Scip. That is so true that I remember to have heard from a master of mine, a very clever man, that the famous Greek, Ulysses, was renowned as wise solely because he had travelled and seen many men and nations. I therefore applaud your determination to go with the soldiers, wherever they might take you.

Berg. To help him in the display of his jugglery, the drummer began to teach me to dance to the sound of the drum, and to play other monkey tricks such as no other dog than myself could ever have acquired. The detachment marched by very short stages; we had no commissary to control us; the captain was a mere lad, but a perfect gentleman, and a great christian; the ensign had but just left the page's hall at the court; the serjeant was a knowing blade, and a great conductor of companies from the place where they were raised to the port of embarkation. The detachment was full of ruffians whose insolent behaviour, in the places through which we passed, redounded in curses directed to a quarter where they were not deserved. It is the misfortune of the good prince to be blamed by some of his subjects, for faults committed by others of them, which he could not remedy if he would, for the circumstances attendant on war are for the most part inevitably harsh, oppressive, and untoward.

In the course of a fortnight, what with my own cleverness, and the diligence of him I had chosen for my patron, I learned to jump for the king of France, and not to jump for the good-for-nothing landlady; he taught me to curvet like a Neapolitan courser, to move in a ring like a mill horse, and other things which might have made one suspect that they were performed by a demon in the shape of a dog. The drummer gave me the name of the wise dog, and no sooner were we arrived at a halting place, than he went about, beating his drum, and giving notice to all who desired to behold the marvellous graces and performances of the wise dog, that they were to be seen at such a house, for four or eight maravedis a head, according to the greater or less wealth of the place. After these encomiums everybody ran to see me, and no one went away without wonder and delight. My master exulted in the gains I brought him, which enabled him to maintain six of his comrades like princes. The envy and covetousness of the rogues was excited, and they were always watching for an opportunity to steal me, for any way of making money by sport has great charms for many. This is why there are so many puppet showmen in Spain, so many who go about with peep shows, so many others who hawk pens and ballads, though their stock, if they sold it all, would not be enough to keep them for a day; and yet they are to be found in taverns and drinking-shops all the year round, whence I infer that the cost of their guzzling is defrayed by other means than the profits of their business. They are all good-for-nothing vagabonds, bread weevils and winesponges.

Scip. No more of that, Berganza; let us not go over the same ground again. Continue your story, for the night is waning, and I should not like, when the sun rises, that we should be left in the shades of silence.

Berg. Keep it and listen. As it is an easy thing to extend and improve our inventions, my master, seeing how well I imitated a Neapolitan courser, made me housings of gilt leather, and a little saddle, which he fitted on my back; he put on it a little figure of a man, with lance in hand, and taught me to run straight at a ring fixed between two stakes. As soon as I was perfect in that performance, my master announced that on that day the wise dog would run at the ring, and exhibit other new and incomparable feats, which, indeed, I drew from my own invention, not to give my master the lie. We next marched to Montilla, a town belonging to the famous and great christian, Marquis of Priego, head of the house of Aguilar and Montilla. My master was quartered, at his own request, in a hospital; he made his usual proclamation, and as my great fame had already reached the town, the court-yard was filled with spectators in less than an hour. My master rejoiced to see such a plenteous harvest, and resolved to show himself that day a first-rate conjuror. The entertainment began with my leaping through a hoop. He had a willow switch in his hand, and when he lowered it, that was a signal for me to leap; and when he kept it raised, I was not to budge.

On that day (for ever memorable in my life) he began by saying, "Come, my friend, jump for that juvenile old gentleman, you know, who blacks his beard; or, if you won't, jump for the pomp and grandeur of Donna Pimpinela de Plafagonia, who was the fellow servant of the Galician kitchen wench at Valdeastillas. Don't you like that, my boy? Then jump for the bachelor Pasillas, who signs himself licentiate without having any degree. How lazy you are! Why don't you jump? Oh! I understand! I am up to your roguery! Jump, then, for the wine of Esquivias, a match for that of Ciudad Real, St. Martin, and Rivadavia." He lowered the switch, and I jumped in accordance with the signal. Then, addressing the audience, "Do not imagine, worshipful senate," he said, "that it is any laughing matter what this dog knows. I have taught him four-and-twenty performances, the least of which is worth going thirty leagues to see. He can dance the zaraband and the chacona better than their inventor; he tosses off a pint of wine without spilling a drop; he intones a sol, fa, mi, re, as well as any sacristan. All these things, and many others which remain to be told, your worships shall witness during the time the company remains here. At present, our wise one will give another jump, and then we will enter upon the main business."

Having inflamed the curiosity of the audience, or senate, as he called them, with this harangue, he turned to me and said, "Come now, my lad, and go through all your jumps with your usual grace and agility; but this time it shall be for the sake of the famous witch who is said to belong to this place." The words were hardly out of his mouth, when the matron of the hospital, an old woman, who seemed upwards of seventy, screamed out, "Rogue, charlatan, swindler, there is no witch here. If you mean Camacha, she has paid the penalty of her sin, and is where God only knows; if you mean me, you juggling cheat, I am no witch, and never was one in my life; and if I ever was reputed to be a witch, I may thank false witnesses, and the injustice of the law, and a presumptuous and ignorant judge. All the world knows the life of penance I lead, not for any acts of witchcraft, which I have never done, but for other great sins which I have committed as a poor sinner. So get out of the hospital, you rascally sheep-skin thumper, or by all the saints I'll make you glad to quit it at a run." And with that she began to screech at such a rate, and pour such a furious torrent of abuse upon my master, that he was utterly confounded. In fine, she would not allow the entertainment to proceed on any account. My master did not care much about the row, as he had his money in his pocket, and he announced that he would give the performance next day in another hospital. The people went away cursing the old woman, and calling her a witch, and a bearded hag into the bargain. We remained for all that in the hospital that night, and the old woman meeting me alone in the yard, said, "Is that you, Montiel, my son? Is that you?" I looked up as she spoke, and gazed steadily at her, seeing which, she came to me with tears in her eyes, threw her arms round my neck, and would have kissed my mouth if I had allowed her; but I was disgusted, and would not endure it.

Scip. You were quite right, for it is no treat, but quite the reverse, to kiss or be kissed by an old woman.

Berg. What I am now going to relate I should have told you at the beginning of my story, as it would have served to diminish the surprise we felt at finding ourselves endowed with speech. Said the old woman to me, "Follow me, Montiel, my son, that you may know my room; and be sure you come to me to-night, that we may be alone together, for I have many things to tell you of great importance for you to know." I drooped my head in token of obedience, which confirmed her in her belief that I was the dog Montiel whom she had been long looking for, as she afterwards told me. I remained bewildered with surprise, longing for the night to see what might be the meaning of this mystery or prodigy, and as I had heard her called a witch, I expected wonderful things from the interview. At last the time came, and I entered the room, which was small, and low, and dimly lighted by an earthenware lamp. The old woman trimmed it, sat down on a chest, drew me to her, and without speaking a word, fell to embracing me, and I to taking care that she did not kiss me.

"I did always hope in heaven," the old woman began, "that I should see my son before my eyes were closed in the last sleep; and now that I have seen you, let death come when it will, and release me from this life of sorrow. You must know, my son, that there lived in this city the most famous witch in the world, called Camacha de Montilla. She was so perfect in her art, that the Erichtheas, Circes, and Medeas, of whom old histories, I am told, are full, were not to be compared to her. She congealed the clouds when she pleased, and covered the face of the sun with them; and when the whim seized her, she made the murkiest sky clear up at once. She fetched men in an instant from remote lands; admirably relieved the distresses of damsels who had forgot themselves for a moment; enabled widows to console themselves without loss of reputation; unmarried wives, and married those she pleased. She had roses in her garden in December, and gathered wheat in January. To make watercresses grow in a handbasin was a trifle to her, or to show any persons whom you wanted to see, either dead or alive, in a looking-glass, or on the nail of a newborn infant. It was reported that she turned men into brutes, and that she made an ass of a sacristan, and used him really and truly in that form for six years. I never could make out how this was done; for as for what is related of those ancient sorceresses, that they turned men into beasts, the learned are of opinion that this means only that by their great beauty and their fascinations, they so captivated men and subjected them to their humours, as to make them seem unreasoning animals. But in you, my son, I have a living instance to the contrary, for I know that you are a rational being, and I see you in the form of a dog; unless indeed this is done through that art which they call Tropelia, which makes people mistake appearances and take one thing for another.

“Be this as it may, what mortifies me is that neither your mother nor myself, who were disciples of the great Camacha, ever came to know as much as she did, and that not for want of capacity, but through her inordinate selfishness, which could never endure that we should learn the higher mysteries of her art, and be as wise as herself. Your mother, my son, was called Montiel, and next to Camacha, she was the most famous of witches. My name is Cañizares; and, if not equal in proficiency to either of these two, at least I do not yield to them in good will to the art. It is true that in boldness of spirit, in the intrepidity with which she entered a circle, and remained enclosed in it with a legion of fiends, your mother was in no wise inferior to Camacha herself; while, for my part, I was always somewhat timid, and contented myself with conjuring half a legion; but though I say it that should not, in the matter of compounding witches’ ointment, I would not turn my back upon either of them, no, nor upon any living who follow our rules. But you must know, my son, ever since I have felt how fast my life is hastening away upon the light wings of time, I have sought to withdraw from all the wickedness of witchcraft in which I was plunged for many years, and I have only amused myself with white magic, a practice so engaging that it is most difficult to forego it. Your mother acted in the same manner; she abandoned many evil practices, and performed many righteous works; but she would not relinquish white magic to the hour of her death. She had no malady, but died by the sorrow brought upon her by her mistress, Camacha, who hated her because she saw that in a short time Montiel would know as much as herself, unless indeed she had some other cause of jealousy not known to me.

“Your mother was pregnant, and her time being come, Camacha was her midwife. She received in her hands what your mother brought forth, and showed her that she had borne two puppy dogs. ‘This is a bad business,’ said Camacha; ‘there is some knavery here. But, sister Montiel, I am your friend, and I will conceal this unfortunate birth; so have patience and get well, and be assured that your misfortune shall remain an inviolable secret.’ I was present at this extraordinary occurrence, and was not less astounded than your mother. Camacha went away taking the whelps with her, and I remained to comfort the lying-in woman, who could not bring herself to believe what had happened. At last Camacha’s end drew near, and when she felt herself at the point of death, she sent for her and told her how she had turned her sons into dogs on account of a certain grudge she bore her, but that she need not distress herself, for they would return to their natural forms when it was least expected; but this would not happen ‘until they shall see the exalted quickly brought low, and the lowly exalted by an arm that is mighty to do it.’

“Your mother wrote down this prophecy, and deeply engraved it in her memory, and so did I, that I might impart it to one of you if ever the opportunity should present itself. And in hopes to recognise you, I have made it a practice to call every dog of your colour by your mother’s name, to see if any of them would answer to one so unlike those usually given to dogs; and, this evening, when I saw you do so many things, and they called you the wise dog, and also when you looked up at me upon my calling to you in the yard, I believed that you were really the son of Montiel. It is with extreme pleasure I acquaint you with the history of your birth, and the manner in which you are to recover your original form. I wish it was as easy as it was for the golden ass of Apuleius, who had only to eat a rose for his restoration; but yours depends upon the actions of others, and not upon your own efforts. What you have to do meanwhile, my son, is to commend yourself heartily to God, and hope for the speedy and prosperous fulfilment of the prophecy; for since it was pronounced by Camacha it will be accomplished without any doubt, and you and your brother, if he is alive, will see yourselves as you would wish to be. All that grieves me is that I am so near my end, that I can have no hope of witnessing the joyful event.

“I have often longed to ask my goat how matters would turn out with you at last; but I had not the courage to do so, for he never gives a straightforward answer, but as crooked and perplexing as possible. That is always the way with our lord and master; there is no use in asking him anything, for with one truth he mingles a thousand lies, and from what I have noted of his replies it appears that he knows nothing for certain of the future, but only by way of conjecture. At the same time he so be-fools us that, in spite of a thousand treacherous tricks he plays us, we cannot shake off his influence. We go to see him a long way from here in a great field, where we meet a multitude of warlocks and witches, and are feasted without measure, and other things take place which, indeed and in truth, I cannot bring myself to mention, nor will I offend your chaste ears by repeating things so filthy and abominable. Many are of opinion that we frequent these assemblies only in imagination, wherein the demon presents to us the images of all those things which we afterwards relate as having occurred to us in reality; others, on the contrary, believe that we actually go to them in body and soul; and for my part I believe that both opinions are true, since we know not when we go in the one manner or in the other; for all that happens to us in imagination does so with such intensity, that it is impossible to distinguish between it and reality. Their worships the inquisitors have had sundry opportunities of investigating this matter, in the cases of some of us whom they have had under their hands, and I believe that they have ascertained the truth of what I state.

“I should like, my son, to shake off this sin, and I have exerted myself to that end. I have got myself appointed matron to this hospital; I tend the poor, and some die who afford me a livelihood either by what they leave me, or by what I find among their rags, through the great care I always take to examine them well. I say but few prayers, and only in public, but grumble a good deal in secret. It is better for me to be a hypocrite than an open sinner; for my present good works efface from the memory of those who know me the bad ones of my past life. After all, pretended sanctity injures no one but the person who practises it. Look you, Montiel, my son, my advice to you is this: be good all you can; but if you must be wicked, contrive all you can not to appear so. I am a witch, I do not deny it, and your mother was one likewise; but the appearances we put on were always enough to maintain our credit in the eyes of the whole world. Three days before she died, we were both present at a grand sabbath of witches in a valley of the Pyrenees; and yet when she died it was with such calmness and serenity, that were it not for some grimaces she made a quarter of an hour before she gave up the ghost, you would have thought she lay upon a bed of flowers. But her two children lay heavy at her heart, and even to her last gasp she never would forgive Camacha, such a resolute spirit she had. I closed her eyes and followed her to the grave, and there took my last look at her; though, indeed, I have not lost the hope of seeing her again before I die, for they say that several persons have met her going about the churchyards and the cross-roads in various forms, and who knows but I may fall in with her some time or other, and be able to ask her whether I can do anything for the relief of her conscience?”

Every word that the old hag uttered in praise of her she called my mother went like a knife to my heart; I longed to fall upon her and tear her to pieces, and only refrained from unwillingness that death should find her in such a wicked state. Finally she told me that she intended to anoint herself that night and go to one of their customary assemblies, and inquire of her master as to what was yet to befall me. I should have liked to ask her what were the ointments she made use of; and it seemed as though she read my thoughts, for she replied to my question as though it had been uttered.

“This ointment,” she said, “is composed of the juices of exceedingly cold herbs, and not, as the vulgar assert, of the blood of children whom we strangle. And here you may be inclined to ask what pleasure or profit can it be to the devil to make us murder little innocents, since he knows that being baptised they go as sinless creatures to heaven, and every Christian soul that escapes him is to him a source of poignant anguish. I know not what answer to give to this except by quoting the old saying, that some people would give both their eyes to make their enemy lose one. He may do it for sake of the grief beyond imagination which the parents suffer from the murder of their children; but what is still more important to him is to accustom us to the repeated commission of such a cruel and perverse sin. And all this God allows by reason of our sinfulness; for without his permission, as I know by experience, the devil has not the power to hurt a pismire; and so true is this, that one day when I requested him to destroy a vineyard belonging to an enemy of mine, he told me that he could not hurt a leaf of it, for God would not allow him. Hence you may understand when you come to be a man, that all the casual evils that befall men, kingdoms, and cities, and peoples, sudden deaths, shipwrecks, devastations, and all sorts of losses and disasters, come from the hand of the Almighty, and by his sovereign permission; and the evils which fall under the denomination of crime, are caused by ourselves. God is without sin, whence it follows that we ourselves are the authors of sin, forming it in thought, word, and deed; God permitting all this by reason of our sinfulness, as I have already said.

“Possibly you will ask, my son, if so be you understand me, who made me a theologian? And mayhap you will say to yourself, Confound the old hag! why does not she leave off being a witch since she knows so much? Why does not she turn to God, since she knows that he is readier to forgive sin than to permit it? To this I reply, as though you had put the question to me, that the habit of sinning becomes a second nature, and that of being a witch transforms itself into flesh and blood; and amidst all its ardour, which is great, it brings with it a chilling influence which so overcomes the soul as to freeze and benumb its faith, whence follows a forgetfulness of itself, and it remembers neither the terrors with which God threatens it, nor the glories with which he allures it. In fact, as sin is fleshly and sensual, it must exhaust and stupefy all the feelings, and render the soul incapable of rising to embrace any good thought, or to clasp the hand which God in his mercy continually holds out to it. I have one of those souls I have described; I see it clearly; but the empire of the senses enchains my will, and I have ever been and ever shall be bad.

“But let us quit this subject, and go back to that of our unguents. They are of so cold a nature that they take away all our senses when we anoint ourselves with them; we remain stretched on the ground, and then they say we experience all those things in imagination which we suppose to occur to us in reality. Sometimes after we have anointed and changed ourselves into fowls, foals, or deer, we go to the place where our master awaits us. There we recover our own forms and enjoy pleasures which I will not describe, for they are such as the memory is ashamed to recal, and the tongue refuses to relate. The short and the long of it is, I am a witch, and cover my many delinquencies with the cloak of hypocrisy. It is true that if some esteem and honour me as a good woman, there are many who bawl in my ear the name imprinted upon your mother and me by order of an ill-tempered judge, who committed his wrath to the hands of the hangman; and the latter, not being bribed, used his plenary power upon our shoulders. But that is past and gone; and all things pass, memories wear out, lives do not renew themselves, tongues grow tired, and new events make their predecessors forgotten. I am matron of a hospital; my behaviour is plausible in appearance; my unguents procure me some pleasant moments, and I am not so old but that I may live another year, my age being seventy-five. I cannot fast on account of my years, nor pray on account of the swimming in my head, nor go on pilgrimages for the weakness of my legs, nor give alms because I am poor, nor think rightly because I am given to backbiting, and to be able to backbite one must first think evil. I know for all that that God is good and merciful, and that he knows what is in store for me, and that is enough; so let us drop this conversation which really makes me melancholy. Come, my son, and see me anoint myself; for there is a cure for every sorrow; and though the pleasures which the devil affords us are illusive and fictitious, yet they appear to us to be pleasures; and sensual delight is much greater in imagination than in actual fruition, though it is otherwise with true joys.”

After this long harangue she got up, and taking the lamp went into another and smaller room. I followed her, filled with a thousand conflicting thoughts, and amazed at what I had heard and what I expected to see. Cañizares hung the lamp against the wall, hastily stripped herself to her shift, took a jug from a corner, put her hand into it, and, muttering between her teeth, anointed herself from her feet to the crown of her head. Before she had finished she said to me, that whether her body remained senseless in that room, or whether it quitted it, I was not to be frightened, nor fail to wait there till morning, when she would bring me word of what was to befall me until I should be a man. I signified my assent by drooping my head; and she finished her unction, and stretched herself on the floor like a corpse. I put my mouth to hers, and perceived that she did not breathe at all. One thing I must own to you, friend Scipio, that I was terribly frightened at seeing myself shut up in that narrow room with that figure before me, which I will describe to you as well as I can.

She was more than six feet high, a mere skeleton covered with a black wrinkled skin. Her dug nose was like two dried and puckered ox-bladders; her lips were blackened; her long teeth locked together; her nose was hooked; her eyes starting from her head; her hair hung in elf-locks on her hollow wrinkled cheeks; — in short, she was all over diabolically hideous. I remained gazing on her for a while, and felt myself overcome with horror as I contemplated the hideous spectacle of her body, and the worse occupation of her soul. I wanted to bite her to see if she would come to herself, but I could not find a spot on her whole body that did not fill me with disgust. Nevertheless, I seized her by one heel, and dragged her to the yard, without her ever giving any sign of feeling. There seeing myself at large with the sky above me, my fear left me, or at least abated, so much as to give me courage to await the result of that wicked woman's expedition, and the news she was to bring me. Meanwhile, I asked myself, how comes this old woman to be at once so knowing and so wicked? How is it that she can so well distinguish between casual and culpable evils? How is it that she understands and speaks so much about God, and acts so much from the prompting of the devil? How is it that she sins so much from choice, not having the excuse of ignorance?

In these reflections I passed the night. The day dawned and found us both in the court, she lying still insensible, and I on my haunches beside her, attentively watching her hideous countenance. The people of the hospital came out, and seeing this spectacle, some of them exclaimed, "The pious Cañizares is dead! See how emaciated she is with fasting and penance." Others felt her pulse, and finding that she was not dead, concluded that she was in a trance of holy ecstasy; whilst others said, "This old hag is unquestionably a witch, and is no doubt anointed, for saints are never seen in such an indecent condition when they are lost in religious ecstasy; and among us who know her, she has hitherto had the reputation of a witch rather than a saint." Some curious inquirers went so far as to stick pins in her flesh up to the head, yet without ever awaking her. It was not till seven o'clock that she came to herself; and then finding how she was stuck over with pins, bitten in the heels, and her back flayed by being dragged from her room, and seeing so many eyes intently fixed upon her, she rightly concluded that I had been the cause of her exposure. "What, you thankless, ignorant, malicious villain," she cried, "is this my reward for the acts I did for your mother and those I intended to do for you?" Finding myself in peril of my life under the talons of that ferocious harpy, I shook her off, and seizing her by her wrinkled flank, I worried and dragged her all about the yard, whilst she shrieked for help from the fangs of that evil spirit. At these words, most present believed that I must be one of those fiends who are continually at enmity with good Christians. Some were for sprinkling me with holy water, some were for pulling me off the old woman, but durst not; others bawled out words to exorcise me. The witch howled, I tightened my grip with my teeth, the confusion increased, and my master was in despair, hearing it said that I was a fiend. A few who knew nothing of exorcisms caught up three or four sticks and began to baste me. Not liking the joke, I let go the old woman; in three bounds I was in the street, and in a few more I was outside the town, pursued by a host of boys, shouting, "Out of the way! the wise dog is gone mad." Others said "he is not mad, but he is the devil in the form of a dog." The people of the place were confirmed in their belief that I was a devil by the tricks they had seen me perform, by the words spoken by the old woman when she woke out of her infernal trance, and by the extraordinary speed with which I shot away from them, so that I seemed to vanish from before them like a being of the other world. In six hours I cleared twelve leagues; and arrived at a camp of gipsies in a field near Granada. There I rested awhile, for some of the gipsies who recognised me as the wise dog, received me with great delight, and hid me in a cave, that I might not be found if any one came in search of me; their intention being, as I afterwards learned, to make money by me as my master the drummer had done. I remained twenty days among them, during which I observed their habits and ways of life; and these are so remarkable that I must give you an account of them.

Scip. Before you go any further, Berganza, we had better consider what the witch said to you, and see if there can possibly be a grain of truth in the great lie to which you give credit. Now, what an enormous absurdity it would be to believe that Camacha could change human beings into brutes, or that the sacristan served her for years under the form of an ass. All these things, and the like, are cheats, lies, or illusions of the devil; and if it now seems to ourselves that we have some understanding and reason — since we speak, though we are really dogs or bear that form — we have already said that this is a portentous and unparalleled case; and though it is palpably before us, yet we must suspend our belief until the event determines what it should be. Shall I make this more plain to you? Consider upon what frivolous things Camacha declared our restoration to depend, and that what seems a prophecy to you is nothing but a fable, or one of those old woman's tales, such as the headless horse, and the wand of virtues, which are told by the fireside in the long winter nights; for were it anything else it would already have been accomplished, unless, indeed, it is to be taken in what I have heard called an allegorical sense: that is to say, a sense which is not the same as that which the letter imports, but which, though differing from it, yet resembles it. Now for your prophecy:— "They are to recover their true forms when they shall see the exalted quickly brought low, and the lowly exalted by a hand that is mighty to do it." If we take this in the sense I have mentioned, it seems to me to mean that we shall recover our forms when we shall see those who yesterday were at the top of fortune's wheel, to-day cast down in the mire, and held of little account by those who most esteemed them; so, likewise, when we shall see others who, but two hours ago, seemed sent into the world only to figure as units in the sum of its population, and now are lifted up to the very summit of prosperity. Now, if our return, as you say, to human form, were to depend on this, why we have already seen it, and we see it every hour. I infer, then, that Camacha's words are to be taken, not in an allegorical, but in a literal, sense; but this will help us out no better, since we have many times seen what they say, and we are still dogs, as you see. And so Carnacha was a cheat, Cañizares an artful hag, and Montiel a fool and a rogue — be it said without offence, if by chance she was the mother of us both, or yours, for I won't have her for mine. Furthermore, I say that the true meaning is a game of nine-pins, in which those that stand up are quickly knocked down, and the fallen are set up again, and that by a hand that is able to do it. Now think whether or not in the course of our lives we have ever seen a game of nine-pins, or having seen it, have therefore been changed into men.

Berg. I quite agree with you Scipio, and have a higher opinion of your judgment than ever. From all you have said, I am come to think and believe that all that has happened to us hitherto, and that is now happening, is a dream; but let us not therefore fail to enjoy this blessing of speech, and the great excellence of holding human discourse all the time we may; and so let it not weary you to hear me relate what befel me with the gipsies who hid me in the cave.

Scip. With great pleasure. I will listen to you, that you in your turn may listen to me, when I relate, if heaven pleases, the events of my life.

Berg. My occupation among the gipsies was to contemplate their numberless tricks and frauds, and the thefts they all commit from the time they are out of leading-strings and can walk alone. You know what a multitude there is of them dispersed all over Spain. They all know each other, keep up a constant intelligence among themselves, and reciprocally pass off and carry away the articles they have purloined. They render less obedience to their king than to one of their own people whom they style count, and who bears the surname of Maldonado, as do all his descendants. This is not because they come of that noble line, but because a page belonging to a cavalier of that name fell in love with a beautiful gipsy, who would not yield to his wishes unless he became a gipsy and made her his wife. The page did so, and was so much liked by the other gipsies, that they chose him for their lord, yielded him obedience, and in token of vassalage rendered to him a portion of everything they stole, whatever it might be.

To give a colour to their idleness the gipsies employ themselves in working in iron, and you may always see them hawking pincers, tongs, hammers, fire-shovels, and so forth, the sale of which facilitates their thefts. The women are all midwives, and in this they have the advantage over others, for they bring forth without cost or attendants. They wash their newborn infants in cold water, and accustom them from birth to death to endure every inclemency of weather. Hence they are all strong, robust, nimble leapers, runners, and dancers. They always marry among themselves, in order that their bad practices may not come to be known, except by their own people. The women are well behaved to their husbands, and few of them intrigue except with persons of their own race. When they seek for alms, it is rather by tricks and juggling than by appeals to charity; and as no one puts faith in them, they keep none, but own themselves downright vagabonds; nor do I remember to have ever seen a gipsy-woman taking the sacrament, though I have often been in the churches. The only thoughts of their minds are how to cheat and steal. They are fond of talking about their thefts and how they effected them. A gipsy, for instance, related one day in my presence how he had swindled a countryman as you shall hear: The gipsy had an ass with a docked tail, and he fitted a false tail to the stump so well that it seemed quite natural. Then he took the ass to market and sold it to a countryman for ten ducats. Having pocketed the money, he told the countryman that if he wanted another ass, own brother to the one he had bought, and every bit as good, he might have it a bargain. The countryman told him to go and fetch it, and meanwhile he would drive that one home. Away went the purchaser; the gipsy followed him, and some how or other, it was not long before he had stolen the ass, from which he immediately whipped off the false tail, leaving only a bare stump. He then changed the halter and saddle, and had the audacity to go and offer the animal for sale to the countryman, before the latter had discovered his loss. The bargain was soon made; the purchaser went into his house to fetch the money to pay for the second ass, and there he discovered the loss of the first.

Stupid as he was, he suspected that the gipsy had stolen the animal, and he refused to pay him. The gipsy brought forward as witness the man who had received the alcabala on the first transaction, and who swore that he had sold the countryman an ass with a very bushy tail, quite different from the second one; and an alguazil, who was present, took the gipsy's part so strongly that the countryman was forced to pay for the ass twice over. Many other stories they told, all about stealing beasts of burden, in which art they are consummate masters. In short, they are a thoroughly bad race, and though many able magistrates have taken them in hand, they have always remained incorrigible.

After I had remained with them twenty days, they set out for Murcia, taking me with them. We passed through Granada, where the company was quartered to which my master the drummer belonged. As the gipsies were aware of this, they shut me up in the place where they were lodged. I overheard them talking about their journey, and thinking that no good would come of it, I contrived to give them the slip, quitted Granada, and entered the garden of a Morisco, who gladly received me. I was quite willing to remain with him and watch his garden, — a much less fatiguing business in my opinion than guarding a flock of sheep; and as there was no need to discuss the question of wages, the Morisco soon had a servant and I a master. I remained with him more than a month, not that the life I led with him was much to my liking, but because it gave me opportunities of observing that of my master, which was like that of all the other Moriscoes in Spain. O what curious things I could tell you, friend Scipio, about that half Paynim rabble, if I were not afraid that I should not get to the end of my story in a fortnight! Nay, if I were to go into particulars, two months would not be enough. Some few specimens, however, you shall hear.

Hardly will you find among the whole race one man who is a sincere believer in the holy law of Christianity. Their only thought is how to scrape up money and keep it; and to this end they toil incessantly and spend nothing. The moment a real falls into their clutches, they condemn it to perpetual imprisonment; so that by dint of perpetually accumulating and never spending, they have got the greater part of the money of Spain into their hands. They are the grubs, the magpies, the weasels of the nation. Consider how numerous they are, and that every day they add much or little to their hoards, and that as they increase in number so the amount of their hoarded wealth must increase without end. None of them of either sex make monastic vows, but all marry and multiply, for thrifty living is a great promoter of fecundity. They are not wasted by war or excessive toil; they plunder us in a quiet way, and enrich themselves with the fruits of our patrimonies which they sell back to us. They have no servants, for they all wait upon themselves. They are at no expense for the education of their sons, for all their lore is but how to rob us. From the twelve sons of Jacob, who entered Egypt, as I have heard, there had sprung, when Moses freed them from captivity, six hundred thousand fighting men, besides women and children. From this we may infer how much the Moriscoes have multiplied, and how incomparably greater must be their numbers.

Scip. Means have been sought for remedying the mischiefs you have mentioned and hinted at; and, indeed, I am sure that those which you have passed over in silence, are even more serious than those which you have touched upon. But our commonwealth has most wise and zealous champions, who, considering that Spain produces and retains in her bosom such vipers as the Moriscoes, will, with God's help, provide a sure and prompt remedy for so great an evil. Go on.

Berg. My master being a stingy hunk, like all his caste, I lived like himself chiefly on maize bread and buckwheat porridge; but this penury helped me to gain paradise, in the strange manner you shall hear. Every morning, by daybreak, a young man used to seat himself at the foot of one of the many pomegranate trees. He had the look of a student, being dressed in a rusty suit of threadbare baize, and was occupied in writing in a note book, slapping his forehead from time to time, biting his nails, and gazing up at the sky. Sometimes he was so immersed in reverie, that he neither moved hand nor foot, nor even winked his eyes. One day I drew near him unperceived, and heard him muttering between his teeth. At last, after a long silence, he cried out aloud, "Glorious! The very best verse I ever composed in my life!" and down went something in his note book. From all this, it was plain that the luckless wight was a poet. I approached him with my ordinary courtesies, and when I had convinced him of my gentleness, he let me lie down at his feet, and resumed the course of his thoughts, scratching his head, falling into ecstasies, and then writing as before.

Meanwhile there came into the garden another young man, handsome and well dressed, with papers in his hand, at which he glanced from time to time. The new comer walked up to the pomegranate tree, and said to the poet, "Have you finished the first act?"

"I have just this moment finished it in the happiest manner possible," was the reply.

"How is that?"

"I will tell you! His Holiness the Pope comes forth in his pontificals, with twelve cardinals in purple canonicals — for the action of my comedy is supposed to take place at the season of mutatio caparum, when their eminences are not dressed in scarlet but in purple — therefore propriety absolutely requires that my cardinals should wear purple. This is a capital point, and one on which your common run of writers would be sure to blunder; but as for me I could not go wrong, for I have read the whole Roman ceremonial through, merely that I might be exact as to these dresses."

"But where do you suppose," said the other, "that our manager is to find purple robes for twelve cardinals?"

"If a single one is wanting," cried the poet, "I would as soon think of flying, as of letting my comedy be represented without it. Zounds! is the public to lose that magnificent spectacle! Just imagine the splendid effect on the stage of a supreme Pontiff and twelve grave cardinals, with all the other dignitaries, who will of course accompany them! By heavens, it will be one of the grandest things ever seen on the stage, not excepting even the nosegay of Duraja!"

I now perceived that one of these young men was a poet, and the other a comedian. The latter advised the former that he should cut out a few of his cardinals, if he did not want to make it impossible for the manager to produce the piece. The poet would not listen to this, but said they might be thankful that he had not brought in the whole conclave, to be present at the memorable event which he proposed to immortalise in his brilliant comedy. The player laughed, left him to his occupation, and returned to his own, which was studying a part in a new play. The poet, after having committed to writing some verses of his magnificent comedy, slowly and gravely drew from his pocket some morsels of bread, and about twenty raisins, or perhaps not so many, for there were some crumbs of bread among them, which increased their apparent number. He blew the crumbs from the raisins, and ate them one by one, stalks and all, for I did not see him throw anything away, adding to them the pieces of bread, which had got such a colour from the lining of his pocket, that they looked mouldy, and were so hard that he could not get them down, though he chewed them over and over again. This was lucky for me, for he threw them to me, saying, "Catch, dog, and much good may it do you." Look, said I to myself, what nectar and ambrosia this poet gives me; for that is the food on which they say these sons of Apollo are nourished. In short, great for the most part is the penury of poets; but greater was my need, since it obliged me to eat what he left.

As long as he was busy with the composition of his comedy he did not fail to visit the garden, nor did I want crusts, for he shared them with me very liberally; and then we went to the well, where we satisfied our thirst like monarchs, I lapping, and he drinking out of a pitcher. But at last the poet came no more, and my hunger became so intolerable, that I resolved to quit the Morisco and seek my fortune in the city. As I entered it, I saw my poet coming out of the famous monastery of San Geronimo. He came to me with open arms, and I was no less delighted to see him. He immediately began to empty his pockets of pieces of bread, softer than those he used to, carry to the garden, and to put them between my teeth without passing them through his own. From the softness of the bits of bread, and my having seen my poet come out of the monastery, I surmised that his muse, like that of many of his brethren, was a bashful beggar. He walked into the city, and I followed him, intending to take him for my master if he would let me, thinking that the crumbs from his table might serve to support me, since there is no better or ampler purse than charity, whose liberal hands are never poor.

After some time, we arrived at the house of a theatrical manager, called Angulo the Bad, to distinguish him from another Angulo, not a manager but a player, one of the best ever seen. The whole company was assembled to hear my master's comedy read; but before the first act was half finished, all had vanished, one by one, except the manager and myself, who formed the whole audience. The comedy was such that to me, who am but an ass in such matters, it seemed as though Satan himself had composed it for the utter ruin and perdition of the poet; and I actually shivered with vexation to see the solitude in which his audience had left him. I wonder did his prophetic soul presage to him the disgrace impending over him; for all the players — and there were more than twelve of them — came back, laid hold on the poet, without saying a word, and, had it not been for the authoritative interference of the manager, they would have tossed him in a blanket. I was confounded by this sad turn of affairs, the manager was incensed, the players very merry; and the poor forlorn poet, with great patience, but a somewhat wry face, took the comedy, thrust it into his bosom, muttering, "It is not right to cast pearls before swine," and sadly quitted the place without another word. I was so mortified and ashamed that I could not follow him, and the manager caressed me so much that I was obliged to remain; and within a month I became an excellent performer in interludes and pantomimes. Interludes, you know, usually end with a cudgelling bout, but in my master's theatre they ended with setting me at the characters of the piece, whom I worried and tumbled one over the other, to the huge delight of the ignorant spectators, and my master's great gain.

Oh, Scipio! what things I could tell you that I saw among these players, and two other companies to which I belonged; but I must leave them for another day, for it would be impossible to compress them within moderate limits. All you have heard is nothing to what I could relate to you about these people and their ways, their work and their idleness, their ignorance and their cleverness, and other matters without end, which might serve to disenchant many who idolise these fictitious divinities.

Scip. I see clearly, Berganza, that the field is large; but leave it now, and go on.

Berg. I arrived with a company of players in this city of Valladolid, where they gave me a wound in an interlude that was near being the death of me. I could not revenge myself then, because I was muzzled, and I had no mind to do so afterwards in cold blood; for deliberate vengeance argues a cruel and malicious disposition. I grew weary of this employment, not because it was laborious, but because I saw in it many things which called for amendment and castigation; and, as it was not in my power to remedy them, I resolved to see them no more, but to take refuge in an abode of holiness, as those do who forsake their vices when they can no longer practise them; but better late than never. Well, then, seeing you one night carrying the lantern with that good Christian Mahudes, I noticed how contented you were, how righteous and holy was your occupation. Filled with honest emulation, I longed to follow your steps; and, with that laudable intention, I placed myself before Mahudes, who immediately elected me your companion, and brought me to this hospital. What has occurred to me since I have been here would take some time to relate. I will just mention a conversation I heard between four invalids, who lay in four beds next each other. It will not take long to tell, and it fits in here quite pat.

Scip. Very well; but be quick, for, to the best of my belief, it cannot be far from daylight.

Berg. The four beds were at the end of the infirmary, and in them lay an alchemist, a poet, a mathematician, and one of those persons who are called projectors.

Scip. I recollect these good people well.

Berg. One afternoon, last summer, the windows being closed, I lay panting under one of their beds, when the poet began piteously to bewail his ill fortune. The mathematician asked him what he complained of.

“Have I not good cause for complaint?” he replied. “I have strictly observed the rule laid down by Horace in his Art of Poetry, not to bring to light any work until ten years after it has been composed. Now, I have a work on which I was engaged for twenty years, and which has lain by me for twelve. The subject is sublime, the invention perfectly novel, the episodes singularly happy, the versification noble, and the arrangement admirable, for the beginning is in perfect correspondence with the middle and the end. Altogether it is a lofty, sonorous, heroic poem, delectable and full of matter; and yet I cannot find a prince to whom I may dedicate it — a prince, I say, who is intelligent, liberal, and magnanimous. Wretched and depraved age this of ours!”

“What is the subject of the work?” inquired the alchemist.

“It treats,” said the poet, “of that part of the history of king Arthur of England which archbishop Turpin left unwritten, together with the history of the quest of the Sangreal, the whole in heroic measure, — part rhymes, part blank-verse; and in dactyles moreover, that is to say, in dactylic noun substantives, without any admission of verbs.”

“For my part, I am not much of a judge in matters of poetry,” returned the alchemist, “and therefore I cannot precisely estimate the misfortune you complain of; but in any case it cannot equal my own in wanting means, or a prince to back me and supply me with the requisites, for prosecuting the science of alchemy; but for which want alone I should now be rolling in gold, and richer than ever was Midas, Crassus, or Croesus.”

“Have you ever succeeded, Señor Alchemist,” said the mathematician, “in extracting gold from the other metals?”

“I have not yet extracted it,” the alchemist replied, “but I know for certain that the thing is to be done, and that in less than two months more I could complete the discovery of the philosopher’s stone, by means of which gold can be made even out of pebbles.”

“Your worships,” rejoined the mathematician, “have both of you made a great deal of your misfortunes; but after all, one of you has a book to dedicate, and the other is on the point of discovering the philosopher’s stone, by means of which he will be as rich as all those who have followed that course. But what will you say of my misfortune, which is great beyond compare? For two and twenty years I have been in pursuit of the fixed point; here I miss it, there I get sight of it again, and just when it seems that I am down upon it so that it can by no means escape me, I find myself on a sudden so far away from it that I am utterly amazed. It is just the same with the quadrature of the circle. I have been within such a hair’s breadth of it, that I cannot conceive how it is that I have not got it in my pocket. Thus I suffer a torment like that of Tantalus, who starves with fruits all round him, and burns with thirst with water at his lip. At one moment I seem to grasp the truth, at another it is far away from me; and, like another Sisyphus, I begin again to climb the hill which I have just rolled down, along with all the mass of my labours.”

The projector, who had hitherto kept silence, now struck in. “Here we are,” he said, “four complainants, brought together by poverty under the roof of this hospital. To the devil with such callings and employments, as give neither pleasure nor bread to those who exercise them! I, gentlemen, am a projector, and have at various times offered sundry valuable projects to his majesty, all to his advantage, and without prejudice to the realm; and I have now a memorial in which I supplicate his majesty to appoint a person to whom I may communicate a new project of mine, which will be the means of entirely liquidating all his debts. But from the fate which all my other memorials have had, I foresee that this one also will be thrown into the dust-hole. Lest, however, your worships should think me crack-brained, I will explain my project to you, though this be in some degree a publication of my secret.

“I propose that all his majesty’s vassals, from the age of fourteen to sixty, be bound once a month, on a certain appointed day, to fast on bread and water; and that the whole expenditure, which would otherwise be made on that day for food, including fruit, meat, fish, wine, eggs, and vegetables, be turned into money, and the amount paid to his majesty, without defrauding him of a doit, as each shall declare on oath. By this means, in the course of twenty years the king will be freed from all debts and incumbrances. The calculation is easily made. There are in Spain more than three millions of persons of the specified age, exclusive of invalids, old, and young, and there is not one of these but spends at least a real and a half daily; however, I am willing to put it at a real only, and less it cannot be, even were they to eat nothing but leeks. Now does it not strike your worships that it would be no bad thing to realise every month three millions of reals, all net and clear as if they were winnowed and sifted? The plan, moreover, instead of a loss to his majesty’s subjects, would be a real advantage to them; for by means of their fasts they would make themselves acceptable to God and would serve their king, and some of them even might find it beneficial to their health. The project is in every way admirable, as you must confess; the money too might be collected by parishes, without the cost of tax gatherers and receivers, those plagues and bloodsuckers of the realm.”

The others all laughed at the projector’s scheme, and even he himself joined in the laugh at last. For my part I found much matter for reflection in the strange conversation I had heard, and in the fact that people such as these usually end their days in a hospital.

Scip. That is true, Berganza. Have you anything more to say?

Berg. Two things more and then I shall have done, for I think day is beginning to dawn. One day I accompanied Mahudes to ask for alms in the house of the corregidor of this city, who is a great cavalier and a very great Christian. We found him alone, and I thought fit to take advantage of that opportunity to give him certain counsels which I had gathered from the lips of an old invalid in this hospital, who was discussing the means of saving from perdition those vagabond girls who take to a life of vice to avoid labour, — an intolerable evil demanding an immediate and effectual remedy. Wishing to impart what I had heard to the corregidor, I lifted up my voice, thinking to speak; but instead of articulate speech I barked so loudly that the corregidor called out in a passion to his servants to drive me out of the room with sticks; whereupon one of them caught up a copper syphon, which Was the nearest thing at hand, and thrashed me with it so, that I feel it in my ribs to this hour.

Scip. And do you complain of that, Berganza?

Berg. Nay; have I not reason to complain, since I feel the pain even now; and since it appears to me that my good intentions merited no such chastisement?

Scip. Look you, Berganza, no one should interfere where he is not wanted, nor take upon himself a business that in no wise is his concern. Besides, you ought to know, that the advice of the poor, however good it may be, is never taken; nor should the lowly presume to offer advice to the great, who fancy they know everything. Wisdom in a poor man lies under a cloud, and cannot be seen; or if by chance it shines through it, people mistake it for folly, and treat it with contempt.

Berg. You are right, Scipio; and having had the lesson well beaten into me, I will henceforth act accordingly. That same night I entered the house of a lady of quality, who had in her arms a little lap-dog, so very diminutive that she could have hid it in her bosom. The instant it saw me, it flew at me out of its mistress's arms, barking with all its might, and even went so far as to bite my leg. I looked at it with disgust, and said to myself, "If I met you in the street, paltry little animal, either I would take no notice of you at all, or I would make mince meat of you." The little wretch was an example of the common rule — that mean-souled persons when they are in favour are always insolent, and ready to offend those who are much better than themselves, though inferior to them in fortune.

Scip. We have many instances of this in worthless fellows, who are insolent enough under cover of their masters' protection; but if death or any other chance brings down the tree against which they leaned, their true value becomes apparent, since they have no other merit than that borrowed from their patrons; whilst virtue and good sense are always the same, whether clothed or naked, alone or accompanied. But let us break off now; for the light beaming in through those chinks shows that the dawn is far advanced.

Berg. Be it so; and I trust in heaven that to-night we shall find ourselves in a condition to renew our conversation.

The licentiate finished the reading of this dialogue, and the Alferez his nap, both at the same time. "Although this colloquy is manifestly fictitious," said the licentiate, "it is, in my opinion, so well composed, that the Señor Alferez may well proceed with the second part."

"Since you give me such encouragement, I will do so," replied the alferez, "without further discussing the question with you, whether the dogs spoke or not."

"There is no need that we should go over that ground again," said the licentiate. "I admire the art and the invention you have displayed in the dialogue, and that is enough. Let us go to the Espolon, and recreate our bodily eyes, as we have gratified those of our minds."

"With all my heart," said the alferez, and away they went.

THE LITTLE GIPSY GIRL.

It would almost seem that the Gitanos and Gitanas, or male and female gipsies, had been sent into the world for the sole purpose of thieving. Born of parents who are thieves, reared among thieves, and educated as thieves, they finally go forth perfected in their vocation, accomplished at all points, and ready for every species of roguery. In them the love of thieving, and the ability to exercise it, are qualities inseparable from their existence, and never lost until the hour of their death.

Now it chanced that an old woman of this race, one who had merited retirement on full pay as a veteran in the ranks of Cacus, brought up a girl whom she called Preciosa, and declared to be her granddaughter. To this child she imparted all her own acquirements, all the various tricks of her art. Little Preciosa became the most admired dancer in all the tribes of Gipsydom; she was the most beautiful and discreet of all their maidens; nay she shone conspicuous not only among the gipsies, but even as compared with the most lovely and accomplished damsels whose praises were at that time sounded forth by the voice of fame. Neither sun, nor wind, nor all those vicissitudes of weather, to which the gipsies are more constantly exposed than any other people, could impair the bloom of her complexion or embrown her hands; and what is more remarkable, the rude manner in which she was reared only served to reveal that she must have sprung from something better than the Gitano stock; for she was extremely pleasing and courteous in conversation, and lively though she was, yet in no wise did she display the least unseemly levity; on the contrary, amidst all her sprightliness, there was at the same time so much genuine decorum in her manner, that in the presence of Preciosa no gitana, old or young, ever dared to sing lascivious songs, or utter unbecoming words.

The grandmother fully perceived what a treasure she had in her grandchild; and the old eagle determined to set her young eaglet flying, having been careful to teach her how to live by her talons. Preciosa was rich in hymns, ballads, seguidillas, sarabands, and other ditties, especially romances, which she sang with peculiar grace; for the cunning grandmother knew by experience that such accomplishments, added to the youth and beauty of her granddaughter, were the best means of increasing her capital, and therefore she failed not to promote their cultivation in every way she could. Nor was the aid of poets wanting; for some there are who do not disdain to write for the gipsies, as there are those who invent miracles for the pretended blind, and go snacks with them in what they gain from charitable believers.

During her childhood, Preciosa lived in different parts of Castile; but in her sixteenth year her grandmother brought her to Madrid, to the usual camping-ground of the gipsies, in the fields of Santa Barbara. Madrid seemed to her the most likely place to find customers; for there everything is bought and sold. Preciosa made her first appearance in the capital on the festival of Santa Anna, the patroness of the city, when she took part in a dance performed by eight gitanas, with one gitano, an excellent dancer, to lead them. The others were all very well, but such was the elegance of Preciosa, that she fascinated the eyes of all the spectators. Amidst the sound of the tambourine and castanets, in the heat of the dance, a murmur of admiration arose for the beauty and grace of Preciosa; but when they heard her sing — for the dance was accompanied with song — the fame of the gitana reached its highest point; and by common consent the jewel offered as the prize of the best dancer in that festival was adjudged to her. After the usual dance in the church of Santa Maria, before the image of the glorious Santa Anna, Preciosa caught up a tambourine, well furnished with bells, and having cleared a wide circle around her with pirouettes of exceeding lightness, she sang a hymn to the patroness of the day. It was the admiration of all who heard her. Some said, “God bless the girl!” Others, “’Tis a pity that this maiden is a gitana: truly she deserves to be the daughter of some great lord!” Others more coarsely observed, “Let the wench grow up, and she will show you pretty tricks; she is closing the meshes of a very nice net to fish for hearts.” Another more good-natured but ill-bred and stupid, seeing her foot it so lightly, “Keep it up! keep it up! Courage, darling! Grind the dust to atoms!” “Never fear,” she answered, without losing a step; “I’ll grind it to atoms.”

At the vespers and feast of Santa Anna Preciosa was somewhat fatigued; but so celebrated had she become for beauty, wit, and discretion, as well as for her dancing, that nothing else was talked of throughout the capital. A fortnight afterwards, she returned to Madrid, with three other girls, provided with their tambourines and a new dance, besides a new stock of romances and songs, but all of a moral character; for Preciosa would never permit those in her company to sing immodest songs, nor would she ever sing them herself. The old gitana came with her, for she now watched her as closely as Argus, and never left her side, lest some one should carry her off. She called her granddaughter, and the girl believed herself to be her grandchild.

The young gitanas began their dance in the shade, in the Calle de Toledo, and were soon encircled by a crowd of spectators. Whilst they danced, the old woman gathered money among the bystanders, and they showered it down like stones on the highway; for beauty has such power that it can awaken slumbering charity. The dance over, Preciosa said, "If you will give me four quartos, I will sing by myself a beautiful romance about the churching of our lady the Queen Doña Margarita. It is a famous composition, by a poet of renown, one who may be called a captain in the battalion of poets." No sooner had she said this, than almost every one in the ring cried out, "Sing it, Preciosa; here are my four quartos;" and so many quartos were thrown down for her, that the old gitana had not hands enough to pick them up. When the gathering was ended, Preciosa resumed her tambourine, and sang the promised romance, which was loudly encored, the whole audience crying out with one voice, "Sing again, Preciosa, sing again, and dance for us, girl: thou shalt not want quartos, whilst thou hast the ground beneath thy feet."

Whilst more than two hundred persons were thus looking on at the dance, and listening to the singing of the gitana, one of the lieutenants of the city passed by; and seeing so many people together, he asked what was the occasion of the crowd. Being told that the handsome gitana was singing there, the lieutenant, who was not without curiosity, drew near also to listen, but in consideration of his dignity, he did not wait for the end of the romance. The gitanilla, however, pleased him so much, that he sent his page to tell the old crone to come to his house that evening with her troop, as he wished his wife Doña Clara to hear them. The page delivered the message, and the old gitana promised to attend.

After the performance was ended, and the performers were going elsewhere, a very well-dressed page came up to Preciosa, and giving her a folded paper, said, "Pretty Preciosa, will you sing this romance? It is a very good one, and I will give you others from time to time, by which you will acquire the fame of having the best romances in the world."

"I will learn this one with much willingness," replied Preciosa; "and be sure, señor, you bring me the others you speak of, but on condition that there is nothing improper in them. If you wish to be paid for them, we will agree for them by the dozen; but do not expect to be paid in advance; that will be impossible. When a dozen have been sung, the money for a dozen shall be forthcoming."

"If the Señora Preciosa only pays me for the paper," said the page, "I shall be content. Moreover, any romance which does not turn out so well shall not be counted."

"I will retain the right of choice," said Preciosa; and then she continued her way with her companions up the street, when some gentlemen called and beckoned to them from a latticed window. Preciosa went up and looked through the window, which was near the ground, into a cheerful, well-furnished apartment, in which several cavaliers were walking about, and others playing at various games. "Will you give me a share of your winnings, señors?" said Preciosa, in the lisping accent of the gipsies, which she spoke not by nature but from choice. At the sight of Preciosa, and at the sound of her voice, the players quitted the tables, the rest left off lounging, and all thronged to the window, for her fame had already reached them. "Come in! Let the little gipsies come in," said the cavaliers, gaily; "we will certainly give them a share of our winnings."

"But you might make it cost us dear, señors," said Preciosa.

"No, on the honour of gentlemen," said one, "you may come in, niña, in full security that no one will touch the sole of your shoe. I swear this to you by the order I wear on my breast;" and as he spoke he laid his hand on the cross of the order of Calatrava which he wore.

"If you like to go in, Preciosa," said one of the gitanillas who were with her, "do so by all means; but I do not choose to go where there are so many men."

"Look you, Christina," answered Preciosa, "what you have to beware of is one man alone; where there are so many there is nothing to fear. Of one thing you may be sure, Christina; the woman who is resolved to be upright may be so amongst an army of soldiers. It is well, indeed, to avoid occasions of temptation, but it is not in crowded rooms like this that danger lurks."

"Well then, let us go in, Preciosa," said her companion, "you know more than a witch."

The old gipsy also encouraged them to go in, and that decided the question. As soon as they had entered the room, the cavalier of the order, seeing the paper which Preciosa carried, stretched out his hand to take it. "Do not take it from me," she said: "It is a romance but just given to me, and which I have not yet had time to read."

"And do you know how to read, my girl?" said one of the cavaliers.

"Ay, and to write too," said the old woman. "I have brought up my grandchild as if she was a lawyer's daughter."

The cavalier opened the paper, and finding a gold crown inclosed in it, said, "Truly, Preciosa, the contents of this letter are worth the postage. Here is a crown inclosed in the romance."

"The poet has treated me like a beggar," said Preciosa; "but it is certainly a greater marvel for one of his trade to give a crown than for one of mine to receive it. If his romances come to me with this addition, he may transscribe the whole Romancero General and send me every piece in it one by one. I will weigh their merit; and if I find there is good matter in them, I will not reject them. Read the paper aloud, señor, that we may see if the poet is as wise as he is liberal." The cavalier accordingly read as follows: —

Sweet gipsy girl, whom envy's self Must own of all fair maids the fairest, Ah!
well befits thy stony heart The name thou, Preciosa, bearest.

If as in beauty, so in pride And cruelty thou grow to sight, Woe worth the land, woe worth the age Which brought thy fatal charms to light.

A basilisk in thee we see, Which fascinates our gaze and kills. No empire mild is thine, but one That tyrannises o'er our wills.

How grew such charms 'mid gipsy tribes, From roughest blasts without a shield? How such a perfect chrysolite Could humble Manzanares yield?

River, for this thou shalt be famed, Like Tagus with its golden show, And more for Preciosa prized Than Ganges with its lavish flow.

In telling fortunes who can say What dupes to ruin thou beguilest? Good luck thou speak'st with smiling lips. But luckless they on whom thou smilest!

Tis said they're witches every one, The women of the gipsy race; And all men may too plainly see That thou hast witchcraft in thy face.

A thousand different modes are thine To turn the brain; for rest or move, Speak, sing, be mute, approach, retire, Thou kindlest still the fire of love.

The freest hearts bend to thy sway, And lose the pride of liberty; Bear witness mine, thy captive thrall, Which would not, if it could, be free.

These lines, thou precious gem of love, Whose praise all power of verse transcend, He who for thee will live or die, Thy poor and humble lover sends.

"The poem ends with 'poor' in the last line," said Preciosa; "and that is a bad sign. Lovers should never begin by saying that they are poor, for poverty, it strikes me, is a great enemy to love."

"Who teaches you these things, girl?" said one of the cavaliers.

"Who should teach me?" she replied. "Have I not a soul in my body? Am I not fifteen years of age? I am neither lame, nor halt, nor maimed in my understanding. The wit of a gipsy girl steers by a different compass from that which guides other people. They are always forward for their years. There is no such thing as a stupid gitano, or a silly gitana. Since it is only by being sharp and ready that they can earn a livelihood, they polish their wits at every step, and by no means let the moss grow under their feet. You see these girls, my companions, who are so silent. You may think they are simpletons, but put your fingers in their mouths to see if they have cut their wise teeth; and then you shall see what you shall see. There is not a gipsy girl of twelve who does not know as much as one of another race at five-and-twenty, for they have the devil and much practice for instructors, so that they learn in one hour what would otherwise take them a year."

The company were much amused by the gitana's chat, and all gave her money. The old woman sacked thirty reals, and went off with her flock as merry as a cricket to the house of the señor lieutenant, after promising that she would return with them another day to please such liberal gentlemen. Doña Clara, the lieutenant's lady, had been apprised of the intended visit of the gipsies, and she and her doncellas and dueñas, as well as those of another señora, her neighbour, were expecting them as eagerly as one looks for a shower in May. They had come to see Preciosa. She entered with her companions, shining among them like a torch among lesser lights, and all the ladies pressed towards her. Some kissed her, some gazed at her; others blessed her sweet face, others her graceful carriage. "This, indeed, is what you may call golden hair," cried Doña Clara; "these are truly emerald eyes." The señora, her neighbour, examined the gitanilla piecemeal. She made a pepetoria of all her joints and members, and coming at last to a dimple in her chin, she said, "Oh, what a dimple! it is a pit into which all eyes that behold it must fall." Thereupon an esquire in attendance on Doña Clara, an elderly gentleman with a long beard, exclaimed, "Call you this a dimple, señora? I know little of dimples then if this be one. It is no dimple, but a grave of living desires. I vow to God the gitanilla is such a dainty creature, she could not be better if she was made of silver or sugar paste. Do you know how to tell fortunes, niña?"

"That I do, and in three or four different manners," replied Preciosa.

"You can do that too?" exclaimed Doña Clara. "By the life of my lord the lieutenant, you must tell me mine, niña of gold, niña of silver, niña of pearls, niña of carbuncles, niña of heaven, and more than that cannot be said."

"Give the niña the palm of your hand, señora, and something to cross it with," said the old gipsy; "and you will see what things she will tell you, for she knows more than a doctor of medicine."

The señora Tenienta put her hand in her pocket, but found it empty; she asked for the loan of a quarto from her maids, but none of them had one, neither had the señora her neighbour. Preciosa seeing this, said, "For the matter of crosses all are good, but those made with silver or gold are best. As for making the sign of the cross with copper money, that, ladies, you must know lessens the luck, at least it does mine. I always like to begin by crossing the palm with a good gold crown, or a piece of eight, or at least a quarto, for, I am like the sacristans who rejoice when there is a good collection."

"How witty you are," said the lady visitor; then turning to the squire, "Do you happen to have a quarto about you, Señor Contreras? if you have, give it me, and when my husband the doctor comes you shall have it again."

"I have one," replied Contreras, "but it is pledged for two-and-twenty maravedis for my supper; give me so much and I will fly to fetch it."

"We have not a quarto amongst us all," said Doña Clara, "and you ask for two-and-twenty maravedis? Go your ways, Contreras, for a tiresome blockhead, as you always were.”

One of the damsels present, seeing the penury of the house, said to Preciosa, “Niña, will it be of any use to make the cross with a silver thimble?”

“Certainly,” said Preciosa; “the best crosses in the world are made with silver thimbles, provided there are plenty of them.”

“I have one,” said the doncella; “if that is enough, here it is, on condition that my fortune be told too.”

“So many fortunes to be told for a thimble!” exclaimed the old gipsy. “Make haste, granddaughter, for it will soon be night.” Preciosa took the thimble, and began her sooth saying.

Pretty lady, pretty lady, With a hand as silver fair, How thy husband dearly loves thee 'Tis superfluous to declare.

Thou'rt a dove, all milk of kindness; Yet at times too thou canst be Wrathful as a tiger, or a Lioness of Barbary.

Thou canst show thy teeth when jealous; Truly the lieutenant's sly; Loves with furtive sports to vary Magisterial gravity.

What a pity! One worth having Woo'd thee when a maiden fair. Plague upon all interlopers! You'd have made a charming pair.

Sooth, I do not like to say it, Yet it may as well be said; Thou wilt be a buxom widow; Twice again shalt thou be wed.

Do not weep, my sweet senora; We gitanas, you must know, Speak not always true as gospel Weep not then sweet lady so.

If the thought is too distressing, Losing such a tender mate, Thou hast but to die before him, To escape a widow's fate.

Wealth abundant thou'lt inherit, And that quickly, never fear: Thou shalt have a son, a canon, — Of what church does not appear;

Not Toledo; no, that can't be; And a daughter — let me see — Ay, she'll rise to be an abbess; — That is, if a nun she be.

If thy husband do not drop off From this moment in weeks four, Burgos him, or Salamanca, Shall behold corregidor.

Meanwhile keep thyself from tripping: Where thou walkest, many a snare For the feet of pretty ladies Naughty gallants lay: beware!

Other things still more surprising Shall on Friday next be told, Things to startle and delight thee, When I've crossed thy palm with gold.

Preciosa having finished this oracular descant for the lady of the house, the rest of the company were all eager to have their fortunes told likewise, but she put them off till the next Friday, when they promised to have silver coin ready for crossing their palms. The señor lieutenant now came in, and heard a glowing account of the charms and accomplishments of the leading gitana. Having made her and her companions dance a little, he emphatically confirmed the encomiums bestowed on Preciosa; and putting his hand in his pocket he groped and rummaged about in it for a while, but at last drew his hand out empty, saying, "Upon my life I have not a doit. Give Preciosa a real, Doña Clara; I will give it you by and by."

"That is all very well, señor," the lady replied; "but where is the real to come from? Amongst us all we could not find a quarto to cross our hands with."

"Well, give her some trinket or another, that Preciosa may come another day to see us, when we will treat her better."

"No," said Doña Clara, "I will give her nothing to-day, and I shall be sure she will come again."

"On the contrary," said Preciosa, "if you give me nothing. I will never come here any more. Sell justice, señor lieutenant, sell justice, and then you will have money. Do not introduce new customs, but do as other magistrates do, or you will die of hunger. Look you, señor, I have heard say that money enough may be made of one's office to pay any mulets that may be incurred, and to help one to other appointments."

"So say and do those who have no conscience," said the lieutenant; "but the judge who does his duty will have no mulet to pay; and to have well discharged his office, will be his best help to obtain another."

"Your worship speaks like a very saint," replied Preciosa; "proceed thus, and we shall snip pieces off your old coats for relics."

"You know a great deal, Preciosa," said the lieutenant; "say no more, and I will contrive that their majesties shall see you, for you are fit to be shown to a king."

"They will want me for a court fool," said the gitanilla, "and as I never shall learn the trade, your pains will be all for nothing. If they wanted me for my cleverness, they might have me; but in some palaces fools thrive better than the wise. I am content to be a gitana, and poor, and let Heaven dispose of me as it pleases."

"Come along, niña," said the old gipsy; "say no more, you have said a great deal already, and know more than I ever taught you. Don't put too fine a point to your wit for fear it should get blunted; speak of things suitable to your years; and don't set yourself on the high ropes, lest you should chance to have a fall."

"The deuce is in these gitanas," said the delighted lieutenant, as they were taking their leave. The doncella of the thimble stopped them for a moment, saying to Preciosa, "Tell me my fortune, or give me back my thimble, for I have not another to work with."

“Señora doncella,” replied Preciosa, “count upon your fortune as if it were already told, and provide yourself with another; or else sew no more gussets until I come again on Friday, when I will tell you more fortunes and adventures than you could read in any book of knight errantry.”

The gipsies went away, and falling in with numerous workwomen returning from Madrid to their villages as usual at the Ave Maria, they joined company with them, as they always did for the greater security; for the old gipsy lived in perpetual terror lest some one should run away with her granddaughter.

One morning after this as they were returning to Madrid to levy black mail along with other gitanas, in a little valley about five hundred yards from the city, they met a handsome young gentleman richly dressed; his sword and dagger were a blazo of gold; his hat was looped with a jewelled band, and was adorned with plumes of various colours. The gitanas stopped on seeing him, and set themselves to observe his movements at their leisure, wondering much that so fine a cavalier should be alone and on foot in such a place at that early hour. He came up to them, and addressing the eldest gitana, said, “On your life, friend, I entreat you do me the favour to let me say two words in private to you and Preciosa. It shall be for your good.”

“With all my heart,” said the old woman, “so you do not take us much out of our way, or delay us long;” and calling Preciosa, they withdrew to some twenty paces distance, where they stopped, and the young gentleman thus addressed them: “I am so subdued by the wit and beauty of Preciosa, that after having in vain endeavoured to overcome my admiration, I have at last found the effort impossible. I, señoras (for I shall always give you that title if heaven favours my pretensions), am a knight, as this dress may show you;” and opening his cloak he displayed the insignia of one of the highest orders in Spain; “I am the son of — — “ (here he mentioned a personage whose name we suppress for obvious reasons), “and am still under tutelage and command. I am an only son, and expect to inherit a considerable estate. My father is here in the capital, looking for a certain post which by all accounts he is on the point of obtaining. Being then of the rank and condition which I have declared to you, I should yet wish to be a great lord for the sake of Preciosa, that I might raise her up to my own level, and make her my equal and my lady. I do not seek to deceive; the love I bear her is too deep for any kind of deception; I only desire to serve her in whatever way shall be most agreeable to her; her will is mine; for her my heart is wax to be moulded as she pleases but enduring as marble to retain whatever impression she shall make upon it. If you believe me I shall fear no discouragement from any other quarter, but if you doubt me, I shall despond. My name is — — ; my father’s I have already given you; he lives in such a house in such a street and you may inquire about him and me of the neighbours, and of others also; for our name and quality are not so obscure but that you may hear of us about the court, and every, where in the capital. I have here a hundred crowns in gold to present to you, as earnest of what I mean to give you hereafter; for a man will be no niggard of his wealth who has given away his very soul.”

Whilst the cavalier was speaking, Preciosa watched him attentively, and doubtless she saw nothing to dislike either in his language or his person. Turning to the old woman, she said, “Pardon me, grandmother, if I take the liberty of answering this enamoured señor myself.”

“Make whatever answer you please, granddaughter,” said the old woman, “for I know you have sense enough for anything.” So Preciosa began.

“Señor cavalier,” she said, “though I am but a poor gitana and humbly born, yet I have a certain fantastic little spirit within me, which moves me to great things. Promises do not tempt me, nor presents sap my resolution, nor obsequiousness allure, nor amorous wiles ensnare me; and although by my grandmother’s reckoning I shall be but fifteen next Michaelmas, I am already old in thought, and have more understanding than my years would seem to promise. This may, perhaps, be more from nature than from experience; but be that as it may, I know that the passion of love is an impetuous impulse, which violently distorts the current of the will, makes it dash furiously against all impediments, and recklessly pursue the desired object. But not unfrequently when the lover believes himself on the point of gaining the heaven of his wishes, he falls into the hell of disappointment. Or say that the object is obtained, the lover soon becomes wearied of his so much desired treasure, and opening the eyes of his understanding he finds that what before was so devoutly adored is now become abhorrent to him. The fear of such a result inspires me with so great a distrust, that I put no faith in words, and doubt many deeds. One sole jewel I have, which I prize more than life, and that is my virgin purity, which I will not sell for promises or gifts, for sold it would be in that case, and if it could be bought, small indeed would be its value. Nor is it to be filched from me by wiles or artifices; rather will I carry it with me to my grave, and perhaps to heaven, than expose it to danger by listening to specious tales and chimeras. It is a flower which nothing should be allowed to sully, even in imagination if it be possible. Nip the rose from the spray, and how soon it fades! One touches it, another smells it, a third plucks its leaves, and at last the flower perishes in vulgar hands. If you are come then, señor, for this booty, you shall never bear it away except bound in the ties of wedlock. If you desire to be my spouse, I will be yours; but first there are many conditions to be fulfilled, and many points to be ascertained.

“In the first place I must know if you are the person you declare yourself to be. Next, should I find this to be true, you must straightway quit your father's mansion, and exchange it for our tents, where, assuming the garb of a gipsy, you must pass two years in our schools, during which I shall be able to satisfy myself as to your disposition, and you will become acquainted with mine. At the end of that period, if you are pleased with me and I with you, I will give myself up to you as your wife; but till then I will be your sister and your humble servant, and nothing more. Consider, señor, that during the time of this novitiate you may recover your sight, which now seems lost, or at least disordered, and that you may then see fit to shun what now you pursue with so much ardour. You will then be glad to regain your lost liberty, and having done so, you may by sincere repentance obtain pardon of your family for your faults. If on these conditions you are willing to enlist in our ranks, the matter rests in your own hands; but if you fail in any one of them, you shall not touch a finger of mine."

The youth was astounded at Preciosa's decision, and remained as if spell-bound, with his eyes bent on the ground, apparently considering what answer he should return. Seeing this, Preciosa said to him, "This is not a matter of such light moment that it can or ought to be resolved on the spot. Return, señor, to the city, consider maturely what is best for you to do; and you may speak with me in this same place any week-day you please, as we are on our way to or from Madrid."

"When Heaven disposed me to love you, Preciosa," replied the cavalier, "I determined to do for you whatever it might be your will to require of me, though it never entered my thoughts that you would make such a demand as you have now done; but since it is your pleasure that I should comply with it, count me henceforth as a gipsy, and put me to all the trials you desire, you will always find me the same towards you as I now profess myself. Fix the time when you will have me change my garb. I will leave my family under pretext of going to Flanders, and will bring with me money for my support for some time. In about eight days I shall be able to arrange for my departure, and I will contrive some means to get rid of my attendants, so as to be free to accomplish my purpose. What I would beg of you (if I might make bold to ask any favour) is that, except to-day for the purpose of inquiring about me and my family, you go no more to Madrid, for I would not that any of the numerous occasions that present themselves there, should deprive me of the good fortune I prize so dearly."

"Not so, señor gallant," said Preciosa: "wherever I go I must be free and unfettered; my liberty must not be restrained or encumbered by jealousy. Be assured, however, that I will not use it to such excess, but that any one may see from a mile off that my honesty is equal to my freedom. The first charge, therefore, I have to impose upon you is, that you put implicit confidence in me; for lovers who begin by being jealous, are either silly or deficient in confidence.”

“You must have Satan himself within you, little one,” said the old gipsy; “why you talk like a bachelor of Salamanca. You know all about love and jealousy and confidence. How is this? You make me look like a fool, and I stand listening to you as to a person possessed, who talks Latin without knowing it.”

“Hold your peace, grandmother,” replied Preciosa; “and know that all the things you have heard me say are mere trifles to the many greater truths that remain in my breast.”

All that Preciosa said, and the sound sense she displayed, added fuel to the flame that burned in the breast of the enamoured cavalier. Finally, it was arranged that they should meet in the same place on that day sennight, when he would report how matters stood with him, and they would have had time to inquire into the truth of what he had told them. The young gentleman then took out a brocaded purse in which he said there were a hundred gold crowns, and gave it to the old woman; but Preciosa would by no means consent that she should take them.

“Hold your tongue, niña,” said her grandmother; “the best proof this señor has given of his submission, is in thus having yielded up his arms to us in token of surrender. To give, upon whatever occasion it may be, is always the sign of a generous heart. Moreover, I do not choose that the gitanas should lose, through my fault, the reputation they have had for long ages of being greedy of lucre. Would you have me lose a hundred crowns, Preciosa? A hundred crowns in gold that one may stitch up in the hem of a petticoat not worth two reals, and keep them there as one holds a rent-charge on the pastures of Estramadura! Suppose that any of our children, grandchildren, or relations should fall by any mischance into the hands of justice, is there any eloquence so sure to touch the ears of the judge as the music of these crowns when they fall into his purse? Three times, for three different offences, I have seen myself all but mounted on the ass to be whipped; but once I got myself off by means of a silver mug, another time by a pearl necklace, and the third time with the help of forty pieces of eight, which I exchanged for quartos, throwing twenty reals into the bargain. Look you, niña, ours is a very perilous occupation, full of risks and accidents; and there is no defence that affords us more ready shelter and succour than the invincible arms of the great Philip: nothing beats the plus ultra. For the two faces of a doubloon, a smile comes over the grim visage of the procurator and of all the other ministers of mischief, who are downright harpies to us poor gitanas, and have more mercy for highway robbers than for our poor hides. Let us be ever so ragged and wretched in appearance, they will not believe that we are poor, but say that we are like the doublets of the gavachos of Belmont, ragged and greasy and full of doubloons.”

“Say no more, for heaven’s sake, grandmother,” said Preciosa; “do not string together so many arguments for keeping the money, but keep it, and much good may it do you. I wish to God you would bury it in a grave out of which it may never return to the light, and that there may never be any need of it. We must, however, give some of it to these companions of ours, who must be tired of waiting so long for us.”

“They shall see one coin out of this purse as soon as they will see the Grand Turk,” the old woman replied. “The good señor will try if he has any silver coin or a few coppers remaining, to divide amongst them, for they will be content with a little.”

“Yes, I have,” he said, and he took from his pocket three pieces of eight which he divided among the gitanas, with which they were more delighted than the manager of a theatre when he is placarded as victor in a contest with a rival. Finally it was settled that the party should meet there again in a week, as before mentioned, and that the young man’s gipsy name should be Andrew Caballero, for that was a surname not unknown among the gipsies. Andrew (as we shall henceforth call him) could not find courage to embrace Preciosa, but darting his very soul into her with a glance, he went away without it, so to speak, and returned to Madrid. The gipsies followed soon after; and Preciosa, who already felt a certain interest in the handsome and amiable Andrew, was anxious to learn if he was really what he said.

They had not gone far before they met the page of the verses and the gold crown. “Welcome, Preciosa,” he said, coming up to her. “Have you read the lines I gave you the other day?”

“Before I answer you a word,” said she, “you must, by all you love best, tell me one thing truly.”

“Upon that adjuration,” he replied, “I could not refuse an answer to any question, though it should cost me my head.”

“Well, then, what I want to know is this: are you, perchance, a poet?”

“If I were one, it would certainly be perchance,” said the page; “but you must know, Preciosa, that the name of poet is one which very few deserve. Thus I am not a poet, but only a lover of poetry; yet for my own use I do not borrow of others. The verses I gave you were mine, as are these also which I give you now; but I am not a poet for all that — God forbid.”

“Is it such a bad thing to be a poet?” Preciosa asked.

“It is not a bad thing,” he answered; “but to be a poet and nothing else I do not hold to be very good. We should use poetry like a rich jewel, the owner of which does not wear it every day, or show it to all people, but displays it only at suitable times. Poetry is a beautiful maiden, chaste, honest, discreet, reserved, and never overstepping the limits of perfect refinement. She is fond of solitude; she finds pleasure and recreation among fountains, meadows, trees, and flowers; and she delights and instructs all who are conversant with her."

"I have heard for all that," said Preciosa, "that she is exceedingly poor; something of a beggar in short."

"It is rather the reverse," said the page, "for there is no poet who is not rich, since they all live content with their condition; and that is a piece of philosophy which few understand. But what has moved you, Preciosa, to make this inquiry?"

"I was moved to it, because, as I believe all poets, or most of them, to be poor, that crown which you gave me wrapped up with the verses caused me some surprise; but now that I know that you are not a poet, but only a lover of poetry, it may be that you are rich, though I doubt it, for your propensity is likely to make you run through all you have got. It is a well-known saying, that no poet can either keep or make a fortune."

"But the saying is not applicable to me," said the page. "I make verses, and I am neither rich nor poor; and without feeling it or making a talk about it, as the Genoese do of their invitations, I can afford to give a crown, or even two, to whom I like. Take then, precious pearl, this second paper, and this second crown enclosed in it, without troubling yourself with the question whether I am a poet or not. I only beg you to think and believe that he who gives you this would fain have the wealth of Midas to bestow upon you."

Preciosa took the paper, and feeling a crown within it, she said, "This paper bids fair to live long, for it has two souls within it, that of the crown and that of the verses, which, of course, are full of souls and hearts as usual. But please to understand, Señor Page, that I do not want so many souls; and that unless you take back one of them, I will not receive the other on any account. I like you as a poet and not as a giver of gifts; and thus we may be the longer friends, for your stock of crowns may run out sooner than your verses."

"Well," said the page, "since you will have it that I am poor, do not reject the soul I present to you in this paper, and give me back the crown, which, since it has been touched by your hand, shall remain with me as a hallowed relic as long as I live."

Preciosa gave him the crown, and kept the paper, but would not read it in the street. The page went away exulting in the belief that Preciosa's heart was touched, since she had treated him with such affability.

It being now her object to find the house of Andrew's father, she went straight to the street, which she well knew, without stopping anywhere to dance. About half way down it, she saw the gilded iron balcony which Andrew had mentioned to her, and in it a gentleman of about fifty years of age, of noble presence, with a red cross on his breast. This gentleman seeing the gitanilla, called out, "Come up here, niñas, and we will give you something." These words brought three other gentlemen to the balcony, among whom was the enamoured Andrew. The instant he cast his eyes on Preciosa he changed colour, and well nigh swooned, such was the effect her sudden appearance had upon him. The girls went up stairs, whilst the old woman remained below to pump the servants with respect to Andrew. As they entered the room, the elder gentleman was saying to the others, "This is no doubt the handsome gitanilla who is so much talked of in Madrid."

"It is," said Andrew; "and she is unquestionably the most beautiful creature that ever was seen."

"So they say," said Preciosa, who had overheard these remarks as she came in; "but indeed they must be half out in the reckoning. I believe I am pretty well, but as handsome as they say — not a bit of it!"

"By the life of Don Juanico, my son," said the elder gentleman, "you are far more so, fair gitana."

"And who is Don Juanico, your son?" said Preciosa.

"That gallant by your side," said the cavalier.

"Truly, I thought your worship had sworn by some bantling of two years old," said Preciosa. "What a pretty little pet of a Don Juanico! Why he is old enough to be married; and by certain lines on his forehead, I foresee that married he will be before three years are out, and much to his liking too, if in the meantime he be neither lost nor changed."

"Ay, ay," said one of the company; "the gitanilla can tell the meaning of a wrinkle."

During this time, the three gipsy girls, who accompanied Preciosa, had got their heads together and were whispering each other. "Girls," said Christina, "that is the gentleman that gave us the three pieces of eight this morning."

"Sure enough," said they; "but don't let us say a word about it unless he mentions it. How do we know but he may wish to keep it secret?"

Whilst the three were thus conferring together, Preciosa replied to the last remark about wrinkles. "What I see with my eyes, I divine with my fingers. Of the Señor Don Juanico, I know without lines that he is somewhat amorous, impetuous, and hasty; and a great promiser of things that seem impossible. God grant he be not a deceiver, which would be worse than all. He is now about to make a long journey; but the bay horse thinks one thing, and the man that saddles him thinks another thing. Man proposes and God disposes. Perhaps he may think he is bound for Oñez, and will find himself on the way to Gaviboa.”

“In truth, gitana,” said Don Juan, “you have guessed right respecting me in several points. I certainly intend, with God’s will, to set out for Flanders in four or five days, though you forebode that I shall have to turn out of my road; yet I hope no obstacle will occur to frustrate my purpose.”

“Say no more, señorito,” the gipsy replied; “but commend yourself to God, and all will be well. Be assured I know nothing at all of what I have been saying. It is no wonder if I sometimes hit the mark, since I talk so much and always at random. I wish I could speak to such good purpose as to persuade you not to leave home, but remain quietly with your parents to comfort their old age; for I am no friend to these Flanders expeditions, especially for a youth of your tender years. Wait till you are grown a little more and better able to bear the toils of war; and the rather as you have war enough at home, considering all the amorous conflicts that are raging in your bosom. Gently, gently with you, madcap! Look what you are doing before you marry; and now give us a little dole for God’s sake and for the name you bear; for truly I believe you are well born, and if along with this you are loyal and true, then I will sing jubilee for having hit the mark in all I have said to you.”

“I told you before, niña,” said Don Juan, otherwise Andrew Caballero, “that you were right on every point except as to the fear you entertain that I am not quite a man of my word. In that respect you are certainly mistaken. The word that I pledge in the field I fulfil in the town, or wherever I may be, without waiting to be asked; for no man can esteem himself a gentleman, who yields in the least to the vice of falsehood. My father will give you alms for God’s sake and for mine; for in truth I gave all I had this morning to some ladies, of whom I would not venture to assert that they are as obliging as they are beautiful, one of them especially.”

Hearing this, Christina said to her companions, “May I be hanged, girls, if he is not talking of the three pieces of eight he gave us this morning.”

“No, that can’t be,” one of them observed; “for he said they were ladies, and we are none; and being so true-spoken as he says he is, he would not lie in this matter.”

“Oh, but,” said Christina, “that is not a lie of any moment that is told without injury to anybody, but for the advantage and credit of him who tells it. Be that as it may, I see he neither gives us anything, nor asks us to dance.”

The old gipsy now came into the room and said, “Make haste, granddaughter; for it is late, and there is much to be done, and more to be said.”

“What is it, grandmother?” said Preciosa, “A boy or a girl?”

“A boy, and a very fine one. Come along, Preciosa, and you shall hear marvels.”

“God grant the mother does not die of her after pains,” said the granddaughter.

“We will take all possible care of her. She has had a very good time, and the child is a perfect beauty.”

“Has any lady been confined?” said Andrew’s father.

“Yes, señor,” replied the old Gitana: “but it is such a secret, that no one knows of it except Preciosa, myself, and one other person. So we cannot mention the lady’s name.”

“Well, we don’t want to know it,” said one of the gentlemen present; “but God help the lady who trusts her secret to your tongues, and her honour to your aid.”

“We are not all bad,” replied Preciosa; “perhaps there may be one among us who piques herself on being as trusty and as true as the noblest man in this room. Let us begone, grandmother; for here we are held in little esteem, though in truth we are neither thieves nor beggars.”

“Do not be angry, Preciosa,” said Andrew’s father. “Of you at least I imagine no one can presume anything ill, for your good looks are warrant for your good conduct. Do me the favour to dance a little with your companions. I have here a doubloon for you with two faces, and neither of them as good as your own, though they are the faces of two kings.”

The moment the old woman heard this she cried, “Come along, girls: tuck up your skirts, and oblige these gentlemen.” Preciosa took the tambourine, and they all danced with so much grace and freedom, that the eyes of all the spectators were riveted upon their steps, especially those of Andrew, who gazed upon Preciosa as if his whole soul was centred in her; but an untoward accident turned his delight into anguish. In the exertion of the dance, Preciosa let fall the paper given her by the page. It was immediately picked up by the gentleman who had no good opinion of the gipsies. He opened it, and said, “What have we here? A madrigal? Good! Break off the dance, and listen to it; for, as far as I can judge from the beginning, it is really not bad.” Preciosa was annoyed at this, as she did not know the contents of the paper; and she begged the gentleman not to read it, but give it back to her. All her entreaties, however, only made Andrew more eager to hear the lines, and his friend read them out as follows: —

Who hath Preciosa seen Dancing like the Fairy Queen? Ripplets on a sunlit river
Like her small feet glance and quiver. When she strikes the timbrel featly,
When she warbles, oh how sweetly! Pearls from her white hands she showers, From her rosy lips drop flowers. Not a ringlet of her hair But doth thousand souls ensnare. Not a glance of her bright eyes But seems shot from Love’s own skies. He in obeisance to this sovereign maid, His bow and quiver at her feet hath laid.

“Por dios!” exclaimed the reader, “he is a dainty poet who wrote this.”

“He is not a poet, señor,” said Preciosa, “but a page, and a very gallant and worthy man.”

“Mind what you say, Preciosa,” returned the other; “for the praises you bestow on the page are so many lance-thrusts through Andrew’s heart. Look at him as he sits aghast, thrown back on his chair, with a cold perspiration breaking through all his pores. Do not imagine, maiden, that he loves you so lightly but that the least slight from you distracts him. Go to him, for God’s sake, and whisper a few words in his ear, that may go straight to his heart, and recall him to himself. Go on receiving such madrigals as this every day, and just see what will come of it.”

It was just as he had said. Andrew had been racked by a thousand jealousies on hearing the verses; and was so overcome that his father observed it, and cried out, “What ails you, Don Juan? You are turned quite pale, and look as if you were going to faint.”

“Wait a moment,” said Preciosa, “let me whisper certain words in his ear, and you will see that he will not faint.” Then bending over him she said, almost without moving her lips, “A pretty sort of gitano you will make! Why, Andrew, how will you be able to bear the torture with gauze, when you are overcome by a bit of paper?” Then making half-a-dozen signs of the cross over his heart, she left him, after which Andrew breathed a little, and told his friends that Preciosa’s words had done him good.

Finally, the two-faced doubloon was given to Preciosa, who told her companions that she would change it, and share the amount honourably with them. Andrew’s father intreated her to leave him in writing the words she had spoken to his son, as he wished by all means to know them. She said she would repeat them with great pleasure; and that though they might appear to be mere child’s play, they were of sovereign virtue to preserve from the heartache and dizziness of the head. The words were these: —

Silly pate, silly pate, Why run on at this rate? No tripping, or slipping, or sliding! Have trusty assurance, And patient endurance And ever be frank and confiding. To ugly suspicion Refuse all admission, Nor let it your better sense twist over. All this if you do You’ll not rue, For excellent things will ensue, With the good help of God and St. Christopher.

“Only say these words,” she continued, “over any person who has a swimming in the head, making at the same time six signs of the cross over his heart, and he will soon be as sound as an apple.”

When the old woman heard the charm, she was amazed at the clever trick played by her granddaughter; and Andrew was still more so when he found that the whole was an invention of her quick wit. Preciosa left the madrigal in the hands of the gentleman, not liking to ask for it, lest she should again distress Andrew; for she knew, without any one teaching her, what it was to make a lover feel the pangs of jealousy. Before she took her leave, she said to Don Juan, "Every day of the week, señor, is lucky for beginning a journey: not one of them is black. Hasten your departure, therefore, as much as you can; for there lies before you a free life of ample range and great enjoyment, if you choose to accommodate yourself to it."

"It strikes me that a soldier's life is not so free as you say," replied Andrew, "but one of submission rather than liberty. However, I will see what I can do."

"You will see more than you think for," said Preciosa; "and may God have you in his keeping, and lead you to happiness, as your goodly presence deserves."

These farewell words filled Andrew with delight; the gitanas went away no less gratified, and shared the doubloon between them, the old woman as usual taking a part and a half, both by reason of her seniority, as because she was the compass by which they steered their course on the wide sea of their dances, pleasantries, and tricks.

At last the appointed day of meeting came, and Andrew arrived in the morning at the old trysting place, mounted on a hired mule, and without any attendant. He found Preciosa and her grandmother waiting for him, and was cordially welcomed by them. He begged they would take him at once to the rancho, before it was broad day, that he might not be recognised should he be sought for. The two gitanas, who had taken the precaution to come alone, immediately wheeled round, and soon arrived with him at their huts. Andrew entered one of them, which was the largest in the rancho, where he was forthwith assisted by ten or twelve gitanos, all handsome strapping young fellows, whom the old woman had previously informed respecting the new comrade who was about to join them. She had not thought it necessary, to enjoin them to secrecy; for, as we have already said, they habitually observed it with unexampled sagacity and strictness. Their eyes were at once on the mule, and said one of them, "We can sell this on Thursday in Toledo."

"By no means," said Andrew; "for there is not a hired mule in Madrid, or any other town, but is known to all the muleteers that tramp the roads of Spain."

"Por dios, Señor Andrew," said one of the gang, "if there were more signs and tokens upon the mule than are to precede the day of judgment, we will transform it in such a manner that it could not be known by the mother that bore it, or the master that owned it."

"That maybe," said Andrew; "but for this time you must do as I recommend.

This mule must be killed, and buried where its bones shall never be seen.”

“Put the innocent creature to death!” cried another gipsy. “What a sin! Don’t say the word, good Andrew; only do one thing. Examine the beast well, till you have got all its marks well by heart; then let me take it away, and if in two hours from this time you are able to know, it again, let me be basted like a runaway negro.”

“I must insist upon the mule’s being put to death,” said Andrew, “though I were ever so sure of its transformation. I am in fear of being discovered unless it is put under ground. If you object for sake of the profit to be made by selling it, I am not come so destitute to this fraternity but that I can pay my footing with more than the price of four mules.”

“Well, since the Señor Andrew Caballero will have it so,” said the other gitano, “let the sinless creature die, though God knows how much it goes against me, both because of its youth, for it has not yet lost mark of mouth, a rare thing among hired mules, and because it must be a good goer, for it has neither scars on its flank nor marks of the spur.”

The slaughter of the mule was postponed till night, and the rest of the day was spent in the ceremonies of Andrew’s initiation. They cleared out one of the best huts in the encampment, dressed it with boughs and rushes, and seating Andrew in it on the stump of a cork tree, they put a hammer and tongs in his hands, and made him cut two capers to the sound of two guitars. They then bared one of his arms, tied round it a new silk ribbon through which they passed a short stick, and gave it two turns gently, after the manner of the garotte with which criminals are strangled. Preciosa was present at all this, as were many other gitanas, old and young, some of whom gazed at Andrew with admiration, others with love, and such was his good humour, that even the gitanos took most kindly to him.

These ceremonies being ended, an old gipsy took Preciosa by the hand, and setting her opposite Andrew, spoke thus: “This girl, who is the flower and cream of all beauty among the gitanas of Spain, we give to you either for your wife or your mistress, for in that respect you may do whatever shall be most to your liking, since our free and easy life is not subject to squeamish scruples or to much ceremony. Look at her well, and see if she suits you, or if there is anything in her you dislike; if there is, choose from among the maidens here present the one you like best, and we will give her to you. But bear in mind that once your choice is made, you must not quit it for another, nor make or meddle either with the married women or the maids. We are strict observers of the law of good fellowship; none among us covets the good that belongs to another. We live free and secure from the bitter plague of jealousy; and though incest is frequent amongst us there is no adultery. If a wife or a mistress is unfaithful, we do not go ask the courts of justice to punish; but we ourselves are the judges and executioners of our wives and mistresses, and make no more ado about killing and burying them in the mountains and desert places than if they were vermin. There are no relations to avenge them, no parents to call us to account for their deaths. By reason of this fear and dread, our women learn to live chaste; and we, as I have said, feel no uneasiness about their virtue.

“We have few things which are not common to us all, except wives and mistresses, each of whom we require to be his alone to whom fortune has allotted her. Among us divorce takes place, because of old age as well as by death. Any man may if he likes leave a woman who is too old for him, and choose one more suitable to his years. By means of these and other laws and statutes we contrive to lead a merry life. We are lords of the plains, the corn fields, the woods, mountains, springs, and rivers. The mountains yield us wood for nothing, the orchards fruit, the vineyards grapes, the gardens vegetables, the fountains water, the rivers fish, the parks feathered game; the rocks yield us shade, the glades and valleys fresh air, and the caves shelter. For us the inclemencies of the weather are zephyrs, the snow refreshment, the rain baths, the thunder music, and the lightning torches. For us the hard ground is a bed of down; the tanned skin of our bodies is an impenetrable harness to defend us; our nimble limbs submit to no obstacle from iron bars, or trenches, or walls; our courage is not to be twisted out of us by cords, or choked by gauze, or quelled by the rack.

“Between yes and no we make no difference when it suits our convenience to confound them; we always pride ourselves more on being martyrs than confessors. For us the beasts of burden are reared in the fields, and pockets are filled in the cities. No eagle or other bird of prey pounces more swiftly on its quarry than we upon opportunities that offer us booty. And finally, we possess many qualities which promise us a happy end; for we sing in prison, are silent on the rack, work by day, and by night we thieve, or rather we take means to teach all men that they should exempt themselves from the trouble of seeing where they put their property. We are not distressed by the fear of losing our honour, or kept awake by ambition to increase it. We attach ourselves to no parties; we do not rise by daylight to attend levees and present memorials, or to swell the trains of magnates, or to solicit favours. Our gilded roofs and sumptuous palaces are these portable huts; our Flemish pictures and landscapes are those which nature presents to our eyes at every step in the rugged cliffs and snowy peaks, the spreading meads and leafy groves. We are rustic astronomers, for as we sleep almost always under the open sky, we can tell every hour by day or night. We see how Aurora extinguishes and sweeps away the stars from heaven, and how she comes forth with her companion the dawn, enlivening the air, refreshing the water, and moistening the earth; and after her appears the sun gilding the heights, as the poet sings, and making the mountains smile. We are not afraid of being left chilly by his absence, when his rays fall aslant upon us, or of being roasted when they blaze down upon us perpendicularly. We turn the same countenance to sun and frost, to dearth and plenty. In conclusion, we are people who live by our industry and our wits, without troubling ourselves with the old adage, 'The church, the sea, or the king's household.' We have all we want, for we are content with what we have.

"All these things have I told you, generous youth, that you may not be ignorant of the life to which you are come, and the manners and customs you will have to profess, which I have here sketched for you in the rough. Many other particulars, no less worthy of consideration, you will discover for yourself in process of time."

Here the eloquent old gitano closed his discourse, and the novice replied, that he congratulated himself much on having been made acquainted with such laudable statutes; that he desired to make profession of an order so based on reason and politic principles; that his only regret was that he had not sooner come to the knowledge of so pleasant a life; and that from that moment he renounced his knighthood, and the vain glory of his illustrious lineage, and placed them beneath the yoke, or beneath the laws under which they lived, forasmuch as they so magnificently recompensed the desire he had to serve them, in bestowing upon him the divine Preciosa, for whom he would surrender many crowns and wide empires, or desire them only for her sake.

Preciosa spoke next: "Whereas these señores, our lawgivers," she said, "have determined, according to their laws that I should be yours, and as such have given me up to you, I have decreed, in accordance with the law of my own will, which is the strongest of all, that I will not be so except upon the conditions heretofore concerted between us two. You must live two years in our company before you enjoy mine, so that you may neither repent through fickleness, nor I be deceived through precipitation. Conditions supersede laws; those which I have prescribed you know; if you choose to keep them, I may be yours, and you mine; if not, the mule is not dead, your clothes are whole, and not a doit of your money is spent. Your absence from home has not yet extended to the length of a day; what remains you may employ in considering what best suits you. These señores may give up my body to you, but not my soul, which is free, was born free, and shall remain free. If you remain, I shall esteem you much; if you depart, I shall do so no less; for I hold that amorous impulses run with a loose rein, until they are brought to a halt by reason or disenchantment. I would not have you be towards me like the sportsman, who when he has bagged a hare thinks no more of it, but runs after another. The eyes are sometimes deceived; at first sight tinsel looks like gold; but they soon recognise the difference between the genuine and the false metal. This beauty of mine, which you say I possess, and which you exalt above the sun, and declare more precious than gold, how do I know but that at a nearer view it will appear to you a shadow, and when tested will seem but base metal? I give you two years to weigh and ponder well what will be right to choose or reject. Before you buy a jewel, which you can only get rid of by death, you ought to take much time to examine it, and ascertain its faults or its merits. I do not assent to the barbarous licence which these kinsmen of mine have assumed, to forsake their wives or chastise them when the humour takes them; and as I do not intend to do anything which calls for punishment, I will not take for my mate one who will abandon me at his own caprice.”

“You are right, Preciosa,” said Andrew; “and so if you would have me quiet your fears and abate your doubts, by swearing not to depart a jot from the conditions you prescribe, choose what form of oath I shall take, or what other assurance I shall give you, and I will do exactly as you desire.”

“The oaths and promises which the captive makes to obtain his liberty are seldom fulfilled when he is free,” returned Preciosa; “and it is just the same, I fancy, with the lover, who to obtain his desire will promise the wings of Mercury, and the thunderbolts of Jove; and indeed a certain poet promised myself no less, and swore it by the Stygian lake. I want no oaths or promises, Señor Andrew, but to leave everything to the result of this novitiate. It will be my business to take care of myself, if at any time you should think of offending me.”

“Be it so,” said Andrew. “One request I have to make of these señores and comrades mine, and that is that they will not force me to steal anything for a month or so; for it strikes me that it will take a great many lessons to make me a thief.”

“Never fear, my son,” said the old gipsy; “for we will instruct you in such a manner that you will turn out an eagle in our craft; and when you have learned it, you will like it so much, that you will be ready to eat your hand, it will so itch after it. Yes, it is fine fun to go out empty-handed in the morning, and to return loaded at night to the rancho.”

“I have seen some return with a whipping,” said Andrew.

“One cannot catch trouts dry shod,” the old man replied: “all things in this life have their perils: the acts of the thief are liable to the galleys, whipping, and the scragging-post; but it is not because one ship encounters a storm, or springs a leak, that others should cease to sail the seas. It would be a fine thing if there were to be no soldiers, because war consumes men and horses. Besides, a whipping by the hand of justice is for us a badge of honour, which becomes us better worn on the shoulders than on the breast. The main point is to avoid having to dance upon nothing in our young days and for our first offences; but as for having our shoulders dusted, or thrashing the water in a galley, we don't mind that a nutshell. For the present, Andrew, my son, keep snug in the nest under the shelter of our wings; in duo time, we will take you out to fly, and that where you will not return without a prey; and the short and the long of it is, that by and by you will lick your fingers after every theft."

"Meanwhile," said Andrew, "as a compensation for what I might bring in by thieving during the vacation allowed me, I will divide two hundred gold crowns among all the members of the rancho."

The words were no sooner out of his mouth, than several gitanos caught him up in their arms, hoisted him upon their shoulders, and bore him along, shouting, "Long life to the great Andrew, and long life to Preciosa his beloved!" The gitanas did the same with Preciosa, not without exciting the envy of Christina, and the other gitanillas present; for envy dwells alike in the tents of barbarians, the huts of shepherds, and the palaces of princes; and to see another thrive who seems no better than oneself is a great weariness to the spirit.

This done, they ate a hearty dinner, made an equitable division of the gift money, repeated their praises of Andrew, and exalted Preciosa's beauty to the skies. When night fell, they broke the mule's neck, and buried it, so as to relieve Andrew of all fear of its leading to his discovery; they likewise buried with it the trappings, saddle, bridle, girths and all, after the manner of the Indians, whose chief ornaments are laid in the grave with them.

Andrew was in no small astonishment at all he had seen and heard, and resolved to pursue his enterprise without meddling at all with the customs of his new companions, so far as that might be possible. Especially he hoped to exempt himself, at the cost of his purse, from participating with them in any acts of injustice. On the following day, Andrew requested the gipsies to break up the camp, and remove to a distance from Madrid; for he feared that he should be recognised if he remained there. They told him they had already made up their minds to go to the mountains of Toledo, and thence to scour all the surrounding country, and lay it under contribution. Accordingly they struck their tents, and departed, offering Andrew an ass to ride; but he chose rather to travel on foot, and serve as attendant to Preciosa, who rode triumphantly another ass, rejoicing in her gallant esquire; whilst he was equally delighted at finding himself close to her whom he had made the mistress of his freedom.

O potent force of him who is called the sweet god of bitterness — a title given him by our idleness and weakness — how effectually dost thou enslave us! Here was Andrew, a knight, a youth of excellent parts, brought up at court, and maintained in affluence by his noble parents; and yet since yesterday such a change has been wrought in him that he has deceived his servants and friends; disappointed the hopes of his parents; abandoned the road to Flanders, where he was to have exercised his valour and increased the honours of his line; and he has prostrated himself at the feet of a girl, made himself the lackey of one who, though exquisitely beautiful, is after all a gitana! Wondrous prerogative of beauty, which brings down the strongest will to its feet, in spite of all its resistance!

In four days' march, the gipsies arrived at a pleasant village, within two leagues of the great Toledo, where they pitched their camp, having first given some articles of silver to the alcalde of the district, as a pledge that they would steal nothing within all his bounds, nor do any other damage that might give cause of complaint against them. This done, all the old gitanas, some young ones, and the men, spread themselves all over the country, to the distance of four or five leagues from the encampment. Andrew went with them to take his first lesson in thievery; but though they gave him many in that expedition, he did not profit by any of them. On the contrary, as was natural in a man of gentle blood, every theft committed by his masters wrung his very soul, and sometimes he paid for them out of his own pocket, being moved by the tears of the poor people who had been despoiled. The gipsies were in despair at this behavior: it was in contravention, they said, of their statutes and ordinances, which prohibited the admission of compassion into their hearts; because if they had any they must cease to be thieves, — a thing which was not to be thought of on any account. Seeing this, Andrew said he would go thieving by himself; for he was nimble enough to run from danger, and did not lack courage to encounter it; so that the prize or the penalty of his thieving would be exclusively his own.

The gipsies tried to dissuade him from this good purpose, telling him that occasions might occur in which he would have need of companions, as well to attack as to defend; and that one person alone could not make any great booty. But in spite of all they could say, Andrew was determined to be a solitary robber; intending to separate from the gang, and purchase for money something which he might say he had stolen, and thus burden his conscience as little as possible. Proceeding in this way, in less than a month, he brought more gain to the gang than four of the most accomplished thieves in it. Preciosa rejoiced not a little to see her tender lover become such a smart and handy thief; but for all that she was sorely afraid of some mischance, and would not have seen him in the hands of justice for all the treasures of Venice; such was the good feeling towards him which she could not help entertaining, in return for his many good offices and presents. After remaining about a month in the Toledan district, where they reaped a good harvest, the gipsies entered the wealthy region of Estramadura.

Meanwhile Andrew frequently held honourable and loving converse with Preciosa, who was gradually becoming enamoured of his good qualities; while, in like manner, his love for her went on increasing, if that were possible: such were the virtues, the good sense and beauty of his Preciosa. Whenever the gipsies engaged in athletic games, he carried off the prize for running and leaping: he played admirably at skittles and at ball, and pitched the bar with singular strength and dexterity. In a short while, his fame spread through all Estramadura, and there was no part of it where they did not speak of the smart young gitano Andrew, and his graces and accomplishments. As his fame extended, so did that of Preciosa's beauty; and there was no town, village, or hamlet, to which they were not invited, to enliven their patron saints' days, or other festivities. The tribe consequently became rich, prosperous, and contented, and the lovers were happy in the mere sight of each other.

It happened one night, when the camp was pitched among some evergreen oaks, a little off the highway, they heard their dogs barking about the middle watch, with unusual vehemence. Andrew and some others got up to see what was the matter, and found a man dressed in white battling with them, whilst one of them held him by the leg. "What the devil brought you here, man," said one of the gipsies, after they had released him, "at such an hour, away from the high road? Did you come to thief? If so, you have come to the right door?"

"I do not come to thief; and I don't know whether or not I am off the road, though I see well enough that I am gone astray," said the wounded man. "But tell me, señores, is there any venta or place of entertainment where I can get a night's lodging, and dress the wounds which these dogs have given me?"

"There is no venta or public place to which we can take you," replied Andrew; "but as for a night's lodging, and dressing your wounds, that you can have at our ranchos. Come along with us; for though we are gipsies, we are not devoid of humanity."

"God reward you!" said the man: "take me whither you please, for my leg pains me greatly." Andrew lifted him up, and carried him along with the help of some of the other compassionate gipsies; for even among the fiends there are some worse than others, and among many bad men you may find one good.

It was a clear moonlight night, so that they could see that the person they carried was a youth of handsome face and figure. He was dressed all in white linen, with a sort of frock of the same material belted round his waist. They arrived at Andrew's hut or shed, quickly kindled a fire, and fetched Preciosa's grandmother to attend to the young man's hurts. She took some of the dogs' hairs, fried them in oil, and after washing with wine the two bites she found on the patient's left leg, she put the hairs and the oil upon them, and over this dressing a little chewed green rosemary. She then bound the leg up carefully with clean bandages, made the sign of the cross over it, and said, "Now go to sleep, friend and with the help of God your hurts will not signify."

Whilst they were attending to the wounded man, Preciosa stood by, eyeing him with great curiosity, whilst he did the same by her, insomuch that Andrew took notice of the eagerness with which he gazed; but he attributed this to the extraordinary beauty of Preciosa, which naturally attracted all eyes. Finally, having done all that was needful for the youth, they left him alone on a bed of dry hay, not caring to question him then as to his road, or any other matter.

As soon as all the others were gone, Preciosa called Andrew aside, and said to him, "Do you remember, Andrew, a paper I let fall in your house, when I was dancing with my companions, and which caused you, I think, some uneasiness?"

"I remember it well," said Andrew; "it was a madrigal in your praise, and no bad one either."

"Well, you must know, Andrew, that the person who wrote those verses is no other than the wounded youth we have left in the hut. I cannot be mistaken, for he spoke to me two or three times in Madrid, and gave me too a very good romance. He was then dressed, I think, as a page, — not an ordinary one, but like a favourite of some prince. I assure you, Andrew, he is a youth of excellent understanding, and remarkably well behaved; and I cannot imagine what can have brought him hither, and in such a garb."

"What should you imagine, Preciosa, but that the same power which has made me a gitano, has made him put on the dress of a miller, and come in search of you? Ah, Preciosa! Preciosa! how plain it begins to be that you pride yourself on having more than one adorer. If this be so, finish me first, and then kill off this other, but do not sacrifice both at the same time to your perfidy."

"God's mercy, Andrew, how thin-skinned you are! On how fine a thread you make your hopes and my reputation hang, since you let the cruel sword of jealousy so easily pierce your soul. Tell me, Andrew, if there were any artifice or deceit in this case, could I not have held my tongue about this youth, and concealed all knowledge of him? Am I such a fool that I cannot help telling you what should make you doubt my integrity and good behaviour? Hold your tongue, Andrew, in God's name, and try to-morrow to extract from this cause of your alarm whither he is bound, and why he is come hither. It may be that you are mistaken in your suspicion, though I am not mistaken in what I told you of the stranger. And now for your greater satisfaction — since it is come to that pass with me that I seek to satisfy you — whatever be the reason of this youth's coming, send him away at once. All our people obey you, and none of them will care to receive him into their huts against your wish. But if this fails, I give you my word not to quit mine, or let myself be seen by him, or by anybody else from whom you would have me concealed. Look you, Andrew, I am not vexed at seeing you jealous, but it would vex me much to see you indiscreet."

"Unless you see me mad, Preciosa," said Andrew, "any other demonstration would be far short of showing you what desperate havoc jealousy can make of a man's feelings. However, I will do as you bid me, and find out what this señor page-poet wants, whither he is going, and whom he is in search of. It may be, that unawares he may let me get hold of some end of thread which shall lead to the discovery of the whole snare which I fear he is come to set for me."

"Jealousy, I imagine," said Preciosa, "never leaves the understanding clear to apprehend things as they really are. Jealousy always looks through magnifying glasses, which make mountains of molehills, and realities of mere suspicions. On your life, Andrew, and on mine, I charge you to proceed in this matter, and all that touches our concerns, with prudence and discretion; and if you do, I know that you will have to concede the palm to me, as honest, upright, and true to the very utmost."

With these words she quitted Andrew, leaving him impatient for daylight, that he might receive the confession of the wounded man, and distracted in mind by a thousand various surmises. He could not believe but that this page had come thither attracted by Preciosa's beauty; for the thief believes that all men are such as himself. On the other hand, the pledge voluntarily made to him by Preciosa appeared so highly satisfactory, that he ought to set his mind quite at ease, and commit all his happiness implicitly to the keeping of her good faith. At last day appeared: he visited the wounded man; and after inquiring how he was, and did his bites pain him, he asked what was his name, whither he was going, and how it was he travelled so late and so far off the road. The youth replied that he was better, and felt no pain so that he was able to resume his journey. His name was Alonzo Hurtado; he was going to our Lady of the Peña de Francia, on a certain business; he travelled by night for the greater speed; and having missed his way, he had come upon the encampment, and been worried by the dogs that guarded it. Andrew did not by any means consider this a straightforward statement: his suspicions returned to plague him; and, said he, "Brother, if I were a judge, and you had been brought before me upon any charge which would render necessary such questions as those I have put to you, the reply you have given would oblige me to apply the thumb-screw. It is nothing to me who you are, what is your name, or whither you are going: I only warn you, that if it suits your convenience to lie on this journey, you should lie with more appearance of truth. You say you are going to La Peña de Francia, and you leave it on the right hand more than thirty leagues behind this place. You travel by night for sake of speed, and you quit the high road, and strike into thickets and woods where there is scarcely a footpath. Get up, friend, learn to lie better, and go your ways, in God's name. But in return for this good advice I give you, will you not tell me one truth? I know you will, you are such a bad hand at lying. Tell me, are you not one I have often seen in the capital, something between a page and a gentleman? One who has the reputation of being a great poet, and who wrote a romance and a sonnet upon a gitanilla who some time ago went about Madrid, and was celebrated for her surpassing beauty? Tell me, and I promise you, on the honour of a gentleman gipsy, to keep secret whatever you may wish to be so kept. Mind you, no denial that you are the person I say will go down with me; for the face I see before me is unquestionably the same I saw in Madrid. The fame of your talents made me often stop to gaze at you as a distinguished man, and therefore your features are so strongly impressed on my memory, though your dress is very different from that in which I formerly saw you. Don't be alarmed, cheer up, and don't suppose you have fallen in with a tribe of robbers, but with an asylum, where you may be guarded and defended from all the world. A thought strikes me; and if it be as I conjecture, you have been lucky in meeting me above all men. What I conjecture is, that being in love with Preciosa — that beautiful young gipsy, to whom you addressed the verses — you have come in search of her; for which I don't think a bit the worse of you, but quite the reverse: for gipsy though I am, experience has shown me how far the potent force of love reaches, and the transformations it makes those undergo whom it brings beneath its sway and jurisdiction. If this be so, as I verily believe it is, the fair gitanilla is here."

"Yes, she is here; I saw her last night," said the stranger. This was like a death-blow to Andrew; for it seemed at once to confirm all his suspicions.

"I saw her last night," the young man repeated; "but I did not venture to tell her who I was, for it did not suit my purpose."

"So, then," said Andrew, "you are indeed the poet of whom I spoke."

"I am: I neither can nor will deny it. Possibly it may be that where I thought myself lost I have come right to port, if, as you say, there is fidelity in the forests, and hospitality in the mountains."

"That there is, beyond doubt," said Andrew; "and among us gipsies the strictest secrecy in the world. On that assurance, señor, you may unburden your breast to me: you will find in mine no duplicity whatever. The gitanilla is my relation, and entirely under my control. If you desire her for a wife, myself and all other relations will be quite willing; and if for a mistress, we will not make any squeamish objections, provided you have money, for covetousness never departs from our ranchos."

"I have money," the youth replied; "in the bands of this frock, which I wear girt round my body, there are four hundred gold crowns."

This was another mortal blow for Andrew, who assumed that the stranger could carry so large a sum about him for no other purpose than to purchase possession of the beloved object. With a faltering tongue he replied, "That is a good lump of money; you have only to discover yourself, and go to work: the girl is no fool, and will see what a good thing it will be for her to be yours."

"O friend," exclaimed the youth, "I would have you know that the power which has made me change my garb is not that of love, as you say, nor any longing for Preciosa; for Madrid has beauties who know how to steal hearts and subdue souls as well as the handsomest gitanas, and better; though I confess that the beauty of your kinswoman surpasses any I have ever seen. The cause of my being in this dress, on foot, and bitten by dogs, is not love but my ill luck."

Upon this explanation, Andrew's downcast spirit began to rise again; for it was plain that the wind was in quite a different quarter from what he had supposed. Eager to escape from this confusion, he renewed his assurances of secrecy, and the stranger proceeded thus: —

"I was in Madrid, in the house of a nobleman, whom I served not as a master but as a relation. He had an only son and heir, who treated me with great familiarity and friendship, both on account of our relationship, and because we were both of the same age and disposition. This young gentleman fell in love with a young lady of rank, whom he would most gladly have made his wife, had it not been for his dutiful submission to the will of his parents, who desired him to marry into a higher family. Nevertheless, he continued furtively to pay court to the lady of his choice, carefully concealing his proceedings from all eyes but mine. One night, which ill luck must have especially selected for the adventure I am about to relate to you, as we were passing by the lady's house, we saw ranged against it two men of good figure apparently. My kinsman wished to reconnoitre them, but no sooner had he made a step towards them than their swords were out, their bucklers ready, and they made at us, whilst we did the same on our side, and engaged them with equal arms. The fight did not last long, neither did the lives of our two opponents; for two thrusts, urged home by my kinsman's jealousy and my zeal in his defence, laid them both low — an extraordinary occurrence, and such as is rarely witnessed. Thus involuntarily victorious, we returned home, and taking all the money we could, set off secretly to the church of San Geronimo, waiting to see what would happen when the event was discovered next day, and what might be the conjectures as to the persons of the homicides.

“We learned that no trace of our presence on the scene had been discovered, and the prudent monks advised us to return home, so as not by our absence to arouse any suspicion against us. We had already resolved to follow their advice, when we were informed that the alcaldes of the court had arrested the young lady and her parents; and that among their domestics, whom they examined, one person, the young lady’s attendant, had stated that my kinsman visited her mistress by night and by day. Upon this evidence they had sent in search of us; and the officers not finding us, but many indications of our flight, it became a confirmed opinion throughout the whole city, that we were the very men who had slain the two cavaliers, for such they were, and of very good quality. Finally, by the advice of the count, my relation, and of the monks, after remaining hid a fortnight in the monastery, my comrade departed in company with a monk, himself disguised as one, and took the road to Aragon, intending to pass over to Italy, and thence to Flanders, until he should see what might be the upshot of the matter. For my part, thinking it well to divide our fortunes, I set out on foot, in a different direction, and in the habit of a lay brother, along with a monk, who quitted me at Talavera. From that city I travelled alone, and missed my way, till last night I reached this wood, when I met with the mishap you know. If I asked for La Peña de Francia, it was only by way of making some answer to the questions put to me; for I know that it lies beyond Salamanca.”

“True,” observed Andrew, “you left it on your right, about twenty leagues from this. So you see what a straight road you were taking, if you were going thither.”

“The road I did intend to take was that to Seville; for there I should find a Genoese gentleman, a great friend of the count my relation, who is in the habit of exporting large quantities of silver ingots to Genoa; and my design is, that he should send me with his carriers, as one of themselves, by which means I may safely reach Carthagená, and thence pass over to Italy; for two galleys are expected shortly to ship some silver. This is my story, good friend: was I not right in saying it is the result of pure ill luck, rather than disappointed love? Now if these señores gitanos will take me in their company to Seville, supposing they are bound thither, I will pay them handsomely; for I believe that I should travel more safely with them, and have some respite from the fear that haunts me.”

“Yes, they will take you,” said Andrew; “or if you cannot go with our band — for as yet I know not that we are for Andalusia — you can go with another which we shall fall in with in a couple of days; and if you give them some of the money you have about you, they will be able and willing to help you out of still worse difficulties.” He then left the young man, and reported to the other gipsies what the stranger desired, and the offer he had made of good payment for their services.

They were all for having their guest remain in the camp; but Preciosa was against it; and her grandmother said, that she could not go to Seville or its neighbourhood, on account of a hoax she had once played off upon a capmaker named Truxillo, well known in Seville. She had persuaded him to put himself up to his neck in a butt of water, stark naked, with a crown of cypress on his head, there to remain till midnight, when he was to step out, and look for a great treasure, which she had made him believe was concealed in a certain part of his house. When the good capmaker heard matins ring, he made such haste to get out of the butt, lest he should lose his chance, that it fell with him, bruising his flesh, and deluging the floor with water, in which he fell to swimming with might and main, roaring out that he was drowning. His wife and his neighbours ran to him with lights, and found him striking out lustily with his legs and arms. “Help! help!” he cried; “I am suffocating;” and he really was not far from it, such was the effect of his excessive fright. They seized and rescued him from his deadly peril. When he had recovered a little, he told them the trick the gipsy woman had played him; and yet for all that, he dug a hole, more than a fathom deep, in the place pointed out to him, in spite of all his neighbours could say; and had he not been forcibly prevented by one of them, when he was beginning to undermine the foundations of the house, he would have brought the whole of it down about his ears. The story spread all over the city; so that the little boys in the streets used to point their fingers at him, and shout in his ears the story of the gipsy’s trick, and his own credulity. Such was the tale told by the old gitana, in explanation of her unwillingness to go to Seville.

The gipsies, knowing from Andrew that the youth had a sum of money about him, readily assented to his accompanying them, and promised to guard and conceal him as long as he pleased. They determined to make a bend to the left, and enter La Mancha and the kingdom of Murcia. The youth thanked them cordially, and gave them on the spot a hundred gold crowns to divide amongst them, whereupon they became as pliant as washed leather. Preciosa, however, was not pleased with the continuance among them of Don Sancho, for that was the youth’s name, but the gipsies changed it to Clement. Andrew too was rather annoyed at this arrangement; for it seemed to him that Clement had given up his original intention upon very slight grounds; but the latter, as if he read his thoughts, told him that he was glad to go to Murcia, because it was near Carthage, whence, if galleys arrived there, as he expected, he could easily pass over to Italy. Finally, in order to have him more under his own eye, to watch his acts, and scrutinise his thoughts, Andrew desired to have Clement for his own comrade, and the latter accepted this friendly offer as a signal favour. They were always together, both spent largely, their crowns came down like rain; they ran, leaped, danced, and pitched the bar better than any of their companions, and were more than commonly liked by the women of the tribe, and held in the highest respect by the men.

Leaving Estramadura they entered La Mancha, and gradually traversed the kingdom of Murcia. In all the villages and towns they passed through, they had matches at ball-playing, fencing, running, leaping, and pitching the bar; and in all these trials of strength, skill, and agility Andrew and Clement were victorious, as Andrew alone had been before. During the whole journey, which occupied six weeks, Clement neither found nor sought an opportunity to speak alone with Preciosa, until one day when she and Andrew were conversing together, they called him to them, and Preciosa said, "The first time you came to our camp I recognised you, Clement, and remembered the verses you gave me in Madrid; but I would not say a word, not knowing with what intention you had come among us. When I became acquainted with your misfortune, it grieved me to the soul, though at the same time it was a relief to me; for I had been much disturbed, thinking that as there was a Don Juan in the world who had become a gipsy, a Don Sancho might undergo transformation in like manner. I speak this to you, because Andrew tells me he has made known to you who he is, and with what intention he turned gipsy." (And so it was, for Andrew had acquainted Clement with his whole story, that he might be able to converse with him on the subject nearest to his thoughts.) "Do not think that my knowing you was of little advantage to you, since for my sake, and in consequence of what I said of you, our people the more readily admitted you amongst them, where I trust in God you may find things turn out according to your best wishes. You will repay me, I hope, for this good will on my part, by not making Andrew ashamed of having set his mind so low, or representing to him how ill he does in persevering in his present way of life; for though I imagine that his will is enthralled to mine, still it would grieve me to see him show signs, however slight, of repenting what he has done."

"Do not suppose, peerless Preciosa," replied Clement, "that Don Juan acted lightly in revealing himself to me. I found him out beforehand: his eyes first disclosed to me the nature of his feelings; I first told him who I was, and detected that enthralment of his will which you speak of; and he, reposing a just confidence in me, made his secret mine. He can witness whether I applauded his determination and his choice; for I am not so dull of understanding, Preciosa, as not to know how omnipotent is beauty; and yours, which surpasses all bounds of loveliness, is a sufficient excuse for all errors, if error that can be called for which there is so irresistible a cause. I am grateful to you, señora, for what you have said in my favour; and I hope to repay you by hearty good wishes that you may find a happy issue out of your perplexities, and that you may enjoy the love of your Andrew, and Andrew that of his Preciosa, with the consent of his parents; so that from so beautiful a couple there may come into the world the finest progeny which nature can form in her happiest mood. This is what I shall always desire, Preciosa; and this is what I shall always say to your Andrew, and not anything which could tend to turn him from his well-placed affections.”

With such emotion did Clement utter these words, that Andrew was in doubt whether they were spoken in courtesy only, or from love; for the infernal plague of jealousy is so susceptible that it will take offence at the motes in the sunbeams; and the lover finds matter for self-torment in everything that concerns the beloved object. Nevertheless, he did not give way to confirmed jealousy; for he relied more on the good faith of his Preciosa than on his own fortune, which, in common with all lovers, he regarded as luckless, so long as he had not obtained the object of his desires. In fine, Andrew and Clement continued to be comrades and friends, their mutual good understanding being secured by Clement’s upright intentions, and by the modesty and prudence of Preciosa, who never gave Andrew an excuse for jealousy. Clement was somewhat of a poet, Andrew played the guitar a little, and both were fond of music. One night, when the camp was pitched in a valley four leagues from Murcia, Andrew seated himself at the foot of a cork-tree, and Clement near him under an evergreen oak. Each of them had a guitar; and invited by the stillness of the night, they sang alternately, Andrew beginning the descant, and Clement responding.

ANDREW.

Ten thousand golden lamps are lit on high, Making this chilly night Rival the noon-day’s light; Look, Clement, on yon star-bespangled sky, And in that image see, If so divine thy fancy be, That lovely radiant face, Where centres all of beauty and of grace.

CLEMENT

Where centres all of beauty and of grace, And where in concord sweet Goodness and beauty meet, And purity hath fixed its dwelling-place. Creature so heavenly fair, May any mortal genius dare, Or less than tongue divine, To praise in lofty, rare, and sounding line?

ANDREW

To praise in lofty, rare, and sounding line Thy name, gitana bright! Earth's wonder and delight, Worthy above the empyrean vault to shine; Fain would I snatch from Fame The trump and voice, whose loud acclaim Should startle every ear, And lift Preciosa's name to the eighth sphere.

CLEMENT

To lift Preciosa's fame to the eighth sphere Were meet and fit, that so The heavens new joy might know Through all their shining courts that name to hear, Which on this earth doth sound Like music spreading gladness round, Breathing with charm intense Peace to the soul and rapture to the sense.

It seemed as though the freeman and the captive were in no haste to bring their tuneful contest to conclusion, had not the voice of Preciosa, who had overheard them, sounded from behind in response to theirs. They stopped instantly, and remained listening to her in breathless attention. Whether her words were delivered impromptu, or had been composed some time before, I know not; however that may be, she sang the following lines with infinite grace, as though they were made for the occasion.

While in this amorous emprise An equal conflict I maintain, 'Tis higher glory to remain Pure maid, than boast the brightest eyes.

The humblest plant on which we tread, If sound and straight it grows apace, By aid of nature or of grace May rear aloft towards heaven its head.

In this my lowly poor estate, By maiden honour dignified, No good wish rests unsatisfied; Their wealth I envy not the great.

I find not any grief or pain In lack of love or of esteem; For I myself can shape, I deem, My fortunes happy in the main.

Let me but do what in me lies The path of rectitude to tread; And then be welcomed on this head Whatever fate may please the skies.

I fain would know if beauty hath Such high prerogative, to raise My mind above the common ways, And set me on a loftier path.

If equal in their souls they be, The humblest hind on earth may vie In honest worth and virtue high With one of loftiest degree.

What inwardly I feel of mine Doth raise me all that's base above; For majesty, be sure, and love Do not on common soil recline.

Preciosa having ended her song, Andrew and Clement rose to meet her. An animated conversation ensued between the three; and Preciosa displayed so much intelligence, modesty, and acuteness, as fully excused, in Clement's opinion, the extraordinary determination of Andrew, which he had before attributed more to his youth than his judgment. The next morning the camp was broken up, and they proceeded to a place in the jurisdiction of Murcia, three leagues from the city, where a mischance befel Andrew, which went near to cost him his life.

After they had given security in that place, according to custom, by the deposit of some silver vessels and ornaments, Preciosa and her grandmother, Christina and two other gitanillas, Clement, and Andrew, took up their quarters in an inn, kept by a rich widow, who had a daughter aged about seventeen or eighteen, rather more forward than handsome. Her name was Juana Carducha. This girl having seen the gipsies dance, the devil possessed her to fall in love with Andrew to that degree that she proposed to tell him of it, and take him for a husband, if he would have her, in spite of all her relations. Watching for an opportunity to speak to him, she found it in a cattle-yard, which Andrew had entered in search of two young asses, when she said to him, hurriedly, "Andrew" (she already knew his name), "I am single and wealthy. My mother has no other child: this inn is her own; and besides it she has large vineyards, and several other houses. You have taken my fancy; and if you will have me for a wife, only say the word. Answer me quickly, and if you are a man of sense, only wait, and you shall see what a life we shall lead."

Astonished as he was at Carducha's boldness, Andrew nevertheless answered her with the promptitude she desired, "Señora doncella, I am under promise to marry, and we gitanos intermarry only with gitanas. Many thanks for the favour you would confer on me, of which I am not worthy."

Carducha was within two inches of dropping dead at this unwelcome reply, to which she would have rejoined, but that she saw some of the gitanos come into the yard. She rushed from the spot, athirst for vengeance. Andrew, like a wise man, determined to get out of her way, for he read in her eyes that she would willingly give herself to him with matrimonial bonds, and he had no wish to find himself engaged foot to foot and alone in such an encounter; accordingly, he requested his comrades to quit the place that night. Complying with his wishes as they always did, they set to work at once, took up their securities again that evening, and decamped. Carducha, seeing that Andrew was going away and half her soul with him, and that she should not have time to obtain the fulfilment of her desires, resolved to make him stop by force, since he would not do so of good will. With all the cunning and secrecy suggested to her by her wicked intentions, she put among Andrew's baggage, which she knew to be his, a valuable coral necklace, two silver medals, and other trinkets belonging to her family. No sooner had the gipsies left the inn than she made a great outcry, declaring that the gipsies had robbed her, till she brought about her the officers of justice and all the people of the place. The gipsies halted, and all swore that they had no stolen property with them, offering at the same time to let all their baggage be searched. This made the old gipsy woman very uneasy, lest the proposed scrutiny should lead to the discovery of Preciosa's trinkets and Andrew's clothes, which she preserved with great care. But the good wench Carducha quickly put an end to her fears on that head, for before they had turned over two packages, she said to the men, "Ask which of these bundles belongs to that gipsy who is such a great dancer. I saw him enter my room twice, and probably he is the thief.”

Andrew knew it was himself she meant, and answered with a laugh, “Señora doncella, this is my bundle, and that is my ass. If you find in or upon either of them what you miss, I will pay you the value sevenfold, beside submitting to the punishment which the law awards for theft.”

The officers of justice immediately unloaded the ass, and in the turn of a hand discovered the stolen property, whereat Andrew was so shocked and confounded that he stood like a stone statue. “I was not out in my suspicions,” said Carducha; “see with what a good looking face the rogue covers his villany.” The alcalde, who was present, began to abuse Andrew and the rest of the gipsies, calling them common thieves and highwaymen. Andrew said not a word, but stood pondering in the utmost perplexity, for he had no surmise of Carducha’s treachery. At last, an insolent soldier, nephew to the alcalde, stepped up to him, saying “Look at the dirty gipsy thief! I will lay a wager he will give himself airs as if he were an honest man, and deny the robbery, though the goods have been found in his hands. Good luck to whoever sends the whole pack of you to the galleys. A fitter place it will be for this scoundrel, where he may serve his Majesty, instead of going about dancing from place to place, and thieving from venta to mountain. On the faith of a soldier, I have a mind to lay him at my feet with a blow.”

So saying, without more ado he raised his hand, and gave Andrew such a buffet as roused him from his stupor, and made him recollect that he was not Andrew Caballero but Don Juan and a gentleman; therefore, flinging himself upon the soldier with sudden fury, he snatched his sword from its sheath, buried it in his body, and laid him dead at his feet. The people shouted and yelled; the dead man’s uncle, the alcalde, was frantic with rage; Preciosa fainted, and Andrew, regardless of his own defence, thought only of succouring her. As ill luck would have it, Clement was not on the spot, having gone forward with some baggage, and Andrew was set upon, by so many, that they overpowered him, and loaded him with heavy chains. The alcalde would gladly have hanged him on the spot, but was obliged to send him to Murcia, as he belonged to the jurisdiction of that city. It was not, however, till the next day that he was removed thither, and meanwhile he was loaded with abuse and maltreatment by the alcalde and all the people of the place. The alcalde, moreover, arrested all the rest of the gipsies he could lay hands on, but most of them had made their escape, among others Clement, who was afraid of being seized and discovered. On the following morning the alcalde, with his officers and a great many other armed men, entered Murcia with a caravan of gipsy captives, among whom were Preciosa and poor Andrew, who was chained on the back of a mule, and was handcuffed and had a fork fixed under his chin. All Murcia flocked to see the prisoners, for the news of the soldier's death had been received there; but so great was Preciosa's beauty that no one looked upon her that day without blessing her. The news of her loveliness reached the corregidor's lady, who being curious to see her, prevailed on her husband to give orders that she should not enter the prison to which all the rest of the gipsies were committed. Andrew was thrust into a dark narrow dungeon, where, deprived of the light of the sun and of that which Preciosa's presence diffused, he felt as though he should leave it only for his grave. Preciosa and her grandmother were taken to the corregidor's lady, who at once exclaiming, "Well might they praise her beauty," embraced her tenderly, and never was tired of looking at her. She asked the old woman what was the girl's age. "Fifteen, within a month or two, more or less," was the reply. "That would be the age of my poor Constantia," observed the lady. "Ah, amigas! how the sight of this young girl has brought my bereavement back afresh to my mind."

Upon this, Preciosa took hold of the corregidora's hands, kissed them repeatedly, bathed them with tears, and said, "Señora mia, the gitano who is in custody is not in fault, for he had provocation. They called him a thief, and he is none; they gave him a blow on the face, though his is such a face that you can read in it the goodness of his soul. I entreat you, señora, to see that justice is done him, and that the señor corregidor is not too hasty in executing upon him the penalty of the law. If my beauty has given you any pleasure, preserve it for me by preserving the life of the prisoner, for with it mine ends too. He is to be my husband, but just and proper impediments have hitherto prevented our union. If money would avail to obtain his pardon, all the goods of our tribe should be sold by auction, and we would give even more than was asked of us. My lady, if you know what love is, and have felt and still feel it for your dear husband, have pity on me who love mine tenderly and honestly."

All the while Preciosa was thus speaking she kept fast hold of the corregidora's hands, and kept her tearful eyes fixed on her face, whilst the lady gazed on her with no less wistfulness, and wept as she did. Just then the corregidor entered, and seeing his wife and Preciosa thus mingling their tears, he was surprised as much by the scene as by the gitanilla's beauty. On his asking the cause of her affliction, Preciosa let go the lady's hands, and threw herself at the corregidor's feet, crying, "Mercy, mercy, señor! If my husband dies, I die too. He is not guilty; if he is, let me bear the punishment; or if that cannot be, at least let the trial be delayed until means be sought which may save him; for as he did not sin through malice, it may be that heaven in its grace will send him safety.” The corregidor was still more surprised to hear such language from the gitanilla’s lips, and but that he would not betray signs of weakness, he could have wept with her.

While all this was passing, the old gitana was busily turning over a great many things in her mind, and after all this cogitation, she said, “Wait a little, your honour, and I will turn these lamentations into joy, though it should cost me my life;” and she stepped briskly out of the room. Until she returned, Preciosa never desisted from her tears and entreaties that they would entertain the cause of her betrothed, being inwardly resolved that she would send to his father that he might come and interfere in his behalf.

The old gipsy woman returned with a little box under her arm, and requested that the corregidor and his lady would retire with her into another room, for she had important things to communicate to them in secret. The corregidor imagined she meant to give him information respecting some thefts committed by the gipsies, in order to bespeak his favour for the prisoner, and he instantly withdrew with her and his lady to his closet, where the gipsy, throwing herself on her knees before them both, began thus:

“If the good news I have to give to your honours be not worth forgiveness for a great crime I have committed, I am here to receive the punishment I deserve. But before I make my confession, I beg your honours will tell me if you know these trinkets;” and she put the box which contained those belonging to Preciosa into the corregidor’s hands. He opened it, and saw those childish gewgaws, but had no idea what they could mean. The corregidora looked at them, too, with as little consciousness as her husband, and merely observed that they were the ornaments of some little child. “That is true,” replied the gipsy, “and to what child they belonged is written in this folded paper.” The corregidor hastily opened the paper, and read as follows: —

“The child’s name was Doña Constanza de Acevedo y de Menesis; her mother’s, Doña Guiomar de Menesis; and her father’s, D. Fernando de Acevedo, knight of the order of Calatrava. She disappeared on the day of the Lord’s Ascension, at eight in the morning, in the year one thousand five hundred and ninety-five. The child had upon her the trinkets which are contained in this box.”

Instantly, on hearing the contents of the paper, the corregidora recognised the trinkets, put them to her lips, kissed them again and again, and swooned away; and the corregidor was too much occupied in assisting her to ask the gitana for his daughter. “Good woman, angel rather than gitana,” cried the lady when she came to herself, “where is the owner of these baubles?”

“Where, señora?” was the reply. “She is in your own house. That young gipsy who drew tears from your eyes is their owner, and is indubitably your own daughter, whom I stole from your house in Madrid on the day and hour named in this paper.”

On hearing this, the agitated lady threw off her clogs, and rushed with open arms into the sala, where she found Preciosa surrounded by her doncellas and servants, and still weeping and wailing. Without a word she caught her hurriedly in her arms, and examined if she had under her left breast a mark in the shape of a little white mole with which she was born, and she found it there enlarged by time. Then, with the same haste, she took off the girl’s shoe, uncovered a snowy foot, smooth as polished marble, and found what she sought; for the two smaller toes of the right foot were joined together by a thin membrane, which the tender parents could not bring themselves to let the surgeon cut when she was an infant. The mole on the bosom, the foot, the trinkets, the day assigned for the kidnapping, the confession of the gitana, and the joy and emotion which her parents felt when they first beheld her, confirmed with the voice of truth in the corregidora’s soul that Preciosa was her own daughter: clasping her therefore in her arms, she returned with her to the room where she had left the corregidor and the old gipsy. Preciosa was bewildered, not knowing why she had made all those investigations, and was still more surprised when the lady raised her in her arms, and gave her not one kiss, but a hundred.

Doña Guiomar at last appeared with her precious burthen in her husband’s presence, and transferring the maiden from her own arms to his, “Receive, Señor, your daughter Constanza,” she said; “for your daughter she is without any doubt, since I have seen the marks on the foot and the bosom; and stronger even than these proofs is the voice of my own heart ever since I set eyes on her.”

“I doubt it not,” replied the corregidor, folding Preciosa in his arms, “for the same sensations have passed through my heart as through yours; and how could so many strange particulars combine together unless it were by a miracle?”

The people of the house were now lost in wonder, going about and asking each other, “What is all this?” but erring widely in their conjectures; for who would have imagined that the gitanilla was the daughter of their lord? The corregidor told his wife and daughter and the old gipsy that he desired the matter should be kept secret until he should himself think fit to divulge it. As for the old gipsy, he assured her that he forgave the injury she had done him in stealing his treasure, since she had more than made atonement by restoring it. The only thing that grieved him was that, knowing Preciosa’s quality, she should have betrothed her to a gipsy, and worse than that, to a thief and murderer. “Alas, señor mio,” said Preciosa, “he is neither a gipsy nor a thief, although he has killed a man, but then it was one who had wounded his honour, and he could not do less than show who he was, and kill him.”

“What! he is not a gipsy, my child?” said Doña Guiomar.

“Certainly not,” said the old gitana; and she related the story of Andrew Caballero, that he was the son of Don Francisco de Cárcamo, knight of Santiago; that his name was Don Juan de Cárcamo, of the same order; and that she had kept his clothes after he had changed them for those of a gipsy. She likewise stated the agreement which Preciosa and Don Juan had made not to marry until after two years of mutual trial; and she put in their true light the honourable conduct of both, and the suitable condition of Don Juan.

The parents were as much surprised at this as at the recovery of their daughter. The corregidor sent the gitana for Don Juan’s clothes, and she came back with them accompanied by a gipsy who carried them. Previously to her return, Preciosa’s parents put a thousand questions to her, and she replied with so much discretion and grace, that even though they had not recognised her for their child, they must have loved her. To their inquiry whether she had any affection for Don Juan, she replied, not more than that to which she was bound in gratitude towards one who had humbled himself to become a gipsy for her sake; but even this should not extend farther than her parents desired. “Say no more, daughter Preciosa,” said her father; “(for I wish you to retain this name of Preciosa in memory of your loss and your recovery); as your father, I take it upon myself to establish you in a position not derogatory to your birth.”

Preciosa sighed, and her mother shrewdly suspecting that the sigh was prompted by love for Don Juan, said to the corregidor, “Since Don Juan is a person of such rank, and is so much attached to our daughter, I think, señor, it would not be amiss to bestow her upon him.”

“Hardly have we found her to-day,” he replied, “and already would you have us lose her? Let us enjoy her company for a while at least, for when she marries she will be ours no longer but her husband’s.”

“You are right, señor,” said the lady, “but give orders to bring out Don Juan, for he is probably lying in some filthy dungeon.”

“No doubt he is,” said Preciosa, “for as a thief and homicide, and above all as a gipsy, they will have given him no better lodging.”

“I will go see him,” said the corregidor, “as if for the purpose of taking his confession. Meanwhile, señora, I again charge you not to let any one know this history until I choose to divulge it, for so it behoves my office.” Then embracing Preciosa he went to the prison where Don Juan was confined, and entered his cell, not allowing any one to accompany him.

He found the prisoner with both legs in fetters, handcuffed, and with the iron fork not yet removed from beneath his chin. The cell was dark, only a scanty gleam of light passing into it from a loop-hole near the top of the wall. "How goes it, sorry knave?" said the corregidor, as he entered. "I would I had all the gipsies in Spain leashed here together to finish them all at once, as Nero would have beheaded all Rome at a single blow. Know, thou thief, who art so sensitive on the point of honour, that I am the corregidor of this city, and come to know from thee if thy betrothed is a gitanilla who is here with the rest of you?"

Hearing this Andrew imagined that the corregidor had surely fallen in love with Preciosa; for jealousy is a subtle thing, and enters other bodies without breaking or dividing them. He replied, however, "If she has said that I am her betrothed, it is very true; and, if she has said I am not her betrothed, she has also spoken the truth; for it is not possible that Preciosa should utter a falsehood."

"Is she so truthful then?" said the corregidor. "It is no slight thing to be so and be a gitana. Well, my lad, she has said that she is your betrothed, but that she has not yet given you her hand; she knows that you must die for your crime, and she has entreated me to marry her to you before you die, that she may have the honour of being the widow of so great a thief as yourself."

"Then, let your worship do as she has requested," said Andrew; "for so I be married to her, I will go content to the other world, leaving this one with the name of being hers."

"You must love her very much?"

"So much," replied the prisoner, "that whatever I could say of it would be nothing to the truth. In a word, señor corregidor, let my business be despatched. I killed the man who insulted me; I adore this young gitana; I shall die content if I die in her grace, and God's I know will not be wanting to us, for we have both observed honourably and strictly the promise we made each other."

"This night then I will send for you," said the corregidor, "and you shall marry Preciosa in my house, and to-morrow morning you shall be on the gallows. In this way I shall have complied with the demands of justice and with the desire of you both." Andrew thanked him; the corregidor returned home, and told his wife what had passed between them.

During his absence Preciosa had related to her mother the whole course of her life; and how she had always believed she was a gipsy and the old woman's granddaughter; but that at the same time she had always esteemed herself much more than might have been expected of a gitana. Her mother bade her say truly, was she very fond of Don Juan? With great bashfulness and with downcast eyes she replied that, having considered herself a gipsy, and that she should better her condition by marrying a knight of Santiago, and one of such station as Don Juan de Cárcamo, and having, moreover, learned by experience his good disposition and honourable conduct, she had sometimes looked upon him with the eyes of affection; but that as she had said once for all, she had no other will than that which her parents might approve.

Night arrived; and about ten they took Andrew out of prison without handcuffs and fetters, but not without a great chain with which his body was bound from head to foot. In this way he arrived, unseen by any but those who had charge of him, in the corregidor's house, was silently and cautiously admitted into a room, and there left alone. A confessor presently entered and bade him confess, as he was to die next day. "With great pleasure I will confess," replied Andrew; "but why do they not marry me first? And if I am to be married, truly it is a sad bridal chamber that awaits me."

Doña Guiomar, who heard all this, told her husband that the terrors he was inflicting on Don Juan were excessive, and begged he would moderate them, lest they should cost him his life. The corregidor assented, and called out to the confessor that he should first marry the gipsy to Preciosa, after which the prisoner would confess, and commend himself with all his heart to God, who often rains down his mercies at the moment when hope is most parched and withering. Andrew was then removed to a room where there was no one but Doña Guiomar, the corregidor, Preciosa, and two servants of the family. But when Preciosa saw Don Juan in chains, his face all bloodless, and his eyes dimmed with recent weeping, her heart sank within her, and she clutched her mother's arm for support. "Cheer up, my child," said the corregidora, kissing her, "for all you now see will turn to your pleasure and advantage." Knowing nothing of what was intended, Preciosa could not console herself; the old gipsy was sorely disturbed, and the bystanders awaited the issue in anxious suspense.

"Señor Vicar," said the corregidor, "this gitano and gitana are the persons whom your reverence is to marry."

"That I cannot do," replied the priest, "unless the ceremony be preceded by the formalities required in such cases. Where have the banns been published? Where is the license of my superior, authorising the espousals?"

"The inadvertance has been mine," said the corregidor; "but I will undertake to get the license from the bishop's deputy."

"Until it comes then, your worships will excuse me," said the priest, and without another word, to avoid scandal, he quitted the house, leaving them all in confusion.

"The padre has done quite right," said the corregidor, "and it may be that it was by heaven's providence, to the end that Andrew's execution might be postponed; for married to Preciosa he shall assuredly be, but first the banns must be published, and thus time will be gained, and time often works a happy issue out of the worst difficulties. Now I want to know from Andrew, should matters take such a turn, that without any more of those shocks and perturbations, he should become the husband of Preciosa, would he consider himself a happy man, whether as Andrew Caballero, or as Don Juan de Cárcamo?"

As soon as Don Juan heard himself called by his true name, he said, "Since Preciosa has not chosen to confine herself to silence, and has discovered to you who I am, I say to you, that though my good fortune should make me monarch of the world, she would still be the sole object of my desires; nor would I aspire to have any blessing besides, save that of heaven."

"Now for this good spirit you have shown, Señor Don Juan de Cárcamo, I will in fitting time make Preciosa your lawful wife, and at present I bestow her upon you in that expectation, as the richest jewel of my house, my life, and my soul; for in her I bestow upon you Doña Constanza de Acevedo Menesis, my only daughter, who, if she equals you in love, is nowise inferior to you in birth."

Andrew was speechless with astonishment, while in a few words Doña Guiomar related the loss of her daughter, her recovery, and the indisputable proofs which the old gipsy woman had given of the kidnapping. More amazed than ever, but filled with immeasurable joy, Don Juan embraced his father and mother-in-law, called them his parents and señores, and kissed Preciosa's hands, whose tears called forth his own. The secret was no longer kept; the news was spread abroad by the servants who had been present, and reached the ears of the alcalde, the dead man's uncle, who saw himself debarred of all hope of vengeance, since the rigour of justice could not be inflicted on the corregidor's son-in-law. Don Juan put on the travelling dress which the old woman had preserved; his prison and his iron chain were exchanged for liberty and chains of gold; and the sadness of the incarcerated gipsies was turned into joy, for they were all bailed out on the following day. The uncle of the dead man received a promise of two thousand ducats on condition of his abandoning the suit and forgiving Don Juan. The latter, not forgetting his comrade Clement, sent at once in quest of him, but he was not to be found, nor could anything be learned of him until four days after, when authentic intelligence was obtained that he had embarked in one of two Genoese galleys that lay in the port of Cartagena, and had already sailed. The corregidor informed Don Juan, that he had ascertained that his father, Don Francisco de Cárcano, had been appointed corregidor of that city, and that it would be well to wait until the nuptials could be celebrated with his consent and approbation. Don Juan was desirous to conform to the corregidor's wishes, but said that before all things he must be made one with Preciosa. The archbishop granted his license, requiring that the banns should be published only once.

The city made a festival on the wedding-day, the corregidor being much liked, and there were illuminations, bullfights, and tournaments. The old woman remained in the house of her pretended grandchild, not choosing to part from Preciosa. The news reached Madrid, and Don Francisco de Cárcamo learned that the gipsy bridegroom was his son, and that Preciosa was the gitanilla he had seen in his house. Her beauty was an excuse in his eyes for the levity of his son, whom he had supposed to be lost, having ascertained that he had not gone to Flanders. Besides, he was the more reconciled when he found what a good match Don Juan had made with the daughter of so great and wealthy a cavalier as was Don Fernando de Acevedo. He hastened his departure in order to see his children, and within twenty days he was in Murcia. His arrival renewed the general joy; the lives of the pair were related, and the poets of that city, which numbers some very good ones, took it upon them to celebrate the extraordinary event along with the incomparable beauty of the gitanilla; and the licentiate Pozo wrote in such wise, that Preciosa's fame will endure in his verses whilst the world lasts. I forgot to mention that the enamoured damsel of the inn owned that the charge of theft she had preferred against Andrew was not true, and confessed her love and her crime, for which she was not visited with any punishment, because the joyous occasion extinguished revenge and resuscitated clemency.

THE GENEROUS LOVER.

“O lamentable ruins of the ill-fated Nicosia, still moist with the blood of your valorous and unfortunate defenders! Were you capable of feeling, we might jointly bewail our disasters in this solitude, and perhaps find some relief for our sorrows in mutually declaring them. A hope may remain that your dismantled towers may rise again, though not for so just a defence as that in which they fell; but I, unfortunate! what good can I hope for in my wretched distress, even should I return to my former state? Such is my hard fate, that in freedom I was without happiness, and in captivity I have no hope of it.”

These words were uttered by a captive Christian as he gazed from an eminence on the ruined walls of Nicosia; and thus he talked with them, comparing his miseries with theirs, as if they could understand him, — a common habit with the afflicted, who, carried away by their imaginations, say and do things inconsistent with all sense and reason. Meanwhile there issued from a pavilion or tent, of which there were four pitched in the plain, a young Turk, of good-humoured and graceful appearance, who approached the Christian, saying, “I will lay a wager, friend Ricardo, that the gloomy thoughts you are continually ruminating have led you to this place.”

“It is true,” replied Ricardo, for that was the captive’s name; “but what avails it, since, go where I will, I find no relief from them; on the contrary, the sight of yonder ruins have given them increased force.”

“You mean the ruins of Nicosia?”

“Of course I do, since there are no others visible here.”

“Such a sight as that might well move you to tears,” said the Turk; “for any one who saw this famous and plenteous isle of Cyprus about two years ago, when its inhabitants enjoyed all the felicity that is granted to mortals, and who now sees them exiled from it, or captive and wretched, how would it be possible not to mourn over its calamity? But let us talk no more of these things, for which there is no remedy, and speak of your own, for which I would fain find one. Now I entreat you, by what you owe me for the good-will I have shown you, and for the fact that we are of the same country, and were brought up together in boyhood, that you tell me what is the cause of your inordinate sadness. For even, admitting that captivity alone is enough to sadden the most cheerful heart in the world, yet I imagine that your sorrows have a deeper source; for generous spirits like yours do not yield to ordinary misfortunes so much as to betray extraordinary grief on account of them. Besides, I know that you are not so poor as to be unable to pay the sum demanded for your ransom; nor are you shut up in the castles of the Black Sea as a captive of consideration, who late or never obtains the liberty he sighs for. Since, then, you are not deprived of the hope of freedom, and yet manifest such deep despondency, I cannot help thinking that it proceeds from some other cause than the loss of your liberty. I entreat you to tell me what is that cause, and I offer you my help to the utmost of my means and power. Who knows but that it was in order that I might serve you that fortune induced me to wear this dress which I abhor.

“You know, Ricardo, that my master is the cadi (which is the same thing as the bishop) of this city. You know, too, how great is his power, and my influence with him. Moreover, you are not ignorant of the ardent desire I feel not to die in this creed, which I nominally profess; but if it can be done in no other way, I propose to confess and publicly cry aloud my faith in Jesus Christ, from which I lapsed by reason of my youth and want of understanding. Such a confession I know will cost me my life, which I will give freely, that I may not lose my soul. From all this I would have you infer, and be assured, that my friendship may be of some use to you. But that I may know what remedies or palliations your case may admit of, it is necessary that you explain it to me, as the sick man does to the doctor, taking my word for it, that I will maintain the strictest secrecy concerning it.”

Ricardo, who had listened in silence all this while, finding himself at last obliged to reply, did so as follows: “If, as you have guessed rightly, respecting my misfortune, friend Mahmoud,” (that was the Turk’s name,) “so also you could hit upon the remedy for it, I should think my liberty well lost, and would not exchange my mischance for the greatest imaginable good fortune. But I know that it is such, that though all the world should know the cause whence it proceeds, no one ever would make bold to find for it a remedy, or even an alleviation. That you may be satisfied of this truth, I will relate my story to you, as briefly as I can; but before I enter upon the confused labyrinth of my woes, tell me what is the reason why my master, Hassan Pasha, has caused these pavilions to be pitched here in the plain, before he enters Nicosia, to which he has been appointed pasha, as the Turks call their viceroys.”

“I will satisfy you briefly,” replied Mahmoud. “You must know, then, that it is the custom among the Turks, for those who are sent as viceroys of any province, not to enter the city in which their predecessor dwells until he quits it, and leaves the new comer to take up his residence freely; and when the new pasha has done so, the old one remains encamped beyond the walls, waiting the result of the inquiry into his administration, which is made without his being able to interfere,

and avail himself of bribery or affection, unless he has done so beforehand. The result of the inquiry, enrolled on a sealed parchment, is then given to the departing pasha, and this he must present to the Sublime Porte, that is to say, the court in front of the grand council of the Turk. It is then read by the vizier pasha and the four lesser pashas, (or, as we should say, by the president and members of the royal council,) who punish or reward the bearer according to its contents; though, if these are not favourable, he buys off his punishment with money. If there is no accusation against him, and he is not rewarded, as commonly happens, he obtains by means of presents the post he most desires; for, at that court, offices are not bestowed by merit, but for money; everything is bought and sold. The bestowers of office fleece the receivers; but he who purchases a post, makes enough by it to purchase another which promises more profit.

“Everything proceeds as I tell you; in this empire all is violence: a fact which betokens that it will not be durable; but, as I full surely believe, it is our sins that uphold it, the sins, I mean, of those who imprudently and forwardly offend God, as I am doing: may he forgive me in his mercy!

“It is, then, for the reason I have stated that your master, Hassan Pasha, has been encamped here four days, and if the Pasha of Nicosia has not come out as he should have done, it is because he has been very ill. But he is now better, and he will come out to-day or to-morrow without fail, and lodge in some tents behind this hill, which you have not seen, after which your master will immediately enter the city. And now I have replied to the question you put to me.”

“Listen, then, to my story,” said Ricardo, “but I know not if I shall be able to fulfil my promise to be brief, since my misfortune is so vast that it cannot be comprised within any reasonable compass of words. However, I will do what I may and as time allows. Let me ask you, in the first place, if you knew in our town of Trapani, a young lady whom fame pronounced to be the most beautiful woman in Sicily? A young lady, I say, of whom the most ingenious tongues, and the choicest wits declared that her beauty was the most perfect ever known in past ages or the present, or that may be looked for in the future. One, of whom the poets sang that she had hair of gold, that her eyes were two shining suns, her cheeks roses, her teeth pearls, her lips rubies, her neck alabaster; and that every part of her made with the whole, and the whole with every part, a marvellous harmony and consonance, nature diffusing all over her such an exquisite sweetness of tone and colour, that envy itself could not find a fault in her. How is it possible, Mahmoud, that you have not already named her? Surely you have either not listened to me, or when you were in Trapani you wanted common sensibility.”

“In truth, Ricardo,” replied Mahmoud, “if she whom you have depicted in such glowing colours is not Leonisa, the daughter of Rodolfo Florencio, I know not who she is, for that lady alone was famed as you have described.”

“Leonisa it is, Mahmoud,” exclaimed Ricardo; “Leonisa is the sole cause of all my bliss and all my sorrow; it is for her, and not for the loss of liberty, that my eyes pour forth incessant tears, my sighs kindle the air, and my wailings weary heaven and the ears of men. It is she who makes me appear in your eyes a madman, or at least a being devoid of energy and spirit. This Leonisa, so cruel to me, was not so to another, and this is the cause of my present miserable plight. For you must know that, from my childhood, or at least from the time I was capable of understanding, I not only loved, but adored and worshipped her, as though I knew no other deity on earth. Her parents and relations were aware of my affection for her, and never showed signs of disapproving it, for they knew that my designs were honourable and virtuous; and I know that they often said as much to Leonisa, in order to dispose her to receive me as her betrothed; but she had set her heart on Cornelio, the son of Ascanio Rotulo, whom you well know — a spruce young gallant, point-de-vice in his attire, with white hands, curly locks, mellifluous voice, amorous discourse — made up, in short, of amber and sugar-paste, garnished with plumes and brocade. She never cared to bestow a look on my less dainty face, nor to be touched in the least by my assiduous courtship; but repaid all my affection with disdain and abhorrence; whilst my love for her grew to such an extreme, that I should have deemed my fate most blest if she had killed me by her scorn, provided she did not bestow open, though maidenly, favours on Cornelio. Imagine the anguish of my soul, thus lacerated by her disdain, and tortured by the most cruel jealousy. Leonisa’s father and mother winked at her preference for Cornelio, believing, as they well might, that the youth, fascinated by her incomparable beauty, would chose her for his wife, and thus they should have a wealthier son-in-law than myself. That he might have been; but they would not have had one (without arrogance, be it said) of better birth than myself, or of nobler sentiments or more approved worth.

“Well, in the course of my wooing, I learned one day last May, that is to say, about a year ago, that Leonisa and her parents, Cornelio and his, accompanied by all their relations and servants had gone to enjoy themselves in Ascanio’s garden, close to the sea shore on the road to the Saltpits.

“I know the place well,” interrupted Mahmoud, “and passed many a merry day there in better times. Go on, Ricardo.”

“The moment I received information of this party, such an infernal fury of jealousy possessed my soul that I was utterly distraught, as you will see, by what I straightway did; and that was to go to the garden, where I found the whole party taking their pleasure, and Cornelio and Leonisa seated together under a nopal-tree, a little apart from the rest.

“What were their sensations on seeing me I know not, all I know is that my own were such that a cloud came over my sight, and I was like a statue without power of speech or motion. But this torpor soon gave way to choler, which roused my heart’s blood, and unlocked my hands and my tongue. My hands indeed were for a while restrained by respect for that divine face before me; but my tongue at least broke silence.

“‘Now hast thou thy heart’s content,’ I cried, ‘O mortal enemy of my repose, thine eyes resting with so much composure on the object that makes mine a perpetual fountain of tears! Closer to him! Closer to him, cruel girl! Cling like ivy round that worthless trunk. Comb and part the locks of that new Ganymede, thy lukewarm admirer. Give thyself up wholly to the capricious boy on whom thy gaze is fixed, so that losing all hope of winning thee I may lose too the life I abhor. Dost thou imagine, proud, thoughtless girl, that the laws and usages which are acknowledged in such cases by all mankind, are to give way for thee alone? Dost thou imagine that this boy, puffed up with his wealth, vain of his looks, presuming upon his birth, inexperienced from his youth, can preserve constancy in love, or be capable of estimating the inestimable, or know what riper years and experience know? Do not think it. One thing alone is good in this world, to act always consistently, so that no one be deceived unless it be by his own ignorance. In extreme youth there is much inconstancy; in the rich there is pride; in the arrogant, vanity; in men who value themselves on their beauty, there is disdain; and in one who unites all these in himself, there is a fatuity which is the mother of all mischief.

“‘As for thee, boy, who thinkest to carry off so safely a prize more due to my earnest love than to thy idle philandering, why dost thou not rise from that flowery bank, and tear from my bosom the life which so abhors thine? And that not for the insult thou puttest upon myself, but because thou knowest not how to prize the blessing which fortune bestows upon thee. ’Tis plain, indeed, how little thou esteemest it, since thou wilt not budge to defend it for fear of ruffling the finical arrangement of thy pretty attire. Had Achilles been of as placid temper as thou art, Ulysses would certainly have failed in his attempt, for all his show of glittering arms and burnished helmets. Go, play among thy mother’s maids; they will help thee to dress thy locks and take care of those dainty hands that are fitter to wind silk than to handle a sword.’

“In spite of all these taunts Cornelio never stirred from his seat, but remained perfectly still, staring at me as if he was bewitched. The loud tones in which I spoke had brought round us all the people who were walking in the garden, and they arrived in time to hear me assail Cornelio with many other opprobrious terms. Plucking up heart, at last, from the presence of numbers, most of whom were his relations, servants, or friends, he made a show as if he would rise; but before he was on his feet my sword was out, and I attacked not him only but all who were before me. The moment Leonisa saw the gleam of my sword she swooned away, which only exasperated my frantic rage. I know not whether it was that those whom I assailed contented themselves with acting on the defensive as against a raving madman, or that it was my own good luck and adroitness, or Heaven's design to reserve me for greater ills, but the fact was that I wounded seven or eight of those who came under my hand. As for Cornelio, he made such good use of his heels that he escaped me.

"In this imminent danger, surrounded by enemies who were now incensed to vengeance, I was saved by an extraordinary chance; but better would it have been to have lost my life on the spot than to be saved in order to suffer hourly death. On a sudden the garden was invaded by a great number of Turkish corsairs, who had landed in the neighbourhood without being perceived by the sentinels in the castles on the coast, or by our cruisers. As soon as my antagonists descried them they left me, and escaped with all speed. Of all the persons in the garden the Turks captured only three, besides Leonisa, who was still in her swoon. As for me, I fell into their hands after receiving four ugly wounds, which, however, I had revenged by laying four Turks dead upon the ground.

"The Turks having effected this onslaught with their usual expedition, returned to their galleys, ill-satisfied with a success which had cost them so dear. Having set sail they quickly arrived at Fabiana, where mustering their hands to see who was missing, they found that they had lost four Levantine soldiers whom they esteemed their best men. They resolved to revenge the loss on me, and the commander of the galley immediately ordered the yard-arm to be lowered in order to hang me. Leonisa was present at all this. She had come to her senses, and seeing herself in the power of the corsairs, she stood weeping and wringing her delicate hands, without saying a word, but listening if she could understand what was said by the Turks. One of the Christian slaves at the oar told her in Italian that the captain had ordered that Christian to be hanged, pointing to me, because he had killed in his own defence four of the best soldiers belonging to the galley. On hearing this, Leonisa (it was the first time she showed any pity for me) bade the captive tell the Turks not to hang me, for they would lose a large ransom, but return at once, to Trapani, where it would be paid them. This, I say, was the first, as it will also be the last mark of compassion bestowed on me by Leonisa, and all for my greater woe.

“The Turks believed what the captive told them: interest got the better of their resentment, and they returned next morning with a flag of peace. I passed a night of the greatest anguish, not so much from the pain of my wounds, as from thinking of the danger in which my fair and cruel enemy was placed among those barbarians. When we arrived at the town one galley entered the port, the other remained in the offing. The Christian inhabitants lined the whole shore, and the effeminate Cornelio stood watching from a distance what was going on in the galley. My steward immediately came to treat for my ransom, and I told him on no account to bargain for it but for that of Leonisa, for which he should offer all I was worth. I furthermore ordered him to return to shore, and toll Leonisa’s parents that they might leave it to him to treat for their daughter’s liberation, and give themselves no trouble about the matter.

“The chief captain, who was a Greek renegade named Yusuf, demanded six thousand crowns for Leonisa and four thousand for me, adding that he would not give up the one without the other. He asked this large sum, as I afterwards ascertained, because he was in love with Leonisa, and did not wish to ransom her, but to give me and a thousand crowns to boot to the other captain, with whom he was bound to share equally whatever prizes they made, and to keep Leonisa for himself as valued at five thousand crowns. It was for this reason that he appraised us both at ten thousand.

“Leonisa’s parents made no offer at all, relying on my promise, nor did Cornelio so much as open his lips on the matter. After much bargaining my steward agreed to pay five thousand crowns for Leonisa and three for me, and Yusuf accepted this offer at the persuasion of the other captain and of all his men. But as my agent had not so large an amount in ready money, he asked for three days to get it in, being resolved to expend all I possessed rather than fail to rescue us. Yusuf was glad of this, thinking that something might possibly occur in the interval to prevent the completion of the bargain, and he departed for the isle of Fabiana, saying that in three days he would return for the money. But fortune, never weary of persecuting me, ordained that a Turkish sentinel descried from the highest point of the island, far out at sea, six vessels which appeared to be either the Maltese squadron or one belonging to Sicily. He ran down to give warning, and as quick as thought the Turks who were on shore, some cooking their dinners, some washing their linen, embarked again, heaved anchor, got out their oars, hoisted sail, and heading in the direction of Barbary, in less than two hours lost sight of the galleys. I leave you to conjecture, friend Mahmoud, what I suffered in that voyage, so contrary to my expectation, and more when we arrived the following day at the south-west of the isle of Pantanalea. There the Turks landed, and the two captains began to divide all the prizes they had made.

All this was for me a lingering death.

“When Leonisa’s turn and mine came, Yusuf gave Fatallah (the other captain) myself and six other Christians, four of them fit for the oar, and two very handsome Corsican boys, as an equivalent for Leonisa, whom he himself retained; Fatallah being content with that arrangement. I was present at all this, but knew not what they said, though I saw what they did, nor should I have then understood the nature of the partition, had not Fatallah come up to me and said in Italian, ‘Christian, you now belong to me; you have cost me two thousand crowns; if you desire your liberty you must pay me four thousand, or else die here.’ I asked him if the Christian maiden was his also. He said she was not, but that Yusuf had kept her with the intention to make her a Moor and marry her; and this was true, for I was told the same thing by one of the Christian rowers, who understood Turkish very well, and had overheard the conversation that had passed between Yusuf and Fatallah. I told my master to take measures for possessing himself of the maiden, and that I would give him for her ransom alone ten thousand gold crowns. He replied that it was impossible, but he would let Yusuf know the large sum I had offered for the Christian girl, and perhaps he would be tempted to change his intention and ransom her. He did so, and ordered all his crew to go on board again immediately, for he intended to sail to Tripoli, to which city he belonged. Yusuf also determined to make for Biserta, and they all embarked with as much speed as they use when they discover galleys to give them chase or merchant craft to plunder. They had reason for this haste, for the weather seemed to be changing, and to threaten a storm.

“Leonisa was ashore, but not where I could see her, until just as we were embarking we met at the water side. Her new master and newer lover led her by the hand, and as she set foot on the ladder that reached from the shore to the galley, she turned her eyes upon me. Mine were fixed on her, and such a pang of mingled tenderness and grief came over me that a mist overspread my eyes, and I fell senseless on the ground. I was told afterwards that Leonisa was affected in the same way, for she fell off the ladder into the sea, into which Yusuf plunged after her and brought her out in his arms. This was told me in my master’s galley into which I had been carried insensible. When I came to my senses, and found myself there, and saw the other galley steering a different course and carrying off the half of my soul or rather the whole of it, my heart sank within me again; again I cursed my unhappy fate, and clamorously invoked! death, till my master, annoyed by my loud lamentations, threatened me with a great stick if I did not hold my tongue. I restrained my tears and groans, believing that the force with which I compressed them would make them burst a passage for my soul, which so longed to quit this miserable body. But my misfortune did not end here. The storm which had been foreseen suddenly burst upon us. The wind veered round to the south and blew in our teeth with such violence that we were forced to quit our course and run before it.

“It was the captain’s intention to make for the island and take shelter under its northern shore, but in this he was disappointed; for such was the fury of the storm that although before it we had been making way continually for two days and nights, yet in little more than fourteen hours we saw ourselves again within six or seven miles of the island, and driving helplessly against it, not where the shore was low, but just where the rocks were highest and threatened us with inevitable death. We saw near us the other galley, on board of which was Leonisa, and all its Turk and captive rowers straining every nerve to keep themselves off the rocks. Ours did the same, but with more success than the crew of our consort, who, spent with toil, and vanquished in the desperate struggle with the elements, let fall their oars, and suffered themselves to drift ashore, where the galley struck with such violence that it was dashed to pieces before our eyes.

“Night began to close in, and such were the shrieks of those who were drowning, and the alarm of those on board our galley, that none of our captain’s orders were heard or executed. All the crew did, was to keep fast hold of their oars, turn the vessel’s head to the wind, and let go two anchors, in hopes to delay for a little while the death that seemed certain. Whilst all were in dread of dying, with me it was quite the reverse; for in the fallacious hope of seeing in the other world her who had so lately departed from this, every instant the galley delayed to founder or drive ashore was to me an age of agony. I watched every billow that dashed by us and over us, to see if they bore the body of the unfortunate Leonisa. I will not detain you, Mahmoud, with a recital of the tortures that distracted my soul in that long and bitter night; it is enough to say that they were such that had death come, it would have had little to do in bereaving me of life.

“Day broke with every appearance of worse weather than ever, and we found that our vessel had shifted its course considerably, having drifted away from the rocks and approached a point of the island. Setting all of us to work, both Turks and Christians, with renewed hope and strength, in six hours we doubled the point, and found ourselves in calmer water, so that we could better use our oars; and the Turks saw a prospect of going on shore to see if there were any remains of the galley that had been wrecked the night before. But Heaven denied me the consolation I hoped for in seeing in my arms the body of Leonisa. I asked a renegade, who was about to land, to look for it and see if it had been cast on the strand. But, as I have said, Heaven denied me this consolation, for at that moment the wind rose with such fresh fury that the shelter of the island was no longer of any avail to us.

“Seeing this, Fatallah would no longer strive against the fortune that so persecuted him. He ordered some sail to be spread, turned the prow to the sea and the poop to the wind, and himself taking the helm, let the vessel run over the wide sea, secure of not being crossed in his way by any impediment. The oars were all placed in their regular positions, the whole crew was seated on the benches, and no one else was seen on foot in the whole galley but the boatswain, who had lashed himself strongly amidship for his greater security. The vessel flew so swiftly that in three days and nights, passing in sight of Trapani, Melazo, and Palermo, she entered the straits of Messina, to the dismay of all on board, and of the spectators on shore. Not to be as long-winded as the storm that buffeted us, I will only say that wearied, famishing, and exhausted by such a long run, almost all round the island of Sicily, we arrived at Tripoli, where my master, before he had divided the booty with his partners, and accounted to the king for one-fifth part, according to custom, was seized with such a pleurisy that in three days it carried him off to hell.

“The king of Tripoli, and the alcaide of the Grand Turk, who, as you know, is heir to all those who die without natural heirs, immediately took possession of all Fatallah’s effects. I became the property of the then viceroy of Tripoli, who a fortnight afterwards received the patent appointing him viceroy of Cyprus, and hither I am come with him without any intention of redeeming myself. He has often told me to do so, since I am a man of station, as Fatallah’s soldiers informed him; I have never complied, but have declared that he was deceived by those who had exaggerated my means. If you would have me tell you my whole purpose, Mahmoud, you must know that I desire not to turn in any direction in which I may find any sort of consolation, but that the sad thoughts and memories which have never left me since the death of Leonisa may become so identified with my captive life that it may never afford me the least pleasure. And if it is true that continual sorrow must at last wear out itself, or him who suffers it, mine cannot fail to wear me out, for I am resolved to give it such free scope that in a few days it shall put an end to the wretched life I endure so unwillingly.

“This is, brother Mahmoud, my sad story; this is the cause of my sighs and tears; judge now if it is enough to draw them forth from my inmost vitals, and to engender them in the desolation of my afflicted heart, Leonisa is dead, and with her all my hope; and though whilst she lived it hung by the merest thread, yet, yet— “

Here the speaker’s voice faltered, so that he could not utter another word, or restrain the tears which coursed each other down his cheeks so fast that they bedewed the ground. Mahmoud mingled his own with them; and when the paroxysm had somewhat abated, he tried to console Ricardo with the best suggestions he could offer; but the mourner cut them short, saying, "What you have to do, friend, is to advise me how I shall contrive to fall into disgrace with my master, and with all those I have to do with, so that, being abhorred by him and by them, I may be so maltreated and persecuted that I may find the death I so much long for."

"I have now," said Mahmoud, "experienced the truth of the common saying, that what is deeply felt is well expressed, though it is true that sometimes excess of feeling paralyses the tongue. Be that as it may, friend Ricardo, — whether your woes inspire your language, or your language exalts your woes, — you shall always find in me a true friend, to aid or to counsel, though my youth, and the folly I committed in assuming this garb, cry aloud that I am little to be relied on in this capacity. I will try, however, to prove that such a conclusion is unfounded; and though you do not desire either counsel or help, I will not the more desist from doing what your case requires, just as people give a sick man not what he asks for, but what is good for him. There is no one who has more power and influence in this city than my master, the Cadi; not even your own master, who comes to it as viceroy, will have so much. This being the case, I may say that I am the most powerful person here, since I can do what I please with my master. I mention this because it may be that I shall so contrive with him that you shall become his property, and being constantly with me, time will tell us what we had best do, both for your consolation, if you will or can be consoled, and to enable me to exchange the life I lead here for a better one."

"I thank you, Mahmoud, for the friendship you offer me," replied Ricardo, "though I well know that, do what you may, it will avail nothing. But let us quit this subject, and go to the tents, for, as I perceive, great numbers of people are coming forth from the city; no doubt it is the old viceroy who is quitting it to give place to my master."

"It is so," said Mahmoud. "Come then, Ricardo, and you will see the ceremony of the reception."

"Come on," said Ricardo; "perhaps I shall have need of you, if the superintendent of my master's slaves have missed me, for he is a Corsican renegade of no very tender heart."

Here the conversation ended, and the two friends reached the tents, just as the new pasha was coming out to receive his predecessor, Ali Pasha. The latter came attended by all the janissaries who have formed the garrison of Nicosia ever since the Turks have had possession of it, in number about five hundred. They marched in two divisions, the one armed with guns, the other with drawn scimeters. Arrived at the tent of Hassan, the new Pasha, they all surrounded it.

Ali made a low obeisance to Hassan, who returned the salutation, but did not bow so low. Ali then entered Hassan's tent, and the Turks placed the new Pasha on a powerful steed, richly caparisoned, and led him round the tents, and up and down the plain; vociferating in their own language, "Long live Sultan Soliman, and Hassan Pasha, his representative!" which cry they frequently repeated, and each time louder and louder. This part of the ceremony being ended, they brought Hassan back to Ali's tent, where the two pashas and the cadi remained alone together for an hour to consult, as Mahmoud informed Ricardo, as to what was to be done upon some works which Ali had begun. Afterwards the cadi appeared at the door of the tent, and proclaimed in Turkish, Arabic, and Greek, that all who desired to crave justice or make any other appeal against Ali Pasha, might now enter freely, for there was Hassan Pasha, sent by the Grand Signor to be viceroy of Cyprus, who would accord them all reason and justice.

In conformity with this permission the janissaries opened a passage to the door of the tent, and every one entered who pleased. Mahmoud made Ricardo go in along with him, for being Hassan's slave his entrance was not opposed. Several Greek Christians and some Turks appeared as appellants, but all upon such trifling matters, that the cadi despatched most of them without the formality of written declarations, rejoinders, and replications. It is, in fact, the custom of the Turks that all causes, except those which relate to marriage, shall be immediately and summarily decided, rather by the rules of common sense than of legal precedent; and among these barbarians (if such they are in this respect) the cadi is the sole judge in all cases, cuts short the pleadings, gives sentence in a breath, and there is no appeal from his decision. Presently a khawass (that is to say, a Turkish alguazil) entered and said that a Jew stood without, at the door of the tent, with a most beautiful Christian maiden for sale. The cadi gave orders to admit him. The khawass withdrew and immediately returned, accompanied by a Jew of venerable appearance, who led by the hand a young woman clothed in the Moorish dress, which became her so well that the most richly arrayed women of Fez or Morocco could not be compared with her, though in the art of adorning themselves they surpass all the other women of Africa, not excepting even those of Algiers, with all their profusion of pearls.

The face of the female slave was covered with a mask of crimson taffety. On her naked ankles she wore two rings, apparently of pure gold; and two others, set with large pearls, on her arms, which shone through the sleeves of a transparent camisole. Her whole dress was rich, gay, and graceful. Struck by her appearance, the first thing the cadi and the pashas did, was to bid the Jew make the Christian uncover her face. She did so, and disclosed a countenance which, like the sun bursting through thick clouds which have long obscured it, dazzled the eyes and gladdened the hearts of the beholders. But on none did that marvellous light produce such an effect as on the woe-worn Ricardo, for he saw before him no other than his cruel and beloved Leonisa, whom he had so often and with such bitter tears bewailed as dead.

At the unexpected sight of such unparalleled loveliness, Ali felt his heart transfixed; Hassan's was pierced with as deep a wound; nor did the cadi's escape scatheless, but, even more deeply smitten than the two pashas, he could not take his eyes off the Christian's face. All three were seized at the same moment with an absolute determination to possess her; and without stopping to inquire how, or where, or when, she had come into the hands of the Jew, they bade him name her price. Four thousand doblas, he replied. The words were no sooner out of the Jew's mouth than Ali Pasha said he would give the price, and that the Jew had only to go to his tent to fetch the money. Hassan Pasha, however, who looked as if he had no mind to lose her, though she were to cost him his life, interposed and said, "I myself will give the four thousand doblas demanded by the Jew, though I would not interfere with Ali's bargain or oppose his wishes, were I not compelled by motives the imperious force and obligation of which he will himself acknowledge. This exquisitely beautiful slave is not for us, but for the Grand Signor alone, and therefore I say that I purchase her in his name. Let us see now who will be so bold as to dispute the purchase with me."

"That will I," replied Ali, "for it is for that very purpose I buy her of the Jew; and it suits me the better to make the present to his Highness, as I have the opportunity of taking her to Constantinople in a few days, and thus winning the favour of the Sultan; for being, as you see, Hassan, a man without employment, I must seek means for obtaining one; whereas, you are secure in that respect for three years, since to-day you enter upon the government of this rich realm of Cyprus. On these grounds, and as I was the first to offer the price demanded for the slave, it stands to reason, Hassan, that you should yield her to me."

"The satisfaction I shall feel in purchasing and sending her to the Sultan," said Hassan, "is so much the greater, as I shall do it without being prompted by any motives of interest whatever. And as for a convenient means of sending her to Constantinople, she shall go thither in a galley manned only by my own slaves."

Ali now started up in wrath, and, clutching his scimeter, cried out, "Since we both intend the same thing, Hassan, namely, to present this Christian to the Grand Signor, and since I was the first purchaser, reason and justice require that you should leave her to me; if you will not, this blade in my hand shall defend my right, and punish your audacity."

The cadi, who had been closely watching this contest, and who was himself no less inflamed with desire than either of the pashas, bethought him how he might remain possessor of the prize, without giving any cause to suspect his insidious designs. Rising therefore to his feet, he stepped between the two angry pashas. "Be quiet, Hassan," he said; "calm yourself, Ali; here am I who can and will arrange your differences in such wise that you shall both have your intentions fulfilled, the Sultan shall be gratified as you desire, and shall be under obligations to you both alike for your loyal and acceptable homage."

The two pashas submitted at once to the cadì, as they would have done even had the terms he imposed appeared harder to them, such is the respect which is paid to their elders by those of that accursed sect. The cadì then continued his address to them. "Ali," said he, "you say that you want this Christian to present her to the Grand Signor; and Hassan says the same. You allege that, having been the first to offer the price required, she ought to be yours; but Hassan denies this; and though he does not know how to assign valid grounds for his claim, yet I find that he has the same as yourself, namely, the intention, which doubtless must have arisen within him at the same time as within yourself, to purchase the slave for the self-same purpose; only you had the advantage of him in being the first to declare yourself. This, however, is no reason why he should be out and out defrauded of the benefit of his good-will, and therefore I am of opinion that it will be well to arrange matters between you in this wise: let the slave be bought by you both; and since she is to belong to the Grand Signor, for whom you buy her, it will be for him to dispose of her. Meanwhile, you Hassan shall pay two thousand doblas, and you Ali another two thousand, and the slave shall remain in my custody, so that I may send her in the name of you both to Constantinople, and thus I too shall not be without some reward for my presence and aid on this occasion. Accordingly, I undertake to send her at my own cost in a style worthy of the great sovereign to whom she is to be presented; and I will write to the Grand Signor a true account of all that has occurred here, and of the good-will you have shown in his service."

The two enamoured pashas could find no pretext for gainsaying this decision; and though it thwarted their desires, they were constrained to submit, each of them comforting himself with the hope, however doubtful, that he would succeed at last. Hassan, who was to remain viceroy of Cyprus, resolved to make such presents to the cadì as would induce him to give up the slave. Ali formed other plans, and as he flattered himself that he should carry them into successful operation, they both professed themselves satisfied, and paid the Jew two thousand doblas each on the spot. The Jew then said that he had sold the slave, but not the clothes she wore, which were worth another two thousand doblas; and this indeed was true, for her hair which she wore partly loose on her shoulders, and partly braided on her forehead, was most gracefully interwoven with strings of pearls; her bracelets and anklets too were set with very large pearls, and her green satin robe was heavily flounced and embroidered with gold. In short, all agreed that the Jew had set a low price on the dress, and the cadi, to show himself no less liberal than the two pashas, said that he would pay for it, that the slave might appear before the Grand Signor as she then stood. The two competitors agreed in approving of this, each of them believing that slave, dress, and all would soon be his own.

It is impossible to describe Ricardo's feelings, when he saw the treasure of his soul thus put up for sale, and found that he had regained it only to lose it more cruelly. He knew not whether he was asleep or awake, and could not believe his own eyes; for it seemed incredible that they should have so unexpectedly before them her whom he had supposed to have disappeared for ever. "Do you know her?" he whispered in Mahmoud's ear.

"No! I do not," was the reply.

"Then I must tell you that it is Leonisa."

"What do you say, Ricardo?" exclaimed Mahmoud.

"I say it is Leonisa."

"Say no more; fortune is proving your friend, and all is turning out for the best, for she is to remain in my master's custody."

"What think you? Shall I place myself where I may be seen by her?"

"By no means, lest you give her a sudden shock; nor must you let it be known that you have seen her, for that might disconcert the plan I have in view."

"I will do as you advise," said Ricardo, turning away his eyes, and carefully avoiding those of Leonisa, which were meanwhile bent upon the ground. Presently the cadi went up to her, and taking her by the hand, delivered her to Mahmoud, ordering him to take her into the city and give her up to his lady, Halema, with directions to keep her as a slave of the Grand Signor. Mahmoud obeyed and left Ricardo alone, following with his eyes the star of his soul, until it disappeared behind the walls of Nicosia. He then went up to the Jew, and asked him where he had bought that Christian slave, or how he had become possessed of her. The Jew replied that he had bought her in the island of Pantanalea, of some Turks who had been shipwrecked there. Ricardo would have pursued his inquiries, but the Jew was called away to give the pashas the very same information which Ricardo so much longed to obtain.

During the long walk from the tents to the city Mahmoud conversed with Leonisa in Italian, and asked her whence she came. She replied that she belonged to the illustrious city of Trapani, and that her parents were noble and wealthy, though as for herself she was utterly unfortunate. Mahmoud then asked her if she knew a gentleman of birth and fortune in that city, named Ricardo. On hearing that name a sigh escaped her that seemed to come from the bottom of her heart. "I know him," she replied, "to my sorrow."

"Why to your sorrow?"

"Because it was to his sorrow that he knew me, and for my misfortune."

"Perhaps," said Mahmoud, "you may also know in the same city another gentleman of very amiable disposition, the son of very wealthy parents, and himself a person of great spirit, liberality, and discretion. His name is Cornelio."

"Him too I know, and of him still more than Ricardo I may say that I know him to my sorrow. But who are you, sir, who know these gentlemen and inquire of me respecting them? Doubtless, Heaven, in compassion for the trouble and mischances I have undergone, has sent me to a place where, if they do not cease, at least I may find a person to console me for them."

"I am a native of Palermo," said Mahmoud, "brought by various chances to wear this garb, and to be in appearance so different from what I am in my secret soul. I know the gentlemen in question, because not many days ago they were with me. Cornelio was captured by some Moors of Tripoli, and sold by them to a Turk who brought him to this island, whither he came to trade, for he is a merchant of Rhodes, and so highly satisfied was he with Cornelio, and such was the confidence he reposed in his truth and integrity, that he entrusted him with his whole property."

"He will be sure to take care of it," said Leonisa, "for he takes very good care of his own. But tell me, señor, how or with whom did Ricardo come to this island?"

"He came," said Mahmoud, "with a corsair who had captured him in a garden on the coast near Trapani, and along with him a damsel, whose name I never thought of asking, though the corsair often spoke to me in praise of her beauty. Ricardo remained here some days with his master until the latter went to visit the tomb of Mahomet, which is in the city of Almedina, and then Ricardo fell into such a sickness that his master left him with me, as being my countryman, that I might take care of him until the return of the pilgrim to Cyprus, should that happen; or else I was to send Ricardo to Constantinople, when his master should advise me of his arrival there. But heaven ordered it otherwise; for the unfortunate Ricardo died in a few days, always invoking to the last the name of one Leonisa, whom he had told me he loved more than his life and soul. She had been drowned, he said, in the wreck of a galley on the coast of the island of Pantanalea; and he never ceased to deplore her death till his grief destroyed him, for that in fact was the only malady I discovered in him."

"Tell me, señor," said Leonisa, "in the conversations you had with the other young man, did he sometimes name this Leonisa? Did he relate the manner in which he and she and Ricardo were captured?”

“He did name her,” replied Mahmoud, “and asked me if there had been brought to this island a Christian of that name, of such and such appearance; for if so he should like to ransom her, provided her owner had been undeceived as to his notion that she was richer than she really was, or should it chance that having enjoyed her, he held her in less esteem. If her price did not exceed three or four hundred crowns, he would pay it gladly, because he had once had some regard for her.”

“It must have been very little,” said Leonisa, “since it was worth no more than four hundred crowns. Ricardo was more generous. Heaven forgive her who was the cause of his death, and that was myself; for I am the unhappy maiden whom he wept as dead, and God knows how I should rejoice were he alive, that I might repay him by letting him see how I felt for his misfortunes. Yes, señor, I am the little loved of Cornello, the truly wept of Ricardo, whom various chances have brought to the miserable state in which I now am; but through all my perils, by the favour of Heaven, I have preserved my honour unsullied, and that consoles me in my misery. I know not at this moment where I am, nor who is my master, nor what my adverse fates have determined is to become of me. I entreat you, therefore, señor, by the Christian blood that flows in your veins, that you will advise me in my difficulties; for though they have already taught me something by experience, yet they are so great and never-ending, that I know not what to do.”

Mahmoud assured her he would do what he could to help her to the best of his understanding and his power. He acquainted her with the nature of the dispute there had been between the pashas concerning her, and how she was now in the keeping of his master the cadi, who was to send her to Constantinople to the Grand Turk Selim; but that he trusted that the true God, in whom he, though a bad Christian, believed, would dispose of her otherwise. He advised her to conciliate Halima, the wife of his master the cadi, with whom she was to remain until she was sent to Constantinople, and of whose character he gave her some details. Having given her this and other useful counsel, he arrived at the cadi’s house, and delivered her over to Halima along with his master’s message.

The Moorish woman received her well, seeing her so beautiful and so handsomely dressed, and Mahmoud returned to the tents, where he recounted to Ricardo, point by point, all that had passed between himself and Leonisa; and the tears came into his eyes when he spoke of the feeling displayed by Leonisa, when he told her that Ricardo was dead. He stated how he had invented the story of Cornelio’s captivity, in order to see what impression it made on her; and in what disparaging terms he had spoken of him. All this was balm to Ricardo’s afflicted heart.

“I remember, friend Mahmoud,” he said, “an anecdote related to me by my father; you know how ingenious he was, and you have heard how highly he was honoured by the emperor, Charles V., whom he always served in honourable posts in peace and war. He told me that when the emperor was besieging Tunis, a Moorish woman was brought to him one day in his tent, as a marvel of beauty, and that some rays of the sun, entering the tent, fell upon her hair, which vied with them in its golden lustre; a rare thing among the Moorish women, whose hair is almost universally black. Among many other Spanish gentlemen present on that occasion, there were two of distinguished talent as poets, the one an Andalusian, the other a Catalan. Struck with admiration at the sight before him, the Andalusian began to extemporise some verses, but stopped short in the middle of the last line, unable to finish them for want of a rhyme; whereupon the Catalan, who saw his embarrassment, caught the line as it were out of his mouth, finished it, continued the thought, and completed the poem. This incident came into my mind when I saw the exquisitely beautiful Leonisa enter the pasha’s tent obscuring not only the rays of the sun, but the whole firmament with all its stars.”

“Gently, gently, friend Ricardo,” said Mahmoud; “I am afraid if you praise your mistress at that rate you will seem to be a heathen rather than a Christian.”

“Well, tell me then,” said Ricardo, “what you think of doing in our business. Whilst you were conducting Leonisa to Halima, a Venetian renegade who was in the pasha’s tent, and who understands Turkish very well, explained to me all that had passed between them. Above all things, then, we must try to find some means of preventing Leonisa’s being sent to the Grand Signor.”

“The first thing to be done is to have you transferred to my master,” said Mahmoud, “and then we will consider what next.”

The keeper of Hassan’s Christian slaves now came up and took Ricardo away with him. The cadı returned to the city with Hassan, who in a few days made out the report on Ali’s administration, and gave it to him under seal that he might depart to Constantinople. Ali went away at once, laying strict injunctions on the cadı to send the captive without delay to the sultan, along with such a letter as would be serviceable to himself. The cadı promised all this with a treacherous heart, for it was inflamed for the fair Christian. Ali went away full of false hopes, leaving Hassan equally deluded by them. Mahmoud contrived that Ricardo should pass into the possession of his master; but day after day stole on, and Ricardo was so racked with longing to see Leonisa, that he could have no rest. He changed his name to Mario, that his own might not reach her ears before he saw her, which, indeed, was a very difficult thing, because the Moors are exceedingly jealous, and conceal the faces of their women from the eyes of all men; it is true they are not so scrupulous with regard to Christian slaves, perhaps, because being slaves they do not regard them as men.

Now it chanced that one day the lady Halima saw her slave Mario, and gazed so much upon him that his image regained printed on her heart. Not very well satisfied with the languid embraces of her old husband, she readily gave admission to a reprehensible desire, and as readily communicated it to Leonisa, whom she liked much for her agreeable temper, and treated with great respect as a slave of the Grand Signor. She told her how the cadi had brought home a Christian captive of such graceful manners and appearance, that she had never set eyes on a more engaging man in all her life; she understood that he was a chilidi (that is, a gentleman) of the same country as her renegade Mahmoud, and she knew not how to make known to him her inclination, so that the Christian might not despise her for her voluntary declaration. Leonisa asked what was the captive's name, and being told that it was Mario, she replied, "If he was a gentleman, and of the place they say, I should know him; but there is no one of that name in Trapani. But let me see him, and speak with him, lady, and I will tell you who he is, and what may be expected of him."

"It shall be so," said Halima. "On Friday, when the cadi is at prayers in the mosque, I will make Mario come in here where you may speak to him alone, and if you can give him a hint of my desires you will do so in the best way you can."

Not two hours after this conversation the cadi sent for Mahmoud and Mario, and with no less earnestness than Halima had unbosomed herself to Leonisa, the amorous graybeard opened his own to his two slaves, asking their advice as to what he should do to enjoy the Christian and cheat the Grand Signor, to whom she belonged, for he would sooner die a thousand deaths, than give her up to him. So earnestly did the reverend Turk declare his passion that he inspired his two slaves with no less earnestness, though their purposes were quite the reverse of his. It was settled between them that Mario, as a countryman of the fair Christian's, should take it in hand to solicit her on the cadi's part; and that if that failed, the latter should use force, since she was in his power, and afterwards account for not sending her to Constantinople by pretending that she was dead. The cadi was highly delighted with the advice of his two slaves, and with all imaginable alacrity he gave Mahmoud his freedom on the spot, and promised to bequeath him half his property when he died. To Mario likewise he promised, in case of success his liberty and money enough to enable him to return home a wealthy man.

If he was liberal in promises, his slaves were prodigal; they would bring down the moon to him from Heaven, much more Leonisa, if only he gave them an opportunity of speaking with her. "Mario shall have one whenever he pleases," said the cadi, "for I will make Halima go for some days to the house of her parents, who are Greek Christians, and when she is away I will order the porter to admit Mario into the house as often as he pleases, and I will tell Leonisa that she may converse with her countryman whenever she has a mind." Thus did the wind begin to shift in Ricardo's favour, his master and mistress working for him without knowing it; and the first who began was Halima, as was to be expected of her, for it is the nature of women ever to be prompt and bold where their pleasures are concerned.

That same day the cadi told Halima that she might pay a visit to her parents, and stay with them some time if she liked; but elated as she was with the false hopes given her by Leonisa, she was so far from wishing to visit her parents, that she would not have cared to go to the imaginary paradise of Mahomet. She replied then that she had no such wish at that moment; when she had she would mention it, and then she would take the Christian maiden with her. "That you must not," replied the cadi, "for it is not right that the Grand Signor's slave should be seen by any one, much less should she converse with Christians; for you know that when she comes into the Sultan's possession she will be shut up in the seraglio, and must become a Turk whether she will or not."

"As she will be in my company," said Halima, "there will be no harm in her being in the house of my parents, or conversing with them. I do so myself, and I am not less a good Turk for all that. Besides, I do not intend to remain with them more than four or five days at most, for my love for you will not allow me to be so long without seeing you." Here the conversation dropped, the cadi not venturing to make any further objection, for fear of rousing her suspicions.

Friday being come, he went to the mosque, from which he was sure not to return for about four hours. He was no sooner gone than Halima sent for Mario; but a Corsican slave who acted as porter, would not have admitted him into the court-yard if Halima had not called out to let him pass, whereupon he came in confused and trembling as if he were going to encounter a host of enemies. Leonisa was seated at the foot of a great marble staircase, in the dress in which she had appeared before the pashas. Her right arm resting on her knee supported her head, and her back was towards the door by which Mario entered, so that though he advanced to where she sat, she did not see him.

Ricardo cast his eyes all round the place when he entered; all was silence and solitude till he turned his gaze to where Leonisa sat. Instantly he was seized with a thousand conflicting emotions. He was within twenty paces of the object of his soul's desire; but he was a captive, and the glory of his life was in the power of another. Thus agitated with fear and exultation, joy and sadness, he advanced towards her slowly, until Leonisa suddenly turned round and her eyes met his earnest gaze. He stopped, unable to move another step. Leonisa, who believed him to be dead, was struck with awe and consternation at seeing him so unexpectedly before her. With her eyes still fixed upon him and without turning her back, she retreated up four or five stairs, took a little cross from her breast, kissed it again and again, and crossed herself repeatedly, as though a being from the other world stood before her. Ricardo presently recovered himself, and perceiving from Leonisa's gestures what was the cause of her terror, he said, "It grieves me, beautiful Leonisa, that the news which Mahmoud gave you of my death was not true, so that I might be free from the fear I now feel lest the rigour you have also shown towards me still subsists entire. Set your mind at ease, lady, and come down; and if you will do what you have never yet done — approach me — you will see that I am not a phantom. I am Ricardo, Leonisa, — Ricardo the happy, if you will bid him be so."

Here Leonisa put her finger to her lips, giving Ricardo to understand that he should be silent or speak more low. Gathering a little courage, he drew near enough to hear her whisper thus: "Speak softly, Mario (for so I hear you are now called): talk of nothing but what I talk of, and bear in mind that if we are overheard it will be the cause of our never meeting again. I believe that Halima, our mistress, is listening to us: she has told me that she adores you, and has sent me here as her intercessor. If you will respond to her desires, you will consult the interest of your body more than of your soul; and if you will not, you must feign to do so, were it only because I request it, and for sake of what is due to the declared desires of a woman."

"Never did I think, never could I imagine, beautiful Leonisa," replied Ricardo, "that you could ever ask anything of me with which I should find it impossible to comply; but this present request of yours has undeceived me. Is the inclination so slight a thing that it can be moved this way or that at pleasure? Or would it become a man of truth and honour to feign in matters of such weight? If you think that such things can or ought to be done, be it as you will, since it is for you to command and for me to obey; and that it may not be said I failed to do so with regard to the first order you laid upon me, I will impose silence on the voice of my honour, and will pretend to return Halima's passion, as you desire, if I may thereby secure the blessing of seeing you; and you have only to signify as much to her in such terms as you shall think proper. In return for this sacrifice, to me the greatest possible, I entreat you to tell me briefly how you escaped from the hands of the corsairs, and fell into those of the Jew who sold you."

"The recital of my misfortunes," Leonisa answered, "demands more time than

we have now at our disposal; nevertheless, I will tell you some particulars. The day after we parted company, Yusuf's galley was driven back by a contrary wind to the island of Pantanalea, where we also saw your galley, but ours, in spite of all efforts, was driven upon the rocks. My master, seeing death so near, quickly emptied two water-casks, closed them tightly, lashed them together with ropes, and placed me between them. Then stripping off his clothes he took another cask in his arms, and passing round his body a rope attached to the casks on which I was placed, he boldly plunged into the sea. I had not the courage to follow his example, but another Turk pushed me in. I fell senseless into the water, and did not recover until I found myself on land, in the arms of two Turks, who held me with my mouth downwards, discharging a great quantity of water which I had swallowed. I opened my eyes, and looking wildly round me, the first thing I saw was Yusuf lying beside me with his skull shattered, having, as I afterwards learned, been dashed head foremost against the rocks.

"The Turks told me that they had hawled me ashore by the rope, more dead than alive. Only eight persons escaped out of the unfortunate galley. We remained eight days on the island, during which the Turks treated me with as much respect as if I were their sister. We lay hid in a cave, the Turks being afraid of being captured by some of the Christian garrison of a fort in the island, and we supported ourselves with biscuits from the foundered galley which the waves cast ashore, and which the men collected by night. It happened for my misfortune that the commandant of the fort had died a few days before, and that there were in it only twenty soldiers; this fact we learned from a boy whom the Turks captured as he was amusing himself gathering shells on the shore. At the end of eight days a Moorish vessel, of the kind which the Turks call caramuzal, hove in sight; the Turks quitted their hiding-place, and made signals which were recognised by the crew of the caramuzal. They landed, and hearing from their countrymen an account of their disasters, they took us all on board, where there was a very rich Jew, to whom the whole cargo, or the greater part of it, belonged, consisting of carpets, stuffs, and other wares, which are commonly exported by the Jews from Barbary to the Levant. The vessel carried us to Tripoli, and during the voyage I was sold to the Jew, who gave two thousand doubloons, an excessive price; but the Jew was made liberal by the love he conceived for me.

"After leaving the Turks in Tripoli, the vessel continued its voyage, and the Jew began to importune me with his solicitations, which I treated with the scorn they deserved. Despairing, therefore, of success, he resolved to get rid of me upon the first opportunity; and knowing that the two pashas, Ali and Hassan, were in this island, where he could sell his goods as well as in Scio, whither he had been bound, he landed here in hopes of disposing of me to one of the two pashas, with which view he had me dressed as you now see me. I find that I have been purchased by the cadi, for the purpose of being presented to the Grand Turk, which causes me no little dread. Here I heard of your pretended death, which, if you will believe me, grieved me to the soul; yet I envied rather than pitied you, not from ill will towards you, for, if insensible to love, I am yet neither unfeeling nor ungrateful, but because I believed that your sorrows were all at an end."

"You would be right, lady," said Ricardo, "were it not that death would have robbed me of the bliss of seeing you again. The felicity of this moment is more to me than any blessing that life or death could bring me, that of eternity alone excepted. My master, the cadi, into whose hands I have fallen by as strange a series of adventures as your own, is just in the same disposition towards you as Halima is towards me, and has deputed me to be the interpreter of his feelings. I accepted the office, not with the intention of serving his wishes, but my own in obtaining opportunities to speak with you. Only see, Leonisa, to what a pass our misfortunes have brought us; you to ask from me what you know to be impossible; and me to propose to you what I would give my life not to obtain, dear as that life is to me now, since I have the happiness to behold you."

"I know not what to say to you, Ricardo," replied Leonisa, "nor what issue we can find from the labyrinth in which we are involved. I can only say that we must practise, what would not be expected from us, dissimulation and deceit. I will repeat to Halima some phrases on your part which will rather encourage than make her despair; and you may tell the cadi whatever you think may serve, with safety to my honour, to keep him in his delusion. And since I place my honour in your hands, you may be assured that I have preserved it intact, in spite of all the perils and trials I have undergone. Opportunity to converse together will be easily afforded us, and to me this will be most pleasing, provided you never address me on the subject of your suit; from the moment you do so, I shall cease to see you; for I would not have you suppose that my spirit is so weak as to be swayed by captivity. With the favour of heaven, I hope to prove like gold which becomes the purer the more it is passed through the furnace. Be content with the assurance I have given you, that I shall no longer look upon you with repugnance, as I used to do; for I must tell you, Ricardo, that I always found you somewhat more arrogant and presumptuous than became you. I confess, also, that I was deceived, and that my eyes being now opened, if the experiment were to be made over again, perhaps I should be more humane to you, within the bounds of honour. Go now, and God be with you; for I am afraid lest Halima may have been listening to us, and she understands something of our language."

"I fully acknowledge the propriety of all you have said, lady," replied

Ricardo. "I am infinitely obliged for the explanation you have given me, and perhaps time will show you how profoundly respectful is the adoration I profess for you. Rely upon me that I will deal in the best manner with the cadi, and do you do the same with Halima. Believe me, lady, since I have seen you, there has sprung up in my heart an assured hope that we shall soon achieve our freedom; and so I commend you to God's keeping, deferring to another time to tell you the events by which fortune brought me to this place, after we were parted."

They now separated, Leonisa well pleased with Ricardo's modest behaviour, and he overjoyed at having heard from her lips words unmixed with harshness. Halima, meanwhile, had shut herself up in her room, and was praying to Mahomet for Leonisa's success in the commission she had given her. The cadi was in the mosque, burning, like his wife, with desire, and anxiously awaiting the answer to be brought him by the slave he had sent to speak to Leonisa, and whom Mahmoud was to admit to her presence for that purpose, even though Halima was at home. Leonisa inflamed Halima's impure desires, giving her very good hopes that Mario would do all she wished, but telling her that two months must elapse before he could consent to what he longed for even more than herself; and that he asked that delay that he might complete a course of devotion for the recovery of his freedom. Halima was satisfied with this excuse, but begged Leonisa to tell her dear Mario to spare himself the trouble and her the delay he proposed, for she would give him, at once, whatever the cadi required for his ransom.

Before Ricardo went with his answer to his master, he consulted Mahmoud as to what it should be. They agreed between them that it should be as discouraging as possible, and that he should advise the cadi to take the girl as soon as possible to Constantinople, and accomplish his wishes on the way by fair means or by force. Moreover, that in order to prevent the unpleasant consequences that might ensue from supplanting the sultan, it would be well to purchase another slave, then pretend, or contrive on the voyage, that Leonisa should fall sick, and throw the newly-purchased Christian woman into the sea by night, with all possible secrecy, giving out that the person who had died was Leonisa, the sultan's slave. All this might be done in such a manner that the truth should never be known, and the cadi would remain blameless in the sultan's eyes, and have the full enjoyment of his desires. The wretched old cadi, who was so blinded by his passion that he would have listened to any absurdity they proposed, eagerly fell in with this scheme as one full of promise; and so indeed it was, but not as he imagined; for the intention of his two advisers was to make off with the boat, and pitch the old fool into the sea.

But a difficulty occurred to the cadi, one of the greatest in his eyes that could possibly be. It occurred to him that his wife would not let him go to Constantinople without her; but presently he got over this obstacle by saying, that instead of buying a Christian woman to put to death in Leonisa's name, he would make Halima serve his turn, for he longed with all his heart to be rid of her. Mahmoud and Ricardo agreed to this expedient as readily as he proposed it, and this being finally settled, the cadi that same day imparted to his wife his design of setting out at once for Constantinople, to present the Christian captive to the Sultan, who, he expected would, in his munificence, make him grand cadi of Cairo or Constantinople. Halima, with great alacrity, expressed her approval of his intention, believing that Mario would be left at home; but when the cadi told her that he would take both him and Mahmoud along with him, she changed her mind, and began to dissuade him from what she had before advised; and finally, she told him that unless she went with him she would not allow him to go at all. The cadi had great satisfaction in complying with her desire, for he thought he would soon get rid of a burden that hung like a millstone round his neck.

All this while Hassan Pasha was indefatigable in pressing the cadi to give up the slave girl to him, in return for which he offered him mountains of gold, and had already made him a present of Ricardo, whose ransom he valued at two thousand crowns. Moreover, to facilitate the transfer, he suggested to the cadi the same expedient which the latter had himself devised, namely, that when the Grand Turk sent for Leonisa he should pretend she was dead. But all the pasha's gifts, promises, and entreaties, had no other effect on the cadi than to increase his eagerness to hasten his departure. Tormented therefore by his own desires, by Hassan's importunities, and by those of Halima (for she, too, was amusing herself with vain hopes) he made such despatch that in twenty days he had equipped a brigantine of fifteen benches, which he manned with able Turkish mariners and some Greek Christians. He put all his wealth on board it; Halima, too, left nothing of value behind her, and asked her husband to let her take her parents with her that they might see Constantinople. Halima entertained the same designs as Mahmoud and Ricardo; she intended, with their help, to seize the brigantine, but would not make this known to them until she found herself actually embarked. Afterwards she proposed to land among Christians, return to her old creed, and marry Ricardo; for she had reason to suppose that bringing so much wealth with her, he would not fail to take her to wife on her again becoming a Christian.

Ricardo had another interview with Leonisa, and made known to her the whole scheme they had projected; and she in return apprised him of the designs of Halima, who kept no secret from Leonisa. After mutual injunctions of secrecy, they bade each other adieu until the day of embarkation. When it arrived, Hassan escorted the party to the shore with all his soldiers, and did not leave them until they had set sail. Even then he never took his eyes off the brigantine until it was out of sight. It almost seemed as if the sighs heaved by the enamoured mussulman swelled the gale, and impelled with more force the sails that were wafting away his soul. But as love had allowed him no rest, but plenty of time to consider what he should do to escape being killed by the vehemence of his unsatisfied desire, he immediately put in operation a plan he had long matured. He put fifty soldiers, all trusty men, bound to him by many favours received and expected, on board a vessel of seventeen benches, which he had secretly fitted out in another port; and he ordered them to pursue and capture the brigantine with all its wealth, and put every soul on board to the sword, with the exception of Leonisa, whom he desired to have as his own sole share of the immense booty. He also ordered them to sink the brigantine, so that no trace of her fate might remain.

Animated with the hope of plunder the soldiers proceeded with the utmost alacrity to execute the pasha's orders, which seemed the more easy as the crew of the brigantine were unarmed, not anticipating any such encounter. It had been now two days under sail, which seemed two centuries to the cadi, who would fain, on the very first of them, have carried his design into effect. But his two slaves represented to him the absolute necessity that Leonisa should first fall sick in order to give colour to the report of her death, and that the feigned malady ought to last some days. The cadi was much more disposed to say that she died suddenly, finish the whole job at once, despatch his wife, and allay the raging fire that was consuming his vitals; but he was obliged to submit to the advice of his two counsellors.

Meanwhile, Halima had declared her design to Mahmoud and Ricardo, who had signified their readiness to accomplish it when passing the Crosses of Alexandria, or entering the castles of Anatolia; but so intolerably did the cadi importune them, that they made up their minds to do so upon the first opportunity that offered. After they had been six days at sea the cadi thought that Leonisa's feigned malady had lasted quite long enough, and was very urgent with them that they should finish with Halima on the following day, and to quiet him they promised that they would do so. But when that day came, which, as they expected, was to witness the accomplishment of their own secret plans, or to be the last of their lives, they suddenly discovered a vessel giving chase to them, with all speed of sails and oars. They were afraid it was a Christian corsair, from which neither party had any good to expect; for if it were one, the mussulmans would be made captive, and the Christians, though left at liberty, would be plundered of everything. Mahmoud and Ricardo, however, took comfort in the prospect of freedom for Leonisa and themselves; nevertheless, they were not without fear of the insolence of the corsairs, for people who abandon themselves to such practices, whatever be their religion or law, are invariably cruel and brutal. The cadi's crew made preparation to defend themselves; but without quitting their oars, and still doing all in their power to escape; but the vessel in chase gained upon them so fast that in less than two hours it was within cannon-shot. Seeing her so close, they lowered their sails, stood to their arms, and awaited the assault, though the cadi told them they had nothing to fear, for the stranger was under Turkish colours and would do them no harm. He then gave orders to hoist the white flag of peace.

Just then Mahmoud chanced to turn his head, and espied another galley of some twenty benches apparently, bearing down upon them from the west. He told the cadi, and some Christians at the oar said that this was a vessel of their own people. The confusion and alarm was now doubled, and all awaited the issue in anxious suspense, not knowing whether to hope or fear it. I fancy the cadi, just then, would have gladly foregone all his amorous hopes to be safe again in Nicosia, so great was his perplexity. It did not last long however; for the first galley, without paying the least regard to the flag of peace, or to what was due to a community in religion, bore down upon his brigantine with such fury as nearly to send it to the bottom. The cadi then perceived that the assailants were soldiers of Nicosia, and guessing what was the real state of the case, he gave himself up for lost; and had it not been for the greed of the soldiers, who fell to plundering in the first instance, not a soul would have been left alive. Suddenly, however, while they were busy with all their might in pillaging, a voice cried out in Turkish, "To arms! to arms! Here's a Christian galley bearing down upon us!" And this indeed was true, for the galley which Mahmoud had descried to the westward was bearing furiously down upon Hassan's under Christian colours; but before it came to close quarters it hailed the latter.

"What galley is that?"

"Hassan Pasha's, viceroy of Cyprus."

"How comes it, then, that you, being mussulmans are plundering this brigantine, on board of which, as we know, is the cadi of Nicosia?"

The reply to this was that they only knew that the pasha had ordered them to take it, and that they, as his soldiers, had done his bidding. The commander of the galley under Christian colours having now ascertained what he wanted to know, desisted from attacking Hassan's and fell upon the cadi's brigantine, killed ten of its Turkish crew at the first volley, and immediately boarded it with great impetuosity. Then the cadi discovered that his assailant was no Christian, but Ali Pasha, Leonisa's lover, who had been laying wait to carry her off, and had disguised himself and his soldiers as Christians, the better to conceal his purpose.

The cadì, finding himself thus assailed on all sides, began loudly to exert his lungs. "What means this, Ali Pasha, thou traitor?" he cried. "How comes it that, being a mussulman, thou attackest me in the garb of a Christian? And you, perfidious soldiers of Hassan, what demon has moved you to commit so great an outrage? How dare you, to please the lascivious appetite of him who sent you, set yourselves against your sovereign?" At these words, the soldiers on both sides lowered their arms, looked upon and recognised each other, for they had all served under one captain and one flag. Confounded by the cadì's words, and by their conscious criminality, they sheathed their blades, and seemed quite discomfited. Ali alone shut his eyes and his ears to everything, and rushing upon the cadì, dealt him such a stroke on the head with his scimeter, that, but for the hundred ells of stuff that formed his turban, he would certainly have cleft it in two. As it was, he knocked the cadì down among the rower's benches, where he lay, exclaiming amid his groans, "O cruel renegade! Enemy of the Prophet! Can it be that there is no true mussulman left to avenge me? Accursed one! to lay violent hands on thy cadì, on a minister of Mahomet!"

The cadì's denunciations made a strong impression on the minds of Hassan's soldiers, who, fearing besides that Ali's men would despoil them of the booty they already looked upon as their own, determined to put all to the hazard of battle. Suddenly they fell upon Ali's men with such vehemence that, although the latter were the stronger party, they soon thinned their numbers considerably; the survivors, however, quickly rallied, and so well avenged their slaughtered comrades, that barely four of Hassan's men remained alive, and those too badly wounded. Ricardo and Mahmoud, who had been watching the fight, putting their heads out every now and then at the cabin hatchway, seeing now that most of the Turks were dead, and the survivors all wounded, and that they might very easily be mastered, called upon Halima's father and two of his nephews to aid them in seizing the vessel. Then arming themselves with the dead men's scimeters, they rushed amidships, shouting "Liberty! Liberty!" and with the help of the stout Christian rowers, they soon despatched all the Turks. Then they boarded Ali Pasha's galley. He had been one of the first slain in the last conflict, a Turk having cut him down in revenge for the cadì, and the galley being defenceless, they took possession of it with all its stores.

By Ricardo's advice, all the valuables on board the brigantine and Hassan's galley were transhipped to Ali's, that being the largest of the three vessels, with plenty of stowage room, and a good sailer. The rowers, too, were Christians, and being highly delighted with the acquisition of their freedom, and with the gifts which Ricardo liberally divided amongst them, they offered to carry him to Trapani, or to the end of the world, if he desired it. After this, Mahmoud and Ricardo, exulting in their success, went to Halima, and told her that if she desired to return to Cyprus they would give her her own brigantine, with its full complement of men, and half the wealth she had put on board it; but as her affection for Ricardo was unabated, she replied that she would rather go with them to Christian lands, whereat her parents were exceedingly rejoiced.

The cadi having by this time got upon his legs again, he, too, had his choice given him either to go into Christendom or return to Nicosia in his own vessel. He replied that, "as fortune had reduced him to his present situation, he thanked them for the boon of his liberty; and that he desired to go to Constantinople to complain to the Grand Signor of the outrage he had received at the hands of Ali and Hassan." But when he heard that Halima was leaving him, and intended to go back to Christianity, he was almost beside himself. Finally, they put him on board his own vessel, supplying him abundantly with all accessories for his voyage, and even giving him back some of his own sequins; and he took leave of them all with the intention of returning to Nicosia; but first he entreated that Leonisa would embrace him, declaring that if she would graciously grant him that favour, it would wipe out the recollection of all his misfortunes. All joined in entreating Leonisa to grant him what he so earnestly desired, since she might do so without prejudice to her honour. She complied, and the cadi besought her to lay her hands on his head, that he might have hopes of his wound being healed.

These adieux concluded, and having scuttled Hassan's galley, they sailed away with a favouring breeze and soon lost sight of the brigantine, on the deck of which stood the unlucky cadi, watching with swimming eyes how the wind was wafting away his property, his delight, his wife, and his whole soul. With very different feelings did Ricardo and Mahmoud pursue their way. They passed in sight of Alexandria, and without shortening sail, or needing to have recourse to their oars, they touched at Corfu, where they took in water; and then without more delay they left behind them the ill-famed Acroceraunian rocks, and descried afar off Paquino, a promontory of the most fertile Trinacria, at sight of which, and of the illustrious island of Malta, their prosperous barque seemed to fly across the waters. In fine, fetching a compass round the island, in four days afterwards they made Lampadosa, and then the island where Leonisa had been shipwrecked, at sight of which she almost swooned.

On the following day the beloved native land they so longed for gladdened their eyes and their hearts. Their spirits rose tumultuously with this new joy, one of the greatest that can be known in this life, to return safe and sound to one's country after long captivity; and one which may compare with it is that of victory achieved over its enemies. There was in the galley a chest full of flags and streamers of various colours, with which Ricardo had the rigging adorned. Soon after daybreak they were within less than a league of the city, when taking to their oars, and uttering every now and then joyous cries, they advanced to the harbour, the shore of which was immediately lined by a great concourse of people; for the gaily adorned galley had been so long in sight, that the whole town had come down to observe it more closely.

Meanwhile, Ricardo had entreated Leonisa to dress herself just as she had appeared in the tent before the two pashas, for he wished to play off a pleasant trick upon his relations. She did so, adding jewels to jewels, pearls to pearls, and beauty to beauty (for it increases with the satisfaction of the heart), to the renewed admiration and astonishment of all. Ricardo and Mahmoud also dressed themselves in the Turkish costume, and made the crew put on the garments of the dead Turks. It was about eight o'clock when they entered the harbour, and the morning was so calm and clear that it seemed as though it were intent on beholding this joyful arrival.

Before coming into port, Ricardo fired a salute with the three pieces belonging to the galley, which were one gun amidships, and two falconets; the town returned the salute with an equal number. The whole shore was in lively commotion, watching the approach of the gaily decked galley; but when they had a nearer view of it, and saw by the white turbans of the pretended mussulmans that it was a Turkish craft, there was a general alarm. Suspecting some stratagem, the people flew to arms, all the soldiers in the town were marched down to the port, and the cavalry scoured the coast. Highly amused at all this, the navigators held on their course, entered the port, and anchored close to the shore. Then running out a plank they all stepped ashore one after the other as if in procession, and falling on their knees kissed the ground with tears of joy — a clear proof to all who witnessed their proceedings that they were no Turks. When all the crew were out of the vessel, Halima with her father and mother, and her two nephews, followed next, all dressed as Turks; and the beautiful Leonisa, her face covered with a crimson veil, and escorted on either side by Mahmoud and Ricardo, closed the procession, while the eyes of the whole multitude were fixed upon her. They too did as the others had done, and knelt and kissed the ground.

Presently the captain and governor of the city advanced towards them, perceiving that they were the principal persons belonging to the vessel. The moment he set eyes on Ricardo he recognised him, ran to him with open arms, and embraced him with the liveliest demonstrations of joy. With the governor came Cornelio and his father, Leonisa's parents and relations, and those of Ricardo, all of whom were among the principal persons in the city. Ricardo returned the governor's embrace and his cordial greeting; held out his hand to Cornelio (who had changed colour at sight of him, and almost quaked for fear), and, holding Leonisa also by the hand, thus addressed the bystanders: "Under your favour, gentlemen, I beg that, before we enter the city and the temple to return the thanks so justly due to our Lord for the great mercies vouchsafed to us in our distresses, that you will listen to a few words I have to say to you." The governor bade him say on, for all present would listen to him with pleasure and in silence. All the principal people then formed a circle round him, and he addressed them as follows: —

"You must well remember, gentlemen, the misfortune which befel me some months ago in the garden of the Salt Pits, and the loss of Leonisa: nor can you have forgotten the exertions I made to procure her liberation, since, regardless of my own, I offered all I was worth for her ransom. But this seeming generosity is not to be imputed to me as a merit, since I did but offer my fortune for the ransom of my soul. What has since happened to us both requires more time to relate, a more convenient season, and a speaker less agitated than myself. For the present, let it suffice to tell you that after various extraordinary adventures, and after a thousand disappointments of our hopes of relief, merciful Heaven has, without any merit of ours, restored us to our beloved country, with hearts full of joy and with abundance of wealth. It is not from this, nor from the recovery of my freedom, that springs the incomparable pleasure I now experience, but from that which I imagine this sweet enemy of mine in peace and in war enjoys on seeing herself restored to freedom and to her birth-place. Yet, I rejoice in the general joy of those who have been my companions in misery; and though grievous disasters are apt to alter the disposition and debase worthy minds, it has not been so with the fair destroyer of my hopes, for with more fortitude and invincibility than can well be told, she has passed through the wrecking sea of her disasters and the encounters of my ardent though honourable importunities.

"But to return to the point from which I set out: I offered my fortune for her ransom, and with it the surrender of my soul's desires; I strove for her liberation, and ventured more for her than for my own life. All these things might seem to be obligations of some moment, but I will not have them regarded in that light; what I would have so considered, is that which I now do;" and so saying, he raised his hand and respectfully withdrew the veil from Leonisa's face — it was like removing a cloud from before the sun — and then he continued: "See, Cornelio; here I present to you the prize which you should value above all precious things on earth; and here, beauteous Leonisa, I present to you him whom you have always borne in memory. This is what I would have you all esteem as generosity, in comparison with which to give fortune, life, and honour, is nothing.

“Take her, O fortunate youth, take her; and if your understanding can reach the height of comprehending the greatness of her worth, esteem yourself the most fortunate of mankind. With her I will also give you my whole share of what Heaven has bestowed on us all; it will exceed, as I fully believe, thirty thousand crowns. You may enjoy it all freely and at your ease, and Heaven grant you to do so for many happy years. For my hapless self, since I am left without Leonisa, it is my pleasure to be poor. To want Leonisa, is to find life superfluous.”

Here he ceased speaking, as if his tongue clove to the roof of his mouth, but soon afterwards, before any one else had spoken, he exclaimed, “Good heavens! how toil and trouble confuse the understanding! In the eagerness of my desire to do right, I have spoken inconsiderately, for no one can be generous in disposing of what is not his own. What authority have I over Leonisa to give her to another? Or how can I bestow what is so far from being mine? Leonisa is her own mistress, and so much so, that failing her parents (long and happily may they live), her wishes could have no opposition to encounter. Should they meet an imaginary obstacle in the obligations which she, in her good feeling, may think she is under to me, from this moment I cancel them, and declare them null and void. I unsay, then, what I have said, and I give Cornelio nothing, for I cannot; only I confirm the transfer of my property made to Leonisa, without desiring any other recompense than that she will believe in the sincerity of my honourable sentiments towards her, and be assured that they never had an aim unbecoming her incomparable virtue, her worth, and her infinite beauty.”

Ricardo closed his speech with these words, and Leonisa thus replied, “If you imagine, Ricardo, that I bestowed any favour on Cornelio during the time when you were enamoured of me and jealous, think that it was in all honour, as being done by the express desire of my parents, who wished to have him for their son-in-law. If you are satisfied with this explanation, I am sure you are no less so with what you have yourself experienced as to my virtue and modesty. I say this, Ricardo, that you may know that I have always been mistress of myself, and subject to no one else except my parents, whom I now entreat humbly, as is meet, to grant me leave and license to dispose of what your magnanimous generosity has given me.”

Her parents said she might do so, for they relied on her great discretion that she would make such use of it as would always redound to her honour and advantage. “With that permission, then,” said Leonisa, “I beg it may not be taken amiss if I choose rather to seem overbold than ungrateful; and so, worthy Ricardo, my inclination, hitherto coy, perplexed, and dubious, declares in your favour, that the world may know that women are not all ungrateful. I am yours, Ricardo, and yours I will be till death, unless better knowledge move you to refuse me your hand.”

Ricardo was almost beside himself to hear her speak thus, and could make no other reply than by falling on his knees before her, grasping her hands, and kissing them a thousand times, with delicious tears. Cornelio wept with vexation, Leonisa’s parents for joy, and all the bystanders for admiration and sympathy.

The bishop, who was present, led them with his blessing to the church, and dispensing with the usual forms, married them at once. The whole city overflowed with gladness, which it testified that night by a splendid illumination, and for many days following in jousts and rejoicings given by the relations of Ricardo and Leonisa. Halima, who had lost all hope of having Ricardo for her husband, was content to become the wife of Mahmoud, having returned with him to the bosom of the church. Her parents and her two nephews were, by Ricardo’s bounty, presented with so much out of his share of the spoil as sufficed to maintain them for the rest of their lives. In a word, all were happy to their heart’s content; and the fame of Ricardo, spreading beyond the limits of Sicily, extended throughout all Italy and beyond it. He was universally known as the Generous Lover, and his renown is still prolonged in the persons of the many sons borne to him by Leonisa, who was a rare example of discretion, virtue, modesty, and beauty.

THE SPANISH-ENGLISH LADY.

Among the spoils which the English carried off from the city of Cadiz, was a little girl of about seven years old. An English gentleman, named Clotald, commander of a squadron of vessels, took her to London without the knowledge of the Earl of Essex, and in defiance of his general orders. The parents complained to the earl of the loss of their child, and implored him, since he had declared that property alone should be seized, and the persons of the inhabitants should be left free, they should not, besides being reduced to poverty, suffer the additional misery of being deprived of their daughter, who was the very light of their eyes. The earl caused it to be proclaimed throughout his whole army, that whoever had possession of the child, should restore her on pain of death; but no threatened penalties could constrain Clotald to obey; in spite of them, he kept the child concealed in his ship, being fascinated, though in a Christian manner, with the incomparable beauty of Isabella, as she was called. In fine, her inconsolable parents were left to mourn her loss, and Clotald, rejoicing beyond measure, returned to London, and presented the pretty child to his wife, as the richest prize he had brought home from the war.

It happened fortunately that all the members of Clotald's household were catholics in secret, though in public they affected to follow the religion of the state. Clotald had a son about twelve years old, named Richard, who was brought up by his parents to love and fear God, and to be very stedfast in the truths of the catholic faith. Catherine, the wife of Clotald, a noble, Christian, and prudent lady, conceived such an affection for Isabella, that she reared her as if she was her own daughter; and the child was so well endowed by nature, that she readily learned all they taught her. Time and the kind treatment she received, gradually wore out from her recollection that which her parents had bestowed upon her; not so much so, however, but that she often thought of them with a sigh. Though she learned English, she did not forget her native tongue, for Clotald took care to bring Spaniards secretly to his house to converse with her, and thus it was, that without ceasing to speak Spanish, she became as proficient in English as if she had been born in London.

After having learned all kinds of work becoming a young lady of good birth, she was taught to read and write more than passably well; but what she excelled in above all, was in playing all sorts of instruments suitable to her sex, with extraordinary perfection of musical taste and skill, and with the accompaniment of a voice which Heaven had endowed with such melody that when she chanted she enchanted. All these graces, natural and acquired, gradually inflamed the heart of Richard, whom she loved and respected as the son of her lord. At first his affection for her was like that of a brother for a sister, but when she reached her twelfth year, this feeling had changed into a most ardent desire to possess her, but only in the honourable way of becoming her lawful spouse; for Isabella's incomparable virtue made it hopeless to obtain her in any other way, nor would he have done so even, if he could, for his own noble disposition, and the high estimation in which he held her, forbade any bad thought to take root in his soul.

A thousand times he determined to make known his passion to his father and mother, and as often broke his resolution, knowing that they had destined him to be the husband of a young Scotch lady of great wealth and good family, who, like themselves, secretly professed the catholic faith; and it seemed clear to him, that after having betrothed him to a lady of rank, they would not think of bestowing him on a slave, if that name could be applied to Isabella. Agitated by these distressing reflections, not knowing what course to pursue or whom to consult, he fell into a melancholy that nearly cost him his life. But thinking it was a very cowardly thing to let himself die without making any kind of effort for his own relief, he strove to gather up courage enough to declare his feelings to Isabella.

Everybody in the house was grieved for Richard's illness for he was beloved by them all, and by his parents to the utmost degree, both because he was their only child, and because his virtues, his worth, and good sense deserved all their affection. The physicians could not make out the nature of his complaint, nor could he himself venture to declare it. At last, one day when Isabella entered his room alone, to attend upon him, he said to her, with a faltering voice and stammering tongue, "Lovely Isabella, your worth, your great virtue, and exceeding beauty, have brought me to the state you see; if you would not have me perish in the worst agonies that can be imagined, say that you return the love I feel for you, and consent to my fondest desire, which is to make you secretly my wife; for I fear that my parents, not knowing your merits as I do, would refuse me a blessing to me so indispensable. If you will give me your word to be mine, I here pledge you my own, as a true catholic Christian, to be yours; and though our union be deferred, as deferred it shall be until it can take place with the church's sanction and that of my parents, yet the thought that you will surely be mine, will be enough to restore me to health, and to keep my spirits buoyant until the happy day arrives."

Whilst Richard was speaking, Isabella stood with downcast eyes, and when he had ceased, she replied with equal modesty and good sense, “Ever since Heaven, in its anger or its mercy (I know not which), withdrew me from my parents, Señor Richard, and gave me to yours, I have resolved, in gratitude for the infinite kindness they have bestowed upon me, never to act in opposition to their wishes; and without their consent, I should regard the inestimable boon you desire to confer upon me, not as a good but as an evil fortune. Should it ever be my happy destiny to be acknowledged by them as worthy of you, be assured that my heart shall be yours; but till that time comes, or should it never come, let it console you to know that the dearest wish of my soul will ever be that you may know every blessing which Heaven can bestow upon you.” She said no more, but from that moment began the convalescence of Richard, and the revival of his parents’ drooping hopes.

The youthful pair took courteous leave of each other, he with tears in his eyes, and she wondering in her soul to see that of Richard captive to her love. As for him, having been raised from his sick bed by a miracle, as it seemed to his parents, he would no longer conceal from them the state of his feelings, but disclosed it one day to his mother, and ended a long conversation by declaring that they might as well put him to death as refuse him Isabella, for it amounted to the same thing. He extolled the virtues of Isabella in such terms, that he almost brought his mother to think that in becoming her son’s wife she would have the worst of the bargain. Accordingly she gave Richard good hopes that she would prevail on his father to assent to his wishes, as she herself did; in this she succeeded, for by repeating to her husband all Richard’s arguments, she easily induced him to approve of the young man’s design, and to find excuses for breaking off the match with the Scotch lady.

At this time Isabella was fourteen and Richard twenty; but even in that early spring time of their youth, they were old in sense and judgment. It wanted but four days of the time appointed by Richard’s parents when he should bend his neck to the holy yoke of matrimony; and wise and fortunate did they deem themselves in choosing their prisoner to be their daughter, esteeming her virtues to be a better dower than the great wealth of the Scotch lady. The preparations for the wedding were all made, the relations and friends of the family were invited, and nothing remained but to make known the intended match to the Queen, no marriage between persons of noble blood being lawful without her knowledge and consent; but making no doubt of obtaining the royal licence, they put off applying for it to the last. Things being in this state, their joy was disturbed one evening by the appearance of one of the Queen’s servants with an order to Clotald from her Majesty, requiring his appearance before her next morning with his Spanish prisoner. He replied that he would cheerfully obey her Majesty's command. The messenger retired, and left the family in great perturbation; "Alas," said dame Catherine, "what if the Queen knows that I have brought up this girl as a Catholic, and thence infers that we are all of us Christians in this house! For, if her Majesty asks her what she has learned during the eight years she has been with us, what answer can she give with all her discretion, poor timid girl, that will not condemn us?"

"Be under no fear on that account, dear lady," said Isabella; "for I trust in the divine goodness and mercy of Heaven, that it will put such words into my mouth as will not only not condemn you, but redound to your advantage."

Richard trembled as if he foreboded some calamity. Clotald cast about for some encouragement to allay his grievous fears, and found none but in his great trust in God and in the prudence of Isabella, whom he earnestly entreated to try in every possible way to avoid convicting them of being Catholics; for, though their spirits were willing to encounter martyrdom, yet their flesh was weak and recoiled from the bitter trial. Isabella assured them over and over again that they might set their minds at rest; what they apprehended should not befall them through her instrumentality; for though she knew not then what answer she should make to the questions that should be put to her on the morrow, she had a lively and confident hope that she would reply in such a manner as would be for their good.

Many were the comments and surmises they made that night on this unwelcome incident, and especially it occurred to them that, if the Queen knew they were Catholics, she would not have sent them so mild a message; it seemed reasonable to infer from it, that she only desired to see Isabella, the fame of whose incomparable beauty and accomplishments, known to every one in the capital, must have reached her Majesty's ears. Clotald and his wife confessed to themselves, however, that they had done wrong in not presenting her at court, and they thought the best excuse they could make for this, was to say that ever since she had come into their hands, they had destined her to be the wife of their son. But even this would be acknowledging themselves culpable, since it would appear that they arranged the marriage without the Queen's leave; but such an offence would probably not incur any severe punishment. In this way, they comforted themselves, and they resolved that Isabella should not be dressed humbly like a prisoner, but in rich bridal attire, such as became the betrothed of a gentleman of importance like their son. Next day accordingly they dressed Isabella in the Spanish style, in a robe of green satin with a long train, and slashes lined with cloth of gold and looped with the pearls, the whole being adorned with precious stones; a diamond necklace and girdle, with a fan such as is carried by Spanish ladies; and for head dress her own luxuriant golden hair entwined with diamonds and pearls.

In that sumptuous attire, with her sprightly air and marvellous beauty, she made her appearance in London in a handsome coach, fascinating the eyes and souls of all who beheld her. Clotald, his wife, and Richard rode with her in the coach, and many noble relations of the family escorted her on horseback, Clotald desiring that all these honours should be paid to his prisoner, in order that the queen might treat her as his son's betrothed. When they arrived at the palace, and entered the vast hall in which her majesty was seated, Isabella's escort halted at the lower end, and she herself advanced alone in all her inconceivable beauty, producing an effect like that of a brilliant meteor shooting through the sky on a calm clear night, or of a sunbeam darting at the first dawn of day through a mountain gorge. A comet she seemed, portending a fiery doom to the hearts of many in that presence hall. Full of meekness and courtesy, she advanced to the foot of the throne, knelt before the queen, and said to her in English, "May it please your Majesty to extend your royal hands to your servant's lips, who will henceforth esteem herself exalted, since she has been so fortunate as to behold your grandeur."

The queen remained a good while gazing on her without saying a word, figuring to herself, as she afterwards told her lady of the bed-chamber, that she had before her a starry heaven, the stars of which were the many pearls and diamonds worn by Isabella; her fair face and her eyes its sun and moon, and her whole person a new marvel of beauty. The queen's ladies would fain have been all eyes, that they might do nothing but gaze on Isabella; one praised her brilliant eyes, one her complexion, another her fine figure, another her sweet voice; and one there was who said in pure envy, "The Spaniard is good looking, but I do not like her dress."

At last the queen motioned to Isabella to rise, and said to her, "Speak to me in Spanish, maiden, for I understand it well, and shall like to hear it." Then turning to Clotald, "You have done me wrong, Clotald," she said, "in keeping this treasure so many years concealed from me; but it is such a one as may well have excited you to avarice. You are bound however to restore it to me, for by right it is mine."

"My liege," replied Clotald, "what your majesty says is quite true; I confess my fault, if it is one, to have kept this treasure until it arrived at the perfection suitable for appearing before your majesty's eyes. Now that it has done so, I had it in mind to enhance it still more, by asking your majesty's leave for Isabella to become the wife of my son Richard."

"I like her name, too," returned the queen. "Nothing was wanting to the fulness of her perfection but that she should be called Isabella the Spaniard. But, mark you, Clotald, I know that, without my leave, you have promised her to your son."

"That is true, my liege, but it was in the confident hope that the many eminent services which my ancestors and I have rendered to the crown, would obtain from your majesty favours still more difficult to grant than the leave in question, the more so as my son is not yet wedded."

"Nor shall he be wedded to Isabella," said the queen, "until he has merited it in his own person. I mean that I will not have him avail himself to that end of your services or those of his forefathers. He must himself prepare to serve me, and win by his own deserts this prize which I esteem as if she were my daughter."

The queen had no sooner uttered these last words than Isabella again fell on her knees before her, saying in Spanish, "Such thwartings as these, most gracious sovereign, are rather to be esteemed auspicious boons than misfortunes. Your majesty has given me the name of daughter; after that what can I have to fear, or what may I not hope?"

Isabella uttered this with so winning a grace, that the queen conceived an extreme affection for her, desired that she should remain in her service, and committed her to the care of a great lady, her keeper of the robes, who was to instruct her in the duties of her new position.

Richard, who saw himself thus, as it were, deprived of his life in losing Isabella, was almost at his wits' end. Agitated and discomfited, he knelt before the queen, and said, "I need no other rewards to induce me to serve your majesty than such as my ancestors have obtained in the service of your royal predecessors; but since it is your majesty's pleasure that I should have new motives and incentives for my zeal, I would crave to know in what way I may fulfil your majesty's behest?"

"There are two ships ready to set out on a cruise," said the queen, "of which I have made the Baron de Lansac general. I appoint you captain of one of them, being assured that the qualities you derive from those whose blood is in your veins will supply the defect of your years. Mark what a favour I confer upon you, since I give you an opportunity to signalise yourself in the service of your queen, to display your capacity and your valour, and to win the highest reward, methinks, which you yourself could desire. I myself will be Isabella's guardian, though she manifests that her own virtue will be her truest guardian. Go in God's name; for since you are in love, as I imagine, I expect great things from your prowess. Fortunate were the king who in time of war had in his army ten thousand soldiers in love, expecting to obtain their mistresses as the reward of their victories. Rise, Richard, and if you have anything to say to Isabella, say it now, for to-morrow you must sail.”

Richard kissed the queen’s hands, highly prizing the favour she had conferred upon him, and went and knelt before Isabella. He tried to speak to her, but could not, for he felt as if there was a knot in his throat that paralysed his tongue. He strove with all his might to keep down the tears that started into his eyes, but he could not conceal them from the queen. “Shame not to weep, Richard,” said her majesty, “nor think less of yourself for allowing such evidence of a tender heart to escape you, for it is one thing to fight the enemy, and another to take leave of one who is dearly loved. Isabella, embrace Richard, and give him your blessing: his affection well deserves it.”

Isabella’s heart ached to see Richard so cast down. She could not understand what her majesty said. Conscious of nothing but her grief, motionless, and blinded by her tears, she looked like a weeping statue of alabaster. The anguish of the two lovers drew tears from most of the beholders. In fine, Richard and Isabella separated without exchanging a word; and Clotald and his friends, after saluting the queen, left the hall full of grief and pity. Isabella felt like an orphan whose parents have just been buried, and dreaded lest her new mistress should make her abandon the rule of life in which she had been brought up.

Two days afterwards, Richard put to sea, distracted among many other sources of incertitude by two reflections — one was that he had to perform exploits by which he might merit Isabella’s hand; and the other, that he could perform none without violating his conscience as a catholic, which forbade him to draw his sword against those of his own faith, but unless he did so, he should be denounced as a catholic or as a coward, to the peril of his life and his hopes. But, in fine, he determined to postpone his inclinations as a lover to his duty as a catholic, and in his heart he prayed heaven to send him occasions in which he might show himself at once valiant and a true Christian, — might satisfy his queen and merit Isabella.

For six days the two vessels sailed with a prosperous wind, shaping their course for the Western Islands, for, in that direction they could not fail to fall in with Portuguese East India men, or vessels returning from the West Indies; but on the seventh day the wind became contrary and continued that way so long that they could not make the islands, but were forced to run for the coast of Spain. On nearing it at the entrance of the straits of Gibraltar, they discovered three vessels, one very large and two small. Richard steered towards his commander’s ship to know if it was his intention they should attack the three vessels just discovered; but on nearing it, he saw them hoist a black flag, and presently he heard a mournful sound of trumpets, indicating that either the general or one of his chief officers was dead. When he came within hail, which had not before been the case since they put to sea, there was a call from the leading ship for Captain Richard to come on board, as their general had died of apoplexy the preceding night. Sad as this news was, Richard could not help being glad, not of his admiral's death, but at finding himself in command of both ships, according to the Queen's orders for the contingency which had occurred. He went on board the flag-ship where he found some lamenting the old commander, and some rejoicing over the new one; but all promised him obedience, yet proclaimed him general with short ceremony, not having time for longer, for two out of the three vessels they had discovered had quitted the third and were bearing down upon them.

They at once made them out by the crescents on their flags to be Turkish galleys, to the great delight of Richard, who believed that with the help of Heaven he should make an important capture without prejudice to his religion. The two galleys came up to reconnoitre the English ships, which had not shown their national colours but those of Spain, in order to baffle those who might overhaul them, and prevent their recognising them as war cruisers. The Turks mistook them for trading vessels from India, and made sure of capturing them with ease. Richard took care to let them approach till they were well within range of his guns, which he let fly at them so opportunely, that with a single broadside he disabled one of the galleys, sending five balls through her middle and nearly cutting her in two. She immediately heeled over and began to founder; the other galley made haste to take her in tow, in order to get her under the lee of the large ship; but Richard, whose ships manoeuvred as rapidly as if they were impelled by oars, having reloaded his guns, pursued the retreating galleys, pouring upon them an incessant shower of balls. The crew of the crippled galley having clambered on board the large ship, Richard poured such a cross fire from his two ships on her consort, that she could neither use sails nor oars, and the Turks on board her, following the example of their comrades, took refuge in the large ship, not with the intention of defending her, but for the momentary safety of their lives. The Christian galley-slaves broke their chains, and mingling with the Turks also boarded the large ship, but as they were in danger from the musquetry of Richard's two ships as they were swarming up the side, he gave orders to cease firing on Turks and Christians alike. The former, however, had already lost the great part of their numbers, and the rest were cut to pieces with their own weapons by the revolted slaves, who, thinking the two English ships were Spanish, did marvels for the recovery of their freedom.

At last, when nearly all the Turks were killed, some Spaniards shouted from the deck to their supposed countrymen to come on board and enjoy the fruits of their victory. Richard asked them in Spanish what ship was that? They replied that she was a Portuguese ship from the West Indies, freighted with spices, and with such a quantity of diamonds and pearls that she was worth a million. She had been driven into those latitudes by a storm, much damaged, with all her guns thrown overboard, and her crew almost perishing of hunger and thirst. In that condition, being unable to make any resistance, she had been captured the day before by these two galleys, which belonged to the corsair Arnaut Mami, and which not having stowage room for her great cargo, had taken her in tow to convey her to the river Larache. Richard apprised them, in return, that if they supposed his two vessels were Spanish, they were greatly mistaken, for they belonged to the Queen of England. This information astonished and alarmed them, making them fear that they had escaped from one rock to founder on another; but Richard told them they had nothing to fear, and that they might rely on obtaining their liberty, provided they did not make any defence. "It would be impossible for us to do so," they said, "for as we have told you, we have neither cannon nor other arms, and have no choice but to throw ourselves upon the generosity of your general. Since he has freed us from the intolerable yoke of the Turks, let him enhance his good work by an act which will exalt his fame all over the world wherever the news reaches of this memorable victory and his magnanimity."

Richard lent a favourable ear to this request, and immediately called a council of his officers to consider what might be the best means of sending all the Christians to Spain, without incurring any risk from them, should their numbers encourage them to rise and attempt to overpower his crews. There were some who suggested that they should be brought on board one by one, and put to death as they entered. "No," said Richard; "since by God's grace we have obtained so rich a prize, I will not betray my ingratitude by such an act of cruelty. It is never well to have recourse to the sword, when, with a little forethought, the end may be secured by other means. I will, therefore, not have any Catholic Christian put to death, not that I care so much for them, but for my own sake and for yours, for I would not have the honour of our victory tarnished by cruelty. My orders are, then, that the crew of one of our ships, with all her guns and arms and the greater part of her stores, be put on board the large Portuguese vessel, which we will then take to England, and leave the Spaniards to return home on ours."

No one ventured to contravene this proposal, which to some appeared equally magnanimous and judicious, while others in their hearts condemned it as showing an undue leaning towards the Catholics.

Taking with him fifty arquebusiers Richard went on board the Portuguese ship, in which he found about three hundred persons, who had escaped out of the galleys. He immediately had the vessel he intended to discharge brought alongside, and had its guns brought on board. Then making a short speech to the Christians, he ordered them to pass into the discharged vessel, where they found stores enough for more than a month and for a greater number of people; and as they embarked he gave each of them four Spanish crowns, which he sent for to his own ship, in order partly to relieve their wants when they reached land, which was not far off; for the lofty mountains of Abyla and Calpe were in sight. They all thanked him heartily for his generous behaviour, and when they were nearly all embarked, the same person who had first spoken to him from the deck of the ship, addressed him, “You would do me a greater service, valorous sir, in taking me with you to England than in sending me to Spain; for, though it is my country, and it is but six days since I left it, I have nothing to look for there but grief and desolation.

“You must know, señor, that at the sack of Cadiz which happened about fifteen years ago, I lost a daughter, whom the English carried away with them to England, and with her I lost the comfort of my age and the light of my eyes, which since she passed from their sight, have never seen anything to gladden them. Grief for this calamity and for the loss of my property, of which I was also despoiled, so overcame me that I was no longer able or willing to apply myself to commerce, in which I had been so successful that I was commonly reputed to be the richest merchant in our whole city; and so indeed I was, for, besides my credit, which was good for many hundred thousand dollars, my estate was worth more than fifty thousand ducats. I lost all; yet all my losses would have been nothing had I not lost my daughter. After the general calamity and my own, want pressed me so hard, that not being able to bear up against it, myself and my wife — that woe-begone creature sitting yonder — determined to emigrate to the Indies, the common refuge of the well-born poor. We embarked six days ago in a packet-ship, but just outside the harbour of Cadiz we were captured by those two corsairs. This was a new addition to our affliction; but it would have been greater had not the corsair taken this Portuguese ship, which fortunately detained them until you came to our rescue.”

In reply to Richard’s question what was his daughter’s name, the Spaniard said it was Isabella. This confirmed the suspicion which Richard had all along entertained, that the person before him was the father of his beloved mistress. Keeping this fact to himself, he told the Spaniard that he would willingly take him and his wife to London, where possibly they might obtain some intelligence about their child.

Taking them both on board his flag-ship, and having sufficiently armed and manned the Portuguese galleon, he set sail that night, avoiding the coast of Spain as much as possible, lest he should be intercepted in consequence of!

information given by the liberated captives. Among the latter there were some twenty Turks, to whom also Richard granted freedom, to show that his conduct had been the result simply of his generous disposition, and not of any secret leaning to the Catholics: and he asked the Spaniards to set the Turks at liberty upon the first opportunity. The wind, which had blown fresh and fair at first, died away into a calm, to the dismay of the English, who murmured against Richard's unseasonable generosity, saying, that the liberated captives might give information of what had happened, and that if there chanced to be armed galleons in port, they might sally out and intercept them.

Richard knew that this was quite true, but strove to allay their fears in the best way he could. But what availed with them more than all his arguments, was that the wind sprang up again, so that they crowded all sail, and in nine days reached London, from which they had been only a month absent on their cruise. Richard would not enter the port with only joyous demonstrations, on account of the death of his late commander, but mingled signs of grief with them. At one moment bugles rang out cheerily, at the next they were answered by melancholy trumpet notes, and the wailing fife was heard at intervals between the lively rattle of the drum and the clash of arms. From one mast-head hung a Turkish banner reversed, and from another a long black streamer, the ends of which dipped in the water. In this manner he entered the river of London in his English ship, leaving the Portuguese ship at sea, for want of depth of water in the river to float it.

These conflicting demonstrations puzzled the vast multitudes, who observed them from the shore. They easily recognised the smaller vessel as the flag-ship of Baron Lansac; but they could not make out how it was that his second vessel had been exchanged for the large and powerful ship which lay out at sea. But the problem was solved when they saw the valorous Richard jump into his boat, fully equipped in rich and splendid armour. Without waiting for any other escort than that of a vast multitude of the people who followed him, he proceeded on foot to the palace, where the queen was standing in a balcony, waiting for news of the ships, and surrounded by her ladies, among whom was Isabella, dressed in the English style, which became her as well as the Castilian. A messenger, who had anticipated Richard's arrival, had startled her by the announcement of his coming, and she stood watching for him with feelings that fluttered between hope and fear, not knowing whether he had sped well or ill upon his expedition.

Richard was a young man of noble presence, tall and finely proportioned, and he looked to great advantage in a complete suit of Milanese armour all graven and gilded, and instead of a helmet, a wide-leafed fawn coloured hat with Walloon plumes. Thus equipped, and with his spirited bearing, to some he seemed like Mars the god of battles; others, struck by the beauty of his face, compared him to Venus sportively disguised in the armour of that god. When he came before the Queen he knelt, and gave a brief account of his expedition.

“After the sudden death of general de Lansac,” he said, “I took his place in pursuance of your Majesty’s gracious orders. Shortly afterwards we discovered two Turkish galleys towing a large ship, which we have brought home with us. We attacked them; your Majesty’s soldiers fought with great spirit, as they always do, and the corsair galleys went to the bottom. I liberated in your Majesty’s royal name the Christians who had escaped out of the hands of the Turks, and sent them away in one of our vessels; and have only brought with me one Spaniard and his wife, who desired of their own accord to come and behold your Majesty’s greatness. The great ship we took, is one of those which come from the Portuguese possessions in India; being damaged by a storm, it fell into the power of the Turks, who took it without any difficulty. According to the account given by some of the Portuguese on board the ship, her cargo of spices, and the pearls and diamonds she carries, are worth more than a million. All is untouched, the Turks not having had time to lay hands on anything, and I have given orders that the whole should be presented to your Majesty. There is one jewel alone which, if your Majesty will bestow it upon me, will leave me your debtor for ten other ships. That jewel your Majesty has promised me: it is my Isabella, in obtaining whom I shall be richly rewarded, not only for this service, such as it is, which I have rendered your Majesty, but for many others which I intend to perform in order to repay some part of the incalculable amount which your Majesty will bestow upon me in that jewel.”

“Rise, Richard,” replied the queen, “and believe me that were I to deliver Isabella to you in the way of bargain at the price at which I value her, you could not pay for her with all the wealth of your prize-ship, nor with what remains in the Indies. I give her to you because I promised to do so, and because she is worthy of you, and you of her; your valour alone entitles you to have her. If you have kept the jewels in the ship for me, I have kept your jewel for you; and though it may seem to you that I do not do much for you in returning to you what is your own, I know that I confer upon you a boon the worth of which is beyond all human computation. Isabella is yours; there she stands; you may claim her when you will, and I believe that it will be with her own consent, for she has the good sense to prize your affection as it deserves. I shall expect you again to-morrow to give me a more detailed account of your exploits, and bring me those two Spaniards who wish to see me, that I may gratify their desire.” Richard kissed the queen’s hand, and her majesty retired.

The ladies now gathered round Richard, and one of them, the lady Tansi, who had taken a great liking to Isabella, and who was the liveliest and most facetious lady of the court, said to him, "What is all this, sir? Why these arms? Did you, perchance, imagine that you were coming here to fight your enemies? Believe me, you have none but friends here, unless it be the lady Isabella, who, as a Spaniard, is bound to bear you no good will."

"Let her only vouchsafe, Lady Tansi, to have me a little in her thoughts, and I am sure she will not think of me with ill will; for ingratitude can have no place in the heart of one so good, so wise, and so exquisitely fair."

"Since I am to be yours, señor Richard," said Isabella, "claim from me what you will in recompense for the praises you bestow upon me."

Whilst Isabella and the other ladies were thus conversing with Richard, there was a little girl present who did nothing but gaze at him, lift up his cuishes to see what was beneath them, touch his sword, and, with childlike simplicity, peep at her own image reflected in his bright armour. When Richard was gone away, she said, turning to the ladies, "Now I see what a fine thing war must be, since armed men look to such advantage even among ladies." "Look to advantage!" exclaimed Lady Tansi; "one might take Richard for the sun, come down from Heaven, to walk the streets in that garb." Every one laughed at the little girl's remark, and at Lady Tansi's hyperbole; and there lacked not back-biters, who thought his appearing in arms at the palace was an act of great impropriety; but others excused him, saying that it was a very natural and pardonable act of vanity on the part of a gallant young soldier.

Richard was most cordially welcomed by his parents, relations, and friends, and that night there were general rejoicings in London. On his return home, he found Isabella's parents already there, and told his father and mother who they were, but begged they would give no hint of the matter to Isabella till he should make it known to her himself. His desire was punctually observed. That night they began with a great number of boats and barges, and in presence of a multitude of admiring spectators, to unload the great galleon, but eight days were consumed in the work before they had disembowelled it of its aromatic and precious freight. On the following day, Richard went again to the palace, taking with him Isabella's father and mother, dressed in the English style, telling them that the queen wished to see them. They found the queen surrounded by her ladies, with Isabella by her side, wearing, by the queen's desire, for Richard's special gratification, the same dress in which she had made her first appearance at court. Isabella's parents were filled with admiration and astonishment at such a display of grandeur and gaiety combined. They looked at Isabella, but did not recognise her, though their hearts, prophetic of the happiness so near at hand, began to throb, not anxiously, but with an emotion of joy for which they could not account.

The queen would not allow Richard to kneel before her, but made him rise and be seated on a chair which was placed for him alone, an unusual favour, which provoked many envious comments. "It is not on a chair he sits," said one, "but on the pepper he has brought." "It is a true saying," remarked another, "that gifts can soften rocks, since they have mollified the hard heart of our queen." "He sits at his ease," said a third, "but there are those who will make bold to push him from his seat." In fact, that new mark of honour which the queen bestowed on Richard gave occasion to many to regard him with envy and malice; for there is no favour which the sovereign bestows on a subject but pierces the heart of the envious like a lance. In obedience to the queen's command, Richard narrated more minutely the details of his conflict with the corsairs, attributing the victory to God, and to the arms of her valiant soldiers. He extolled them all collectively, and made special mention of some who had particularly distinguished themselves, in order that the queen might reward them all and singly. When he came to speak of his having, in her majesty's name, set the Turks and Christians at liberty, he said, pointing to Isabella's parents, "These are the persons of whom I spoke yesterday to your majesty, who, desiring to behold your greatness, earnestly besought me to bring them away with me. They are from Cadiz, and from what they have told me, and from what I have myself observed, I am assured that they are persons of worth and quality."

The queen commanded them to approach her. Isabella raised her eyes to look at persons who she heard were Spaniards, and, above all, from Cadiz, longing to know if perchance they were acquainted with her parents. Her mother first encountered her gaze, and as she looked attentively at her, there rose on her mind some shadowy confused reminiscences that seemed to intimate she had seen that face before. Her father was in the same wavering state of mind, not daring to believe the evidence of his eyes, whilst Richard watched intently the workings of their perplexed and dubious souls. The queen too noticed the emotion of the two strangers, and also Isabella's uneasiness, for she saw her often raise her hand to her forehead, which was bedewed with perspiration. Whilst Isabella was longing that the person she imagined to be her mother would speak, thinking that the sound of her voice would resolve her doubts, the queen commanded her to ask the strangers in Spanish what had induced them voluntarily to forego the freedom which Richard had offered them, since freedom was the thing most prized, not only by reasonable creatures, but even by irrational animals. Isabella put this question to her mother, who, without answering a word, rushed abruptly and almost tottering to Isabella, and forgetting all respect of place or circumstances, put her hand to her daughter's right ear, and discovered a dark mole behind it. Assured now beyond all doubt that Isabella was her daughter, she cried out, "Child of my heart! treasure of my soul!" and swooned in her arms. The father, no less tender hearted but with more self-command, gave no other token of his feelings than the tears that streamed down his venerable face and beard. With her lips pressed upon her mother's, Isabella bent her eyes upon her father, with looks that spoke the gladness of her soul.

The queen was greatly affected by this touching scene, and said to Richard, "I know not whether you have done wisely in contriving this meeting, for sudden joy, it is known, can kill as well as grief." Then, turning to Isabella, she withdrew her from her mother, who, after her face had been sprinkled with water, came to her senses, and recollecting herself a little better, fell on her knees before the queen, entreating her majesty's pardon. Elizabeth graciously replied, and commanded that the two strangers should take up their abode in the palace, that they might have the more opportunity of rejoicing in their daughter's society. Richard then renewed his request that the queen would fulfil her promise, and bestow Isabella upon him, if so it were that he had deserved her, but if not, he begged to be sent where he might find opportunities of doing so.

The queen was well aware that Richard was well satisfied with himself, and that there was no need of putting him to further proof; she told him, therefore, that in four days he should obtain the object of his desires, and that she would honour their union with her royal countenance. Richard then took his leave of her majesty, his heart swelling with joy at the near prospect of Isabella becoming his own for ever. Time sped, but not with the nimbleness he desired; for those who live on the hopes of pleasure to come, always imagine that time does not fly, but hobbles on the feet of sloth itself. At last the day came on which Richard expected, not to end his desires, but to find in Isabella new graces which should make him love her more, if more was possible. But in that brief space of time, in which he thought the bark of his fortunes was running with a prosperous gale towards the desired haven, it encountered such a fearful tempest, as a thousand times threatened it with wreck.

The queen's keeper of the robes, who had charge of Isabella, had a son aged two-and-twenty, named Count Ernest, whom his great wealth, his high blood, and his mother's great favour with the queen, made too arrogant and overbearing. He fell most violently in love with Isabella, and, during Richard's absence, he had made some overtures to her which she had coldly disregarded. Although repugnance and disdain manifested at the outset usually make the enamoured desist from their suit, yet Isabella's notorious disdain had the contrary effect on Ernest, for it fired his passion, and consumed his sense of honour. He was almost distracted when he found that the queen had adjudged Isabella to Richard, and that she was so soon to become his; but before he committed himself to the infamous and dastardly course which he ultimately adopted, he first besought his mother to use her influence with the queen on his behalf, declaring that his death was at hand unless he obtained Isabella for his wife.

The countess, well knowing her son's violent and arrogant disposition, and the obstinacy with which he pursued his desires, had reason to fear that his passion would lead to some unhappy result. With a mother's natural anxiety to gratify her son's wishes, she promised to speak to the queen, not with the hope of succeeding in the impossible attempt to make her majesty break her word, but in order not to sit down in despair, while any remedy remained to be tried. That morning Isabella was dressed by the queen's orders with a magnificence which defies description. With her own hands her majesty put on her neck a string of the largest pearls found in the galleon, valued at twenty thousand ducats, and a diamond ring on her finger worth six thousand crowns. But whilst the ladies were in great glee anticipating the glad time so near at hand, the keeper of the robes presented herself before the queen, and implored her on her knees to postpone Isabella's wedding for two days longer, declaring that if her majesty would only do so, it would more than reward her for all her past services. The queen desired to know, in the first instance, why she made that request, so directly at variance with the royal promise given to Richard; but the countess would not explain until the queen, urged by curiosity to discover the cause of this strange request, promised that she would grant it. Having thus succeeded in her immediate object, the lady keeper made the queen acquainted with her son's passion, and how, fearing that unless he obtained Isabella he would commit some desperate deed against himself or others, she had asked for that delay of two days in order that her majesty might devise the best means of saving the life of her son. The queen replied that had she not pledged her royal word, she would have found a way to smooth over that difficulty, but that, for no consideration, could she retract her promise or defraud Richard of the hope she had given him.

The lady keeper reported the queen's answer to her son, but nothing could overcome his headstrong presumption. Arming himself at all points he mounted a powerful charger, and presented himself before Clotald's house, and shouted for Richard to come to the window. Richard was dressed as a bridegroom, and was on the point of setting out for the palace with his friends, but hearing himself thus summoned, he went with some surprise and showed himself at an open window. "Hark you, Richard; I have something to say to you," said Count Ernest. "Our lady the queen ordered you to go forth on her service and perform exploits that should render you worthy of the peerless Isabella. You set out, and returned with ships laden with wealth, with which you think you have bought your title to Isabella. But though our lady the queen promised her to you, it was under the belief that there was no one at her court who could serve her better than you, or more justly aspire to the fair Spaniard's hand; but in this it may be that her majesty was mistaken. Being of that opinion, and holding it for very truth, I say that you have done no such deeds as can make you worthy of Isabella, nor can you ever perform any to raise you to that honour; and if you dare to maintain the contrary, I defy you to the death."

"I am in no wise called upon to take up your defial," replied Richard; "because I confess not only that I do not merit Isabella, but that no man living does so. Confessing, therefore, the truth of what you allege, I say again, that your defial touches not me; nevertheless, I accept it in order to chastise your insolence." So saying, he left the window and called for his arms.

Richard's family and the friends who had assembled to escort him to the palace were thrown into confusion by this untoward incident. The challenge having been so publicly given, it could not be but that some one should report it to the queen. This was done accordingly, and her majesty ordered the captain of her guard to arrest Count Ernest. The captain made such good speed that he arrived just as Richard was riding out from his father's house, mounted on a handsome steed, and equipped with the magnificent arms in which he had gone to pay his respects to the queen on his return from his expedition. The moment the count saw the captain of the queen's guard, he guessed his purpose, and resolving not to let himself be caught, he shouted out, "You see, Richard, how we are interrupted. If you are bent upon chastising me, you will look for me as I will look for you. Two people surely meet when they have a mind." "The sooner the better," said Richard. Meanwhile, the captain of the guards came up and, in the queen's name, arrested the count, who surrendered, requesting to be taken into the queen's presence. The captain complied, and carried Ernest before the queen, who, without entering into any discourse with him, ordered that he should surrender his sword and be committed to the Tower.

All these things were torture to the heart of Isabella and to her parents, who saw their new-found happiness so soon disturbed. The lady keeper advised the queen that to prevent the mischief which might break out between her own family and Richard's, the possible cause of it should be withdrawn, by sending Isabella to Spain. In support of this suggestion she added that Isabella was a Catholic, and so rooted in that faith, that all the arguments and persuasions she had used to withdraw her from it, and they were many, were of no avail. The queen replied that she esteemed her the more, since she was steadfast to the law taught her by her parents; and that as for sending her to Spain, it was not to be thought of, for she was charmed with her lovely presence and her many graces and virtues. In fine, the queen was resolved that Isabella should become Richard's wife, if not that day, on another, without fail. The lady keeper was so mortified by this reply that she withdrew without saying a word; and having already made up her mind that unless Isabella was removed there could be no hope of relief for her son or of peace between him and Richard, she determined to commit one of the most atrocious acts that could enter the mind of a lady of her exalted station.

Women being, for the most part, rash and sudden in the execution of their resolves, the lady keeper that evening gave Isabella poison in a conserve which she pressed her to take, under the pretence that it was good for the sinking and oppression of the heart which she complained of. A short while after Isabella had swallowed it her throat and tongue began to swell, her lips turned black, her voice became hoarse, her eyes fixed and glassy, and her breathing laboured and stertorous: in short, she exhibited all the symptoms of having been poisoned. The queen's ladies hastened to inform her majesty, assuring her that the lady keeper had been the author of the nefarious deed.

The queen had no great difficulty in coming to the same conclusion, and went at once to see Isabella, who seemed to be almost at the last gasp. Sending with all speed for her physicians, she, meanwhile, ordered that the sufferer should be given a quantity of powdered unicorn's horn and several other antidotes, with which great princes are usually provided against such casualties. The physicians arrived and begged the queen to make the lady keeper declare what kind of poison she had used (for no one doubted that she was the poisoner). This information having been obtained from the criminal, the physician applied the proper remedies with such good effect that, with God's help, Isabella's life was saved, or at least there was a hope that it would be so.

The queen ordered that the lady keeper should be arrested and confined in a chamber of the palace, intending to punish her as her crime deserved; whilst the guilty woman thought to excuse herself by saying that in killing Isabella she offered an acceptable sacrifice to heaven by ridding the world of a Catholic, and removing with her the cause of affliction to her son. Finally, Isabella did not die; but she escaped only with the loss of her hair, eyebrows, and eyelashes, her face swollen, her bloom gone, her skin blotched and blistered, and her eyes red and humid. In a word, she was now become an object as loathsome to look at as she had before been surpassingly beautiful. The change was so frightful that those who knew her thought it would have been better had the poison killed her. But notwithstanding all this, Richard supplicated the queen to let him take her home with him, for the great love he bore her comprehended not only her body but her soul, and if Isabella had lost her beauty, she could not have lost her infinite virtues. "Be it so," said the queen. "Take her, Richard, and reckon that you take in her a most precious jewel, in a rough wooden casket. God knows how gladly I would give her to you as I received her; but since that is impossible, perhaps the punishment I will inflict on the perpetrator of the crime will be some satisfaction to your feelings."

Richard spoke earnestly in the culprit's behalf, and besought her majesty to pardon her. Finally, Isabella and her parents were consigned to his care, and he took them home to his father's house, the queen having added to the fine pearls and the diamonds she had bestowed on Isabella other jewels and rich dresses, such as manifested the great affection she felt for her. Isabella remained for two months in the same state, without the least sign appearing that her beauty would ever return; but at the end of that time her skin began to peel off, and she gradually recovered the natural bloom of her lovely complexion. Meanwhile, Richard's parents, thinking it impossible that Isabella should ever again be what she had been, determined to send for the Scotch lady, to whom they had at first intended to unite him. They did not doubt that the actual beauty of the new bride would make their son forget the lost beauty of her rival, whom they intended to send to Spain with her parents, giving them so much wealth as would compensate them for their past losses. All this was settled between them without Richard's knowledge, and soon after the new bride entered their doors, duly accompanied, and so beautiful that none could compare with her in London, now that Isabella's charms were gone.

Richard was astounded at this unexpected arrival, and fearing that it would have a fatal effect upon Isabella, he went to her bedside, and said to her, in presence of her parents, "Beloved of my soul, my parents, in their great love for me, but ill conceiving how great is mine for you, have brought hither a Scotch lady, to whom they arranged to marry me before I knew your worth. They have done so, I believe, upon the supposition that her great beauty will efface from my soul the image of yours, which is deeply impressed upon it. But from the moment I first loved you, Isabella, it was with a different love from that which finds its end attained in the gratification of the sensual appetite: for though your great beauty captivated my senses, your infinite virtues enthralled my soul, so that if I loved you in your beauty, I adore you in your plainness. That I may confirm that truth, put your hand in mine."

She held out her right hand; he took it in his, and continued:

"By the Catholic faith which my Christian parents have taught me; or, if that is not as pure and perfect as it ought, then, by that held by the Roman pontiff, and which in my heart I confess, believe, and hold, do I swear, and by the true God who hears us, I promise you, Isabella, soul of my soul! to be your husband; and your husband I am from this moment, if you will raise me up so high."

Isabella could only kiss Richard's hand again and again, and tell him in a voice broken by her tears, that she accepted him as hers, and gave herself to him as his slave. Richard kissed her disfigured face, which he had never ventured to kiss in its beauty; and her parents, with tears of affection, ratified their solemn betrothal. Richard told them that he would find a way to postpone his marriage with the Scotch lady, and that when his father proposed to send them to Spain they were not to refuse, but were to go to Cadiz and wait for him there or in Seville for two years, within which time he gave them his word he would be with them, if God spared his life. Should he not appear within that time, they might be assured that he was prevented by some insuperable impediment, and most probably by death. Isabella replied that she would wait for him not only two years, but all the years of her life, until she knew that he was no longer alive; for the moment that brought her that news would be her last.

Richard having at length quitted Isabella, went and told his parents that on no account would he marry the Scotch lady until he had first been to Rome for the satisfaction of his conscience; and he represented the matter in such a light to them and to the relations of Clesterna (that was the name of the Scotch lady), that as they were all Catholics, they easily assented, and Clesterna was content to remain in her father-in-law's house until the return of Richard, who proposed to be away a year. This being settled, Clotald told his son of his intention to send Isabella and her parents to Spain, if the queen gave them leave; perhaps her native air would confirm and expedite her incipient recovery. Richard, to avoid betraying his secret intentions, desired his father, with seeming indifference, to do as he thought best; only he begged him not to take away from Isabella any of the presents which the queen had given her. Clotald promised this, and the same day he went and asked the queen's leave both to marry his son to Clesterna, and to send Isabella and her parents to Spain. The queen granted both requests, and without having recourse to lawyers or judges, she forthwith passed sentence on the lady keeper, condemning her to lose her office, and to pay down ten thousand crowns for Isabella. As for Count Ernest, she banished him from England for six years.

Four days afterwards Richard set out on his exile, and the money had been already paid. The queen, sending for a rich merchant, resident in London, who was a Frenchman, and had correspondents in France, Italy, and Spain, put the ten thousand crowns into his hands, and desired him to let Isabella's father have bills for the amount on Seville or some other place in Spain. The merchant having deducted his profit, told the queen he would give good and safe bills on another French merchant, his correspondent in Seville, in the following manner: — He would write to Paris that the bills might be drawn there by another correspondent of his, in order that they should be dated from France and not from England, because of the interdicted communication between that country and Spain. It would only be necessary to have a letter of advice from him, with his signature and without date, in sight of which the merchant of Seville would immediately pay the money, according to previous advice from the merchant of Paris.

In fine, the queen took such securities from the merchant as made the payment certain; and not content with this, she sent for the master of a Flemish vessel who was about to sail for France, only to obtain a manifest from some French port, in order to be allowed to land in Spain; and she begged him to take Isabella and her parents, treat them well, and land them safely at the first Spanish port he reached. The master, who desired to please the queen, said he would do so, and would land them at Lisbon, Cadiz, or Seville. After this the queen sent word to Clotald not to take from Isabella any of the presents she had given her, whether jewels or clothes.

The next day Isabella and her parents came to take leave of the queen, who received them with great affection. The queen gave them the merchant's bills, besides many other presents, both in money and in things suitable for their voyage. Isabella expressed her gratitude in such terms as to increase the queen's gracious disposition towards her. She took leave of the ladies of the court, who, now that she had become plain, would rather have had her remain among them, having no longer reason to envy her beauty, and being willing to enjoy her society for the sake of her good qualities of mind and disposition. The queen embraced the three, and took leave of them, commending them to good fortune and to the master of the vessel, and asking Isabella to inform her of her arrival in Spain, and of her health at all times through the French merchant. That evening they embarked, not without tears on the part of Clotald, his wife, and his whole household, by whom Isabella was exceedingly beloved. Richard was not present at the departure, for, in order to avoid betraying his feelings, he had gone with some of his friends to the chase.

Many were the dainties which the lady Catherine gave. Isabella for use on the voyage; endless were her embraces, her tears, and her injunctions that she should write to her; for all which Isabella and her parents returned suitable thanks. That night the vessel set sail, and having reached France with a fair wind, and obtained the necessary papers to enable them to enter Spain, they crossed the bar of Cadiz thirty days afterwards, and there Isabella and her parents disembarked. Being known to the whole city, they were joyfully welcomed, and warmly congratulated on their recovery of Isabella, and on their liberation, from their Turkish captors (for that fact had been made known by the captives whom Richard generously released), and also from detention in England. By this time Isabella began to give great hopes that she would quite recover her original beauty.

For more than a month they remained in Cadiz, recruiting themselves after the toils of their voyage; and then they went to Seville, to see if they should obtain payment of the ten thousand crowns upon the French merchant's bill. Two days after their arrival they called upon the person on whom it was drawn. He acknowledged it, but said that, until the arrival of advices from Paris, he could not pay the money. Isabella's father hired a large house facing St. Paul's, because there was in that holy convent a nun who was remarkable for rare musical talents, and who was his own niece. They chose the house to be near her for that reason, and because Isabella had told Richard that if he came to look for her he would find her in Seville, and her cousin, the nun of St. Paula's, would tell him where: he had only to ask for the nun who had the best voice in the convent; every one would know her by that description.

It was forty days more before the advices came from Paris, and two days after their arrival the French merchant paid Isabella the ten thousand crowns, which she handed over to her parents. With that sum, and something more made by the sale of part of Isabella's numerous jewels, her father again began business as a merchant, to the surprise of those who were cognisant of his great losses. After a few months his lost credit began to return; so, too, did his daughter's good looks, so that, whenever female beauty was the subject of discourse, the palm was universally conceded to the Spanish-English lady; for by that name, as well as for her great beauty, she was known throughout the city. Through the French merchant of Seville, Isabella and her parents wrote to the queen of England, announcing their arrival in such grateful and dutiful terms as the many favours received at her Majesty's hands required. They also wrote to Clotald and Catherine, whom Isabella addressed as her revered parents.

Their letters to the queen remained unanswered, but from Clotald and his wife they received a reply, congratulating them on their safe arrival, and informing them that their son Richard had set out from France the day after their departure, and thence to other countries, which it behoved him to visit for the tranquillity of his conscience. Isabella immediately concluded that Richard had left England for no other purpose than to seek her; and cheered by this hope, she was as happy as she could be, and strove to live in such a manner that, when Richard arrived in Seville, the fame of her virtues should reach his ears before he learned where she lived.

She seldom or never quitted the house, except to go to the convent, and attended no other church services than those performed there. She never went near the river, or to Triana, or witnessed the general rejoicings at the Campo de Tablada, or the Puerta de Xeres on Sari Sebastian's day, celebrated by an almost innumerable multitude; in short, she never went abroad for any kind of amusement in Seville; her whole time was spent in her devotions, and in praying and hoping for Richard's arrival. The consequence of this strict retirement was a great increase of the general interest about her; thence came serenades in her street by night, and promenades by day. The desire which so many felt to see her, and the difficulty of accomplishing it, was a great source of gain to the professional go-betweens, who severally professed that they alone had the ear of Isabella, and some there were who had recourse to what are called charms, which are nothing but deceits and follies; but in spite of all this, Isabella was like a rock in the ocean, which the winds and waves assail in vain. A year and a half had now passed, and her heart began to yearn more and more as the end of the period assigned by Richard drew near. Already, in imagination, she looked upon him as arrived; he stood before her eyes; she asked him what had caused his long delay; she heard his excuses; she forgave him, embraced and welcomed him as the half of her soul; and then there was put into her hands a letter from the lady Catherine, dated from London fifty days before. It was as follows: —

“Daughter of my heart, — You doubtless recollect Richard's page, Guillart. He accompanied Richard on his journey the day after you sailed, to France and other parts, whereof I informed you in a former letter. This said Guillart, after we had been sixteen months without hearing news of my son, yesterday entered our house with news that Count Ernest had basely murdered Richard in France. Imagine, my daughter, the effect upon his father, myself, and his intended wife, of such news as this, coming to us in such wise as left no doubt of our misfortune. What Clotald and myself beg of you once more, daughter of my soul, is that you will pray heartily to God for the soul of Richard, for well he deserves this service at your hands, he who loved you so much as you know. Pray also to our Lord to grant us patience, and that we may make a good end; as we will pray for long life for you and your parents.”

This letter and the signature left no doubt in Isabella's mind of the death of her husband. She knew the page Guillart very well, and knew that he was a person of veracity, and that he could have had no motive for publishing false news in such a matter; still less could the lady Catharine have had any interest in deceiving her so painfully. In fine, in whatever way she considered the subject, the conclusion at which she invariably arrived was, that this dismal intelligence was unquestionably true. When she had finished reading the letter, without shedding tears or showing any outward tokens of grief, with a composed face and apparently tranquil breast, she rose from her seat, entered an oratory, and kneeling before a crucifix, made a vow to become a nun, thinking herself free to do so, as she was no longer a betrothed maiden, but a widow. Her parents studiously concealed the grief which this affecting news caused them, in order that they might the better console their bereaved daughter; whilst she, as if mistress over her sorrow, having subdued it by the holy Christian resolution she had made, became their comforter. She made her intention known to them, and they advised her to postpone its execution, until the two years were elapsed which Richard had assigned as the duration of his absence. That delay would suffice for confirming the news of his death, and then she might with more security change her condition. Isabella followed their advice; and the six months and a half which remained to complete the term of two years were spent by her in devotional exercises, and in arranging for her entrance into the convent of Santa Paula, in which her cousin was a nun.

The remainder of the two years elapsed, and the day arrived when she was to take the veil. The news having spread through the city, the convent, and the space between it and Isabella's abode, was thronged by those who knew her by sight, or by report only; and her father having invited her friends, and these having invited others, Isabella had for her escort one of the most imposing retinues ever seen in Seville on such occasions. It included the chief justice of Seville, the vicar-general, and all the titled personages of both sexes in the city, so great was the desire of all to behold the sun of Isabella's beauty, which had been for so many months eclipsed. And as it is customary for maidens about to take the veil to dress themselves in their very gayest attire on the day when they are to renounce for ever the pomps and vanities of the world, Isabella wore the same splendid dress in which she was presented to the queen of England, with her necklace and girdle of lustrous pearls, her diamond ring, and all her other sumptuous jewels. Thus gorgeously attired, Isabella set out from home on foot, for the short distance to the convent seemed to render carriages superfluous; but the concourse was so great that the procession could hardly advance, and its members regretted too late that they had not chosen to ride instead of walking. Some of the spectators blessed the father and mother of that lovely creature; others praised Heaven that had endowed her with so much beauty. Some strained forward to see her; others, having seen her once, ran forward to have a second view of her. Among those who were most eager to behold her, was a man who attracted the notice of many by his extraordinary efforts. He was dressed in the garb of a slave lately ransomed, and wore on his breast the emblem of the Holy Trinity, by which it was known that he had been redeemed by the charity of the Already Isabella had set one foot on the threshold of the convent gate, where the prioress and the nuns stood ready to receive her with the cross, when this ransomed captive cried out, "Stop, Isabella, stop!" Isabella and her parents turned at this cry, and saw the man cleaving his way towards them through the crowd by main strength. The blue hat he wore having fallen oft through the violence of his exertions, disclosed a profusion of flaxen hair, and a clear red and white complexion, which showed him at once to be a foreigner.

Redemptorist fathers.

Struggling, stumbling, and rising again, he at last reached the spot where Isabella stood, caught her hand in his, and said, "Do you know me, Isabella? I am Richard, your betrothed." "Well do I know you," said Isabella, "if indeed you are not a phantom come to trouble my repose." Her parents also examined his features attentively, and saw that this captive was indeed Richard. As for him, weeping at Isabella's feet, he implored her not to let the strange garb he wore prevent her recognising him, nor his low fortune impede the fulfilment of the pledges exchanged between them. In spite of the impression which the letter from Richard's mother had made on her memory, Isabella chose rather to believe the living evidence before her eyes; and embracing the captive, she said, "Without doubt, my lord and master, you are he who alone could hinder the fulfilment of my Christian determination; you are without doubt the half of my soul; my own betrothed! your image is stamped upon my memory, and treasured in my heart. The news of your death, sent me by your lady mother, not having killed me on the spot, I resolved to dedicate myself to religion, and I was just about to enter this convent for the rest of my days; but since God has shown us by so just an impediment that he wills otherwise, it is not for me to refuse obedience. Come, señor, to the house of my parents, which is yours, and there I will give myself to you in the way which our holy catholic faith prescribes."

This dialogue, overheard by the spectators, struck them all with amazement. The chief justice and the vicar-general immediately demanded what was all this ado, who was this stranger, and what marriage was this they talked about. Isabella's father replied, that what they had seen was the sequel of a story which required a different place for the telling of it; therefore, he begged that all who desired to hear it should turn back to his house, which was close by, and there he would fully satisfy their curiosity, and fill them with wonder at the strange things he should relate.

Just then one of the crowd cried out, "Señors, this young man is the great English corsair. It is not much more than two years since he took from the Algerine corsairs the great Portuguese galleon from the Indies. There is not the least doubt that he is the very man; I know him, because he set me at liberty, and gave me money to carry me to Spain, and not me only, but three hundred other captives likewise.” These words increased the general excitement and the desire to see all these intricate matters cleared up. Finally, the principal persons of the city, with the chief justice and the vicar-general, went back with Isabella to her father’s house, leaving the nuns sorely discomfited, and crying with vexation at the loss they had sustained in not having the beautiful Isabella to grace their nunnery. The company being arrived at the house of Isabella’s father, she made them be seated in a long hall, and though Richard would willingly have taken it upon himself to tell his story, yet he thought it better to trust it to Isabella’s tongue than to his own, which was not very expert in speaking Spanish. Accordingly she began her narration in the midst of profound silence and attention.

She related all that happened to her from the day when Clotald carried her off from Cadiz until her return thither; also Richard’s engagement with the Turks; his liberality to the Christians; the promise they had given each other to be husband and wife; the two years’ delay agreed on, and the news she had received of his death, which seemed to her so certain, as to have nearly occasioned her taking the veil! She extolled the liberality of the queen of England, the Christian faith of Richard and his parents, and she concluded by saying, that Richard would relate what had happened to him since he left London until that moment, when he stood before them in the dress of a captive, and with the mark of having been ransomed by charity. “I will do so,” said Richard, “and briefly relate the hardships I have undergone.

“I quitted London to avoid marrying Clisterna, the Scottish Catholic lady, to whom Isabella has told you that my parents wished to unite me, and I took with me Guillart, my page, the same who carried the news of my death to London, as my mother stated in her letter. Passing through France, I arrived in Rome, where my soul was gladdened, and my faith fortified. I kissed the feet of the supreme pontiff, confessed my sins to the grand penitentiary, obtained absolution, and received the necessary certificates of my confession and penance, and of the submission I had paid to our holy mother, the church. This done, I visited the numberless holy places in that sacred city, and out of two thousand crowns I had with me in gold, I deposited one thousand six hundred with a money-changer, who gave me a letter of credit for them on one Roqui, a Florentine, in this city. With the four hundred that remained, I set out for Spain, by way of Genoa, where I had heard that there were two galleys of that signory bound for this country. I arrived with Guillart at a place called Aquapendente, which is the last town in the pope’s dominions on the road to Florence, and in an inn at which I alighted, I met Count Ernest, my mortal enemy. He had four servants with him, he was disguised, and was going, as I understood, to Rome, not because he was a Catholic, but from motives of curiosity. I thought he had not recognised me, and shut myself up in a room with my servant Guillart, where I remained on my guard, intending to shift my quarters at nightfall. I did not do so, however, for the perfect indifference shown by the count and his servants made me confident that they had not recognised me. I supped in my room, locked the door, looked to my sword, commended myself to God, but would not lie down.

“My servant lay asleep, and I sat on a chair between asleep and awake; but a little after midnight, I was near put to sleep for eternity by four pistol shots fired at me, as I afterwards learned, by the count and his servants. They left me for dead, and their horses being in readiness, they rode off, telling the innkeeper to bury me suitably, for I was a man of quality. My servant, awaking in terror at the noise, leaped out of a window, and ran away in such mortal fear, that it seems he never stopped till he got to London, for it was he brought the news of my death.

“The people of the inn came up and found I had been struck by four balls and several slugs, but none of the wounds in any vital part. Calling for a confessor, I received all the sacraments as became a Catholic Christian; but I gradually recovered, though it was two months before I was able to continue my journey. I then proceeded to Genoa, but found no other means of passage than two feluccas, which were hired by myself and two Spanish gentlemen. One of them we employed to go before and pilot the way, and in the other we ourselves embarked. In this way we pursued our voyage, closely hugging the shore; but when we came to a spot on the coast of France, called the Three Marias, two Turkish galleys suddenly came out upon us from a creek, and one keeping to seaward of us, the other more in shore, they cut off our escape to the land and captured us. The corsairs stripped us to the skin, plundered the feluccas, and having completely emptied them, let them drift ashore, instead of sinking them, saying that they might serve to bring them more pickings another time.

“You may well believe how bitterly I felt my captivity, and above all, the loss of the certificates from Rome, which I carried in a tin case, with the bill for the sixteen hundred ducats; but, by good fortune, they fell into the hands of a Christian slave, a Spaniard, who kept them, for if the Turks had got hold of them, they would have required for my ransom at least the amount of the bill. They carried us to Algiers, where I found that the fathers of the Most Holy Trinity were redeeming Christian slaves. I spoke to them, told them who I was, and they, moved by charity, ransomed me, though I was a foreigner. The price set upon me was three hundred ducats; they paid down one hundred on the spot, and engaged to pay the remaining two hundred as soon as the ship should return with the contributions for the release of the Redemptorist father who remained in Algiers in pledge for four thousand ducats, which he had spent over and above the amount he had brought in hand; for so extreme is the charity of these compassionate fathers, that they give their liberty for another's, and remain in captivity that others may go free. In addition to the happiness of obtaining my liberty, I recovered the case with the certificates and the bill. I showed its contents to the good father, and promised him five hundred ducats, in addition to the amount of my ransom, as a contribution towards the payment of the sum for which he was a hostage.

“It was nearly a year before the ship returned with the redemption money. What befel me in that year would, of itself, furnish matter for another history too long to relate at present. I will only say, that I was recognised by one of the twenty Turks whom I liberated with the Christians on the occasion already mentioned; but he was so grateful and so honest, that he would not betray me, for had the Turks known me to be the person who had sunk two of their galleys, and despoiled them of the great Indian galleon, they would either have put me to death, or presented me to the Grand Turk, in which case I should never have recovered my liberty. Finally, the Redemptorist father came to Spain with me, and fifty other ransomed Christians. We made a general procession in Valentia, and from that place we dispersed and took each his own several way, wearing this garb in token of the means by which we had been released. For myself, I arrived to-day in this city, burning with desire to see Isabella, my betrothed, and asked my way at once to the convent, where I was to hear of her. What happened there you all know. It now only remains for me to exhibit these certificates to satisfy you of the truth of my strange story.”

So saying, he produced the documents from a tin case, and placed them in the hands of the vicar-general, who examined them along with the chief justice, and found nothing in them to make him doubt the truth of what Richard had stated. Moreover, for the fuller confirmation of his story, Heaven ordained that among the persons present should be that very Florentine merchant on whom the bill for sixteen hundred ducats was drawn. He asked to see it, found it genuine, and accepted it on the spot, for he had received advice of it several months before. Thereupon Richard confirmed the promise he had made of contributing five hundred ducats to the funds of the Redemptorist fathers. The chief justice embraced him, Isabella, and her parents, and complimented them all in the most courteous terms. So, too, did the vicar-general, who requested Isabella to commit this whole story to writing, that he might lay it before his superior, the archbishop, and this she promised to do.

The deep silence in which the audience had listened to this extraordinary narrative was broken by thanksgivings to God for his great marvels; and all present, from the highest to the lowest, congratulated Isabella, Richard, and their parents, and prayed for their happiness as they took leave of them. Eight days afterwards, Richard and Isabella were united before the altar, their marriage being honoured by the presence of the chief justice, and all the persons of distinction in Seville. Thus, after so many vicissitudes, Isabella's parents recovered their daughter, and re-established their fortune; and she, favoured by heaven, and aided by her many virtues, in spite of so many crosses and troubles, obtained for her husband a man so deserving as Richard, with whom it is believed that she lives to this day, in the house facing Santa Paula, which her father had hired, and which they subsequently bought of the heirs of a gentleman of Burgos, named Hernando Cifuentes.

This tale may teach us what virtue and what beauty can effect, since they are sufficient together, or either singly, to win the love even of enemies; and how Heaven is able to bring forth our greatest happiness even out of our heaviest misfortunes.

THE FORCE OF BLOOD.

One night, after a sultry summer's day, an old hidalgo of Toledo walked out to take the air by the river's side, along with his wife, his little boy, his daughter aged sixteen, and a female servant. Eleven o'clock had struck: it was a fine clear night: they were the only persons on the road; and they sauntered leisurely along, to avoid paying the price of fatigue for the recreation provided for the Toledans in their valley or on the banks of their river. Secure as he thought in the careful administration of justice in that city, and the character of its well-disposed inhabitants, the good hidalgo was far from thinking that any disaster could befall his family. But as misfortunes commonly happen when they are least looked for, so it chanced with this family, who were that night visited, in the midst of their innocent enjoyment, by a calamity which gave them cause to weep for many a year.

There was in that city a young cavalier, about two-and-twenty years of age, whom wealth, high birth, a wayward disposition, inordinate indulgence, and profligate companions impelled to do things which disgraced his rank. This young cavalier — whose real name we shall, for good reasons, conceal under that of Rodolfo — was abroad that night with four of his companions, insolent young roisterers like himself, and happened to be coming down a hill as the old hidalgo and his family were ascending it. The two parties, the sheep and the wolves, met each other. Rodolfo and his companions, with their faces muffled in their cloaks, stared rudely and insolently at the mother, the daughter, and the servant-maid. The old hidalgo indignantly remonstrated; they answered him with mocks and jeers, and passed on. But Rodolfo had been struck by the great beauty of Leocadia, the hidalgo's daughter, and presently he began to entertain the idea of enjoying it at all hazards. In a moment he communicated his thoughts to his companions, and in the next moment they resolved to turn back and carry her off to please Rodolfo; for the rich who are open-handed always find parasites ready to encourage their bad propensities; and thus to conceive this wicked design, to communicate it, approve it, resolve on ravishing Leocadia, and to carry that design into effect was the work of a moment.

They drew their swords, hid their faces in the flaps of their cloaks, turned back, and soon came in front of the little party, who had not yet done giving thanks to God for their escape from those audacious men. Rodolfo laid hold on Leocadia, caught her up in his arms, and ran off with her, whilst she was so overcome with surprise and terror, that far from being able to defend herself or cry out, she had not even sense or sight left to see her ravisher, or know whither he was carrying her. Her father shouted, her mother shrieked, her little brother cried, the servant-maid tore her own face and hair; but the shouts and shrieks were disregarded, the wailings moved no pity, the clawing and scratching was of no avail; for all was lost upon the loneliness of the spot, the silence of the night, and the cruel hearts of the ravishers. Finally, the one party went off exulting, and the other was left in desolation and woe.

Rodolfo arrived at his own house without any impediment, and Leocadia's parents reached theirs heart-broken and despairing. They were afraid to appeal for justice to the laws, lest thereby they should only publish their daughter's disgrace; besides, though well born they were poor, and had not the means of commanding influence and favour; and above all, they knew not the name of their injurer, or of whom or what to complain but their luckless stars. Meanwhile Rodolfo had Leocadia safe in his custody, and in his own apartment. It was in a wing of his father's house, of which he had the keys, a great imprudence on the part of any parent. When Leocadia fainted in his arms, he had bandaged her eyes, in order that she might not notice the streets through which she passed, or the house into which he took her; and before she recovered her senses, he effected his guilty purpose.

Apathy and disgust commonly follow satiated lust. Rodolfo was now impatient to get rid of Leocadia, and made up his mind to lay her in the street, insensible as she was. He had set to work with that intention, when she came to herself, saying, "Where am I? Woe is me! What darkness is this? Am I in the limbo of my innocence, or the hell of my sins? Who touches me? Am I in bed? Mother! dear father! do you hear me? Alas, too well I perceive that you cannot hear me, and that I am in the hands of enemies. Well would it be for me if this darkness were to last for ever, and my eyes were never more to see the light! Whoever thou art," She exclaimed, suddenly seizing Rodolfo's hand, "if thy soul is capable of pity, grant me one prayer: having deprived me of honour, now deprive me of life. Let me not survive my disgrace! In mercy kill me this moment! It is the only amends I ask of you for the wrong you have done me."

Confused by the vehemence of her reproaches, Rodolfo knew not what to say or do, and answered not a word. This silence so astonished Leocadia, that she began to fancy she was dreaming, or haunted by a phantom; but the hands she grasped were of flesh and blood. She remembered the violence with which she had been torn from her parents, and she became but too well aware of the real nature of her calamity. After a passionate burst of tears and groans, "Inhuman youth!" she continued, "for your deeds assure me that your years are few, I will forgive the outrage you have done me, on the sole condition that you promise and vow to conceal your crime in perpetual silence, as profound as this darkness in which you have perpetrated it. This is but a small recompense for so grievous a wrong; but it is the greatest which I can ask, or you can grant me. I have never seen your face, nor ever desire to see it. It is enough for me to remember the injury I have sustained, without having before my mind's eye the image of my ravisher. My complaints shall be addressed only to Heaven: I would not have them heard by the world, which judges not according to the circumstances of each case, but according to its own preconceived notions. You may wonder to hear me speak thus, being so young. I am surprised at it myself; and I perceive that if great sorrows are sometimes dumb, they are sometimes eloquent. Be this as it may, grant me the favour I implore: it will cost you little. Put me at once into the street, or at least near the great church; for I shall know my way thence to the house of my parents. But you must also swear not to follow me, or make any attempts to ascertain my name or that of my family, who if they were as wealthy as they are noble, would not have to bear patiently such insult in my person. Answer me, and if you are afraid of being known by your voice, know, that except my father and my confessor, I have never spoken with any man in my life, and that I should never be able to tell who you were, though you were to speak ever so long."

The only reply Rodolfo made to the unhappy Leocadia was to embrace her, and attempt a repetition of his offence; but she defended herself with hands, feet, and teeth, and with a strength he could not have supposed her capable of exerting. "Base villain," she cried, "you took an infamous advantage of me when I had no more power to resist than a stock or a stone; but now that I have recovered my senses, you shall kill me before you shall succeed. You shall not have reason to imagine, from my weak resistance, that I pretended only to faint when you effected my ruin." In fine, she defended herself with such spirit and vigour as completely damped Rodolfo's ardour. Without saying a word he left the room, locked the door behind him, and went in quest of his companions, to consult them as to what he should do.

Finding herself left alone, Leocadia got out of bed, and groped about the room, and along the walls, feeling for a door or window through which she might make her escape. She found the door, but it was locked outside. She succeeded in opening the window; and the moonlight shone in so brightly, that she could distinguish the colour of some damask hangings in the room. She saw that the bed was gilded, and so rich, that it seemed that of a prince rather than of a private gentleman. She counted the chairs and the cabinets, observed the position of the door, and also perceived some pictures hanging on the walls, but was not able to distinguish the subjects. The window was large, and protected by a stout iron grating: it looked out on a garden, surrounded by high walls, so that escape in that direction was as impossible as by the door.

Everything she observed in this sumptuous apartment showed her that its master was a person of quality, and of extraordinary wealth. Among other things on which she cast her eyes was a small crucifix of solid silver, standing on a cabinet near the window. She took it, and hid it in the sleeve of her gown, not out of devotion, nor yet with a felonious intention, but with a very proper and judicious design. Having done this, she shut the window as before, and returned to the bed, to see what would be the end of an affair which had begun so badly. In about half an hour, as it seemed to her, the door was opened; some one came in, blindfolded her, and taking her by the arm, without a word spoken, led her out of the room, which she heard him lock behind him.

This person was Rodolfo, who though he had gone to look for his friends, had changed his mind in that respect, not thinking it advisable to acquaint them with what had passed between him and the girl. On the contrary, he resolved to tell them, that repenting of his violence, and moved by her tears, he had only carried her half-way towards his house, and then let her go. Having come to this resolution, he hastened back to remove Leocadia before daylight appeared, which would compel him to keep her in his room all the following day. He led her then to the Plaza del Ayuntamiento, and there, in a feigned voice, speaking half Portuguese and half Spanish, he told her she might go home without fear, for she should not be followed; and he was already out of sight before she had taken the bandage from her eyes.

Leocadia looked all round her: she was quite alone: no one was in sight; but suspecting that she might be followed at a distance, she stopped every now and then on her way home, which was not far, and looked behind her. To baffle any spies that might perchance be watching her, she entered a house which she found open; and by and by she went from it to her own, where she found her parents stupefied with grief. They had not undressed, or thought of taking any rest. When they saw her, they ran to her with open arms, and welcomed her with tears. Choking with emotion, Leocadia made a sign to her parents that she wished to be alone with them. They retired with her, and she gave them a succinct account of all that had befallen her. She described the room in which she had been robbed of her honour, the window, the grating, the garden, the cabinets, the bed, the damask hangings, and, last of all, she showed them the crucifix which she had carried off, and before which the three innocent victims renewed their tears, imprecated Heaven's vengeance on the insolent ravisher, and prayed that he might be miraculously punished. She told her parents, that although she had no wish to know the name of him at whose hands she had received such cruel wrong, yet if they thought fit to make such a discovery, they might do so by means of the crucifix, by directing the sacristans of the several parishes in the city to announce from the pulpits that whoever had lost such an image would find it in the hands of a certain monk whom he should name. By this means, they would discover their enemy in the person of the owner of the crucifix.

“That would be very well, my child,” replied her father, “if your plan were not liable to be frustrated by ordinary cunning; but no doubt this image has been already missed by its owner, and he will have set it down for certain that it was taken out of the room by the person he locked up there. To give him notice that the crucifix was in the hands of a certain monk would only serve to make known the person who deposited it in such keeping, but not to make the owner declare himself; for the latter might send another person for it, and furnish him with all the particulars by which he should identify it. Thus you see we should only damage ourselves without obtaining the information we sought; though to be sure we might employ the same artifice on our side, and deposit the image with the monk through a third hand. What you had best do, my child, is to keep it, and pray to it, that since it was a witness to your undoing, it will deign to vindicate your cause by its righteous judgment. Bear in mind, my child, that an ounce of public dishonour outweighs a quintal of secret infamy; and since, by the blessing of God, you can live in honour before the public eye, let it not distress you so much to be dishonoured in your ownself in secret. Real dishonour consists in sin, and real honour in virtue. There are three ways of offending God; by thought, word, and deed; but since neither in thought, nor in word, nor in deed have you offended, look upon yourself as a person of unsullied honour, as I shall always do, who will never cease to regard you with the affection of a father.”

Thus did this humane and right-minded father comfort his unhappy daughter; and her mother embracing her again did all she could to soothe her feelings. In spite of all their tenderness her anguish was too poignant to be soon allayed; and from that fatal night, she continued to live the life of a recluse under the protection of her parents.

Rodolfo meanwhile having returned home, and having missed the crucifix, guessed who had taken it, but gave himself no concern about it. To a person of his wealth such a loss was of no importance; nor did his parents make any inquiry about it, when three days afterwards, on his departure for Italy, one of his mother’s women took an inventory of all the effects he left in his apartment. Rodolfo had long contemplated a visit to Italy; and his father, who himself had been there, encouraged him in that design, telling him that no one could be a finished gentleman without seeing foreign countries. For this and other reasons,

Rodolfo readily complied with the wishes of his father, who gave him ample letters of credit on Barcelona, Genoa, Rome, and Naples. Taking with him two of his companions, he set out on his travels, with expectations raised to a high pitch, by what he had been told by some soldiers of his acquaintance, concerning the good cheer in the hostelrys of Italy and France, and the free and easy life enjoyed by the Spaniards in their quarters. His ears were tickled with the sound of such phrases as these: ecco li buoni polastri, picioni, presuto, salcie, and all the other fine things of the sort, which soldiers are fond of calling to mind when they return from those parts to Spain. In fine, he went away with as little thought or concern about what had passed between him and the beautiful Leocadia as though it had never happened. She meanwhile passed her life with her parents in the strictest retirement, never letting herself be seen, but shunning every eye lest it should read her misfortune in her face. What she had thus done voluntarily at first, she found herself, in a few months, constrained to do by necessity; for she discovered that she was pregnant, to the grievous renewal of her affliction.

Time rolled on: the hour of her delivery arrived: it took place in the utmost secrecy, her mother taking upon her the office of midwife: and she gave birth to a son, one of the most beautiful ever seen. The babe was conveyed, with the same secrecy, to a village, where he remained till he was four years old, when his grandfather brought him, under the name of nephew, to his own house, where he was reared, if not in affluence, at least most virtuously. The boy, who was named Luis after his grandfather, was remarkably handsome, of a sweet docile disposition; and his manners and deportment, even at that tender age, were such as showed him to be the son of some noble father. His grandfather and grandmother were so delighted with his grace, beauty, and good behaviour, that they came at last to regard their daughter's mischance as a happy event, since it had given them such a grandson. When the boy walked through the streets, blessings were showered upon him by all who saw him — blessings upon his beauty, upon the mother that bore him, upon the father that begot him, upon those who brought him up so well. Thus admired by strangers, as well as by all who knew him, he grew up to the age of seven, by which time he could already read Latin and his mother tongue, and write a good round hand; for it was the intention of his grandparents to make him learned and virtuous, since they could not make him rich, learning and virtue being such wealth as thieves cannot steal, or fortune destroy.

One day, when the boy was sent by his grandfather with a message to a relation, he passed along a street in which there was a great concourse of horsemen. He stopped to look at them; and to see them the better, he moved from his position, and crossed the street. In doing so, he was not rapid enough to avoid a fiery horse, which its rider could not pull up in time, and which knocked Luis down, and trampled upon him. The poor child lay senseless on the ground, bleeding profusely from his head. A moment after the accident had happened, an elderly gentleman threw himself from his horse with surprising agility, took the boy out of the arms of a person who had raised him from the ground, and carried him to his own house, bidding his servants go fetch a surgeon.

Many gentlemen followed him, greatly distressed at the sad accident which had befallen the general favourite; for it was soon on everybody's lips that the sufferer was little Luis. The news speedily reached the ears of his grandparents and his supposed cousin, who all hurried in wild dismay to look for their darling. The gentleman who had humanely taken charge of him being of eminent rank, and well known, they easily found their way to his house, and arrived there just as Luis was under the surgeon's hands. The master and mistress begged them not to cry, or raise their voices in lamentation; for it would do the little patient no good. The surgeon, who was an able man, having dressed the wound with great care and skill, saw that it was not so deadly as he had at first supposed. In the midst of the dressing, Luis came to his senses, and was glad to see his relations, who asked him how he felt. "Pretty well," he said, only his head and his body pained him a good deal. The surgeon desired them not to talk to him, but leave him to repose. They did so, and the grandfather then addressed himself to the master of the house, thanking him for the kindness he had shown to his nephew. The gentleman replied that there was nothing to thank him for; the fact being, that when he saw the boy knocked down, his first thought was that he saw under the horses' heels the face of a son of his own, whom he tenderly loved. It was this that impelled him to take the boy up, and carry him to his own house, where he should remain all the time he was in the surgeon's hands, and be treated with all possible care. The lady of the house spoke to the same effect, and with no less kindness and cordiality.

The grandfather and grandmother were surprised at meeting with so much sympathy on the part of strangers; but far greater was the surprise of their daughter, who, on looking round her, after the surgeon's report had somewhat allayed her agitation, plainly perceived that she was in the very room to which she had been carried by her ravisher. The damask hangings were no longer there; but she recognised it by other tokens. She saw the grated window that opened on the garden: it was then closed on account of the little patient; but she asked if there was a garden on the outside, and was answered in the affirmative. The bed she too well remembered was there; and, above all, the cabinet, on which had stood the image she had taken away, was still on the same spot. Finally, to corroborate all the other indications, and confirm the truth of her discovery beyond all question, she counted the steps of the staircase leading from the room to the street, and found the number exactly what she had expected; for she had had the presence of mind to count them on the former occasion, when she descended them blindfold. On her return home, she imparted her discovery to her mother, who immediately made inquiries as to whether the gentleman in whose house her grandson lay ever had a son. She found he had one son, Rodolfo — as we call him — who was then in Italy; and on comparing the time he was said to have been abroad with that which had elapsed since her daughter's ravishment, she found them to agree very closely. She made all this known to her husband; and it was finally settled between the three that they should not move in the matter for the present, but wait till the will of Heaven had declared itself respecting the little patient.

Luis was out of danger in a fortnight; in a month he rose from his bed; and during all that time he was visited daily by his mother and grandmother, and treated by the master and mistress of the house as if he was their own child. Doña Estafania, the kind gentleman's wife, often observed, in conversation with Leocadia, that the boy so strongly resembled a son of hers who was in Italy, she never could look at him without thinking her son was actually before her. One day, when Doña Estafania repeated this remark, no one being present but herself and Leocadia, the latter thought it a good opportunity to open her mind to the lady, in the manner previously concerted between herself and her parents.

"Señora," she said, "when my parents heard of the terrible accident that had befallen their nephew, they felt as if the sky had fallen upon their heads. For them it was losing the light of their eyes, and the staff of their age, to lose their nephew, their love for whom far surpasses that which parents commonly bear towards their sons. But, as the proverb says, with the disease God sends the remedy. The boy found his recovery in this house; and I found in it reminiscences of events I shall never forget as long as I live. I, señora, am noble, for so are my parents, and so were all my ancestors, who, though but moderately endowed with the gifts of fortune, always happily maintained their honour where-ever they lived."

Doña Estafania listened attentively to Leocadia, and was astonished to hear her speak with an intelligence beyond her years, for she did not think her more than twenty; and without interrupting her by a single word, she heard her relate her whole story, how she had been forcibly carried into that chamber, what had been done to her there, and by what tokens she had been able to recognise it again. In confirmation of all this, she drew forth from her bosom the crucifix she had taken away with her, and thus addressed it: "Lord, who wast witness of the violence done to me, be thou the judge of the amends which are my due. I took thee from off this cabinet, that I might continually remind thee of my wrong, not in order to pray to thee for vengeance, which I do not invoke, but to beseech thee to inspire me with some counsel which may enable me to bear it with patience." Then turning to Doña Estafania, "This boy, señora," she said, "towards whom you have manifested the extreme of your great kindness and compassion, is your own grandson. It was by the merciful providence of Heaven that he was run over, in order that being taken to your house, I should find him in it, as I hope to find there, if not the remedy most appropriate to my misfortune, at least the means of alleviating it." Thus saying, and pressing the crucifix to her breast, she fell fainting into the arms of Doña Estafania, who as a gentlewoman, to whose sex pity is as natural as cruelty is to man, instantly pressed her lips to those of the fainting girl, shedding over her so many tears that there needed no other sprinkling of water to recover Leocadia from her swoon.

Whilst the two were in this situation, Doña Estafania's husband entered the room, leading little Luis by the hand. On seeing his wife all in tears, and Leocadia fainting, he eagerly inquired the cause of so startling a spectacle. The boy having embraced his mother, calling her his cousin, and his grandmother, calling her his benefactress, repeated his grandfather's question. "I have great things to tell you, señor," said Doña Estafania to her husband, "the cream and substance of which is this: the fainting girl before you is your daughter, and that boy is your grandson. This truth which I have learned from her lips is confirmed by his face, in which we have both beheld that of our son."

"Unless you speak more fully, señora, I cannot understand you," replied her husband.

Just then Leocadia came to herself, and embracing the cross seemed changed into a sea of tears, and the gentleman remained in utter bewilderment, until his wife had repeated to him, from beginning to end, Leocadia's whole story; and he believed it, through the blessed dispensation of Heaven, which had confirmed it by so many convincing testimonies. He embraced and comforted Leocadia, kissed his grandson, and that same day he despatched a courier to Naples, with a letter to his son, requiring him to come home instantly, for his mother and he had concluded a suitable match for him with a very beautiful lady. They would not allow Leocadia and her son to return any more to the house of her parents, who, overjoyed at her good fortune, gave thanks for it to Heaven with all their hearts.

The courier arrived at Naples; and Rodolfo, eager to become possessed of so beautiful a wife as his father had described, took advantage of the opportunity offered by four galleys which were ready to sail for Spain; and two days after the receipt of the letter he embarked with his two comrades, who were still with him. After a prosperous run of twelve days, he reached Barcelona, whence he posted in seven to Toledo, and entered his father's house, dressed in the very extreme of fashionable bravery. His parents were beyond measure rejoiced at his safe arrival, after so long an absence; and Leocadia was filled with indescribable emotions, as she beheld him, herself unseen, from a secret place in which she had been stationed by Doña Estafania's contrivance. Rodolfo's two comrades proposed to take leave of him at once, and retire to their own homes; but Estafania would not suffer them to depart, for their presence was needful for the execution of a scheme she had in her head.

It was nearly night when Rodolfo arrived; and whilst preparations were making for supper, Estafania took her son's companions aside, believing that they were two of the three whom Leocadia mentioned as having been with Rodolfo on the night of her abduction. She earnestly entreated them to tell her, if they remembered that her son had carried off a young woman, on such a night, so many years ago; for the honour and the peace of mind of all his relations depended on their knowing the truth of that matter. So persuasive were her entreaties, and so strong her assurances that no harm whatever could result to them from the information she sought, they were induced to confess that one summer's night, the same she had mentioned, themselves and another friend being out on a stroll with Rodolfo, they had been concerned in the abduction of a girl whom Rodolfo carried off, whilst the rest of them detained her family, who made a great outcry, and would have defended her if they could. They added that Rodolfo told them, on the following day, that he had carried the girl to his own apartment; and this was all they knew of the matter.

All doubts which could possibly have remained on the case having been removed by this confession, Estafania determined to pursue her scheme. Shortly before supper she took her son in private into a room, where she put the portrait of a lady into his hands, saying, "Here is something to give you an appetite for your supper, Rodolfo; this is the portrait of your bride; but I must tell you that what she wants in beauty is more than made up for in virtue. She is of good family, and tolerably wealthy; and since your father and I have made choice of her, you may be assured she will suit you very well."

"Well," said Rodolfo, staring at the portrait, "if the painter of this portrait has flattered the original as much as painters usually do, then beyond all doubt the lady must be the very incarnation of ugliness. Truly, my lady mother, if it is just and right that sons should obey their parents in all things, it is no less proper that parents should have regard to the inclinations of their sons; and since matrimony is a bond not to be loosed till death, they ought to take care that it shall press as smoothly and equably as possible. Virtue, good birth, prudence, and the gifts of fortune, are all very good things, and may well gladden the heart of whoever may have the lot to obtain this lady for a wife; but that her ugliness can ever gladden the eyes of her spouse, appears to me an impossibility. I am a bachelor to be sure, but I perfectly comprehend the coincidence there should be between the sacrament of marriage and the just and due delight mutually enjoyed by the married pair, and that if that be wanting, the object of marriage is frustrated; for to imagine that an ugly face which one must have before his eyes at all hours, in the hall, at table, and in bed, I say once more that is impossible. For God's sake, my lady mother, give me a wife who would be an agreeable companion, not one who will disgust me, so that we may both bear evenly, and with mutual goodwill, the yoke imposed on us by Heaven, instead of pulling this way and that way, and fretting each other to death. If this lady is well-born, discreet, and rich as you say, she will easily find a husband of a different humour from mine. Some look for noble blood in a wife, some for understanding, others for money, and others again for beauty, and of the latter class I am one. As for high birth, thank Heaven and my ancestors I am well enough off in that respect; as for understanding, provided a woman is neither a dolt nor a simpleton, there is no need of her having a very subtle wit; in point of wealth, I am amply provided by my parents; but beauty is what I covet, with no other addition than virtue and good breeding. If my wife brings me this, I will thank Heaven for the gift, and make my parents happy in their old age."

Estafania was delighted to hear Rodolfo speak thus, for the sentiments he expressed were just such as best accorded with the success of the scheme she had in hand. She told him that she would endeavour to marry him in conformity with his inclination, and that he need not make himself uneasy, for there would be no difficulty in breaking off the match which seemed so distasteful to him. Rodolfo thanked her, and supper being ready they went to join the rest of the party at table. The father and mother, Rodolfo and his two companions had already seated themselves, when Doña Estafania said, in an off-hand way, "Sinner that I am, how well I behave to my guest! Go," she said to a servant, "and ask the señora. Doña Leocadia to honour our table with her presence, and tell her she need not stand on any punctilio, for all here are my sons and her servants." All this was part of her scheme, with the whole of which Leocadia had been previously made acquainted.

The lady soon appeared, presenting a most charming spectacle of perfect beauty, set off by the most appropriate adornments. The season being winter, she was dressed in a robe and train of black velvet, with gold and pearl buttons; her girdle and necklace were of diamonds; her head was uncovered, and the shining braids and ringlets of her thick chestnut hair, spangled with diamonds, dazzled the eyes of the beholders. Her bearing was graceful and animated; she led her son by the hand, and before her walked two maids with wax-lights and silver candlesticks. All rose to do her reverence, as if something from heaven had miraculously appeared before them; but gazing on her, entranced with admiration, not one of them was able to address a single word to her. Leocadia bowed to them all with courteous dignity, and Estafania taking her by the hand led her to a seat next herself and opposite to Rodolfo, whilst the boy was seated beside his grandfather. "Ah," said Rodolfo to himself, as he gazed on the lovely being before him, "could I find but half that beauty in the wife my mother has chosen for me, I should think myself the happiest man in the world. Good God! what is it I behold? Is it some angel in human shape that sits before me?" Whilst his eyes were thus making his soul captive to the lovely image of Leocadia, she, on the other hand, finding herself so near to him who was dearer to her than the light of those eyes with which she furtively glanced at him from time to time, began to revolve in her mind what had passed between her and Rodolfo. The hopes her mother had given her of being his wife began to droop, and the fear came strong upon her that such bliss was not for one so luckless as herself. She reflected how near she stood to the crisis which was to determine whether she was to be blessed or unhappy for ever, and racked by the intensity of her emotions, she suddenly changed colour, her head dropped, and she fell forward in a swoon into the arms of the dismayed Estafania.

The whole party sprang up in alarm and hastened to her assistance, but no one showed more earnest sympathy than Rodolfo, who fell twice in his haste to reach her. They unlaced her, and sprinkled her face with cold water; but far from coming to her senses, the fulness of her congested bosom, her total insensibility, and the absence of all pulse gave such mortal indications, that the servants began imprudently to cry out that she was dead. This shocking news reached the ears of her parents, whom Doña Estafania had concealed in another room that they might make their appearance at the right moment. They now rushed into the supper room, and the parish priest, who was also with them, went up to the prostrate lady to see if she could by any signs make known that she repented of her sins in order that he might give her absolution; but instead of one fainting person he found two, for Rodolfo lay with his face on Leocadia's bosom. His mother had left her to him as being her destined protector; but when she saw that he too was insensible, she was near making a third, and would have done so had he not come to himself. He was greatly confused at finding that he had betrayed such emotion; but his mother, who guessed his thoughts, said to him, "Do not be ashamed, my son, at having been so overcome by your feelings; you would have been so still more had you known what I will no longer conceal from you, though I had intended to reserve it for a more joyful occasion. Know then, son of my heart, that this fainting lady is your real bride: I say real, because she is the one whom your father and I have chosen for you, and the portrait was a pretence.”

When Rodolfo heard this, carried away by the vehemence of his passion, and on the strength of his title as a bridegroom disdaining all conventional proprieties, he clasped Leocadia in his arms, and with his lips pressed to hers, seemed as if he was waiting for her soul to issue forth that he might absorb and mingle it with his own. Just at the moment when the tears of the pitying beholders flowed fastest, and their ejaculations were most expressive of despair, Leocadia gave signs of recovery, and brought back gladness to the hearts of all. When she came to her senses, and, blushing to find herself in Rodolfo’s arms, would have disengaged herself, “No, señora,” he said, “that must not be; strive not to withdraw from the arms of him who holds you in his soul.” There needed no more than these words to complete her revival; and Doña Estafania having no further need of stratagem, requested the priest to marry her son to Leocadia on the spot. This was done; for the event took place at a time when the consent of the parties was sufficient for the celebration of a marriage, without any of the preliminary formalities which are now so properly required. I leave it to a more ingenious pen than mine to describe the gladness of all present; the embraces bestowed on Rodolfo by Leocadia’s parents; the thanks they offered to Heaven, and to his father and mother; the congratulations on both sides; the astonishment of Rodolfo’s companions who saw him so unexpectedly married to so charming a bride on the very night of his arrival; and above all, when they learned from the statement openly made by Doña Estafania, that Leocadia was the very person whose abduction her son had effected with their aid. Nor was Rodolfo less surprised than they; and the better to assure himself of so wonderful a fact, he begged Leocadia to give him some token which should make perfectly clear to him that which indeed he did not doubt, since it was authenticated by his parents.

“Once when I recovered from a swoon,” replied Leocadia, “I found myself, señor, in your arms without honour; but for that I have had full compensation, since on my recovery from my this day’s swoon I found myself in the same arms, but honoured. If this is not enough for you, let it suffice to mention a crucifix which no one could have purloined from you but myself, if it be true that you missed it in the morning, and that it is the same that is now in the hands of your mother, my lady.”

“You are mine, the lady of my soul, and shall be so as long as God grants me life,” cried Rodolfo; embracing her again, amidst a fresh shower of benedictions and congratulations from the rest of the party.

At last they sat down to a merry supper to the sound of music, for the performers, who had been previously engaged, were now arrived. Rodolfo saw his own likeness in his son's face as in a mirror. The four grandparents wept for joy: there was not a corner of the house but was full of gladness; and though night was hurrying on with her swift black wings, it seemed to Rodolfo that she did not fly, but hobble on crutches, so great was his impatience to be alone with his beloved bride. The longed-for hour came at last: every one retired to rest: the whole house was buried in silence; but not so shall be the truth of this story, which will be kept alive in the memory of men by the many children and descendants of that illustrious house in Toledo, where that happy pair still live, and have, for many prosperous years, enjoyed the society of each other, their children, and their grandchildren, by the blessing of Heaven, and through the force of that blood which was seen shed on the ground by the valorous, illustrious, and Christian grandfather of the little Luis.

THE JEALOUS ESTRAMADURAN.

Not many years ago there issued from a town in Estramadura a hidalgo nobly born, who, like another prodigal son, went about various parts of Spain, Italy, and Flanders, squandering his years and his wealth. At last, after long peregrinations, his parents being dead and his fortune spent, he made his appearance in the great city of Seville, where he found abundant opportunity to get rid of the little he had left. Finding himself then so bare of money, and not better provided with friends, he adopted the remedy to which many a spendthrift in that city has recourse; that is, to betake themselves to the Indies, the refuge of the despairing sons of Spain, the church of the homeless, the asylum of homicides, the haven of gamblers and cheats, the general receptacle for loose women, the common centre of attraction for many, but effectual resource of very few. A fleet being about to sail for Tierrafirma, he agreed with the admiral for a passage, got ready his sea-stores and his shroud of Spanish grass cloth, and embarking at Cadiz, gave his benediction to Spain, intending never to see it again. The fleet slipped from its moorings, and, amidst the general glee of its living freight, the sails were spread to the soft and prosperous gale, which soon wafted them out of sight of land into the wide domains of the great father of waters, the ocean.

Our passenger now became very thoughtful, revolving in his memory the many and various dangers he had passed in the years of his peregrinations, and the thriftless conduct he had pursued all his life long. The result of the account to which he thus called himself was a firm resolution to change his way of life, to keep a much better hold of whatever wealth God might yet be pleased to bestow upon him, and to behave with more reserve towards women than he had hitherto done.

The fleet was nearly becalmed whilst the mind of Felipe de Carrizales was actuated by these reflections. The wind soon after rose and became so boisterous that Carrizales had enough to do to keep on his legs, and was obliged to leave off his meditations, and concern himself only with the affairs of his voyage. It was so prosperous that they arrived without check or accident at the port of Cartagena. To shorten the introduction of my narrative and avoid all irrelevant matter, I content myself with saying that Felipe was about eight-and-forty years of age when he went to the Indies, and that in the twenty years he remained there he succeeded, by dint of industry and thrift, in amassing more than a hundred and fifty thousand crowns. Seeing himself once more rich and prosperous, he was moved by the natural desire, which all men experience, to return to his native country. Rejecting therefore great opportunities for profit which presented themselves to him, he quitted Peru, where he had amassed his wealth, turned all his money into ingots, and putting it on board a registered ship, to avoid accidents, returned to Spain, landed at San Lucar, and arrived at Seville, loaded alike with years and riches.

Having placed his property in safety, he went in search of his friends, and found they were all dead. He then thought of retiring to his native place, and ending his days there, although he had ascertained that death had not left him one survivor of his kindred; and if, when he went to the Indies poor and needy, he had no rest from the thoughts that distracted him in the midst of the wide ocean, he was now no less assailed by care, but from a different cause. Formerly his poverty would not let him sleep, and now his wealth disturbed his rest; for riches are as heavy a burden to one who is not used to them, or knows not how to employ them, as indigence to one who is continually under its pressure. Money and the want of it alike bring care; but in the one case the acquisition of a moderate quantity affords a remedy; the other case grows worse by further acquisition. Carrizales contemplated his ingots with anxiety, not as a miser, for, during the few years he had been a soldier, he had learned to be liberal; but from not knowing what to do with them; for to hoard them was unprofitable, and keeping them in his house was offering a temptation to thieves. On the other hand, all inclination for resuming the anxious life of traffic had died out in him, and at his time of life his actual wealth was more than enough for the rest of his days. He would fain have spent them in his native place, put out his money there to interest, and passed his old age in peace and quiet, giving what he could to God, since he had given more than he ought to the world. He considered, however, that the penury of his native place was great, the inhabitants very needy, and that to go and live there would be to offer himself as a mark for all the importunities with which the poor usually harass a rich neighbour, especially when there is only one in the place to whom they can have recourse in their distress.

He wanted some one to whom he might leave his property after his death, and with that view, taking measure of the vigour of his constitution, he concluded that he was not yet too old to bear the burthen of matrimony. But immediately on conceiving this notion, he was seized with such a terrible fear as scattered it like a mist before the wind. He was naturally the most jealous man in the world, even without being married, and the mere thought of taking a wife called up such horrible spectres before his imagination that he resolved by all means to remain a bachelor.

That point was settled; but it was not yet settled what he should do with the rest of his life, when it chanced that, passing one day through a street, he looked up and saw at a window a young girl apparently about thirteen or fourteen, with a face so very handsome and so very pleasing in its expression, that poor old Carrizales was vanquished at once, and surrendered without an effort to the charms of the beautiful Leonora, for that was the girl's name. Without more ado, he began to string together a long train of arguments to the following effect:—"This girl is very handsome, and to judge from the appearance of the house, her parents cannot be rich. She is almost a child too; assuredly a wife of her age could not give a husband any uneasiness. Let me see: say that I marry her; I will keep her close at home, I will train her up to my own hand, and so fashion her to my wishes that she will never have a thought beyond them! I am not so old but that I may yet hope to have children to inherit my wealth. Whether she brings me any dower or not is a matter of no consideration, since Heaven has given me enough for both, and rich people should not look for money with a wife, but for enjoyment, for that prolongs life, whereas jarring discontent between married people makes it wear out faster than it would do otherwise. So be it then; the die is cast, and this is the wife whom heaven destines me to have."

Having thus soliloquised, not once but a hundred times on that day, and the two or three following, Carrizales had an interview with Leonora's parents, and found that, although poor, they were persons of good birth. He made known his intention to them, acquainted them with his condition and fortune, and begged them very earnestly to bestow their daughter upon him in marriage. They required time to consider his proposal, and to give him also an opportunity to satisfy himself that their birth and quality was such as they had stated.

The parties took leave of each other, made the necessary inquiries, found them satisfactory on both sides, and finally Leonora was betrothed to Carrizales, who settled upon her twenty thousand ducats, so hotly enamoured was the jealous old bridegroom. But no sooner had he pronounced the conjugal "yes," than he was all at once assailed by a host of rabid fancies; he began to tremble without cause and to find his cares and anxieties come thicker and faster upon him than ever. The first proof he gave of his jealous temper was, in resolving that no tailor should take measure of his betrothed for any of the many wedding garments he intended to present her. Accordingly, he went about looking for some other woman, who might be nearly of the same height and figure as Leonora. He found a poor woman, who seemed suitable for his purpose, and having had a gown made to her measure, he tried it on his betrothed, found that it fitted well, and gave orders that it should serve as a pattern for all the other dresses, which were so many and so rich that the bride's parents thought themselves fortunate beyond measure, in having obtained for themselves and their daughter a son-in-law and a husband so nobly munificent. As for Leonora, she was at her wit's end with amazement at the sight of such gorgeous finery, for the best she had ever worn in her life had been but a serge petticoat and a silk jacket.

The second proof of jealousy given by Felipe was, that he would not consummate his marriage until he had provided a house after his own fancy, which he arranged in this singular manner. He bought one for twelve thousand ducats, in one of the best wards of the city, with a fountain and pond, and a garden well stocked with orange trees. He put screens before all the windows that looked towards the street, leaving them no other prospect than the sky, and did much the same with all the others in the house. In the gateway next the street, he erected a stable for a mule, and over it a straw loft, and a room for an old black eunuch, who was to take care of the mule. He raised the parapets round the flat roof of the house so high, that nothing could be seen above them but the sky, and that only by turning one's face upwards. In the inner door, opening from the gateway upon the quadrangle, he fixed a turning box like that of a convent, by means of which articles were to be received from without. He furnished the house in a sumptuous style, such as would have become the mansion of a great lord; and he bought four white slave girls, whom he branded in the face, and two negresses. For the daily supplies of his establishment he engaged a purveyor, who was to make all the necessary purchases, but was not to sleep in the house or ever enter it further than to the second door, where he was to deposit what he had brought in the turning box. Having made these arrangements, Carrizales invested part of his money in sundry good securities; part he placed in the bank, and the rest he kept by him to meet any emergencies that might arise. He also had a master key made for his whole house; and he laid up a whole year's store of all such things as it is usual to purchase in bulk at their respective seasons; and everything being now ready to his mind, he went to his father-in-law's house and claimed his bride, whom her parents delivered up to him with no few tears, for it seemed to them as if they were giving her up for burial.

Leonora knew not, poor young creature, what was before her, but she shed tears because she saw her parents weep, and taking leave of them with their blessing, she went to her new home, her husband leading her by the hand, and her slaves and servants attending her. On their arrival Carrizales harangued all his domestics, enjoining them to keep careful watch over Leonora, and by no means, on any pretence whatsoever, to allow anybody to enter within the second gate, not even the black eunuch. But the person whom above all others he charged with the safe keeping and due entertainment of his wife was a dueña of much prudence and gravity, whom he had taken to be Leonora's monitress, and superintendent of the whole house, and to command the slaves and two other maidens of Leonora's age whom he had also added to his family, that his wife might not be without companions of her own years. He promised them all that he would treat them so well, and take such care for their comfort and gratification, that they should not feel their confinement, and that on holidays they should every one of them without exception be allowed to go to mass; but so early in the morning that daylight itself should scarcely have a chance of seeing them. The servant maids and the slaves promised to obey all his orders cheerfully and with prompt alacrity and the bride, with a timid shrinking of her shoulders, bowed her head, and said that she had no other will than that of her lord and spouse, to whom she always owed obedience.

Having thus laid down the law for the government of his household, the worthy Estramaduran began to enjoy, as well as he could, the fruits of matrimony, which, to Leonora's inexperienced taste, were neither sweet-flavoured nor insipid. Her days were spent with her dueña, her damsels, and her slaves, who, to make the time pass more agreeably, took to pampering their palates, and few days passed in which they did not make lots of things in which they consumed a great deal of honey and sugar. Their master gladly supplied them with all they could wish for in that way without stint, for by that means he expected to keep them occupied and amused, so that they should have no time to think of their confinement and seclusion. Leonora lived on a footing of equality with her domestics, amused herself as they did, and even in her simplicity took pleasure in dressing dolls and other childish pastime. All this afforded infinite satisfaction to the jealous husband; it seemed to him that he had chosen the best way of life imaginable, and that it was not within the compass of human art or malice to trouble his repose: accordingly his whole care was devoted to anticipating his wife's wishes by all sorts of presents, and encouraging her to ask for whatever came into her head, for in everything it should be his pleasure to gratify her.

On the days she went to mass, which as we have said was before daylight, her parents attended at church and talked with their daughter in presence of her husband, who made them such liberal gifts as mitigated the keenness of their compassion for the secluded life led by their daughter. Carrizales used to get up in the morning and watch for the arrival of the purveyor, who was always made aware of what was wanted for the day by means of a note placed over-night in the turning box. After the purveyor had come and gone, Carrizales used to go abroad, generally on foot, locking both entrance doors behind him — that next the street, and that which opened on the quadrangle, — and leaving the negro shut up between them. Having despatched his business, which was not much, he speedily returned, shut himself up in his house, and occupied himself in making much of his wife and her handmaids, who all liked him for his placid and agreeable humour, and above all for his great liberality towards them. In this way they passed a year of novitiate, and made profession of that manner of life, resolved every one of them to continue in it to the end of their days; and so it would have been, if the crafty perturber of the human race had not brought their chaste purposes to nought, as you shall presently hear.

Now, I ask the most long-headed and wary of my readers, what more could old Felipe have done in the way of taking precautions for his security, since he would not even allow that there should be any male animal within his dwelling? No tom-cat ever persecuted its rats, nor was the barking of a dog ever heard within its walls; all creatures belonging to it were of the feminine gender. He took thought by day, and by night he did not sleep; he was himself the patrol and sentinel of his house, and the Argus of what he held dear. Never did a man set foot within the quadrangle; he transacted his business with his friends in the street; the pictures that adorned his rooms were all female figures, flowers, or landscapes; his whole dwelling breathed an odour of propriety, seclusion, and circumspection; the very tales which the maid servants told by the fireside in the long winter nights, being told in his presence, were perfectly free from the least tinge of wantonness. Her aged spouse's silver hairs seemed in Leonora's eyes locks of pure gold; for the first love known by maidens imprints itself on their hearts like a seal on melted wax. His inordinate watchfulness seemed to her no more than the due caution of an experienced and judicious man. She was fully persuaded that the life she led was the same as that led by all married women. Her thoughts never wandered beyond the walls of her dwelling, nor had she a wish that was not the same as her husband's. It was only on the days she went to mass that she set eyes on the streets, and that was so early in the morning, that except on the way home she had not light to look about her. Never was there seen a convent more closely barred and bolted; never were nuns kept more recluse, or golden apples better guarded; and yet for all his precautions poor Felipe could not help falling into the pit he dreaded, — or at least believing that he had so fallen.

There is in Seville an idle pleasure-seeking class of people who are commonly called men on town, a sauntering, sprucely dressed, mellifluous race, always finding means to make, themselves welcome at rich men's feasts. Of these people, their manners and customs, and the laws they observe among themselves, I should have much to say, but abstain from it for good reasons. One of these gallants, a bachelor, — or a virote, as such persons are called in their jargon, the newly married being styled matones, — took notice of the house of Carrizales, and seeing it always shut close, he was curious to know who lived there. He set about this inquiry with such ardour and ingenuity, that he failed not to obtain all the information he desired. He learned the character and habits of the old man, the beauty of Leonora, and the singular method adopted by her husband in order to keep her safe. All this inflamed him with desire to see if it would not be possible, by force or stratagem, to effect the reduction of so well-guarded a fortress. He imparted his thoughts to three of his friends, and they all agreed that he should go to work, for in such an enterprise no one lacks counsellors to aid and abet him. At first they were at a loss how to set about so difficult an exploit; but after many consultations they agreed upon the following plan: — Loaysa (so the virote was named) disappeared from among his friends, giving out that he was leaving Seville for some time. Then drawing on a pair of linen drawers and a clean shirt, he put over them a suit of clothes so torn and patched, that the poorest beggar in the city would have disdained to wear such rags. He shaved off the little beard he had, covered one of his eyes with a plaster, tied up one of his legs, and hobbling along on two crutches, appeared so completely metamorphosed into a lame beggar, that no real cripple could have looked less of a counterfeit than he.

In this guise he posted himself closely at the hour of evening prayer before the door of Carrizales' house, which was fast shut, and Luis the negro locked up between the two doors. Having taken up his position there, Loaysa produced a greasy guitar, wanting some of its strings, and as he was something of a musician, he began to play a few lovely airs, and to sing Moorish ballads in a feigned voice, with so much expression that all who were passing through the street stopped to listen. The boys all made a ring round him when he sang, and Luis the negro, enchanted by the virote's music, would have given one of his hands to be able to open the door, and listen to him more at his ease, such is the fondness for music inherent in the negro race. When Loaysa wanted to get rid of his audience, he had only to cease singing, put up his guitar, and hobble away on his crutches.

Loaysa four or five times repeated this serenade to the negro, for whose sake alone he played and sang, thinking that the way to succeed in his sap and siege was to begin by making sure of old Luis; nor was his expectation disappointed. One night when he had taken his place as usual before the door, and had begun to time his guitar, perceiving that the negro was already on the alert, he put his lips to the key-hole and whispered, "Can you give me a drop of water, Luis? I am dying with thirst, and can't sing."

“No,” said the negro, “for I have not the key of this door, and there is no hole through which I can give you drink.”

“Who keeps the key, then?”

“My master, who is the most jealous man in the world; and if he knew that I was now talking here with any one, it were pity of my life. But who are you who ask me for water?”

“I am a poor cripple, who get my bread by asking alms of all good people in God’s name; besides which I teach the guitar to some moriscoes, and other poor people. Among my pupils I have three negroes, slaves to three aldermen, whom I have taught so well that they are fit to sing and play at dance or in any tavern, and they have paid me for it very well indeed.”

“A deal better would I pay you to have the opportunity of taking lessons; but it is not possible, for when my master goes out in the morning he locks the door behind him, and he does the same when he comes in, leaving me shut up between two doors.”

“I vow to God, Luis, if you would only contrive to let me in a few nights to give you lessons, in less than a fortnight I would make you such a dabster at the guitar, that you need not be ashamed to play at any street corner; for I would have you to know that I have an extraordinary knack in teaching; moreover, I have heard tell that you have a very promising capacity, and from what I can judge from the tone of your voice, you must sing very well.”

“I don’t sing; badly; but what good is that since I don’t know any tunes, except the ‘Star of Venus,’ or, ‘In the green meadow,’ or the tune that is now so much in vogue, ‘Clinging to her grated window, with a trembling hand?’”

“All these are moonshine to what I could teach you, for I know all the ballads of the Moor Abendaraez, with those of his lady Xarifa, and all those comprising the history of the grand sofi Tomunibeyo, and the divine sarabands which enchant the souls of the Portuguese themselves, among whom they are most in vogue; and all these I teach by such methods and with such facility, that almost before you have swallowed three or four bushels of salt, you will find yourself an out-and-out performer in every kind of guitar music.”

“What’s the good of all that,” (here the negro sighed heavily,) “since I can’t get you into the house?”

“There’s a remedy for all things: contrive to take the keys from your master, and I will give you a piece of wax, with which you may take an impression of the wards, for I have taken such a liking to you, I will get a locksmith, a friend of mine, to make new keys, and then I can come in at night and teach you to play better than Prester John in the Indies. It is a thousand pities that a voice like yours should be lost for want of the accompaniment of the guitar; for I would have you to know, brother Luis, that the finest voice in the world loses its perfection when it is not accompanied by some instrument, be it guitar or harpsichord, organ or harp; but the instrument that will suit your voice best is the guitar, because it is the handiest and the least costly of all.”

“All that is very good; but the thing can’t be done, for I never get hold of the keys, nor does my master ever let them out of his keeping; day and night they sleep under his pillow.”

“Well, then, there’s another thing you may do, if so be you have made up a mind to be a first-rate musician; if you haven’t, I need not bother myself with advising you.”

“Have a mind, do you say? Ay, and to that degree that there is nothing I wouldn’t do, if it were possible anyhow, for sake of being able to play music.”

“Well, if that’s the case, you have only to scrape away a little mortar from the gate-post near the hinge, and I will give you, through that opening, a pair of pincers and a hammer, with which you may by night draw out the nails of the staple, and we can easily put that to rights again, so that no one will ever suspect that the lock was opened. Once shut up with you in your loft, or wherever you sleep, I will go to work in such style that you will turn out even better than I said, to my own personal advantage, and to the increase of your accomplishments. You need not give yourself any concern about what we shall have to eat. I will bring enough to last us both for more than a week, for I have pupils who will not let me be pinched.”

“As for that matter we are all right; for with what my master allows me, and the leavings brought me by the slave-girls, we should have enough for two more besides ourselves. Only bring the hammer and pincers, and I will make an opening close to the hinge, through which you may pass them in, and I will stop it up again with mud. I will take the fastenings out of the lock, and even should it be necessary to give some loud knocks, my master sleeps so far off from this gate, that it must be either a miracle or our extraordinary ill luck if he hears them.”

“Well, then, with the blessing of God, friend Luis, in two days from this time you shall have everything necessary for the execution of your laudable purpose. Meanwhile, take care not to eat such things as are apt to make phlegm, for they do the voice no good, but a deal of harm.”

“Nothing makes me so hoarse so much as wine, but I would not give it up for all the voices above ground.”

“Don’t think I would have you do so; God forbid! Drink, Luis my boy, drink; and much good may it do you, for wine drunk in measure never did any one harm.”

“I always drink in measure. I have a jug here that holds exactly three pints and a half. The girls fill this for me unknown to my master, and the purveyor brings me on the sly a bottle holding a good gallon, which makes up for the deficiency of the jug.”

“That’s the way to live, my boy, for a dry throat can neither grunt nor sing.”

“Well, go your ways now, and God be with you; but don’t forget to come and sing here every night until such time as you bring the tools for getting you within doors. My fingers itch to be at the guitar.”

“I’ll come, never fear, and I’ll bring some new tunes too.”

“Ay, do; but before you go away now, sing me something that I may go to sleep pleasantly; and for the matter of payment, be it known to the señor pobre that I will be more liberal than many a rich man.”

“Oh, I ain’t uneasy on that score. If you think I teach you well, I will leave it to yourself to pay me accordingly. And now I’ll just sing you one song, but when I am inside you will see wonders.”

Here ended this long dialogue, and Loaysa sang a sprightly ditty with such good effect, that the negro was in ecstasies, and felt as if the time for opening the door would never arrive.

Having finished his song, Loaysa took his departure, and set off at a rounder pace than might have been expected of a man on crutches, to report to his friends what a good beginning he had made. He told them what he had concerted with the negro, and the following day they procured tools of the right sort, fit to break any fastening as if it was made of straw. The virote failed not to serenade the negro, nor the latter to scrape at the gate-post till he had made a sufficiently wide hole, which he plastered up so well, that no one could perceive it unless he searched for it on purpose. On the second night Loaysa passed in the tools, Luis went to work with them, whipped off the staple in a trice, opened the door, and let in his Orpheus. Great was his surprise to see him on his two crutches, with such a distorted leg, and in such a tattered plight. Loaysa did not wear the patch over his eye, for it was not necessary, and as soon as he entered he embraced his pupil, kissed him on the cheek, and immediately put into his hand a big jar of wine, a box of preserves, and other sweet things, with which his wallet was well stored. Then throwing aside his crutches, he began to cut capers, as if nothing ailed him, to the still greater amazement of the negro.

“You must know, brother Luis,” said Loaysa, “that my lameness does not come of natural infirmity, but from my own ingenious contrivance, whereby I get my bread, asking alms for the love of God. In this way, and with the help of my music, I lead the merriest life in the world, where others, with less cleverness and good management, would be starved to death. Of this you will be convinced in the course of our friendship.”

“We shall see,” said the negro; “but now let us put this staple back in its place, so that it may not appear that it has been moved.”

“Very good,” said Loaysa, and taking out some nails from his wallet, he soon made the lock seem as secure as ever, to the great satisfaction of the negro, who, taking him at once to his loft, made him as comfortable there as he could. Luis lighted a lamp; Loaysa took up his guitar, and began to strike the chords softly and sweetly, so that the poor negro was transported with delight. After he had played awhile, he drew forth a fresh supply of good things for a collation, which they partook of together, and the pupil applied himself so earnestly to the bottle that it took away his senses still more than the music had done. Supper over, Loaysa proposed that Luis should take his first lesson at once; and though the poor negro was too much fuddled to distinguish one string from another, Loaysa made him believe that he had already learnt at least two notes. So persuaded was the poor fellow of this, that he did nothing all night but jangle and strum away. They had but a short sleep that night. In the morning, just on the strike of six, Carrizales came down, opened both entrance doors, and stood waiting for the purveyor, who came soon afterwards; and after depositing the day’s supplies in the turning-box, called the negro down to receive his ration and oats for the mule. After the purveyor was gone, old Carrizales went out, locking both doors after him, without having seen what had been done to the lock of one of them, whereat both master and pupil rejoiced not a little.

No sooner was the master of the house gone, than the negro laid hold on the guitar, and began to scrape it in such a manner, that all the servant maids came to the second door, and asked him, through the turning-box, “What is this, Luis? How long have you had a guitar? Who gave it you?”

“Who gave it me? The best musician in the world, and one who is to teach me in six days more than six thousand tunes!”

“Where is he, this musician?” said the dueña.

“He is not far off,” replied the negro; “and if it were not for fear of my master, perhaps I would tell you where at once, and I warrant you would be glad to see him.”

“But where can he be for us to see him,” returned the dueña, “since no one but our master ever enters this house?”

“I will not tell you any more about the matter till you have heard what I can do, and how much he has taught me in this short time.”

“By my troth, unless he is a demon who has taught you, I don’t know how you can have become a musician all at once.”

“Stop a bit and you shall hear him, and mayhap you will see him too some day.”

“That can’t be,” said another of the women, “for there are no windows on the street through which we could hear or see anybody.”

“Never mind” said the negro; “there’s a remedy for everything but death. If you only could or would keep silence— “

“Keep silence! Ay that we will, brother Luis, as if we were born dumb. I give you my word, friend, I am dying to hear a good voice, for ever since we have been shut up here we have not even heard the birds sing.”

Loaysa listened with great inward glee to this conversation, which showed how readily the women were taking the very bent he would have given them. The negro was afraid lest his master should return and catch him talking with them; but they would not go away until he had promised that, when they least expected it, he would call them to hear a capital voice. He then retreated to his loft, where he would gladly have resumed his lessons, but durst not do so by day for fear of detection. His master returned soon after and went into the house, locking both doors behind him as usual. When Luis went that day to the turning-box for his victuals, he told the negress, who brought them, to let her fellow-servants know that when their master was asleep that night, they should all of them come down to the turning-box, when he would be sure to give them the treat he had promised. He was enabled to say so much, having previously entreated his music-master to condescend to sing and play that night before the inner door for the amusement of the women. The maestro suffered himself to be pressed very hard to do the thing he most desired, but after much seeming reluctance he at last yielded to the solicitations of his esteemed pupil, and said he would be happy to oblige him. The negro embraced him cordially, in testimony of his grateful sense of the promised favour, and treated him that day to as good cheer as he could possibly have had at home, or perhaps better.

Towards midnight Luis knew, by the signals cautiously given at the turning-box, that the women were all there; whereupon he and Loaysa went down from the loft with the guitar, complete in all its strings and well tuned. The maestro asked how many were there to hear him, and was told that all the women in the house were there, except their lady, who was in bed with her husband. This was not what Loaysa wished for, nevertheless, by way of making a beginning and obliging his pupil, he touched the guitar softly, and drew from it such tones as ravished the ears of his audience. But who could describe the delight of the women when he sang Pesame de ello, and followed it up with the magic strains of the saraband, then new in Spain? There was not one of them that did not keep time to the music as if she were dancing like mad, but all noiselessly and with extreme caution, keeping scouts on the watch to warn them if the old man awoke. Loaysa finally played them several seguidillas, and so put the climax to his success, that they all eagerly begged the negro to tell them who was this marvellous musician. Luis replied that he was a poor beggar, but the most gallant and genteel man in all the back slums of Seville. They conjured the negro to contrive some means that they might see him, and not to let him quit the house for a fortnight, for they would take care to supply him with the best of good cheer, and plenty of it. They were curious to know how Luis had managed to get him into the house; but to this the negro made no reply. For the rest he told them that if they wanted to see the maestro, they might bore a small hole in the turning-box and afterwards stop it up with wax; and that as for keeping him in the house, he would do his best.

Loaysa then addressed them, and offered them his services in such obliging and polite terms, that they were sure such fine language never came out of the head of a poor beggar. They entreated he would come the next night, and they would prevail on their lady to come down and hear him, in spite of the light sleep of her lord and master — the result not so much of his age as of his extreme jealousy. Loaysa replied that if they wished to hear him without fear of being surprised by the old man, he would give them a powder to put in his wine, which would make him sleep more soundly. “Good heaven!” cried one of the damsels, “if that were true, what a blessing would have come home to us without our knowing or deserving it! It would not be a sleeping powder for him so much as it would be a powder of life for all of us, and for my poor dear lady, Leonora his wife, to whom he sticks as close as her shadow, never losing sight of her for a moment. Ah, señor of my soul! bring that powder, and may God reward you with all the good you can desire. Go! don’t lose a moment — bring it, señor mio; I will take it upon me to put it in his wine and to be his cupbearer. Oh, that it might please God that the old man should sleep three days and nights! Three glorious days and nights they would be for us.”

“Well, I’ll bring it then,” said Loaysa. “It is of such a nature that it does no harm to the person who takes it; the only effect of it being to cause a most profound sleep.”

They all entreated him to bring it without delay, and then they took their leave of him, after agreeing that on the following night they would make a hole in the turning-box with a gimlet, and that they would try and persuade their mistress to come down. By this time it was nearly daylight, yet the negro wished to take a lesson. Loaysa complied with his desire, and assured him that among all the pupils he had ever taught, he had not known one with a finer ear; and yet the poor negro could never, to the end of his days, have learned the gamut.

Loaysa’s friends took care to come at night to Carrizales’ door to see if their friend had any instructions to give them, or wanted anything. On the second night, when they had made him aware of their presence by a preconcerted signal, he gave them, through the key-hole, a brief account of the prosperous beginning he had made, and begged they would try and get him something to be given to Carrizales to make him sleep. He had heard, he said, that there were powders which produced that effect. They told him they had a friend, a physician, who would give them the best drug for that purpose if he happened to have it; and after encouraging him to persist in the enterprise, and promising to return on the following night, they left him.

Presently the whole flock of doves came to the lure of the guitar, and among them was the simple Leonora, trembling for fear her husband should awake. So great was her dread of his discovering her absence, that her women had great difficulty in persuading her to make the hazardous venture. But they all, especially the dueña, told her such wonderful things of the sweetness of the music, and the engaging manners of the poor musician, whom, without having seen him, they extolled above Absalom and Orpheus, that they persuaded her to do what she would never have done of her own accord. Their first act was to bore a hole in the turning-box through which they might peep at the musician, who was no longer clad in rags, but in wide breeches of buff silk, cut sailor fashion, a jacket of the same material, a satin cap to match, and a starched double-pointed ruff, all which he had brought in his wallet, expecting that he would have to show himself on an occasion which would require him to change his costume. Loaysa was young, good-looking, and of pleasing deportment; and as the eyes of all the women had been so long accustomed only to the sight of old Carrizales, they fancied as they looked at Loaysa that they beheld an angel.

Each of them took her turn at the peephole, and that they might see him the better, the negro stood by him with a lighted flambeau, which he moved up and down before the maestro's body. After all the women, from the lady of the house down to the two negresses, had thus gratified their eyes, Loaysa took his guitar, and played and sang more bewitchingly than ever. Leonora's women were bewildered with delight, and all besought Luis to contrive so that the señor maestro should come in through the inner door, so that they might hear and see him better, instead of squinting at him through a gimlet-hole, and without the risk they ran of being caught in the fact by their master, which would not be so great if they had the musician concealed inside. Their lady strenuously opposed this proposition, declaring she would not permit any such thing. She was shocked to hear them mention it, for they could hear and see him well enough as it was, without danger to their honour. "Honour," exclaimed the dueña; "the king has plenty. Your ladyship may shut yourself up with your Methusalem, if you have a mind, but leave us to amuse ourselves as well as we can; the more so since this señor appears to be too much the gentleman to ask anything of us but what would be pleasing to ourselves."

"Never!" interposed Loaysa. "I came hither, ladies, with no other intention than to offer you my humble services, with all my heart and soul, moved by commiseration for the unparalleled rigour of your confinement, and for the precious moments that are lost to you through this recluse way of life. By the life of my father, I am a man so artless, so meek, so tractable and obedient, that I will never do more than I am bidden. If any one of you should please to say, 'Maestro, sit down here; Maestro, step this way, step that way, go yonder,' I will do just as you bid me, like the tamest and best trained dog that jumps for the king of France."

"Well, if that be so," said the inexperienced Leonora, "what is to be done, so that the señor maestro may come in?"

"Nothing can be easier," said Loaysa. "So please you, ladies, just take the trouble to make an impression on wax with the key of this door; and I will take care that by to-morrow night another shall be made exactly like it, which will answer our purpose."

"With that key," one of the women remarked, "we shall have those of the whole house, for it is a master-key."

"So much the better," said Loaysa.

"That is true," said Leonora; "but this señor must first of all swear, that when he is inside here he will not attempt to do anything but sing and play when he is asked, and that he will keep close and quiet wherever we may put him."

"I swear to this," said Loaysa.

"That oath is good for nothing," replied Leonora: "the señor must swear by the life of his father, and by the cross, which he must kiss in sight of us all."

"I swear by the life of my father," said Loaysa, "and by this sign of the cross, which I kiss with my unworthy mouth;" and crossing two of his fingers, he kissed them three times.

"That will do," said one of the women; "and now, señor, be sure you don't forget the powder, for that is the main thing of all."

Here the conversation ended for that night, and all parties retired highly satisfied with the interview. Good luck had evidently declared in favour of Loaysa; and just then, about two o'clock in the morning, it brought his friends to the door. On their giving the usual signal by blowing a French horn, he went to the door, told them what progress he had made, and asked had they brought the powder or other drug to put Carrizales to sleep. At the same time, he spoke to them respecting the master-key. They told him that on the following night they would bring the powder, or else an ointment of such virtue that one had only to rub the patient's wrists and temples with it to throw him into such a profound sleep, that he would not wake for two days, unless the anointed parts were well washed with vinegar. As to the key, he had only to give them the impression in wax, and they would have a false one made forthwith. Having said this, the friends retired, and Loaysa and his pupil went to rest for the short remainder of the night. The next day hung heavily on hand, as always happens to those who are filled with eager expectation; but the longest day must have an end, and Loaysa's impatient desire was at last gratified.

The appointed hour having arrived, all the domestics, great and small, black and white, repaired to the turning-box, longing to see the señor musico fairly within their seraglio; but no Leonora was there. When Loaysa inquired for her, they said she was in bed with her good man, who had locked the bedroom door, and put the key under his pillow; and that their lady had told them, that when the old man had fallen asleep she would take the key, and they were to go to her by and by for the wax impression she would take from it, and pass to them through a trap-hole in the door. Loaysa was astonished at the old man's extreme wariness, in spite of which he by no means despaired of baffling his precautions. Just then the French horn was heard: Loaysa hastened to the door, and received from his friends a pot containing the promised ointment. Bidding them wait awhile, and he would bring them the mould of the key, he went back to the turning-box, and told the dueña, who seemed the most eager of all the women for his admission, to give the ointment to her lady, bid her anoint her husband with it so cautiously that he should not be aware of what she was doing, and she would soon see wonders. The dueña took the pot, stole up to her mistress's door, and found her waiting on the inside, stretched full length on the floor, with her face to the trap-hole. The dueña laid herself down in the same manner, and putting her mouth to her mistress's ear, whispered that she had brought the ointment, telling her at the same time how to apply it. Leonora took the ointment, but told the dueña that she could by no means get the key, for her husband had not put it under the pillow as usual, but between the mattresses, just under where he lay. However, she was to tell the maestro, that if the ointment operated as he said, she could easily get the key as often as she pleased, and so there would be no need of copying it in wax. Having delivered this message at once, the dueña was to come back, and see how the ointment worked, for she intended to apply it forthwith. The dueña having reported all this to Loaysa, he sent away his friends who were waiting without for the mould of the key.

Trembling in every limb, and scarcely daring to breathe, Leonora began to rub the wrists of her jealous husband. Next she smeared his nostrils; but as she did so, the old man jerked his head, and Leonora was petrified with terror, believing that he was awake, and had caught her in the fact. It was a false alarm, however, and she went on with her task the best way she could, till she had completed it according to her instructions. It was not long before its effects manifested themselves; for presently the old man began to snore loud enough to be heard in the street. This was music more delightful to Leonora's ears than the maestro's voice or guitar; but still hardly trusting what she saw, she ventured to shake him, a very little at first, to see if he would wake; and then a wee bit more and more, till finding that he still snored on, she made bold to turn him over from one side to the other, without his showing any signs of waking. Seeing this, she stepped joyfully to the door; and in a voice not so low as before, called out to the dueña, who was waiting with her ear to the trap-hole. "Good news, sister; Carrizales is sleeping more soundly than the dead."

"What stops you then from taking the key, señora?" said the dueña. "The musico has been waiting for it this hour and more."

"Stay a moment, sister; I am going for it," said Leonora; and stepping back to the bed, she put her hand between the mattresses, and drew out the key without the old man's perceiving it. No sooner was the key in her hands, than dancing with delight she unlocked the door, and gave it to the exulting dueña, bidding her let in the maestro, and bring him into the gallery; but as for herself, she durst not stir from that spot, for fear of what might happen. But before all things she insisted that the maestro should ratify anew the oath he had taken not to do more than they should order him; and if he would not give this renewed pledge, he was not to be let in on any consideration.

"Never fear," said the dueña; "not a bit shall he come in until he has sworn, and sworn again, and kissed the cross at least six times."

"Don't bind him to any fixed number," said Leonora; "but let him kiss the cross as many times as he pleases; but be sure that he swears by the life of his father, and by all he holds dear; for then we shall be safe and sure, and we may take our fill of hearing him sing and play; and exquisitely he does so, upon my word. There now, get you gone without more delay, and let us not waste the night in words."

The good dueña caught up her petticoats, and ran with all her speed to the turning-box, where the whole party was impatiently awaiting her; and no sooner had she shown them the key in her hand, than they hoisted her upon their shoulders, and paraded up and down with her, crying "Viva! viva!" But still greater was their joy when she told them there was no need to have a false key made; for so soundly did the old man sleep after being anointed, that they might have the house-key as often as they required it.

“Quick then, good friend,” said one of the troop, “open the door, and let in this gentleman who has been waiting so long, and let us have a jolly bout of music, for that is all we have now to do.”

“Nay, but there is more to be done,” replied the dueña; “for we must exact another oath of him; the same as last night.”

“He is so good,” said one of the slave girls, “that he won’t grudge taking as many oaths as we like.”

The dueña now unlocked the door, and holding it ajar called to Loaysa, who had been listening at the aperture to all that had passed. He was for springing in at a bound; but the dueña stopped him, laying her hand on his breast, and said, “Fair and softly, señor; I would have you to know, as God is my judge, we are all of us virgins here as truly as the mothers that bore us, except my lady; and I am one too, the Lord forgive me, though you would take me for forty years old; but I am not thirty all out, wanting two months and a fortnight of my thirtieth birthday; and if I look older, it is that cares, and troubles, and vexations tell upon one more than years. Now this being so, it does not stand to reason, that for the sake of hearing two or three songs we should risk the loss of so much virginity as is here collected together. And so you see, my sweet sir, before you enter our domain, you must first take a very solemn oath, that you will do nothing beyond our orders. If you think it is much we ask of you, do but consider how much more it is we risk; and if your intentions are good and proper, you will not be loth to swear; for a good paymaster does not mind giving security.”

“Well said, Marialonso,” cried one of the damsels; “spoken like a person of sense, and who knows what’s what. If the señor won’t swear, then let him not come in here.”

“Tell you what,” said Guiomar, the negress, in her broken jargon, “s’ppose him no swear, let him in all the same, in devil’s name; for s’ppose him swear, once him in, him forget eberyting.”

Loaysa listened very demurely to the Señora Marialonso’s harangue, and replied with great gravity, “Be assured, ladies, my charming sisters and companions, my intention never was, is, or shall be other than to gratify and content you to the utmost of my powers; and therefore I make no difficulty with regard to this oath which is required of me, though I could have wished that some confidence had been reposed in my simple word, which, given by such a person as I am, would have been as good as a bond signed and sealed; for I would have you to know, ladies, that under a bad cloak there is often a good drinker. But to the end that you may all be assured of my upright intentions, I will take the oath as a catholic and a man of parts. I swear then by the immaculate efficacy, wherever it abides in greatest sanctity and fulness, by all the entrances and exits of the holy mount Libanus, and by all that is contained in the preface to the true history of Charlemagne, with the death of the giant Fierabras, not to swerve or depart from the oath I have taken, or from the commands which may be laid upon me by the least of these ladies, under penalty, should I do otherwise, or attempt to do otherwise, that from this time forth till then, and from thenceforth till now, the same shall be null and void and of no effect whatsoever.”

When honest Loaysa had got so far in his oath, one of the young maidens, who had listened to him with wrapt attention, cried out, “Well, if that is not what you may call an oath! it is enough to melt the heart of a stone. Plague take me if you shall swear any more for me; for after such an oath as that you might enter the very cave of Cabra.” So saying, she caught hold of him by the breeches, and drew him within the door, where the rest immediately gathered close round him. One of them ran off with the news to her mistress, who stood watching her husband; and who, when she heard that the musico was actually within doors, was moved almost at the same moment by joy and fear, and hurriedly asked if he had sworn. The girl told her he had done so, and with the most singular form of oath she had ever heard in her life.

“Well, since he has sworn, we have him fast,” said Leonora. “Oh, what a good thought it was of mine to make him swear!”

They were now met by the whole party advancing in procession, with the musico in the midst of them, and the negro and Guiomar lighting the way. As soon as Loaysa saw Leonora, he threw himself at her feet to kiss her hands; but without saying a word, she made signs to him to rise, and he obeyed. Observing then that they all remained as mute as if they had lost their tongues, Loaysa told them they might talk, and talk aloud too; for there was no fear that their lord-master would wake and hear them, such being the virtue of the ointment, that without endangering life it made a man lie like one dead.

“That I fully believe,” said Leonora; “for were it not so, he would have been awake twenty times before this, such a light sleeper he is, in consequence of his frequent indispositions; but ever since I anointed him, he has been snoring like a pig.”

“That being the case,” said the dueña, “let us go into the saloon, where we may hear the gentleman sing, and amuse ourselves a little.”

“Let us go,” said Leonora; “but let Guiomar remain here on the watch, to warn us if Carrizales wakes.”

“Ay,” said Guiomar, “black woman stay, white woman go: God pardon all.”

Leaving the negress behind, the rest all went to the saloon, where they seated themselves on a rich carpet, with Loaysa in the centre of the group. Marialonso took a candle, and began to examine the figure of the musician from head to foot. Every one had something to say in his commendation: "Oh, what a nice curly head of hair he has!" said one. "What nice teeth!" cried another; "blanched almonds are nothing to them." "What eyes!" exclaimed a third; "so large and full, and so green! By the life of my mother, they look for all the world like emeralds." Leonora alone said not a word; but as she looked at the maestro, she could not help thinking that he was better looking than her good man. Presently the dueña took the guitar out of the negro's hands, and putting it into Loaysa's, begged he would sing to it a villanetta then in high fashion at Seville. He complied; the women all jumped up, and began to dance; whilst the dueña sang the words of the song with more good will than good voice.

Close you watch me, mother mine, Watch me, and immure me: Don't you know without my help You can not secure me?

Appetite, 'tis said with truth, By privation groweth; Thwarted love, like flame confined, All the fiercer gloweth. Better therefore 'twere, methinks, You should not immure me: Don't you know without my help You can not secure me? Close you watch me, &c.

Moths will to the taper fly, Bees on flowers will cluster; Keep a loving maid who can From love's golden lustre! Fear you lest that beacon light From your arms should lure me? Well I know without my help You can not secure me. Close you watch me, &c.

There's a way where there's a will: Keep the will from straying. Wayward hearts will have their fling, Spite of all gainsaying. If you'd have me very good, Don't be hard on poor me; Sure I am without, my help You can not secure me. Close you watch me, &c.

The song and the dance were just ended, when in rushed Guiomar in wild affright, gesticulating as if she was in a fit, and in a voice between a croak and a whisper, she stammered out, "Master wake, señora; señora, master wake: him getting up, and coming." Whoever has seen a flock of pigeons feeding tranquilly in the field, and has marked the fear and confusion with which they take flight at the terrible sound of the gun, may picture to himself the fluttering dismay of the dancers at the unexpected news blurted out by Guiomar. Off they ran in all directions, leaving the musico in the lurch, and in a pitiable state of perplexity. Leonora wrung her beautiful hands; and the Señora Marialonso beat her face, and tore her hair, but not with great violence. In short, all was panic and confusion; but the dueña, who had more cunning and presence of mind than the rest, directed that Loaysa should go into her own room, whilst she and her mistress remained where they were, never doubting but they should find some excuse or another to put off upon Carrizales.

Loaysa hid himself, and the dueña bent her ear to listen for her master's footsteps; but hearing nothing, she took courage by degrees, and stealing on tip-toe to his bedroom, she found him snoring there as soundly as ever. Back she ran, at her best speed, to gladden her mistress's heart with the joyful intelligence; and then discreetly resolving not to lose so lucky an opportunity of being the first to enjoy the good graces of the musico, she told Leonora to wait there whilst she went and called him. Hastily entering the room where he was concealed, she found him sorely discomfited by the untoward issue of his adventure, cursing the inefficiency of the ointment, the credulity of his friends, and his own want of forethought in not making an experiment with the ointment on some other person before he tried its effect on Carrizales. But when the dueña assured him that the old man was sleeping as soundly as ever, there was an end to all his uneasiness, and he lent a complacent ear to the very liquorish language in which Marialonso addressed him. "Oho," said he to himself, "that's what you would be at, is it? Well, you will do capitally as a bait to fish with for your lady."

Whilst this tête-à-tête was pending, the rest of the women had one by one crept out of their several hiding-places, to see if it was true that their master was awake; and finding all still in the house, they returned to the saloon where they had left their mistress. Having learnt from her that the alarm had been a false one, they asked what had become of the musico and the dueña. Leonora told them that Marialonso had gone to fetch the maestro, whereupon they all stole out of the room as noiselessly as they had entered it, and set themselves to listen at the door to what was passing between the pair. Guiomar was one of the party, but the negro was not among them; for upon the first alarm he had run off, hugging his guitar, and hid himself in his loft, where he lay huddled up under the bed-clothes, sweating with terror; in spite of which he could not forbear from tinkling the guitar from time to time, so inordinate — may Satan as confound him! — was his love of music. The soft speeches of the amorous dueña were distinctly heard by the group outside the door; and there was not one of them but bestowed a blessing upon her from the wrong side of the mouth, with the addition of sundry epithets which I had rather not repeat. The result of the confabulation between the pair was that Loaysa would comply with the dueña's desires, provided that first of all she brought her mistress to consent to his. It cost the dueña something to subscribe to these conditions; but, after all, there was nothing she would not have done to compass the gratification of the desires that had laid hold on her soul and body, and were undermining her very bones and marrow. The bargain was struck; and quitting the room to go and speak to her mistress, she found all the rest of the women assembled round the door. Putting a bold face on the matter, she bade them all go to bed, and next night they should be able to enjoy themselves without any such false alarm as had spoiled their sport for that time. The women all knew well that the old dueña only wanted to be left alone; but they could not help obeying her, for she had command over them all.

Having got rid of the servants, the dueña went back to the saloon, and began to exercise her powers of persuasion upon Leonora. She made her a long and plausible harangue, so well put together that one might have supposed she had composed it beforehand. She extolled the good looks of the gentle musico, the elegance of his manners, his wondrous suavity, and his countless other good qualities; represented how infinitely more agreeable must be the caresses of such a charming young gallant than those of the old husband; assured her the affair would never be discovered, and plied her with a thousand other arguments which the devil put into her mouth, all so specious and so artfully coloured, that they might have beguiled the firmest mind, much more that of a being so artless and unwary as poor Leonora. O dueñas, born and used for the perdition of thousands of modest, virtuous beings! O ye long plaited coifs, chosen to impart an air of grave decorum to the salas of noble ladies, how do you reverse the functions of your perhaps needful office! In fine, the dueña talked with such effect, that Leonora consented to her own undoing, and to that of all the precautions of the wary Carrizales, whose sleep was the death of his honour. Marialonso took her mistress by the hand, led the weeping lady almost by force to Loaysa, and wishing them much joy with a diabolical leer, she left them both shut in together, and laid herself down in the saloon to sleep, or rather to await the reward she had earned. Overcome, however, by the loss of rest on two successive nights, she could not keep her eyes open, but fell fast asleep on the carpet.

And now, if we did not know that Carrizales was asleep, it would not be amiss to ask him, where now were all his jealous cares and precautions? What now availed the lofty walls of his house, and the exclusion from it of every male creature? What had he gained by his turning-box, his thick walls, his stopped up windows, the enormously strict seclusion to which he had doomed his family, the large jointure he had settled on Leonora, the presents he was continually making her, his liberal treatment of her attendants, and his unfailing alacrity in supplying them with everything he imagined they could want or wish for? But as we have said, he was asleep. Had he been awake, and disposed to reply, he could not have given a better answer than by saying, as he shrugged his shoulders and arched his eyebrows, that all this had been brought to nought by the craft of an idle and vicious young man, and the wickedness of a faithless dueña, working upon the weakness of an artless and inexperienced girl. Heaven save us all from such enemies as these, against whom the shield of prudence and the sword of vigilance are alike impotent to defend us!

Such, nevertheless, was Leonora's rectitude, and so opportunely did she manifest it, that all the villanous arts of the crafty seducer were of no avail; till both of them, wearied by the contest, the baffled tempter and the victorious defender of her own chastity, fell asleep almost at the moment when it pleased Heaven that Carrizales should awake in spite of the ointment. As usual he felt all about the bed, and not finding his dear wife in it, he jumped up in the utmost consternation, and with strange agility for a man of his years. He looked all over the room for her, and when he found the door open, and the key gone from between the mattresses, he was nearly distracted. Recovering himself a little, he went out into the gallery, stole softly thence to the saloon, where the dueña was asleep, and seeing no Leonora there, he went to the dueña's own room, opened the door gently, and beheld Leonora in Loaysa's arms, and both of them looking as if the soporific ointment was exerting its influence over themselves instead of upon the jealous husband.

Carrizales was petrified with horror; his voice stuck in his throat; his arms fell powerless by his sides, and his feet seemed rooted to the ground; and though the fierce revulsion of his wrath presently aroused his torpid senses, he yet could scarcely breathe, so intense was his anguish. Thirsting for vengeance as terrible as his monstrous wrong, but having no weapon at hand, he returned to his chamber as stealthily as he had quitted it, in search of a dagger, with which he would wash out the stain cast upon his honour in the blood of the guilty pair, and then massacre his whole household; but he had no sooner reached his room than his grief again overpowered him, and he fell senseless on the bed.

Day broke now, and found Leonora still in the arms of Loaysa. Marialonso awoke, and thinking it time to receive what she counted was due to her, she awoke Leonora, who was shocked to find it so late, and bitterly accused her own imprudence and the dueña's negligence. With trembling steps the two women crept up to Felipe's bedroom, praying inwardly to Heaven that they might find him still snoring; and when they saw him lying on the bed, apparently asleep, they made no doubt that he was still under the effect of the opiate, and embraced each other in a transport of joy. Leonora went up to her husband, and taking him by the arm, turned him over on his side to see if he would wake without their being obliged to wash him with vinegar according to the directions given with the ointment; but the movement roused Carrizales from his swoon, and heaving a deep sigh, he ejaculated in a faint and piteous tone, "Miserable man that I am! to what a woeful pass I am come!"

Leonora did not distinctly hear what her husband said; but seeing with surprise that the effect of the opiate was not so lasting as she had been led to expect, she bent over him, put her cheek to his, and pressing him closely in her arms, said, "What ails you, dear señor? You seem to be complaining?"

Carrizales opened his eyes to their utmost width, and turning them full upon her, stared at her a long while with a look of profound amazement. At last he said, "Do me the pleasure, señora, to send instantly for your parents in my name, and ask them to come hither, for I feel something at my heart which distresses me exceedingly. I fear I have but a short time to live, and I should like to see them before I die."

Leonora immediately despatched the negro with this message to her parents. She fully believed what her husband had told her, and attributing his danger to the violence of the opiate instead of to its real cause, she put her arms round his neck, caressed him more fondly than ever she had done before, and inquired how he felt, with such tender solicitude, as if she loved him above everything in the world; while he, on the other hand, continued to gaze upon her with the same unvarying look of astonishment, every endearing word or caress of hers being like a dagger to his heart. The dueña had, by this time, acquainted Loaysa and the domestics with her master's illness, which, she remarked, was evidently very serious, since he had forgotten to give orders that the street door should be locked after the negro's departure to summon her lady's parents. The message was itself a portentous occurrence, for neither father nor mother had ever set foot within that house since their daughter's marriage. In short, the whole household was in anxiety, though no one divined the true cause of the old man's illness. He lay sighing at intervals, so heavily that every sigh seemed like the parting of soul and body. Leonora wept to see him in such a state, whilst he beheld her feigned tears, as he deemed them, with a bitter smile, that looked like the grin of insanity.

Leonora's parents now arrived, and were struck with no little misgivings when they found both entrance doors open and the house all lonely and silent. They went up to their son-in-law's room, and found him in the posture he had all along maintained, with his eyes immovably fixed on his wife, whom he held by the hands, whilst both were in tears; she, because she saw his flow, and he at seeing how deceitfully she wept. As soon as they entered the room, Carrizales begged them to be seated, ordered all the domestics to withdraw except Marialonso, then wiped his eyes, and with a calm voice and an air of perfect composure addressed them thus: —

"I am sure, my respected father and mother-in-law, I need no other witnesses than yourselves to the truth of what I have now to say to you in the first place. You must well remember with how much love and what tender affection I received your daughter when you bestowed her upon me one year, one month, five days, and nine hours ago, as my lawful wife. You know, also, with what liberality I behaved to her, for the settlement I made upon her would have been more than enough to furnish three young ladies of her quality with handsome marriage portions. You must remember the pains I took to dress and adorn her with everything she could desire or I could think of as suitable to her. It is known to you likewise how, prompted by my natural disposition, fearful of the evil to which I shall surely owe my death, and taught by the experience of a long life to be on my guard against the many strange chances that occur in life, I sought to guard this jewel which I had chosen and you had bestowed upon me, with all possible care and caution. I raised the walls of this house higher, blocked up all the windows that looked on the street, doubled the locks of the doors, set up a turning-box as in a nunnery, and perpetually banished from my dwelling every vestige of the male sex. I gave my wife female servants and slaves to wait upon her: I denied neither her nor them anything they chose to ask of me. I made her my equal, communicated my most secret thoughts to her, and put my whole property at her disposal. Having done all this, I thought I might fairly expect to enjoy securely what had cost me so much, and that it would be her care not to afford me cause for conceiving any kind of jealous fear whatever. But it is not within the power of human efforts to prevent the chastisement which Heaven is pleased to inflict on those who do not rest their whole hopes and desires upon it alone. No wonder then if mine have been deceived, and I have myself prepared the poison of which I am now dying. But I see how anxiously you hang upon the words of my mouth. I will therefore keep you no longer in suspense, but conclude this long preamble by telling you, in one word, what no words were adequate to describe, were I to speak for ever. This morning I found this woman," (here he pointed to his wife,) "who was born for the ruin of my peace and the destruction of my life, in the arms of a young gallant, who is now shut up in the bed-chamber of this pestilent dueña."

Carrizales had no sooner uttered these words than Leonora swooned, and fell with her head upon his lap. Marialonso turned as white as ashes, and Leonora's parents were so astounded that they could not utter a word. After a short pause, Carrizales continued thus: —

"The vengeance I intend to take for this outrage shall be no common one. As I have been singular in all my other actions, so will I be in this. My vengeance shall fall upon myself, as the person most culpable of all, for I ought to have considered how ill this girl's fifteen years could assort with my threescore and ten. I have been like the silkworm, which builds itself a house in which it must die. I do not reproach you, misguided girl" — here he bent down and kissed his still insensible wife— "for the persuasions of a wicked old woman, and the wheedling tongue of an amorous youth, easily prevail over the little wit of a green girl; but that all the world may see how strong and how true was the love I bore you, I shall give such a proof of it here on my death-bed, as the world has never seen or heard of; — one that shall remain an unparalleled example, if not of goodness, at least of singleness of heart. I desire that a notary be immediately sent for to make my will, wherein I will double Leonora's jointure, and recommend her, after my death, which will not be long delayed, to marry that young man whom these gray hairs have never offended. Thus she will see that, as in life I never departed in the slightest particular from what I thought could please her, so I wish her to be happy when I am no more, and to be united to him whom she must love so much. The rest of my fortune I will bequeath to pious uses, after leaving to you both wherewith to live honourably for the rest of your days. Let the notary come instantly, for the anguish I am now suffering is such that, if it continues, my time here will be very short."

Here Carrizales was seized with a terrible swoon, and sank down so close to Leonora that their faces touched. During this scene the dueña stole out of the room, and went to apprise Loaysa of all that had happened. She advised him to quit the house immediately, and she would take care to keep him informed of all that was going on, for there were no locked doors now to hinder her from sending the negro to him whenever it was necessary. Astounded at this news, Loaysa took her advice, put on his beggar's rags again, and went away to make known to his friends the strange issue of his amour.

Leonora's father, meanwhile, sent for a notary, who arrived soon after both husband and wife had recovered their senses. Carrizales made his will in the manner he had stated, without saying anything of his wife's transgressions; he only declared that, for good reasons, he advised, and begged her to marry, should he die, that young man of whom he had spoken to her in private. When Leonora heard this, she threw herself at her husband's feet, and cried, while her heart throbbed as if it would burst, "Long may you live, my lord and my only joy; for though you may not believe a word I say, indeed, indeed I have not offended you, except in thought."

More she would have said, but when she attempted to exculpate herself by a full statement of what had really occurred, her tongue failed her, and she fainted away a second time. The poor old man embraced her as she lay; so, too, did her parents — all three weeping bitterly; and even the notary could not refrain from tears. Carrizales gave the negro and the other slaves their liberty, and left all the servants enough to maintain them; the perfidious Marialonso alone was to have nothing beyond the arrears of her wages. Seven days afterwards Carrizales was laid in his grave.

Leonora remained a mourning though wealthy widow; and whilst Loaysa expected that she would fulfil the desire which he knew her husband had expressed in his will, he learned that within a week she had become a nun in one of the most austere and rigid convents in all Seville. Mortified by this disappointment, he left the country and went to the Indies. Leonora's father and mother were deeply grieved, but found consolation in the wealth which their son-in-law had bequeathed them. The two damsels likewise consoled themselves, as did the negro and the female slaves, the former being well provided for, and the latter having obtained their freedom; the wicked dueña alone was left to digest, in poverty, the frustration of her base schemes. For my part I was long possessed with the desire to complete this story, which so signally exemplifies the little reliance that can be put in locks, turning-boxes, and walls, whilst the will remains free; and the still less reason there is to trust the innocence and simplicity of youth, if its ear be exposed to the suggestions of your demure dueñas, whose virtue consists in their long black gowns and their formal white hoods. Only I know not why it was that Leonora did not persist in exculpating herself, and explaining to her jealous husband how guiltless she had been in the whole of that unhappy business. But her extreme agitation paralysed her tongue at the moment, and the haste which her husband made to die, left her without another opportunity to complete her justification.

THE ILLUSTRIOUS SCULLERY-MAID.

In the famous city of Burgos there lived two wealthy cavaliers, one of whom was called Don Diego de Carriazo, and the other Don Juan de Avendaño. Don Diego had a son called after himself, and Don Juan another, whose name was Don Tomas de Avendaño. These two young gentlemen being the principal persons of the following tale, we shall for the sake of brevity call them Carriazo and Avendaño.

Carriazo might be about thirteen or little more, when, prompted by a scampish disposition, without having had any cause to complain of bad treatment at home, he ran away from his father's house, and cast himself upon the wide world. So much did he enjoy a life of unrestricted freedom, that amidst all the wants and discomforts attendant upon it, he never missed the plenty of his father's house. He neither tired of trudging on foot, nor cared for cold or heat. For him all seasons of the year were genial spring. His sleep was as sound on a heap of straw as on soft mattresses, and he made himself as snug in a hayloft as between two Holland sheets. In short, he made such way in the profession he had chosen, that he could have given lessons to the famous Guzman de Alfarache.

During the three years he absented himself from home, he learned to play at sheepshanks in Madrid, at rentoy in the public-houses of Toledo, and at presa y pinta in the barbacans of Seville. In spite of the sordid penury of his way of life, Carriazo showed himself a prince in his actions. It was easy to see by a thousand tokens that he came of gentle blood. His generosity gained him the esteem of all his comrades. He seldom was present at drinking bouts; and though he drank wine, it was in moderation, and he carried it well. He was not one of those unlucky drinkers, who whenever they exceed a little, show it immediately in their faces, which look as if they were painted with vermilion or red ochre. In short, the world beheld in Carriazo a virtuous, honourable, well-bred, rogue, of more than common ability. He passed through all the degrees of roguery till he graduated as a master in the tunny fisheries of Zahara, the chief school of the art. O kitchen-walloping rogues, fat and shining with grease; feigned cripples; cutpurses of Zocodober and of the Plaza of Madrid; sanctimonious patterers of prayers; Seville porters; bullies of the Hampa, and all the countless host comprised under the denomination of rogues! never presume to call yourself by that name if you have not gone through two courses, at least, in the academy of the tunny fisheries. There it is that you may see converging as it were in one grand focus, toil and idleness, filth and spruceness, sharp set hunger and lavish plenty, vice without disguise, incessant gambling, brawls and quarrels every hour in the day, murders every now and then, ribaldry and obscenity, singing, dancing, laughing, swearing, cheating, and thieving without end. There many a man of quality seeks for his truant son, nor seeks in vain; and the youth feels as acutely the pain of being torn from that life of licence as though he were going to meet his death. But this joyous life has its bitters as well as its sweets. No one can lie down to sleep securely in Zahara, but must always have the dread hanging over him of being carried off to Barbary at any moment. For this reason, they all withdraw at night into some fortified places on the coast, and place scouts and sentinels to watch whilst they sleep; but in spite of all precautions, it has sometimes happened that scouts, sentinels, rogues, overseers, boats, nets, and all the posse comitatus of the place have begun the night in Spain and have seen the dawn in Tetuan. No apprehensions of this kind, however, could deter Carriazo from spending three successive summers at the fisheries for his pastime; and such was his luck during his third season, that he won at cards about seven hundred reals, with which he resolved to buy himself good clothes, return to Burgos, and gladden the heart of his sorrowing mother.

He took a most affectionate leave of his many dear friends, assuring them that nothing but sickness or death should prevent his being with them in the following summer; for his heart was in Zahara, and to his eyes its parched sands were fresher than all the verdure of the Elysian fields. Ambling merrily along on shanks' mare, he arrived at Valladolid, where he stopped a fortnight to get rid of the mahogany hue of his complexion, and to change his rogue's costume for that of a gentleman. Having equipped himself properly, he had still a hundred reals left, which he spent on the hire of a mule and a servant, that he might make a good figure when he presented himself to his parents. They received him with the utmost joy, and all the friends and relations of the family came to congratulate them on the safe arrival of their son Don Diego de Carriazo. I had forgotten to mention that, during his peregrination, Don Diego had taken the name of Vidiales, and by that name alone he was known to his new acquaintances.

Among those who came to see the new arrival were Don Juan de Avendaño and his son Don Tomas, with the latter of whom, as they were both of the same age and neighbours, Carriazo contracted a very close friendship. Carriazo gave his parents a long and circumstantial account of all the fine things he had seen and done during the three years he had been from home, in all which there was not one word of truth; but he never so much as hinted at the tunny fisheries, though they were constantly in his thoughts, more especially as the time approached in which he had promised his friends he would return to them. He took no pleasure in the chase, with which his father sought often to divert him, nor in any of the convivial meetings of that hospitable city. All kinds of amusements wearied him, and the best enjoyments that could be offered to him were not to be compared, he thought, with those he had known at the tunny fisheries. His friend Avendaño, finding him often melancholy and musing, ventured to inquire after the cause, at the same time professing his readiness to assist his friend in any way that might be requisite, and to the utmost of his power, even at the cost of his blood. Carriazo felt that it would be wronging the great friendship subsisting between him and Avendaño if he concealed from the latter the cause of his present sadness; and therefore he described to him in detail the life he had led at Zahara, and declared that all his gloom arose from his strong desire to be there once more. So attractive was the picture he drew, that Avendaño, far from blaming his taste, expressed his entire sympathy with it. The end of the matter was that Avendaño determined to go off with Carriazo, and enjoy for one summer that delicious life of which he had just heard such a glowing description; and in this determination he was strongly encouraged to persist by Carriazo, who was glad to be so countenanced in his own low propensities. They set their wits to work to see how they could scrape together as much money as possible, and the best means that occurred to them was that suggested by Avendaño's approaching departure for Salamanca, where he had already studied for three years, and where his father wished him to complete his education, and take a degree in whatever faculty he pleased. Carriazo now made known to his father that he had a strong desire to go with Avendaño and study at Salamanca. Don Diego gladly fell in with his son's proposal; he talked with his friend Don Juan on the subject, and it was agreed between them that the two young men should reside together at Salamanca, and be sent thither well supplied with all requisites, and in a manner suitable to the sons of men of quality.

The time for their departure being arrived, they were furnished with money, and with a tutor who was more remarkable for integrity than for mother wit. Their fathers talked much and impressively to their sons about what they should do, and how they should govern themselves, in order that they might become fraught with virtue and knowledge, for that is the fruit which every student should aspire to reap from his labours and his vigils, especially such as are of good family. The sons were all humility and obedience; their mothers cried; both parents gave them their blessing, and away they went, mounted on their own mules, and attended by two servants of their respective households, besides the tutor, who had let his beard grow, to give him a more imposing air of gravity, as became his charge.

When they arrived at Valladolid, they told their tutor they should like to remain there a couple of days to see the city, having never been in it before. The tutor severely reprimanded them for entertaining any such idle notion, telling them they had no time to lose in silly diversions; that their business was to get as fast as possible to the place where they were to pursue their studies; that he should be doing extreme violence to his conscience if he allowed them to stop for one hour, not to speak of two days; that they should continue their journey forthwith, or, if not, then brown bread should be their portion.

Such was the extent of the ability in his office possessed by this tutor, or major-domo, as we should rather call him. The lads, who had already gathered in their harvest, since they had laid hands upon four hundred gold crowns which were in the major-domo's keeping, begged that he would let them remain in Valladolid for that day only, that they might see the grand aqueducts, which were then in course of construction, for the purpose of conveying the waters of Argales to that city. He consented at last, but with extreme reluctance, for he wished to avoid the expense of an additional day on the road, and to spend the night at Valdiastellas, whence he could easily reach Salamanca in two days. But the bay horse thinks one thing, and the man on his back another thing, and so it proved in the major-domo's case. The lads, mounted on two excellent mules, and attended by only one servant, rode out to see the fountain of Argales, famous for its antiquity and the abundance of its water. On their arrival there, Avendaño gave the servant a sealed paper, bidding him return forthwith to the city, and deliver it to his tutor, after which the servant was to wait for them at the Puerta del Campo. The servant did as he was bid, and went back to the city with the letter; and they, turning their mules' heads another way, slept that night in Mojados, and arrived two days afterwards in Madrid, where they sold their mules.

They dressed themselves like peasants in short jerkins, loose breeches, and gray stockings. An old clothes dealer, to whom they sold their handsome apparel in the morning, transformed them by night in such a manner that their own mothers would not have known them. Lightly equipped, as suited their purpose, and without swords, for they had sold them to the old clothes dealer, they took to the road to Toledo. There let us leave them for the present, stepping out briskly with merry hearts, while we return to the tutor, and see him open the letter delivered to him by the servant, which he read as follows: —

“Your worship, señor Pedro Alonso, will be pleased to have patience and go back to Burgos, where you will say to our parents that we, their sons, having with mature deliberation considered how much more arms befit cavaliers than do

letters, have determined to exchange Salamanca for Brussels, and Spain for Flanders. We have got the four hundred crowns; the mules we intend to sell. The course we have chosen, which is so worthy of persons of our quality, and the length of the journey before us, are sufficient to excuse our fault, though a fault it will not be deemed by any one but a coward. Our departure takes place now; our return will be when it shall please God, to whose keeping, we, your humble pupils, heartily commend you. Given from the fountain of Argales, with one foot in the stirrup for Flanders.

“CARRIAZO,
“AVENDANO.”

Aghast at the contents of this letter, Pedro Alonso hurried to his valise, and found that the paper spoke but too truly, for the money was gone. Instantly mounting the remaining mule, he returned to Burgos to carry these tidings to his patrons, in order that they might take measures to recover possession of their sons' persons. But as to how he was received, the author of this tale says not a word, for the moment he has put Pedro Alonso into the saddle, he leaves him to give the following account of what occurred to Avendaño and Carriazo at the entrance of Illescas.

Just by the town gate they met two muleteers, Andalusians apparently, one of whom was coming from Seville, and the other going thither. Said the latter to the former, “If my masters were not so far ahead, I should like to stop a little longer to ask you a thousand things I want to know, for I am quite astonished at what you have told me about the conde's having hanged Alonzo Gines and Ribera without giving them leave to appeal.”

“As I'm a sinner,” replied the Sevillian, “the conde laid a trap for them, got them under his jurisdiction — for they were soldiers, and once having them in his gripe, the court of appeal could never get them out of it. I tell you what it is, friend, he has a devil within him, that same conde de Puñonrostro. Seville, and the whole country round it for ten leagues, is swept clear of swash-bucklers; not a thief ventures within his limits; they all fear him like fire. It is whispered, however, that he will soon give up his place as corregidor, for he is tired of being at loggerheads at every hand's turn with the señores of the court of appeal.”

“May they live a thousand years!” exclaimed he who was going to Seville; “for they are the fathers of the miserable, and a refuge for the unfortunate. How many poor fellows must eat dirt, for no other reason than the anger of an arbitrary judge of a corregidor, either ill-informed or wrong-headed! Many eyes see more than two; the venom of injustice cannot so soon lay hold on many hearts as on one alone.”

“You have turned preacher!” said he of Seville; “but I am afraid I can’t stop to hear the end of your sermon. Don’t put up to night at your usual place, but go to the Posada del Sevillano, for there you will see the prettiest scullery-wench I know. Marinilla at the Venta Tejada is a dishclout in comparison with her. I will only tell you that it is said the son of the corregidor is very sweet upon her. One of my masters gone on ahead there, swears, that on his way back to Andalusia, he will stop two months in Toledo, and in that same inn, only to have his fill of looking at her. I myself ventured once to give her a little bit of a squeeze, and all I got for it was a swinging box on the ear. She is as hard as a flint, as savage as a kestrel, and as touch-me-not as a nettle; but she has a face that does a body’s eyes good to look at. She has the sun in one cheek, and the moon in the other; the one is made of roses and the other of carnations, and between them both are lilies and jessamine. I say no more, only see her for yourself, and you will see that all I have told you is nothing to what I might say of her beauty. I’d freely settle upon her those two silver gray mules of mine that you know, if they would let me have her for my wife; but I know they won’t, for she is a morsel for an archbishop or a conde. Once more I say, go and see her; and so, good-bye to you, for I must be off.”

The two muleteers went their several ways, leaving the two friends much struck by what they had overheard of the conversation, especially Avendaño, in whom the mere relation which the muleteer had given of the scullery-maid’s beauty awoke an intense desire to see her. It had the same effect on Carriazo, but not to an equal degree, nor so as to extinguish his desire to reach his beloved tunny fisheries, from which he would not willingly be delayed to behold the pyramids of Egypt, or any or all of the other seven wonders of the world.

Repeating the dialogue between the muleteers, and mimicking their tones and gestures, served as pastime to beguile the way until they reached Toledo. Carriazo, who had been there before, led the way at once to the Posada del Sevillano; but they did not venture to ask for accommodation there, their dress and appearance not being such as would have gained them a ready welcome. Night was coming on, and though Carriazo importuned Avendaño to go with him in search of lodgings elsewhere, he could not prevail on him to quit the doors of the Sevillano, or cease from hanging about them, upon the chance that the celebrated scullery-maid might perhaps make her appearance. When it was pitch dark Carriazo was in despair, but still Avendaño stuck to the spot; and, at last, he went into the courtyard of the inn, under pretence of inquiring after some gentlemen of Burgos who were on their way to Seville. He had but just entered the courtyard, when a girl, who seemed to be about fifteen, and was dressed in working clothes, came out of one of the side doors with a lighted candle. Avendaño's eyes did not rest on the girl's dress, but on her face, which seemed to him such as a painter would give to the angels; and so overcome was he by her beauty, that he could only gaze at it in speechless admiration, without being able to say one word for himself.

"What may you please to want, brother?" said the girl. "Are you servant to one of the gentlemen in the house?"

"I am no one's servant but yours," replied Avendaño, trembling with emotion.

"Go to, brother," returned the girl disdainfully, "we who are servants ourselves have no need of others to wait on us;" and calling her master, she said, "Please to see, sir, what this lad wants."

The master came out, and, in reply to his question, Avendaño said that he was looking for some gentlemen of Burgos who were on their way to Seville. One of them was his master, and had sent him on before them to Alcalá de Henares upon business of importance, bidding him, when that was done, to proceed to Toledo, and wait for him at the Sevillano; and he believed that his master would arrive there that night or the following day at farthest.

So plausibly did Avendaño tell this fib that the landlord was quite taken in by it. "Very well, friend," said he, "you may stop here till your master comes."

"Many thanks, señor landlord," replied Avendaño; "and will your worship bid them give me a room for myself, and a comrade of mine who is outside? We have got money to pay for it, as well as another."

"Certainly," said the host, and turning to the girl he said, "Costanza, bid la Argüello take these two gallants to the corner room, and give them clean sheets."

"I will do so, señor," and curtsying to her master she went away, leaving Avendaño by her departure in a state of feeling like that of the tired wayfarer when the sun sets and he finds himself wrapt in cheerless darkness. He went, however, to give an account of what he had seen and done to Carriazo, who very soon perceived that his friend had been smitten in the heart; but he would not say a word about the matter then, until he should see whether there was a fair excuse for the hyperbolical praises with which Avendaño exalted the beauty of Costanza above the stars.

At last they went in doors, and la Argüello, the chamber maid, a woman of some five-and-forty years of age, showed them a room which was neither a gentleman's nor a servant's, but something between the two. On their asking for supper, la Argüello told them they did not provide meals in that inn; they only cooked and served up such food as the guests bought and fetched for themselves; but there were eating-houses in the neighbourhood, where they might without scruple of conscience go and sup as they pleased. The two friends took la

Argüello's advice, and went to an eating-house, where Carriazo supped on what they set before him, and Avendaño on what he had brought with him, to wit, thoughts and fancies. Carriazo noticed that his friend ate little or nothing, and, by way of sounding him, he said on their way back to the inn, "We must be up betimes to-morrow morning, so that we may reach Orgez before the heat of the day."

"I am not disposed for that," replied Avendaño, "for I intend, before I leave this city, to see all that is worth seeing in it, such as the cathedral, the waterworks of Juanelo, the view from the top of St. Augustine's, the King's garden, and the promenade by the river."

"Very well, we can see all that in two days."

"What need of such haste? We are not posting to Rome to ask for a vacant benefice."

"Ha! ha! friend, I see how it is, I'll be hanged if you are not more inclined to stay in Toledo than to continue our journey."

"That's true, I confess; it is as impossible for me to forego the sight of that girl's face, as it is to get into heaven without good works."

"Gallantly spoken, and as becomes a generous breast like yours! Here's a pretty story! Don Tomas de Avendaño, son of the wealthy and noble cavalier, Don Juan de Avendaño, over head and ears in love with the scullery-maid at the Posada del Sevillano!"

"It strikes me, I may answer you in the same strain. Here's Don Diego de Carriazo, son and sole heir of the noble knight of Alcántara of the same name, a youth finely gifted alike in body and mind, and behold him in love — with whom, do you suppose? With queen Ginevra? No such thing, but with the tunny fisheries of Zahara, and all its rogues and rascals, — a more loathsome crew, I suspect, than ever beset St. Anthony in his temptations."

"You have given me tit for tat, friend, and slain me with my own weapon. Let us say no more now, but go to bed, and to-morrow who knows but we come to our senses?"

"Look ye, Carriazo, you have not yet seen Costanza; when you have seen her, I will give you leave to say what you like to me."

"Well, I know beforehand what will be the upshot of the matter."

"And that is?"

"That I shall be off to my tunny fisheries, and you will remain with your scullery-maid."

"I shall not be so happy."

"Nor I such a fool as to give up my own good purpose for the sake of your bad one."

By this time they reached the inn, where the conversation was prolonged in the same tone, half the night long. After they had slept, as it seemed to them, little more than an hour, they were awakened by the loud sound of clarions in the street. They sat up in bed, and after they had listened awhile, "I'll lay a wager," said Carriazo, "that it is already day, and that there is some feast or other in the convent of Nostra Señora del Carmen, in this neighbourhood, and that is why the clarions are pealing."

"That can't be," said Avendaño; "we have not been long asleep. It must be some time yet till dawn."

While they were talking, some one knocked at the door, and called out, "Young men, if you want to hear some fine music, go to the window of the next room, which looks on the street; it is not occupied."

They got up and opened the door, but the person who had spoken was gone. The music still continuing, however, they went in their shirts, just as they were, into the front room, where they found three or four other lodgers, who made place for them at the window; and soon afterwards an excellent voice sang a sonnet to the accompaniment of the harp. There was no need of any one to tell Carriazo and Avendaño that this music was intended for Costanza, for this was very clear from the words of the sonnet, which grated so horribly on Avendaño's ears, that he could have wished himself deaf rather than have heard it. The pangs of jealousy laid hold on him, and the worst of all was, that he knew not who was his rival. But this was soon made known to him when one of the persons at the window exclaimed, "What a simpleton is the corregidor's son, to make a practice of serenading a scullery-maid. It is true, she is one of the most beautiful girls I have ever seen, and I have seen a great many; but that is no reason why he should court her so publicly."

"After all," said another, "I have been told for certain that she makes no more account of him than if he never existed. I warrant she is this moment fast asleep behind her mistress's bed, without ever thinking of all this music."

"I can well believe it," said the first speaker, "for she is the most virtuous girl I know; and it is marvellous that though she lives in a house like this, where there is so much traffic, and where there are new comers every day, and though she goes about all the rooms, not the least thing in the world is known to her disparagement."

Avendaño began to breathe more freely after hearing this, and was able to listen to many fine things which were sung to the accompaniment of various instruments, all being addressed to Costanza, who, as the stranger said, was fast asleep all the while.

The musicians departed at the approach of dawn. Avendaño and Carriazo

returned to their room, where one of them slept till morning. They then rose, both of them eager to see Costanza, but the one only from curiosity, the other from love. Both were gratified; for Costanza came out of her master's room looking so lovely, that they both felt that all the praises bestowed on her by the muleteer, fell immeasurably short of her deserts. She was dressed in a green bodice and petticoat, trimmed with the same colour. A collar embroidered with black silk set off the alabaster whiteness of her neck. The thick tresses of her bright chestnut hair were bound up with white ribbon; she had pendants in her ears which seemed to be pearls, but were only glass; her girdle was a St. Francis cord, and a large bunch of keys hung at her side. When she came out of the room she crossed herself, and made a profound reverence with great devotion to an image of our Lady, that hung on one of the walls of the quadrangle. Then looking up and seeing the two young men intently gazing on her, she immediately retired again into the room, and called thence to Argüello to get up.

Carriazo, it must be owned, was much struck by Costanza's beauty; he admired it as much as his companion, only he did not fall in love with her; on the contrary, he had no desire to spend another night in the inn, but to set out at once for the fisheries.

La Argüello presently appeared in the gallery with two young women, natives of Galicia, who were also servants in the inn; for the number employed in the Sevillano was considerable, that being one of the best and most frequented houses of its kind in Toledo. At the same time the servants of the persons lodging in the inn began to assemble to receive oats for their masters' beasts; and the host dealt them out, all the while grumbling and swearing at his maid-servants who had been the cause of his losing the services of a capital hostler, who did the work so well and kept such good reckoning, that he did not think he had ever lost the price of a grain of oats by him. Avendaño, who heard all this, seized the opportunity at once. "Don't fatigue yourself, señor host," he said; "give me the account-book, and whilst I remain here I will give out the oats, and keep such an exact account of it that you will not miss the hostler who you say has left you."

"Truly I thank you for the offer, my lad," said the host, "for I have no time to attend to this business; I have too much to do, both indoors and out of doors. Come down and I will give you the book; and mind ye, these muleteers are the very devil, and will do you out of a peck of oats under your very nose, with no more conscience than if it was so much chaff."

Avendaño went down to the quadrangle, took the book, and began to serve out pecks of oats like water, and to note them down with such exactness that the landlord, who stood watching him, was greatly pleased with his performance. "I wish to God," he said, "your master would not come, and that you would make up your mind to stop with me; you would lose nothing by the change, believe me. The hostler who has just quitted me came here eight months ago all in tatters, and as lean as a shotten herring, and now he has two very good suits of clothes, and is as fat as a dormouse; for you must know, my son, that in this house there are excellent vails to be got over and above the wages."

"If I should stop," replied Avendaño, "I should not stand out much for the matter of what I should gain, but should be content with very little for sake of being in this city, which, they tell me, is the best in Spain."

"At least it is one of the best and most plentiful," said the host. "But we are in want of another thing, too, and that is a man to fetch water, for the lad that used to attend to that job has also left me. He was a smart fellow, and with the help of a famous ass of mine he used to keep all the tanks overflowing, and make a lake of the house. One of the reasons why the muleteers like to bring their employers to my house is, that they always find plenty of water in it for their beasts, instead of having to drive them down to the river."

Carriazo, who had been listening to this dialogue, and who saw Avendaño already installed in office, thought he would follow his example, well knowing how much it would gratify him. "Out with the ass, señor host," he said; "I'm your man, and will do your work as much to your satisfaction as my comrade."

"Aye, indeed," said Avendaño, "my comrade, Lope Asturiano will fetch water like a prince, I'll go bail for him."

La Argüello, who had been all the while within earshot, here put in her word. "And pray, my gentleman," said she to Avendaño, "who is to go bail for you? By my faith, you look to me as if you wanted some one to answer for you instead of your answering for another."

"Hold your tongue, Argüello," said her master; "don't put yourself forward where you're not wanted. I'll go bail for them, both of them. And mind, I tell you, that none of you women meddle or make with the men-servants, for it is through you they all leave me."

"So these two chaps are engaged, are they?" said another of the servant-women; "by my soul, if I had to keep them company I would never trust them with the wine-bag."

"None of your gibes, señora Gallega," cried her master; "do your work, and don't meddle with the men-servants, or I'll baste you with a stick."

"Oh, to be sure!" replied the Gallician damsel; "a'nt they dainty dears to make a body's mouth water? I'm sure master has never known me so frolicksome with the chaps in the house, nor yet out of it, that he should have such an opinion of me. The blackguards go away when they take it into their heads, without our giving them any occasion. Very like indeed they're the right sort to be in need of any one's putting them to bidding their masters an early good morning, when they least expect it."

"You've a deal to say for yourself, my friend," said the landlord; "shut your mouth and mind your business."

While this colloquy was going on Carriazo had harnessed the ass, jumped on his back, and set off to the river, leaving Avendaño highly delighted at witnessing his jovial resolution.

Here then, we have Avendaño and Carriazo changed, God save the mark! into Tomas Pedro, a hostler, and Lope Asturiano, a water-carrier: transformations surpassing those of the long-nosed poet. No sooner had la Argüello heard that they were hired, than she formed a design upon Asturiano, and marked him for her own, resolving to regale him in such a manner, that, if he was ever so shy, she would make him as pliant as a glove. The prudish Gallegan formed a similar design upon Avendaño, and, as the two women were great friends, being much together in their business by day, and bed-fellows at night, they at once confided their amorous purposes to each other; and that night they determined to begin the conquest of their two unimpassioned swains. Moreover they agreed that they must, in the first place, beg them not to be jealous about anything they might see them do with their persons; for girls could hardly regale their friends within doors, unless they put those without under contribution. "Hold your tongues, lads," said they, apostrophising their absent lovers, "hold your tongues and shut your eyes; leave the timbrel in the hands that can play it, and let those lead the dance that know how, and no pair of canons in this city will be better regaled than you will be by our two selves."

While the Gallegan and la Argüello were settling matters in this way, our good friend, Lope Asturiano, was on his way to the river, musing upon his beloved tunny fisheries and on his sudden change of condition. Whether it was for this reason, or that fate ordained it so, it happened that as he was riding down a steep and narrow lane, he ran against another water-carrier's ass, which was coming, laden, up-hill; and, as his own was fresh and lively and in good condition, the poor, half-starved, jaded brute that was toiling up hill, was knocked down, the pitchers were broken, and the water spilled. The driver of the fallen ass, enraged by this disaster, immediately flew upon the offender, and pommelled him soundly before poor Lope well knew where he was. At last, his senses were roused with a vengeance, and seizing his antagonist with both hands by the throat, he dashed him to the ground. That was not all, for, unluckily, the man's head struck violently against a stone; the wound was frightful, and bled so profusely, that Lope thought he had killed him. Several other water-carriers who were on their way to and from the river, seeing their comrade so maltreated, seized Lope and held him fast, shouting, "Justice! justice! this water-carrier has murdered a man." And all the while they beat and thumped him lustily. Others ran to the fallen man, and found that his skull was cracked, and that he was almost at the last gasp. The outcry spread all up the hill, and to the Plaza del Carmen, where it reached the ears of an alguazil, who flew to the spot with two police-runners. They did not arrive a moment too soon, for they found Lope surrounded by more than a score of water-carriers, who were basting his ribs at such a rate that there was almost as much reason to fear for his life as that of the wounded man. The alguazil took him out of their hands, delivered him and his ass into those of his followers, had the wounded man laid like a sack upon his own ass, and marched them all off to prison attended by such a crowd that they could hardly make way through the streets. The noise drew Tomas Pedro and his master to the door, and, to their great surprise, they saw Asturiano led by in the gripe of two police-runners, with his face all bloody. The landlord immediately looked about for his ass, and saw it in the hands of another catchpoll, who had joined the alguazil's party. He inquired the cause of these captures, was told what had happened, and was sorely distressed on account of his ass, fearing that he should lose it, or have to pay more for it than it was worth.

Tomas followed his comrade, but could not speak a single word to him, such was the throng round the prisoner, and the strictness of the catchpolls. Lope was thrust into a narrow cell in the prison, with a doubly grated window, and the wounded man was taken to the infirmary, where the surgeon pronounced his case extremely dangerous.

The alguazil took home the two asses with him, besides five pieces of eight which had been found on Lope. Tomas returned greatly disconcerted to the inn, where he found the landlord in no better spirits than himself, and gave him an account of the condition in which he had left his comrade, the danger of the wounded man, and the fate of the ass. "To add to the misfortune," said he, "I have just met a gentleman of Burgos, who tells me that my master will not now come this way. In order to make more speed and shorten his journey by two leagues, he has crossed the ferry at Aceca; he will sleep to-night at Orgaz, and has sent me twelve crowns, with orders to meet him at Seville. But that cannot be, for it is not in reason that I should leave my friend and comrade in prison and in such peril. My master must excuse me for the present, and I know he will, for he is so good-natured that he will put up with a little inconvenience rather than that I should forsake my comrade. Will you do me the favour, señor, to take this money, and see what you can do in this business. While you are spending this, I will write to my master for more, telling him all that has happened, and I am sure he will send us enough to get us out of any scrape.”

The host opened his eyes a palm wide in glad surprise to find himself indemnified for the loss of his ass. He took the money and comforted Tomas, telling him that he could make interest with persons of great influence in Toledo, especially a nun, a relation of the corregidor's, who could do anything she pleased with him. Now the washerwoman of the convent in which the nun lived had a daughter, who was very thick indeed with the sister of a friar, who was hand and glove with the said nun's confessor. All he had to do, then, was to get the washerwoman to ask her daughter to get the monk's sister to speak to her brother to say a good word to the confessor, who would prevail on the nun to write a note to the corregidor begging him to look into Lope's business, and then, beyond a doubt, they might expect to come off with flying colours; that is provided the water-carrier did not die of his wound, and provided also there was no lack of stuff to grease the palms of all the officers of justice, for unless they are well greased they creak worse than the wheels of a bullock cart.

Whatever Tomas thought of this roundabout way of making interest, he failed not to thank the innkeeper, and to assure him that he was confident his master would readily send the requisite money.

Argüello, who had seen her new flame in the hands of the officers, ran directly to the prison with some dinner for him; but she was not permitted to see him. This was a great grief to her, but she did not lose her hopes for all that. After the lapse of a fortnight the wounded man was out of danger, and in a week more, the surgeon pronounced him cured. During this time, Tomas Pedro pretended to have had fifty crowns sent to him from Seville, and taking them out of his pocket, he presented them to the innkeeper, along with a fictitious letter from his master. It was nothing to the landlord whether the letter was genuine or not, so he gave himself no trouble to authenticate it; but he received the fifty good gold crowns with great glee. The end of the matter was, that the wounded man was quieted with six ducats, and Asturiano was sentenced to the forfeiture of his ass, and a fine of ten ducats with costs, on the payment of which he was liberated.

On his release from prison, Asturiano had no mind to go back to the Sevillano, but excused himself to his comrade on the ground that during his confinement he had been visited by Argüello, who had pestered him with her fulsome advances, which were to him so sickening and insufferable, that he would rather be hanged than comply with the desires of so odious a jade. His intention was to buy an ass, and to do business as a water carrier on his own account as long as they remained in Toledo. This would protect him from the risk of being arrested as a vagabond; besides, it was a business he could carry on with great ease and satisfaction to himself, since with only one load of water, he could saunter about the city all day long, looking at silly wenches.

“Looking at beautiful women, you mean,” said his friend, “for of all the cities in Spain, Toledo has the reputation of being that in which the women surpass all others, whether in beauty or conduct. If you doubt it, only look at Costanza, who could spare from her superfluity of loveliness charms enough to beautify the rest of the women, not only of Toledo, but of the whole world.”

“Gently, señor Tomas; not so fast with your praises of the señora scullion, unless you wish that, besides thinking you a fool, I take you for a heretic into the bargain.”

“Do you call Costanza a scullion, brother Lope? God forgive you, and bring you to a true sense of your error.”

“And is not she a scullion?”

“I have yet to see her wash the first plate.”

“What does that matter, if you have seen her wash the second, or the fiftieth?”

“I tell you brother she does not wash dishes, or do anything but look after the business of the house, and take care of the plate, of which there is a great deal.”

“How is it, then, that throughout the whole city they call her the illustrious scullery-maid, if so be she does not wash dishes? Perhaps it is because she washes silver and not crockery that they give her that name. But to drop this subject, tell me, Tomas, how stand your hopes?”

“In a state of perdition; for during the whole time you were in gaol, I never have been able to say one word to her. It is true, that to all that is said to her by the guests in the house, she makes no other reply than to cast down her eyes and keep her lips closed; such is her virtue and modesty; so that her modesty excites my love, no less than her beauty. But it is almost too much for my patience, to think that the corregidor’s son, who is an impetuous and somewhat licentious youth, is dying for her; a night seldom passes but he serenades her, and that so openly, that she is actually named in the songs sung in her praise. She never hears them to be sure, nor ever quits her mistress’s room from the time she retires until morning; but in spite of all that, my heart cannot escape being pierced by the keen shaft of jealousy.”

“What do you intend to do, then, with this Portia, this Minerva, this new Penelope, who, under the form of a scullery-maid, has vanquished your heart?”

“Her name is Costanza, not Portia, Minerva, or Penelope. That she is a servant in an inn, I cannot deny; but what can I do, if, as it seems, the occult force of destiny, and the deliberate choice of reason, both impel me to adore her? Look you, friend, I cannot find words to tell you how love exalts and glorifies in my eyes this humble scullery-maid, as you call her, so that, though seeing her low condition, I am blind to it, and knowing it, I ignore it. Try as I may, it is impossible for me to keep it long before my eyes; for that thought is at once obliterated by her beauty, her grace, her virtue, and modesty, which tell me that, beneath that plebeian husk, must be concealed some kernel of extraordinary worth. In short, be it what it may, I love her, and not with that common-place love I have felt for others, but with a passion so pure that it knows no wish beyond that of serving her, and prevailing on her to love me, and return in the like kind what is due to my honourable affection.”

Here Lope gave a shout, and cried out in a declamatory tone, “O Platonic love! O illustrious scullery-maid! O thrice-blessed age of ours, wherein we see love renewing the marvels of the age of gold! O my poor tunnies, you must pass this year without a visit from your impassioned admirer, but next year be sure I will make amends, and you shall no longer find me a truant.”

“I see, Asturiano,” said Tomas, “how openly you mock me. Why don’t you go to your fisheries? There is nothing to hinder you. I will remain where I am, and you will find me here on your return. If you wish to take your share of the money with you, take it at once; go your ways in peace, and let each of us follow the course prescribed to him by his own destiny.”

“I thought you had more sense,” said Lope. “Don’t you know that I was only joking? But now that I perceive you are in earnest, I will serve you in earnest in everything I can do to please you. Only one thing I entreat in return for the many I intend to do for you: do not expose me to Argüello’s persecution, for I would rather lose your friendship than have to endure hers. Good God, friend! her tongue goes like the clapper of a mill; you can smell her breath a league off; all her front teeth are false, and it is my private opinion that she does not wear her own hair, but a wig. To crown all, since she began to make overtures to me, she has taken to painting white, till her face looks like nothing but a mask of plaster.”

“True, indeed, my poor comrade; she is worse even than the Gallegan who makes me suffer martyrdom. I’ll tell you what you shall do; only stay this night in the inn, and to-morrow you shall buy yourself an ass, find a lodging, and so secure yourself from the importunities of Argüello, whilst I remain exposed to those of the Gallegan, and to the fire of my Costanza’s eyes.”

This being agreed on, the two friends returned to the inn, where Asturiano was received with great demonstrations of love by Argüello. That night a great number of muleteers stopping in the house, and those near it, got up a dance before the door of the Sevillano. Asturiano played the guitar: the female dancers were the two Gallegans and Argüello, and three girls from another inn. Many persons stood by as spectators, with their faces muffled, prompted more by a desire to see Costanza than the dance; but they were disappointed, for she did not make her appearance. Asturiano played for the dancers with such spirit and precision of touch that they all vowed he made the guitar speak; but just as he was doing his best, accompanying the instrument with his voice, and the dancers were capering like mad, one of the muffled spectators cried out, "Stop, you drunken sot! hold your noise, wineskin, piperly poet, miserable catgut scraper!" Several others followed up this insulting speech with such a torrent of abuse that Lope thought it best to cease playing and singing; but the muleteers took the interruption so much amiss, that had it not been for the earnest endeavours of the landlord to appease them, there would have been a terrible row. In spite indeed of all he could do, the muleteers would not have kept their hands quiet, had not the watch happened just then to come up and clear the ground. A moment afterwards the ears of all who were awake in the quarter were greeted by an admirable voice proceeding from a man who had seated himself on a stone opposite the door of the Sevillano. Everybody listened with rapt attention to his song, but none more so than Tomas Pedro, to whom every word sounded like a sentence of excommunication, for the romance ran thus:

In what celestial realms of space Is hid that beauteous, witching face? Where shines that star, which, boding ills, My trembling heart with torment fills?

Why in its wrath should Heaven decree That we no more its light should see? Why bid that sun no longer cheer With glorious beams our drooping sphere?

Yes, second sun! 'tis true you shine, But not for us, with light divine! Yet gracious come from ocean's bed; Why hide from us your radiant head?

Constance! a faithful, dying swain Adores your beauty, though in vain; For when his love he would impart, You fly and scorn his proffered heart!

O let his tears your pity sway, And quick he'll bear you hence away; For shame it is this sordid place, Should do your charms such foul disgrace

Here you're submissive to control, Sweet mistress of my doating soul! But altars youths to you should raise, And passion'd vot'ries sound your praise!

Quit then a scene which must consume Unworthily your early bloom! To my soft vows your ear incline, Nor frown, but be for ever mine!

His gladsome torch let Hymen light, And let the god our hearts unite! This day would then before its end, See me your husband, lover, friend.

The last line was immediately followed by the flight of two brick-bats, which fell close to the singer's feet; but had they come in contact with his head, they would certainly have knocked all the music and poetry out of it. The poor frightened musician took to his heels with such speed that a greyhound could not have caught him. Unhappy fate of night-birds, to be always subject to such showers! All who had heard the voice of the fugitive admired it, but most of all, Tomas Pedro, only he would rather the words had not been addressed to

Costanza, although she had not heard one of them. The only person who found fault with the romance was a muleteer, nicknamed Barrabas. As soon as this man saw the singer run off, he bawled after him; "There you go, you Judas of a troubadour! May the fleas eat your eyes out! Who the devil taught you to sing to a scullery-maid about celestial realms, and spheres, and ocean-beds, and to call her stars and suns and all the rest of it? If you had told her she was as straight as asparagus, as white as milk, as modest as a lay-brother in his novitiate, more full of humours and unmanageable than a hired mule, and harder than a lump of dry mortar, why then she would have understood you and been pleased; but your fine words are fitter for a scholar than for a scullery-maid. Truly, there are poets in the world who write songs that the devil himself could not understand; for my part, at least, Barrabas though I am, I cannot make head or tail of what this fellow has been singing. What did he suppose Costanza could make of them? But she knows better than to listen to such stuff, for she is snug in bed, and cares no more for all these caterwaulers than she does for Prester John. This fellow at least, is not one of the singers belonging to the corregidor's son, for they are out and out good ones, and a body can generally understand them; but, by the Lord, this fellow sets me mad."

The bystanders coincided in opinion with Barrabas, and thought his criticism very judicious. Everybody now went to bed, but no sooner was the house all still, than Lope heard some one calling very softly at his bed-room door. "Who's there?" said he. "It is we," whispered a voice, "Argüello and the Gallegan. Open the door and let us in, for we are dying of cold."

"Dying of cold indeed," said Lope, "and we are in the middle of the dog days."

"Oh, leave off now, friend Lope," said the Gallegan; "get up and open the door; for here we are as fine as archduchesses."

"Archduchesses, and at this hour? I don't believe a word of it, but rather think you must be witches or something worse. Get out of that this moment, or, by all that's damnable, if you make me get up I'll leather you with my belt till your hinder parts are as red as poppies."

Finding that he answered them so roughly, and in a manner so contrary to their expectations, the two disappointed damsels returned sadly to their beds; but before they left the door, Argüello put her lips to the key-hole, and hissed through it, "Honey was not made for the mouth of the ass;" and with that, as if she had said something very bitter indeed, and taken adequate revenge on the scorner, she went off to her cheerless bed.

"Look you, Tomas," said Lope to his companion, as soon as they were gone, "set me to fight two giants, or to break the jaws of half a dozen, or a whole dozen of lions, if it be requisite for your service, and I shall do it as readily as I would drink a glass of wine; but that you should put me under the necessity of encountering Argüello, this is what I would never submit to, no, not if I were to be flayed alive. Only think, what damsels of Denmark fate has thrown upon us this night. Well, patience! To-morrow will come, thank God, and then we shall see."

"I have already told you, friend," replied Tomas, "that you may do as you please — either go on your pilgrimage, or buy an ass and turn water-carrier as you proposed."

"I stick to the water-carrying business," said Lope. "My mind is made up not to quit you at present."

They then went to sleep till daylight, when they rose; Tomas Pedro went to give out oats, and Lope set off to the cattle-market to buy an ass. Now it happened that Tomas had spent his leisure on holidays in composing some amorous verses, and had jotted them down in the book in which he kept the account of the oats, intending to copy them out fairly, and then blot them out of the book, or tear out the page. But, before he had done so, he happened to go out one day and leave the book on the top of the oat-bin. His master found it there, and looking into it to see how the account of the oats stood, he lighted upon the verses. Surprised and annoyed, he went off with them to his wife, but before he read them to her, he called Costanza into the room, and peremptorily commanded her to declare whether Tomas Pedro, the hostler, had over made love to her, or addressed any improper language to her, or any that gave token of his being partial to her. Costanza vowed that Tomas had never yet spoken to her in any such way, nor ever given her reason to suppose that he had any bad thoughts towards her.

Her master and mistress believed her, because they had always found her to speak the truth. Having dismissed her, the host turned to his wife and said, "I know not what to say of the matter. You must know, señora, that Tomas has written in this book, in which he keeps the account of the oats, verses that give me an ugly suspicion that he is in love with Costanza."

"Let me see the verses," said the wife, "and I'll tell you what we are to conclude."

"Oh, of course; as you are a poet you will at once see into his thoughts."

"I am not a poet, but you well know that I am a woman of understanding, and that I can say the four prayers in Latin."

"You would do better to say them in plain Spanish; you know your uncle the priest has told you that you make no end of blunders when you patter your Latin, and that what you say is good for nothing."

“That was an arrow from his niece’s quiver. She is jealous of seeing me take the Latin hours in hand, and make my way through them as easily as through a vineyard after the vintage.”

“Well, have it your own way. Listen now, here are the verses;” and he read some impassioned lines addressed to Costanza.

“Is there any more?” said the landlady.

“No. But what do you think of these verses?”

“In the first place, we must make sure that they are by Tomas.”

“Of that there can be no manner of doubt, for the handwriting is most unquestionably the same as that in which the account of the oats is kept.”

“Look ye, husband, it appears to me that although Costanza is named in the verses, whence it may be supposed that they were made for her, we ought not for that reason to set the fact down for certain, just as if we had seen them written, for there are other Costanzas in the world besides ours. But even supposing they were meant for her, there is not a word in them that could do her discredit. Let us be on the watch, and look sharply after the girl; for if he is in love with her, we may be sure he will make more verses, and try to give them to her.”

“Would it not be better to get rid of all this bother by turning him out of doors?”

“That is for you to do if you think proper. But really, by your own account, the lad does his work so well that it would go against one’s conscience to turn him off upon such slight grounds.”

“Very well; let us be on the watch as you say, and time will tell us what we have to do.” Here the conversation ended, and the landlord carried the book back to the place where he had found it.

Tomas returned in great anxiety to look for his book, found it, and that it might not occasion him another fright, he immediately copied out the verses, effaced the original, and made up his mind to hazard a declaration to Costanza upon the first opportunity that should present itself. Her extreme reserve, however, was such that there seemed little likelihood of his finding such an opportunity; besides, the great concourse of people in the house made it almost impossible that he should have any private conversation with her, — to the despair of her unfortunate lover. That day, however, it chanced that Costanza appeared with one cheek muffled, and told some one who asked her the reason, that she was suffering from a violent face ache. Tomas, whose wits were sharpened by his passion, instantly saw how he might avail himself of that circumstance. “Señora Costanza,” he said, “I will give you a prayer in writing, which you have only to recite once or twice, and it will take away your pain forthwith.”

“Give it me, if you please,” said Costanza, “and I will recite it; for I know how to read.”

“It must be on condition, however,” said Tomas, “that you do not show it to anybody; for I value it highly, and I should not wish it to lose its charm by being made known to many.”

“I promise you that no person shall see it; but let me have it at once, for I can hardly bear this pain.”

“I will write it out from memory, and bring it you immediately.”

This was the very first conversation that had ever taken place between Tomas and Costanza during all the time he had been in the house, which was nearly a month. Tomas withdrew, wrote out the prayer, and found means to deliver it, unseen by any one else, into Costanza’s hand; and she, with great eagerness, and no less devotion, went with it into a room, where she shut herself up alone. Then, opening the paper, she read as follows: —

“Lady of my soul, I am a gentleman of Burgos; and if I survive my father, I shall inherit a property of six thousand ducats yearly income. Upon the fame of your beauty, which spreads far and wide, I left my native place, changed my dress, and came in the garb in which you see me, to serve your master. If you would consent to be mine in the way most accordant with your virtue, put me to any proof you please, to convince you of my truth and sincerity; and when you have fully satisfied yourself in this respect, I will, if you consent, become your husband, and the happiest of men. For the present, I only entreat you not to turn such loving and guileless feelings as mine into the street; for if your master, who has no conception of them, should come to know my aspirations, he would condemn me to exile from your presence, and that would be the same thing as sentencing me to death. Suffer me, señora, to see you until you believe me, considering that he does not deserve the rigorous punishment of being deprived of the sight of you, whose only fault has been that he adores you. You can reply to me with your eyes, unperceived by any of the numbers who are always gazing upon you; for your eyes are such that their anger kills, but their compassion gives new life.”

When Tomas saw that Costanza had gone away to read his letter, he remained with a palpitating heart, fearing and hoping either his death-doom, or the one look that should bid him live. Presently Costanza returned, looking so beautiful in spite of her muffling, that if any extraneous cause could have heightened her loveliness, it might be supposed that her surprise at finding the contents of the paper so widely different from what she had expected, had produced that effect. In her hand she held the paper torn into small pieces, and returning, the fragments to Tomas, whose legs could hardly bear him up, “Brother Tomas,” she said, "this prayer of yours seems to me to savour more of witchcraft and delusion than of piety, therefore I do not choose to put faith in it or to use it, and I have torn it up that it may not be seen by any one more credulous than myself. Learn other prayers, for it is impossible that this one can ever do you any good."

So saying, she returned to her mistress's room, leaving Tomas sorely distressed, but somewhat comforted at finding that his secret remained safe confined to Costanza's bosom; for as she had not divulged it to her master, he reckoned that at least he was in no danger of being turned out of doors. He considered also, that in having taken the first step, he had overcome mountains of difficulties, for in great and doubtful enterprises the chief difficulty is always in the beginning.

Whilst these things were happening in the posada, Asturiano was going about the market in search of an ass. He examined a great many, but did not find one to his mind; though a gipsy tried hard to force upon him one that moved briskly enough, but more from the effects of some quicksilver which the vendor had put into the animal's ears, than from its natural spirit and nimbleness. But though the pace was good enough, Lope was not satisfied with the size, for he wanted an ass big and strong enough to carry himself and the water vessels, whether they were full or empty. At last a young fellow came up, and whispered in his ear, "If you want a beast of the right sort for a water-carrier's business, I have one close by in a meadow; a bigger or a better you will not find in Toledo. Take my advice, and never buy a gipsy's beast, for though they may seem sound and good, they are all shams, and full of hidden defects. If you want to buy the real thing, come along with me, and shut your mouth."

Lope consented, and away went the pair shoulder to shoulder, till they arrived at the King's Gardens, where they found several water-carriers seated under the shade of a water wheel, whilst their asses were grazing in an adjoining meadow. The vendor pointed out his ass, which took Lope's fancy immediately, and was praised by all present, as a very strong animal, a good goer, and a capital feeder. The bargain was soon struck, and Lope gave sixteen ducats for the ass, with all its accoutrements. The bystanders congratulated him on his purchase, and on his entrance into the business, assuring him that he had bought an exceedingly lucky ass, for the man who had sold him had, in less than a year, without over-working himself, made enough to buy two suits of clothes, over and above his own keep, and that of the ass, and the sixteen ducats, with which he intended to return to his native place, where a marriage had been arranged with a half kinswoman of his. Besides the water-carriers who assisted at the sale of the ass, there was a group of four stretched on the ground, and playing at primera, the earth serving them for a table, and their cloaks for a table cloth. Lope went up to watch their game, and saw that they played more like archdeacons than like water-carriers, each of them having before him a pile of more than a hundred reals in cuartos and in silver. Presently two of the players, having lost all they had, got up; whereupon the seller of the ass said, that, if there was a fourth hand, he would play, but he did not like a three-handed game.

Lope, who never liked to spoil sport, said that he would make a fourth. They sat down at once, and went at it so roundly that, in a few moments, Lope lost six crowns which he had about him, and finding himself without coin, said if they liked to play for the ass he would stake him. The proposal was agreed to, and he staked one quarter of the ass, saying they should play for him, quarter by quarter. His luck was so bad, that in four consecutive games he lost the four quarters of his ass, and they were won by the very man who had sold him. The winner got up to take possession, but Lope stopped him, observing that he had only played for and lost the four quarters of his ass, which the winner was welcome to take, but he must leave him the tail. This queer demand made all present shout with laughter; and some of them, who were knowing in the law, were of opinion that his claim was unreasonable, for when a sheep or any other beast is sold, the tail is never separated from the carcass, but goes as a matter of course with one of the hind quarters. To this Lope replied that in Barbary they always reckon five quarters to a sheep, the tail making the fifth, and being reckoned as valuable as any of the other quarters. He admitted that when a beast was sold alive, and not quartered, that the tail was included in the sale; but this was not to the point in question, for he had not sold his ass, but played it away, and it had never been his intention to stake the tail; therefore he required them forthwith to give him up the same, with everything thereto annexed, or pertaining, that is to say, the whole series of spinal bones, from the back of the skull to where they ended in the tail, and to the tips of the lowest hairs thereof.

“Well,” said one, “suppose it be as you say, and that your claim is allowed; leave the tail sticking to the rest of the ass, and hold on by it.”

“No,” said Lope, “give me up the tail, or all the water-carriers in the world shall never make me give up the ass. Don’t imagine because there are so many of you, that I will let you put any cheating tricks on me, for I am a man who can stand up to another man, and put two handbreadths of cold steel into his guts without his being able to tell how he came by them. Moreover, I won’t be paid in money for the tail at so much a pound, but I will have it in substance, and cut off from the ass, as I have said.”

The winner of the four quarters and the rest of the company began to think that it would not be advisable to resort to force in this business, for Lope seemed to them to be a man of such mettle, that he would not be vanquished without some trouble. Nor were they mistaken; for, as became a man who had spent three seasons at the tunny fisheries, where all sorts of rows and brawls are familiar things, he rattled out a few of the most out of the way oaths in vogue there, threw his cap into the air, whipped out a knife from beneath his cloak, and put himself into such a posture as struck the whole company with awe and respect. At last, one of them, who seemed the most rational, induced the rest to agree that Lope should be allowed to stake the tail against a quarter of the ass at a game of quinola. So said, so done. Lope won the first game; the loser was piqued and staked another quarter, which went the way of the first; and in two more games the whole ass was gone. He then proposed to play for money: Lope was unwilling, but was so importuned on all hands, that at last he consented; and such was his run of luck that he left his opponent without a maravedi. So intense was the loser's vexation, that he rolled and writhed upon the ground and knocked his head against it. Lope, however, like a good-natured, liberal gentleman, raised him up, returned all the money he had won, including the sixteen ducats the price of the ass, and even divided what he had left among the bystanders. Great was the surprise of them all at this extraordinary liberality; and had they lived in the time of the great Tamerlane, they would have made him king of the water-carriers.

Accompanied by a great retinue, Lope returned to the city, where he related his adventure to Tomas, who in turn recounted to him his own partial success. There was no tavern, or eating house, or rogues' gathering, in which the play for the ass was not known, the dispute about the tail, and the high spirit and liberality of the Asturian; but as the mob are for the most part unjust, and more prone to evil than to good, they thought nothing of the generosity and high mettle of the great Lope, but only of the tail; and he had scarcely been two days carrying water about the city, before he found himself pointed at by people who cried, "There goes the man of the tail!" The boys caught up the cry, and no sooner had Lope shown himself in any street, than it rang from one end to the other with shouts of "Asturiano, give up the tail! Give up the tail, Asturiano!" At first Lope said not a word, thinking that his silence would tire out his persecutors; but in this he was mistaken, for the more he held his tongue the more the boys wagged theirs, till at last he lost patience, and getting off his ass began to drub the boys; but this was only cutting off the heads of Hydra, and for every one he laid low by thrashing some boy, there sprang up on the instant, not seven but seven hundred more, that began to pester him more and more for the tail. At last he found it expedient to retire to the lodgings he had taken apart from his companion in order to avoid Argüello, and to keep close there until the influence of the malignant planet which then ruled the hours should have passed away, and the boys should have forgotten to ask him for the tail. For two days he never left the house except by night to go and see Tomas, and ask him how he got on. Tomas told him that since he had given the paper to Costanza he had never been able to speak a single word to her, and that she seemed to be more reserved than ever. Once he had found as he thought an opportunity to accost her, but before he could get out a word, she stopped him, saying, "Tomas, I am in no pain now, and therefore have no need of your words or of your prayers. Be content that I do not accuse you to the Inquisition, and give yourself no further trouble." But she made this declaration without any expression of anger in her countenance. Lope then related how the boys annoyed him, calling after him for the tail, and Tomas advised him not to go abroad, at least with his ass, or if he did that he should choose only the least frequented streets. If that was not enough, he had an unfailing remedy left, which was to get rid of his business and with it of the uncivil demand to which it subjected him. Lope asked him had the Gallegan come again to his room. He said she had not, but that she persisted in trying to ingratiate herself with him by means of dainties which she purloined out of what she cooked for the guests. After this conversation Lope went back to his lodgings, intending not to leave them again for another six days, at least in company with his ass.

It might be about eleven at night, when the corregidor most unexpectedly entered the Posado del Sevillano, at the head of a formidable posse. The host and even the guests were startled and agitated by his visit; for as comets, when they appear, always excite fears of disaster, just so the ministers of justice, when they suddenly enter a house, strike even guiltless consciences with alarm. The unwelcome visitor walked into a room, and called for the master of the house, who came tremblingly to know what might be the señor corregidor's pleasure. "Are you the landlord?" said the magistrate with great gravity. "Yes, señor, and your worship's humble servant to command," was the reply. The corregidor then ordered that every one else should quit the room, and leave him alone with the landlord. This being done, he resumed his questions.

"What servants have you in your inn, landlord?"

"Señor, I have two Gallegan wenches, a housekeeper, and a young man who gives out the oats and straw, and keeps the reckoning."

"No more?"

"No, señor."

"Then tell me, landlord, what is become of a girl who is said to be a servant in this house, and so beautiful that she is known all over this city as the illustrious scullery-maid? It has even reached my ears that my son Don Perequito is in love with her, and that not a night passes in which he does not serenade her."

“Señor, it is true that this illustrious scullery-maid, as they call her, is in my house, but she neither is my servant, nor ceases to be so.”

“I do not understand you. What do you mean by saying that she is and is not your servant?”

“It is the real truth, and if your worship will allow me, I will explain the matter to you, and tell you what I have never told to any one.”

“Before I hear what you have to say, I must first see this scullery-maid.”

Upon this the landlord went to the door and called to his wife to send in Costanza, When the landlady heard that, she was in great dismay, and began to wring her hands, saying, “Lord, have mercy on me! What can the corregidor want with Costanza, and alone! Some terrible calamity must surely have happened, for this girl’s beauty bewitches the men.”

“Don’t be alarmed, señora,” said Costanza, “I will go and see what the señor corregidor wants, and if anything bad has happened, be assured the fault is not mine;” and without waiting to be called a second time, she took a lighted candle in a silver candlestick, and went into the room where the corregidor was. As soon as he saw her, he bade the landlord shut the door, and then taking the candle out of her hand; and holding it near her face, he stood gazing at her from head to foot. The blush which this called up into Costanza’s cheeks, made her look so beautiful and so modest that it seemed to the corregidor he beheld an angel descended on earth. After a long scrutiny, “Landlord,” he said, “an inn is not fit setting for a jewel like this, and I now declare that my son Don Perequito has shown his good sense in fixing his affections so worthily. I say, damsel, that they may well call you not only illustrious, but most illustrious: but it should not be with the addition of scullery-maid, but with that of duchess.”

“She is no scullery-maid, señor,” said the host; “her only service in the house is to keep the keys of the plate, of which, by God’s bounty, I have some quantity for the service of the honourable guests who come to this inn.”

“Be that as it may, landlord,” returned the corregidor; “I say it is neither seemly nor proper that this damsel should live in an inn. Is she a relation of yours?”

“She is neither my relation nor my servant; and if your worship would like to know who she is, your worship shall hear, when she is not present, things that will both please and surprise you.”

“I should like to know it. Let Costanza retire, and be assured she may count on me in all things, as she would upon her own father; for her great modesty and beauty oblige all who see her to offer themselves for her service.”

Costanza replied not a word, but with great composure made a profound reverence to the corregidor. On leaving the room she found her mistress waiting in great agitation. She told her all that had passed, and how her master remained with the corregidor to tell some things, she knew not what, which he did not choose her to hear. All this did not quite tranquilise the landlady, nor did she entirely recover her equanimity until the corregidor went away, and she saw her husband safe and free. The latter meanwhile had told the corregidor the following tale: —

“It is now, by my reckoning, señor, fifteen years, one month, and four days, since there came to this house a lady dressed in the habit of a pilgrim, and carried in a litter. She was attended by four servant-men on horseback, and two dueñas and a damsel who rode in a coach. She had also two sumpter mules richly caparisoned, and carrying a fine bed and all the necessary implements for cooking. In short, the whole equipage was first rate, and the pilgrim had all the appearance of being some great lady; and though she seemed to be about forty years of age, she was nevertheless beautiful in the extreme. She was in bad health, looked pale, and was so weary, that she ordered her bed to be instantly made, and her servants made it in this very room. They asked me who was the most famous physician in this city. I said Doctor de la Fuente. They went for him instantly; he came without delay, saw his patient alone, and the result was that he ordered the bed to be made in some other part of the house, where the lady might not be disturbed by any noise, which was immediately done. None of the men-servants entered the lady’s apartment, but only the two dueñas and the damsel. My wife and I asked the men-servants who was this lady, what was her name, whence she came, and whither she was going? Was she wife, widow, or maid, and why she wore that pilgrim’s dress? To all these questions, which we repeated many and many a time, we got no other answer than that this pilgrim was a noble and wealthy lady of old Castile, that she was a widow, and had no children to inherit her wealth; and that having been for some months ill of the dropsy, she had made a vow to go on a pilgrimage to our Lady of Guadalupe, and that was the reason for the dress she wore. As for her name, they were under orders to call her nothing but the lady pilgrim.

“So much we learned then; but three days after one of the dueñas called myself and my wife into the lady’s presence, and there, with the door locked, and before her women, she addressed us with tears in her eyes, I believe in these very words: —

““Heaven is my witness, friends, that without any fault of mine, I find myself in the cruel predicament which I shall now declare to you. I am pregnant, and so near my time, that I already feel the pangs of travail. None of my men-servants are aware of my misfortune, but from my women here I have neither been able nor desirous to conceal it. To escape prying eyes in my own neighbourhood, and that this hour might not come upon me there, I made a vow to go to our Lady of Guadalupe; but it is plainly her will that my labour should befall me in your house. It is now for you to succour and aid me with the secrecy due to one who commits her honour to your hands. In this purse there are two hundred gold crowns, which I present to you as a first proof how grateful I shall be for the good offices I am sure you will render me;’ and taking from under her pillow a green silk purse, embroidered with gold, she put it into the hands of my wife, who, like a simpleton, stood gaping at the lady, and did not say so much as a word in the way of thanks or acknowledgment. For my part I remember that I said there was no need at all of that, we were not persons to be moved more by interest than by humanity to do a good deed when the occasion offered. The lady then continued, ‘You must immediately, my friends, look out for some place to which you may convey my child as soon as it is born, and also you must contrive some story to tell to the person in whose charge you will leave it. At first I wish the babe to remain in this city, and afterwards to be taken to a village. As for what is subsequently done, I will give you instructions on my return from Guadalupe, if it is God’s will that I should live to complete my pilgrimage, for in the meantime I shall have had leisure to consider what may be my best course. I shall have no need of a midwife; for as I know from other confinements of mine, more honourable than this, I shall do well enough with the aid of my women only, and thus I shall avoid having an additional witness to my misfortune.’

“Here the poor distressed pilgrim ended what she had to say, and broke out into a flood of tears, but was partly composed by the soothing words spoken to her by my wife, who had recovered her wits. I immediately went in search of a woman to whom I might take the child when it was born; and, between twelve and one o’clock that night, when all the people in the house were fast asleep, the lady was delivered of the most beautiful little girl that eyes ever beheld, and the very same that your worship has just seen. But the wonder was that neither did the mother make any moan in her labour, nor did the baby cry; but all passed off quietly, and in all the silence that became this extraordinary case. The lady kept her bed for six days, during which the doctor was constant in his visits; not that she had informed him of the cause of her illness, or that she took any of the medicines he prescribed; but she thought to blind her men-servants by his visits, as she afterwards informed me when she was out of danger. On the eighth day she left her bed, apparently as big as she had been before her delivery, continued her pilgrimage, and returned in three weeks, looking almost quite well, for she had gradually reduced the bulk of her artificial dropsy. The little girl had been christened Costanza, in accordance with the order given me by her mother, and was already placed with a nurse in a village about two leagues hence, where she passed for my niece. The lady was pleased to express her satisfaction with all I had done, and gave me when she was going away a gold chain, which is now in my possession, from which she took off six links, telling me that they would be brought by the person who should come to claim the child. She also took a piece of white parchment, wrote upon it, and then cut zigzag through what she had written. Look, sir, here are my hands locked together with the fingers interwoven. Now suppose your honour were to write across my fingers, it is easy to imagine that one could read the writing whilst the fingers were joined, but that the meaning would be lost as soon as the hands were separated, and would appear again as soon as they were united as before. Just so with the parchment; one half serves as a key to the other; when they are put together the letters make sense, but separately they have no meaning. One-half of the parchment and the whole chain, short of the six links, were left with me, and I keep them still, always expecting the arrival of the person who is to produce the counterparts; for the lady told me that in two years she would send for her daughter, charging me that I should have her brought up not as became her mother's quality, but as a simple villager; and if by any chance she was not able to send for the child so soon, I was on no account to acquaint her with the secret of her birth, even should she have arrived at years of discretion. The lady moreover begged me to excuse her if she did not tell me who she was; having for the present important reasons to conceal her name. Finally, after giving us four hundred gold crowns more, and embracing my wife with tears, she departed, leaving us filled with admiration for her discretion, worth, beauty, and modesty.

"Costanza remained at nurse in the village for two years. At the end of that time I brought her home, and have kept her ever since constantly with me, in the dress of a girl who had to work for her bread, as her mother directed. Fifteen years, one month, and four days I have been looking for the person who should come and claim her, but the length of time that has elapsed makes me begin to lose all hope of his coming. If he does not make his appearance before this year is out, it is my determination to adopt her and bequeath her all I am worth, which is upwards of sixteen thousand ducats, thanks be to God. It now remains for me, señor Corregidor, to enumerate to you the virtues and good qualities of Costanza, if it be possible for me to express them. First and foremost, she is most piously devoted to our Lady; she confesses and communicates every month; she can read and write; there's not a better lace maker in all Toledo; she sings without accompaniment like an angel; in the matter of behaving with propriety she has not her equal; as for her beauty, your worship has seen it with your own eyes. Señor Don Pedro, your worship's son, has never exchanged a word with her in her life. It is true that from time to time he treats her to some music, which she never listens to. Many señors, and men of title too, have put up at this house, and have delayed their journey for several days solely to have their fill of looking at her; but I well know there is not one of them can boast with truth that she ever gave them opportunity to say one word to her either alone or before folk. This, señor, is the real history of the illustrious scullery-maid, who is no scullion, in which I have not departed one tittle from the truth."

The host had long ended his narrative before the corregidor broke silence, so much was he struck by the strange facts he had heard. At last he desired to see the parchment and the chain; the host produced them without delay, and they corresponded exactly to the description he had given of them. The chain was of curious workmanship, and on the parchment were written, one under the other, on the projecting portions of the zigzag, the letters, TIITEREOE which manifestly required to be joined with those of the counterpart to make sense. The corregidor admired the ingenuity of the contrivance, and judged from the costliness of the chain, that the pilgrim must have been a lady of great wealth. It was his intention to remove the lovely girl from the inn as soon as he had chosen a suitable convent for her abode; but for the present he contented himself with taking away the parchment only, desiring the innkeeper to inform him if any one came for Costanza, before he showed that person the chain, which he left in his custody. And with this parting injunction the corregidor left the house, much marvelling at what he had seen and heard.

Whilst all this affair was going on, Tomas was almost beside himself with agitation and alarm, and lost in a thousand conjectures, every one of which he dismissed as improbable the moment it was formed. But when he saw the corregidor go away, leaving Costanza behind him, his spirits revived and he began to recover his self-possession. He did not venture to question the landlord, nor did the latter say a word about what had passed between him and the corregidor to any body but his wife, who was greatly relieved thereby, and thanked God for her delivery out of a terrible fright.

About one o'clock on the following day, there came to the inn two elderly cavaliers of venerable presence, attended by four servants on horseback and two on foot. Having inquired if that was the Posada del Sevillano, and being answered in the affirmative, they entered the gateway, and the four mounted servants, dismounting, first helped their master's out of their saddles. Costanza came out to meet the new-comers with her wonted propriety of demeanour, and no sooner had one of the cavaliers set eyes on her, than, turning to his companion, he said, "I believe, señor Don Juan, we have already found the very thing we are come in quest of." Tomas, who had come as usual to take charge of the horses and mules, instantly recognised two of his father's servants; a moment after he saw his father himself, and found that his companion was no other than the father of Carriazo. He instantly conjectured that they were both on their way to the tunny fisheries to look for himself and his friend, some one having no doubt told them that it was there, and not in Flanders, they would find their sons. Not daring to appear before his father in the garb he wore, he made a bold venture, passed by the party with his hand before his face, and went to look for Costanza, whom, by great good luck, he found alone. Then hurriedly, and with a tremulous voice, dreading lest she would not give him time to say a word to her, "Costanza," he said, "one of those two elderly cavaliers is my father — that one whom you will hear called Don Juan de Avendaño. Inquire of his servants if he has a son, Don Tomas de Avendaño by name, and that is myself. Thence you may go on to make such other inquiries as will satisfy you that I have told you the truth respecting my quality, and that I will keep my word with regard to every offer I have made you. And now farewell, for I will not return to this house until they have left it."

Costanza made him no reply, nor did he wait for any, but hurrying out, with his face concealed as he had come in, he went to acquaint Carriazo that their fathers had arrived at the Sevillano. The landlord called for Tomas to give out oats, but no Tomas appearing, he had to do it himself.

Meanwhile, one of the two cavaliers called one of the Gallegan wenches aside, and asked her what was the name of the beautiful girl he had seen, and was she a relation of the landlord or the landlady. "The girl's name is Costanza," replied the Gallegan; "she is no relation either to the landlord or the landlady, nor do I know what she is. All I can say is, I wish the murrain had her, for I don't know what there is about her, that she does not leave one of us girls in the house a single chance, for all we have our own features too, such as God made them. Nobody enters these doors but the first thing he does is to ask, Who is that beautiful girl? and the next is to say all sorts of flattering things of her, while nobody condescends to say a word to the rest of us, not so much as 'What are you doing here, devils, or women, or whatever you are?'"

"From your account, then," said the gentleman, "I suppose she has a fine time of it with the strangers who put up at this house."

"You think so. Well, just you hold her foot for the shoeing, and see how you'll like the job. By the Lord, señor, if she would only give her admirers leave to look at her, she might roll in gold; but she's more touch-me-not than a hedgehog; she's a devourer of Ave Marias, and spends the whole day at her needle and her prayers. I wish I was as sure of a good legacy as she is of working miracles some day. Bless you, she's a downright saint; my mistress says she wears hair-cloth next her skin."

Highly delighted with what he had heard from the Gallegan, the gentleman did not wait till they had taken off his spurs, but called for the landlord, and withdrew with him into a private room. "Señor host," said he, "I am come to redeem a pledge of mine which has been in your hands for some years, and I bring you for it a thousand gold crowns, these links of a chain, and this parchment."

The host instantly recognised the links and the parchment, and highly delighted with the promise of the thousand crowns, replied, "Señor, the pledge you wish to redeem is in this house, but not the chain or the parchment which is to prove the truth of your claim; I pray you therefore to have patience, and I will return immediately." So saying, he ran off to inform the corregidor of what was happening.

The corregidor, who had just done dinner, mounted his horse without delay, and rode to the Posada del Sevillano, taking with him the tally parchment. No sooner had he entered the room where the two cavaliers sat, than hastening with open arms to embrace one of them, "Bless my soul! my good cousin Don Juan de Avendaño! This is indeed a welcome surprise."

"I am delighted to see you, my good cousin," said Don Juan, "and to find you as well as I always wish you. Embrace this gentleman, cousin; this is Don Diego de Carriazo, a great señor and my friend."

"I am already acquainted with the señor Don Diego," replied the corregidor, "and am his most obedient servant."

After a further interchange of civilities they passed into another room, where they remained alone with the innkeeper, who said as he produced the chain, "The señor corregidor knows what you are come for, Don Diego de Carriazo. Be pleased to produce the links that are wanting to this chain; his worship will show the parchment which he holds, and let us come to the proof for which I have been so long waiting."

"It appears, then," said Don Diego, "that it will not be necessary to explain to the señor corregidor the reason of our coming, since you have done so already, señor landlord."

"He told me something," said the corregidor, "but he has left much untold which I long to know. Here is the parchment."

Don Diego produced that which he had brought; the two were put together and found to fit accurately into each other; and between every two letters of the innkeeper's portion, which as we have said were TIITEREOE there now appeared one of the following series HSSHTUTKN, the whole making together the words, This is the true token. The six links of the chain brought by Don Diego were then compared with the larger fragment, and found to correspond exactly.

“So far all is clear,” said the corregidor; “it now remains for us to discover, if it be possible, who are the parents of this very beautiful lady.”

“Her father,” said Don Diego, “you see in me; her mother is not living, and you must be content with knowing that she was a lady of such rank that I might have been her servant. But though I conceal her name, I would not have you suppose that she was in any wise culpable, however manifest and avowed her fault may appear to have been. The story I will now briefly relate to you will completely exonerate her memory.

“You must know, then, that Costanza’s mother, being left a widow by a man of high rank, retired to an estate of hers, where she lived a calm sequestered life among her servants and vassals. It chanced one day when I was hunting, that I found myself very near her house and determined to pay her a visit. It was siesta time when I arrived at her palace (for I can call it nothing else): giving my horse to one of my servants, I entered, and saw no one till I was in the very room in which she lay asleep on a black ottoman. She was extremely handsome; the silence, the loneliness of the place, and the opportunity, awakened my guilty desires, and without pausing to reflect, I locked the door, woke her, and holding her firmly in my grasp said, ‘No cries, señora! they would only serve to proclaim your dishonour; no one has seen me enter this room, for by good fortune all your servants are fast asleep, and should your cries bring them hither, they can do no more than kill me in your very arms; and if they do, your reputation will not be the less blighted for all that.’ In fine, I effected my purpose against her will and by main force, and left her so stupefied by the calamity that had befallen her, that she either could not or would not utter one word to me. Quitting the place as I had entered it, I rode to the house of one of my friends, who resided within two leagues of my victim’s abode. The lady subsequently removed to another residence, and two years passed without my seeing her, or making any attempt to do so. At the end, of that time I heard that she was dead.

“About three weeks since I received a letter from a man who had been the deceased lady’s steward, earnestly entreating me to come to him, as he had something to communicate to me which deeply concerned my happiness and honour. I went to him, very far from dreaming of any such thing as I was about to hear from him, and found him at the point of death. He told me in brief terms that his lady on her deathbed had made known to him what had happened between her and me, how she had become pregnant, had made a pilgrimage to our Lady of Guadalupe to conceal her misfortune, and had been delivered in this inn of a daughter named Costanza. The man gave me the tokens upon which she was to be delivered to me, namely the piece of chain and the parchment, and with them thirty thousand gold crowns, which the lady had left as a marriage portion for her daughter. At the same time, he told me that it was the temptation to appropriate that money which had so long prevented him from obeying the dying behest of his mistress, but now that he was about to be called to the great account, he was eager to relieve his conscience by giving me up the money and putting me in the way to find my daughter. Returning home with the money and the tokens, I related the whole story to Don Juan de Avendaño, and he has been kind enough to accompany me to this city."

Don Diego had but just finished his narrative when some one was heard shouting at the street-door, "Tell Tomas Pedro, the hostler, that they are taking his friend the Asturiano to prison." On hearing this the corregidor immediately sent orders to the alguazil to bring in his prisoner, which was forthwith done. In came the Asturian with his mouth all bloody. He had evidently been very roughly handled, and was held with no tender grasp by the alguazil. The moment he entered the room he was thunderstruck at beholding his own father and Avendaño's, and to escape recognition he covered his face with a handkerchief, under pretence of wiping away the blood. The corregidor inquired what that young man had done who appeared to have been so roughly handed. The alguazil replied that he was a water-carrier, known by the name of the Asturian, and the boys in the street used to shout after him, "Give up the tail, Asturiano; give up the tail." The alguazil then related the story out of which that cry had grown, whereat all present laughed not a little. The alguazil further stated that as the Asturian was going out at the Puerta de Alcantara, the boys who followed him having redoubled their cries about the tail, he dismounted from his ass, laid about them all, and left one of them half dead with the beating he had given him. Thereupon the officer proceeded to arrest him; he resisted, and that was how he came to be in the state in which he then appeared. The corregidor ordered the prisoner to uncover his face, but as he delayed to do so the alguazil snatched away the handkerchief. "My son, Don Diego!" cried the astonished father. "What is the meaning of all this? How came you in that dress? What, you have not yet left off your scampish tricks?" Carriazo fell on his knees before his father, who, with tears in his eyes, held him long in his embrace. Don Juan de Avendaño, knowing that his son had accompanied Carriazo, asked the latter where he was, and received for answer the news that Don Tomas de Avendaño was the person who gave out the oats and straw in that inn.

This new revelation made by the Asturiano put the climax to the surprises of the day. The corregidor desired the innkeeper to bring in his hostler. "I believe he is not in the house, but I will go look for him," said he, and he left the room for that purpose. Don Diego asked Carriazo what was the meaning of these metamorphoses, and what had induced him to turn water-carrier, and Don Tomas hostler? Carriazo replied, that he could not answer these questions in public, but he would do so in private. Meanwhile Tomas Pedro lay hid in his room, in order to see thence, without being himself seen, what his father and Carriazo's were doing; but he was in great perplexity about the arrival of the corregidor, and the general commotion in the inn. At last some one having told the landlord where he was hidden, he went and tried half by fair means and half by force to bring him down; but he would not have succeeded had not the corregidor himself gone out into the yard, and called him by his own name, saying, "Come down, señor kinsman; you will find neither bears nor lions in your way." Tomas then left his hiding place, and went and knelt with downcast eyes and great submission at the feet of his father, who embraced him with a joy surpassing that of the Prodigal's father when the son who had been lost was found again.

The corregidor sent for Costanza, and taking her by the hand, presented her to her father, saying, "Receive, Señor Don Diego, this treasure, and esteem it the richest you could desire. And you, beautiful maiden, kiss your father's hand, and give thanks to heaven which has so happily exalted your low estate." Costanza, who till that moment had not even guessed at what was occurring, could only fall at her father's feet, all trembling with emotion, clasp his hands in hers, and cover them with kisses and tears.

Meanwhile the corregidor had been urgent with his cousin Don Juan that the whole party should come with him to his house; and though Don Juan would have declined the invitation, the corregidor was so pressing that he carried his point, and the whole party got into his coach, which he had previously sent for. But when the corregidor bade Costanza take her place in it, her heart sank within her; she threw herself into the landlady's arms, and wept so piteously, that the hearts of all the beholders were moved. "What is this, daughter of my soul?" said the hostess; "Going to leave me? Can you part from her who has reared you with the love of a mother?" Costanza was no less averse to the separation; but the tenderhearted corregidor declared that the hostess also should enter the coach, and that she should not be parted from her whom she regarded as a daughter, as long as she remained in Toledo. So the whole party, including the hostess, set out together for the corregidor's house, where they were well received by his noble lady.

After they had enjoyed a sumptuous repast, Carriazo related to his father how, for love of Costanza, Don Tomas had taken service as hostler in the inn, and how his devotion to her was such that, before he knew her to be a lady, and the daughter of a man of such quality, he would gladly have married her even as a scullery-maid. The wife of the corregidor immediately made Costanza put on clothes belonging to a daughter of hers of the same age and figure, and if she had been beautiful in the dress of a working girl, she seemed heavenly in that of a lady, and she wore it with such ease and grace that one would have supposed she had never been used to any other kind of costume from her birth. But among so many who rejoiced, there was one person who was full of sadness, and that was Don Pedro, the corregidor's son, who at once concluded that Costanza was not to be his; nor was he mistaken, for it was arranged between the corregidor, Don Diego de Carriazo, and Don Juan de Avendaño, that Don Tomas should marry Costanza, her father bestowing upon her the thirty thousand crowns left by her mother; that the water-carrier Don Diego de Carriazo should marry the daughter of the corregidor, and that Don Pedro the corregidor's son, should receive the hand of Don Juan de Avendaño's daughter, his father undertaking to obtain a dispensation with regard to their relationship. In this manner all were finally made happy. The news of the three marriages, and of the singular fortune of the illustrious scullery-maid, spread through the city, and multitudes flocked to see Costanza in her new garb as a lady, which became her so well. These persons saw the hostler Tomas Pedro changed into Don Tomas de Avendaño, and dressed as a man of quality. They observed, too, that Lope Asturiano looked very much the gentleman since he had changed his costume, and dismissed the ass and the water-vessels; nevertheless, there were not wanting some who, as he passed through the streets in all his pomp, still called out to him for the tail.

After remaining a month in Toledo most of the party went to Burgos, namely, Don Diego de Carriazo, his wife, and his father; Costanza, and her husband, Don Tomas, and the corregidor's son, who desired to visit his kinswoman and destined bride. The host was enriched by the present of the thousand crowns, and by the many jewels which Costanza bestowed upon her señora, as she persisted in calling her who had brought her up. The story of the illustrious scullery-maid afforded the poets of the golden Tagus a theme on which to exercise their pens in celebrating the incomparable beauty of Costanza, who still lives happily with her faithful hostler. Carriazo has three sons, who, without inheriting their father's tastes, or caring to know whether or not there are any such things as tunny fisheries in the world, are all pursuing their studies at Salamanca; whilst their father never sees a water-carrier's ass but he thinks of the one he drove in Toledo, and is not without apprehension that, when he least expects it, his ears shall be saluted with some squib having for its burden, "Give us the tail, Asturiano! Asturiano, give us the tail!"

THE TWO DAMSELS.

Five leagues from the city of Seville there is a town called Castelblanco. At one of the many inns belonging to that town there arrived at nightfall a traveller, mounted on a handsome nag of foreign breed. He had no servant with him, and, without waiting for any one to hold his stirrup, he threw himself nimbly from the saddle. The host, who was a thrifty, active man, quickly presented himself, but not until the traveller had already seated himself on a bench under the gateway, where the host found him hastily unbuttoning his breast, after which he let his arms drop and fainted. The hostess, who was a good-natured soul, made haste to sprinkle his face with cold water, and presently he revived. Evidently ashamed of having been seen in such a state, he buttoned himself up again, and asked for a room to which he might retire, and, if possible, be alone. The hostess said they had only one in the house and that had two beds, in one of which she must accommodate any other guest that might arrive. The traveller replied that he would pay for both beds, guest or no guest; and taking out a gold crown he gave it to the hostess, on condition that no one should have the vacant bed. The hostess, well satisfied with such good payment, promised that she would do as he required, though the Dean of Seville himself should arrive that night at her house. She then asked him if he would sup. He declined, and only begged they would take great care of his nag. Then, taking the key of the chamber, and carrying with him a large pair of leathern saddle-bags, he went in, locked the door, and even, as it afterwards appeared, barricaded it with two chairs.

The moment he was gone, the host, the hostess, the hostler, and two neighbours who chanced to be there, held a council together, and all extolled the great comeliness and graceful deportment of the stranger, agreeing that they had never seen any one so handsome. They discussed his age, and came to the conclusion that it was between sixteen and seventeen. They speculated largely as to what might have been the cause of his fainting, but could make no plausible guess at it. The neighbours after a while went home, the host went to look after the nag, and the hostess to prepare supper in case any other guest should arrive; nor was it long before another entered, not much older than the first, and of no less engaging mien, so that the hostess no sooner saw him than she exclaimed, "God bless me! how is this? Are angels coming to stop here to-night?"

"Why does the lady hostess say that?" said the cavalier.

"It is not for nothing I say it. Only I must beg your honour not to dismount, for I have no bed to give you; for the two I had have been taken by a cavalier who has paid for both, though he has no need of more than one; but he does that because no one else may enter the room, being, I suppose, fond of solitude; though upon my conscience I can't tell why, for his face and appearance are not such that he need be ashamed of them or want to hide them, but quite the contrary."

"Is he so good-looking, señora hostess?"

"Good-looking? Ay, the best of good-looking."

"Here, my man, hold my stirrup," said the cavalier to a muleteer who accompanied him; "for though I have to sleep on the floor, I must see a man of whom I hear such high encomiums;" and then dismounting he called for supper, which was immediately placed before him. Presently an alguazil dropped in — as they commonly do at the inns in small towns — and taking a seat, entered into conversation with the cavalier while he supped; not forgetting at intervals to swallow three large glasses of wine, and the breast and leg of a partridge, which the cavalier gave him. He paid his scot meanwhile by asking news of the capital, of the wars in Flanders, and the decay of the Turk, not forgetting the exploits of the Transylvanian, whom God preserve. The cavalier supped and said nothing, not having come from a place which would have supplied him with the means of satisfying these inquiries. By and by, the innkeeper, having seen to the nag, came in and sat down to make a third in the conversation, and to taste his own wine no less copiously than the alguazil; and at every gulp he leaned his head back over his left shoulder, and praised the wine, which he exalted to the clouds, though he did not leave much of it there, for fear it should get watered.

From one subject to another, the host fell at last upon the praises of the first comer; told how he had fainted, how he had gone to bed without supper, and had locked himself in; and spoke of his well-filled saddle-bags, the goodness of his nag, and the handsome travelling-dress he wore, all which made it strange that he travelled without any attendant. The cavalier felt his curiosity piqued anew, and asked the landlord to contrive that he might sleep in the second bed, for which he would give him a gold crown. The landlord's fingers itched to take the money; but he said the thing was impossible, for the door was locked inside, and he durst not wake the sleeper, who had paid so well for both the beds. The alguazil, however, got over the difficulty. "I'll tell you what is to be done," said he. "I will knock at the door, and say that I am an officer of justice; that I have orders from the señor alcalde to see this cavalier accommodated in this inn; and that as there is no other bed, he must have one of those two. The landlord will cry out against this, and say it is not fair, for the second bed is already engaged and paid for; and so he will clear himself of all responsibility, while your honour will attain your object.” This scheme of the alguazil’s was unanimously approved, and the cavalier rewarded him for it with four reals. It was carried into effect at once; the first guest was compelled, with manifest reluctance, to open the door; the second entered the room with many apologies for the intrusion, to which the first made no reply, nor did he even show his face; for instantly hastening back into bed, he turned to the wall, and pretended to be asleep. The last comer also went to bed, hoping to have his curiosity satisfied in the morning when they both got up.

The night was one of the long and weary ones of December, when the cold and the fatigues of the day should naturally have disposed the two travellers to sleep; but they had not that effect on the first of the pair, who not long after midnight began to sigh and moan as if his heart would break. His lamentations awoke the occupant of the other bed, who distinctly overheard the following soliloquy, though uttered in a faint and tremulous voice, broken by sighs and sobs.

“Wretch that I am! Whither is the irresistible force of my destiny hurrying me? What a path is mine; and what issue can I hope for out of the labyrinth in which I am entangled? O my youth and inexperience! Honour disregarded! Love ungratefully repaid! Regard for honoured parents and kindred trampled under foot! Woe is me a thousand times to have thus given the reins to my inclinations! O false words which I have too trustingly responded to by deeds! But of whom do I complain? Did I not wilfully betray myself? Did not my own hands wield the knife that cut down my reputation, and destroyed the trust which my parents reposed in my rectitude? O perjured Marco Antonio! Is it possible that your honeyed words concealed so much of the gall of unkindness and disdain? Where art thou, ingrate? Whither hast thou fled, unthankful man? Answer her who calls upon thee! Wait for her who pursues thee; sustain me, for I droop; pay me what thou owest me; succour me since thou art in so many ways bound to me!”

Here the sorrowing stranger relapsed into silence, broken only by sobs. The other, who had been listening attentively, inferred from what he had heard that the speaker was a woman. The curiosity he had before felt was now excited to the highest degree: he was several times on the point of approaching the lady’s bed; and he would have done so at last, but just then he heard her open the door, call to the landlord, and bid him saddle the nag, for she wanted to go. It was a pretty long time before she could make the landlord hear her; and finally, all the answer she could obtain was a recommendation to go to sleep again, for there was more than half the night yet to come, and it was so dark that it would be a very rash thing to venture upon the road. Upon this she said no more, but shut the door, and went back to bed, sighing dismally.

The other stranger now thought it would be well to address her, and offer her his aid in any way that might be serviceable, as a means of inducing her to say who she was, and relate her piteous story. "Assuredly, señor gentleman," said he, "I should think myself destitute of natural feeling — nay, that I had a heart of stone and a bosom of brass — if your sighs and the words you have uttered did not move me to sympathy. If the compassion I feel for you, and the earnest desire I have conceived to risk my life for your relief — if your misfortunes admit of any — may give me some claim upon your courtesy, I entreat you to manifest it in declaring to me the cause of your grief without reserve."

"If that grief had not deprived me of understanding," said the person addressed, "I ought to have remembered that I was not alone in this room, and have bridled my tongue and suppressed my sighs; but to punish myself for my imprudent forgetfulness, I will do what you ask; for it may be that the pangs it will cost me to relate the bitter story of my misfortunes will end at once my life and my woes. But first you must promise me solemnly, that whatever I may reveal, you will not quit your bed nor come to mine, nor ask more of me than I choose to disclose; for if you do, the very moment I hear you move I will run myself through with my sword, which lies ready to my hand."

The cavalier, who would have promised anything to obtain the information he so much desired, vowed that he would not depart a jot from the conditions so courteously imposed. "On that assurance, then," said the lady, "I will do what I have never done before, and relate to you the history of my life. Harken then.

"You must know, señor, that although I entered this inn, as they have doubtless told you, in the dress of a man, I am an unhappy maiden, or at least I was one not eight days ago, and ceased to be so, because I had the folly to believe the delusive words of a perjured man. My name is Teodosia; my birthplace is one of the chief towns of the province of Andalusia, the name of which I suppress, because it does not import you so much to know it as me to conceal it. My parents, who are noble and wealthy, had a son and a daughter; the one for their joy and honour, the other for the reverse. They sent my brother to study at Salamanca, and me they kept at home, where they brought me up with all the scrupulous care becoming their own virtue and nobility; whilst on my part I always rendered them the most cheerful obedience, and punctually conformed to all their wishes, until my unhappy fate set before my eyes the son of a neighbour of ours, wealthier than my parents, and no less noble than they. The first time I saw him, I felt nothing more than the pleasure one feels at making an agreeable acquaintance; and this I might well feel, for his person, air, manners, disposition, and understanding were the admiration of all who knew him. But why dwell on the praises of my enemy, or make so long a preface to the confession of my infatuation and my ruin? Let me say at once that he saw me repeatedly from a window opposite to mine; whence, as it seemed to me, he shot forth his soul towards me from his eyes, whilst mine beheld him with a pleasure very different from that which I had experienced at our first interview, and one which constrained me to believe that everything I read in his face was the pure truth.

“Seeing each other in this way led to conversation; he declared his passion, and mine responded to it, with no misgiving of his sincerity, for his suit was urged with promises, oaths, tears, sighs, and every accompaniment that could make me believe in the reality of his devoted attachment. Utterly inexperienced as I was, every word of his was a cannon shot that breached the fortress of my honour; every tear was a fire in which my virtue was consumed; every sigh was a rushing wind that fanned the destructive flame. In fine, upon his promise to marry me in spite of his parents, who had another wife in view for him, I forgot all my maidenly reserve, and without knowing how, put myself into his power, having no other witness of my folly than a page belonging to Marco Antonio — for that is the name of the destroyer of my peace — who two days afterwards disappeared from the neighbourhood, without any person, not even his parents, having the least idea whither he was gone. In what condition I was left, imagine if you can; it is beyond my power to describe it.

“I tore my hair as if it was to blame for my fault, and punished my face as thinking it the primary occasion of my ruin; I cursed my fate, and my own precipitation; I shed an infinity of tears, and was almost choked by them and by my sighs; I complained mutely to heaven, and pondered a thousand expedients to see if there was any which might afford me help or remedy, and that which I finally resolved on was to dress myself in male apparel, and go in quest of this perfidious Æneas, this cruel and perjured Bireno, this defrauder of my honest affections and my legitimate and well-founded hopes. Having once formed this resolution, I lost no time in putting it in execution. I put on a travelling suit belonging to my brother, saddled one of my father’s horses with my own hand, and left home one very dark night, intending to go to Salamanca, whither it was conjectured that Marco Antonio might have gone; for he too is a student, and an intimate friend of my brother’s. I did not omit to take at the same time a quantity of gold sufficient for all contingencies upon my journey. What most distresses me is the thought that my parents will send in pursuit of me, and that I shall be discovered by means of my dress and the horse; and even had I not this to fear, I must dread my brother’s resentment; for he is in Salamanca, and should he discover me, I need not say how much my life would be in peril. Even should he listen to my excuses, the least scruple of his honour would outweigh them all.

“Happen what may, my fixed resolve is to seek out my heartless husband, who cannot deny that he is my husband without belying the pledge which he left in my possession — a diamond ring, with this legend: ‘Marco Antonio is the husband of Teodosia.’ If I find him, I will know from him what he discovered in me that prompted him so soon to leave me; and I will make him fulfil his plighted troth, or I will prove as prompt to vengeance as I was easy in suffering myself to be aggrieved, and will take his life; for the noble blood that runs in my veins is not to be insulted with impunity. This, señor cavalier, is the true and sad history you desired to hear, and which you will accept as a sufficient apology for the words and sighs that awoke you. What I would beseech of you is, that though you may not be able to remedy my misfortune, at least you may advise me how to escape the dangers that beset me, evade being caught, and accomplish what I so much desire and need.”

The cavalier said not a syllable in reply, and remained so long silent that Teodosia supposed he was asleep and had not heard a word she had been saying. To satisfy herself of this, she said, “Are you asleep, señor? No wonder if you are; for a mournful tale poured into an unimpassioned ear is more likely to induce drowsiness than pity.”

“I am not asleep,” replied the cavalier; “on the contrary, I am so thoroughly awake, and feel so much for your calamity, that I know not if your own anguish exceeds mine. For this reason I will not only give you the advice you ask, but my personal aid to the utmost of my powers; for though the manner in which you have told your tale proves that you are gifted with no ordinary intelligence, and therefore that you have been your own betrayer, and owe your sorrow to a perverted will rather than to the seductions of Marco Antonio, nevertheless I would fain see your excuse in your youth and your inexperience of the wily arts of men. Compose yourself, señora, and sleep if you can during the short remainder of the night. When daylight comes we will consult together, and see what means may be devised for helping you out of your affliction.”

Teodosia thanked him warmly, and tried to keep still for a while in order that the cavalier might sleep; but he could not close an eye; on the contrary he began to toss himself about in the bed, and to heave such deep sighs that Teodosia was constrained to ask him what was the matter? was he suffering in any way, and could she do anything for his relief?

“Though you are yourself the cause of my distress, señora,” he replied, “you are not the person who can relieve it, for if you were I should not feel it.”

Teodosia could not understand the drift of this perplexed reply; she suspected, however, that he was under the influence of some amorous passion, and even that she herself might be the object of it; for it might well be that the fact of his being alone with one he knew to be a woman, at that dead hour of the night, and in the same bed-room, should have awakened in him some bad thoughts. Alarmed at the idea, she hastily put on her clothes without noise, buckled on her sword and dagger, and sat down on the bed to wait for daylight, which did not long delay to appear through the many openings there were in the sides of the room, as usual in inn-chambers. The cavalier on his part, had made ready exactly as Teodosia had done; and he no sooner perceived the first rays of light, than he started up from his bed, saying, "Get up, señora Teodosia, and let us be gone; for I will accompany you on your journey, and never quit your side until I see Marco Antonio become your lawful husband, or until he or I shall be a dead man;" and so saying, he opened the windows and the doors of the room.

Teodosia had longed for daylight that she might see what manner of man he was with whom she had been conversing all night; but when she beheld him, she would have been glad that it had never dawned, but that her eyes had remained in perpetual darkness, for the cavalier who stood before her was her brother! At sight of him she was stupefied with emotion, her face was deadly pale, and she could not utter a word. At last, rallying her spirits, she drew her dagger, and presenting the handle to her brother, fell at his feet, and gasped out, "Take it, dear señor and brother, punish the fault I have committed, and satisfy your resentment, for my offence deserves no mercy, and I do not desire that my repentance should be accepted as an atonement. The only thing I entreat is that you will deprive me of life, but not of my honour; for though I have placed it in manifest danger by absenting myself from the house of my parents, yet its semblance may be preserved before the world if my death be secret."

Her brother regarded her fixedly, and although her wantonness excited him to vengeance, he could not withstand this affecting appeal. With a placable countenance he raised her from the ground, and consoled her as well as he could, telling her, among other things, that as he knew of no punishment adequate to the magnitude of her folly, he would suspend the consideration of that matter for the present; and as he thought that fortune had not yet made all remedy impossible, he thought it better to seek one than at once to take vengeance on her for her levity. These words restored Teodosia to life; the colour returned to her cheeks, and her despair gave way to revived hope. Don Rafael (that was the brother's name) would speak no more on the subject, but bade her change her name from Teodosia to Teodoro, and decided that they should both proceed at once to Salamanca in quest of Marco Antonio, though he hardly expected to find him there; for as they were intimate friends, they would have met had he been at the university, unless indeed Marco Antonio might have shunned him from a consciousness of the wrong he had done him. The new Teodoro acquiesced in everything proposed by her brother; and the innkeeper coming in, they ordered breakfast, intending to depart immediately.

Before all was ready another traveller arrived. This was a gentleman who was known to Don Rafael and Teodoro, and the latter, to avoid being seen by him, remained in the chamber. Don Rafael, having embraced the newcomer, asked him what news he brought. His friend replied that he had just come from the port of Santa Maria, where he had left four galleys bound for Naples, and that he had seen Marco Antonio Adorno, the son of Don Leonardo Adorno, on board one of them. This intelligence rejoiced Don Rafael, to whom it appeared that since he had so unexpectedly learned what it was of such importance for him to know, he might regard this an omen of his future success. He asked his friend, who knew his father well, to exchange the hired mule he rode for his father's nag, giving him to understand, not that he was coming from Salamanca, but that he was going thither, and that he was unwilling to take so good an animal on so long a journey. The other obligingly consented, and promised to deliver the nag to its owner. Don Rafael and he breakfasted together, and Teodoro alone; and finally the friend pursued his journey to Cazallo, where he had an estate, whilst Don Rafael excused himself from accompanying him by saying that he had to return that day to Seville.

As soon as the friend was gone, and the reckoning paid, Don Rafael and Teodoro mounted and bade adieu to the people of the inn, leaving them all in admiration of the comeliness of the pair. Don Rafael told his sister what news he had received of Marco Antonio, and that he proposed they should make all haste to reach Barcelona; for vessels on their way to or fro between Italy and Spain usually put in at that port; and if Marco Antonio's ship had not yet arrived there, they would wait for it, and be sure of seeing him. His sister said he should do as he thought best, for his will was hers. Don Rafael then told the muleteer who accompanied him to have patience, for he intended to go to Barcelona, but would pay him accordingly. The muleteer, who was one of the merriest fellows of his trade, and who knew Don Rafael's liberality, declared that he was willing to go with him to the end of the world.

Don Rafael asked his sister what money she had. She told him she had not counted it; all she knew was that she had put her hand seven or eight times into her father's strong box, and had taken it out full of gold crowns. From this Don Rafael calculated that she might have something about five hundred crowns, which, with two hundred of his own, and a gold chain he wore, seemed to him no bad provision for the journey; the more so, as he felt confident of meeting Marco Antonio in Barcelona. They pursued their journey rapidly without accident or impediment until they arrived within two leagues of a town called

Igualada, which is nine leagues from Barcelona, and there they learned that a cavalier who was going as ambassador to Rome, was waiting at Barcelona for the galleys, which had not yet arrived. Greatly cheered by this news, they pushed on until they came to the verge of a small wood, from which they saw a man running, and looking back over his shoulder with every appearance of terror. "What is the matter with you, good man?" said Don Rafael, going up to him. "What has happened to you, that you seem so frightened and run so fast?"

"Have I not good cause to be frightened and to run fast," said the man, "since I have escaped by a miracle from a gang of robbers in that wood?"

"Malediction! Lord save us!" exclaimed the muleteer. "Robbers at this hour! By my halidom, they'll leave us as bare as we were born."

"Don't make yourself uneasy, brother," replied the man from the wood, "for the robbers have by this time gone away, after leaving more than thirty passengers stripped to their shirts and tied to trees, with the exception of one only, whom they have left to unbind the rest as soon as they should have passed a little hill they pointed out to him."

"If that be so," said Calvete, the muleteer, "we may proceed without fear, for where the robbers have made an attack, they do not show themselves again for some days. I say this with confidence, as a man who has been twice in their hands, and knows all their ways."

This fact being confirmed by the stranger, Don Rafael resolved to go on. They entered the wood, and had not advanced far, when they came upon the persons who had been robbed, and who were more than forty in number. The man who had been left free, had unbound some of them; but his work was not yet complete, and several of them were still tied to the trees. They presented a strange spectacle, some of them stripped naked, others dressed in the tattered garments of the robbers; some weeping over their disaster, some laughing at the strange figure the others made in their robber's costume; one dolorously reciting the list of the things he had lost, another declaring that the loss of a box of Agnus Dei he was bringing home from Rome afflicted him more than all besides. In short, the whole wood resounded with the moans and lamentations of the despoiled wretches. The brother and sister beheld them with deep compassion, and heartily thanked heaven for their own narrow escape from so great a peril. But what affected Teodoro more than anything else was the sight of a lad apparently about fifteen, tied to a tree, with no covering on him but a shirt and a pair of linen drawers, but with a face of such beauty that none could refrain from gazing on it. Teodoro dismounted and unbound him, a favour which he acknowledged in very courteous terms; and Teodoro, to make it the greater, begged Calvete to lend the gentle youth his cloak, until he could buy him another at the first town they came to. Calvete complied, and Teodoro threw the cloak over his shoulders, asking him in Don Rafael's presence to what part of the country he belonged, whence he was coming, and whither he was going. The youth replied that he was from Andalusia, and he named as his birthplace a town which was but two leagues distant from that of the brother and sister. He said he was on his way from Seville to Italy, to seek his fortune in arms like many another Spaniard; but that he had had the misfortune to fall in with a gang of thieves, who had taken from him a considerable sum of money and clothes, which he could not replace for three hundred crowns. Nevertheless he intended to pursue his journey, for he did not come of a race which was used to let the ardour of its zeal evaporate at the first check.

The manner in which the youth expressed himself, the fact that he was from their own neighbourhood, and above all, the letter of recommendation he carried in his face, inspired the brother and sister with a desire to befriend him as much as they could. After they had distributed some money among such of the rest as seemed in most need of it, especially among monks and priests, of whom there were eight, they made this youth mount Calvete's mule, and went on without more delay to Igualada. There they were informed that the galleys had arrived the day before at Barcelona, whence they would sail in two days, unless the insecurity of the roadstead compelled them to make an earlier departure. On account of this news, they rose next morning before the sun, although they had not slept all night in consequence of a circumstance which had occurred at supper, and which had more surprised and interested the brother and sister than they were themselves aware. As they sat at table, and the youth with them whom they had taken under their protection, Teodoro fixed her eyes intently on his face, and scrutinising his features somewhat curiously, perceived that his ears were bored. From this and from a certain bashfulness that appeared in his looks, she suspected that the supposed youth was a woman, and she longed for supper to be over that she might verify her suspicion. Meanwhile Don Rafael asked him whose son he was, for he knew all the principal people in the town he had named as his birth place. The youth said he was the son of Don Enrique de Cardenas. Don Rafael replied that he was well acquainted with Don Enrique, and knew for certain that he had no son; but that if he had given that answer because he did not choose to make known his family, it was of no consequence, and he should not be questioned again on that subject.

"It is true," said the youth, "that Don Enrique has no children, but his brother Don Sancho has."

"He has no son either," replied Don Rafael, "but an only daughter, who, by the bye, they say is one of the handsomest damsels in Andalusia; but this I know only by report; for though I have been often in her town I have never seen her.”

“It is quite true, as you say, señor, that Don Sancho has only a daughter, but not one so handsome as fame reports; and if I said that I was the son of Don Enrique it was only to give myself some importance in your eyes; for in fact, I am only the son of Don Sancho’s steward, who has been many years in his service, and I was born in his house. Having displeased my father, I carried off a good sum of money from him, and resolved to go to Italy, as I have told you, and follow the career of arms, by which men even of obscure birth have been known to make themselves illustrious.”

Teodoro, who listened attentively to all this conversation, was more and more confirmed in her suspicion, both by the manner and the substance of what the youth said. After the cloth was removed, and while Don Rafael was preparing for bed, she made known to him her surmise, and then, with his permission, took the youth aside, and, going out with him upon a balcony which looked on the street, addressed him thus: —

“Don Francisco,” for that was the name he had given himself, “I would fain have done you so much service that you could not help granting me anything that I should ask of you; but the short time we have known you has not permitted this. Hereafter perhaps you may know how far I deserve that you should comply with my desires; but if you do not choose to satisfy that which I am now about to express, I will not the less continue to be your faithful servant. Furthermore, before I prefer my present request, I would impress upon you that although my age does exceed yours, I have more experience of the world than is usual at my years, as you will admit when I tell you that it has led me to suspect that you are not a man, as your garb imports, but a woman, and one as well-born as your beauty proclaims, and perhaps as unfortunate as your disguise implies, for such transformations are never made willingly, or except under the pressure of some painful necessity. If what I suspect is the case, tell me so, and I swear to you on the faith of a cavalier to aid and serve you in every way I can. That you are a woman you cannot make me doubt, for the holes in your ears make that fact very clear. It was thoughtless of you not to close them with a little flesh-coloured wax, for somebody else as inquisitive as myself, and not so fit to be trusted with a secret, might discover by means of them what you have so ill concealed. Believe me, you need not hesitate to tell me who you are, in full reliance on my inviolable secrecy.”

The youth had listened with great attention to all Teodoro said, and, before answering her a word, he seized her hands, carried them by force to his lips, kissed them with great fervour, and even bedewed them copiously with tears. Teodoro could not help sympathising with the acute feelings of the youth, and shedding tears also. Although, when she had with difficulty withdrawn her hands from the youth's lips, he replied with a deep-drawn sigh, "I will not, and cannot deny, señora, that your suspicion is true; I am a woman, and the most unfortunate of my sex; and since the acts of kindness you have conferred upon me, and the offers you make me, oblige me to obey all your commands, listen and I will tell you who I am, if indeed it will not weary you to hear the tale of another's misfortunes."

"May I never know aught else myself," replied Teodoro, "if I shall not feel a pleasure in hearing of those misfortunes equal to the pain it will give me to know that they are yours, and that will be such as if they were my own." And again she embraced and encouraged the seeming youth, who, somewhat more tranquilised, continued thus: —

"I have spoken the truth with regard to my native place, but not with regard to my parents; for Don Enrique is not my father but my uncle, and his brother Don Sancho is my father. I am that unhappy daughter of his of whom your brother says that she is celebrated for her beauty, but how mistakenly you now perceive. My name is Leocadia; the occasion of my disguise you shall now hear.

"Two leagues from my native town there is another, one of the wealthiest and noblest of Andalusia, where lives a cavalier of quality, who derives his origin from the noble and ancient Adornos of Genoa. He has a son, who, unless fame exaggerates his praises as it does mine, is one of the most gallant gentlemen one would desire to see. Being so near a neighbour of ours, and being like my father strongly addicted to the chase, he often came on a visit of five or six days to our house, the greater part of that time, much of the night even included, being spent by my father and him in the field. From these visits of his, fortune, or love, or my own imprudence, took occasion to bring me down to my present state of degradation. Having observed, with more attention than became a modest and well-behaved maiden, the graceful person and manners of our visitor, and taking into consideration his distinguished lineage and the great wealth of his parents, I thought that to obtain him for my husband would be the highest felicity to which my wishes could aspire. With this thought in my head I began to gaze at him most intently, and also, no doubt, with too little caution, for he perceived it, and the traitor needed no other hint to discover the secret of my bosom and rob me of my peace. But why should I weary you by recapitulating every minute detail of my unfortunate attachment? Let me say at once that he won so far upon me by his ceaseless solicitations, having plighted his faith under the most solemn and, as I thought, the most Christian vows that he would become my husband, that I put myself wholly at his disposal. Nevertheless, not being quite satisfied with his vows alone, and in order that the wind might not bear them away, I made him commit them to writing, and give them to me in a paper signed with his own hand, and drawn up in terms so strong and unequivocal as to remove all my mistrust. Once in possession of this paper, I arranged that he should come to me one night, climb the garden-wall, and enter my chamber, where he might securely pluck the fruit destined for him alone. The night so longed for by me at last arrived— “

Up to this point Teodoro had listened with rapt attention, especially since she had heard the name of Adorno, but now she could contain herself no longer. “Well,” she cried, suddenly interrupting the speaker, “and then, what did he do? Did he keep the assignation? Were you happy in his arms? Did he confirm his written pledge anew? Was he content when he had obtained from you what you say was his? Did your father know it? What was the end of this good and wise beginning?”

“The end was to bring me to what you see, for he never came.”

Teodoro breathed again at these words, and partly recovered her self-possession, which had been almost destroyed by the frantic influence of jealousy. Even yet she was not so free from it but that she trembled inwardly as Leocadia continued her story.

“Not only did he fail to keep the assignation, but a week after I learned for certain that he had disappeared from home, and carried off from the house of her parents, persons of distinction in his own neighbourhood, a very beautiful and accomplished young lady named Teodosia. I was nearly mad with jealousy and mortification. I pictured Teodosia to myself in imagination, more beautiful than the sun, more perfect than perfection itself, and above all, more blissful than I was miserable. I read the written engagement over and over again; it was as binding as any form of words could be; but though my hopes would fain have clung to it as something sacred and inviolable, they all fell to the ground when I remembered in what company Marco Antonio had departed. I beat my face, tore my hair, and cursed my fate; but what was most irksome to me was that I could not practise these self-inflictions at all hours in consequence of my father’s presence. In fine, that I might be free to indulge my woe without impediment, I resolved to quit my home. It would seem that the execution of a bad purpose never fails for want of opportunity. I boldly purloined a suit of clothes belonging to one of my father’s pages, and from himself a considerable sum of money; then leaving the house by night I travelled some leagues on foot, and reached a town called Osuna, where I hired a car. Two days afterwards I entered Seville, where I was quite safe from all pursuit.

“There I bought other clothes, and a mule, and set out with some cavaliers who were travelling with all speed to Barcelona, that they might be in time for some galleys that were on their way to Italy. I continued my journey until yesterday, when the robbers took everything from me, and among the rest, that precious thing which sustained my soul and lightened my toils, the written engagement given me by Marco Antonio. I had intended to carry it with me to Italy, find Marco Antonio there, and present it to him as an evidence of his faithlessness and my constancy, and constrain him to fulfil his promise. At the same time I am conscious that he may readily deny the words written on this paper, since he has made nought of the obligations that should have been engraved on his soul; besides, it is plain that if he is accompanied by the incomparable Teodosia he will not deign to look upon the unfortunate Leocadia. But happen what may, I am resolved to die or present myself before the pair, that the sight of me may trouble their joy. This Teodosia, this enemy of my peace, shall not so cheaply enjoy what is mine. I will seek her out, I will find her, and will take her life if I can."

"But how is Teodosia in fault," said Teodoro, "if, as is very probably the case, she too has been deluded by Marco Antonio, as you, señora, have been?"

"How can that be so," returned Leocadia, "if he has her with him? Being with the man she loves, what question can there be of delusion? They are together, and therefore they are happy, and would be so, though they were in the burning deserts of Lybia, or the dreary wastes of Scythia. She is blest in his arms wherever she is, and therefore she shall pay for all I shall suffer till I find her."

"It is very likely you are mistaken," said Teodoro; "I am very well acquainted with this enemy of yours, as you call her, and I know her prudence and modesty to be such, that she never would venture to quit her father's house and go away with Marco Antonio. And even had she done so, not knowing you, nor being aware of any claim you had on him, she has not wronged you at all, and where there is no wrong, vengeance is out of place."

"Tell me not of her modesty, señor; for I was as modest and as virtuous as any maiden in the world, and yet I have done what I have told you. That he has carried her off there is no doubt. I acknowledge, looking on the matter dispassionately, that she has not wronged me; but the pangs of jealousy which she occasions me make me abhor her. If a sword were thrust through my vitals, should I not naturally strive to pluck it out and break it to pieces?"

"Well, well, señora Leocadia, since the passion that sways you makes you speak so wildly, I see it is not the fit time to offer you rational advice. I shall therefore content myself with repeating that I am ready and willing to render you every service in my power, and I know my brother's generous nature so well, that I can boldly make you the same promise on his part. We are going to Italy, and it rests only with yourself to accompany us. One thing only I entreat, that you will allow me to tell my brother what I know of your story, that he may treat you with the attention and respect which is your due. I think you had better continue to wear male attire, and if it is to be procured in this place, I will take care that you shall be suitably equipped to morrow. For the rest, trust to time, for it is a great provider of remedies even for the most desperate cases.”

Leocadia gratefully thanked the generous Teodoro, saying he might tell his brother whatever he thought fit, and beseeching him not to forsake her, since he saw to what dangers she was exposed, if she was known to be a woman. Here the conversation ended, and they retired to rest, Teodosia in her brother’s room, and Leocadia in another next it. Don Rafael was still awake, waiting for his sister to know what had passed between her and the suspected woman; and before she lay down, he made her relate the whole to him in detail. “Well, sister,” he said when she had finished, “if she is the person she declares herself to be, she belongs to the best family in her native place, and is one of the noblest ladies of Andalusia. Her father is well known to ours, and the fame of her beauty perfectly corresponds with the evidence of our own eyes. My opinion is, that we must proceed with caution, lest she come to speak with Marco Antonio before us, for I feel some uneasiness about that written engagement she speaks of, even though she has lost it. But be of good cheer, sister, and go to rest, for all will come right at last.”

Teodosia complied with her brother’s advice so far as to go to bed, but it was impossible for her to rest, so racked was she by jealous fears. Oh, how she exaggerated the beauty of Leocadia, and the disloyalty of Marco Antonio! How often she read with the eyes of her imagination his written promise to her rival! What words and phrases she added to it, to make it more sure and binding! How often she refused to believe that it was lost! And how many a time she repeated to herself, that even though it were lost, Marco Antonio would not the less fulfil his promise to Leocadia, without thinking of that by which he was bound to herself! In such thoughts as these she passed the night without a wink of sleep; nor was her brother Don Rafael less wakeful; for no sooner had he heard who Leocadia was, than his heart was on fire for her. He beheld her in imagination, not tied to a tree, or in tattered male garments, but in her own rich apparel in her wealthy father’s house. He would not suffer his mind to dwell on that which was the primary cause of his having become acquainted with her; and he longed for day that he might continue his journey and find out Marco Antonio, not so much that he might make him his brother-in-law, as that he might hinder him from becoming the husband of Leocadia. In fact, he was so possessed by love and jealousy, that he could have borne to see his sister comfortless, and Marco Antonio fairly buried, rather than be himself without hope of obtaining

Leocadia.

Thus with different thoughts, they all quitted their beds at break of day, and Don Rafael sent for the host, and asked him if he could purchase a suit of clothes in that place for a page who had been stripped by robbers. The host said he happened to have one for sale which he would dispose of at a reasonable price. He produced it, Leocadia found that it fitted her very well, she put it on, and girt herself with sword and dagger with such sprightly grace that she enchanted Don Rafael, and redoubled Teodosia's jealousy. Calvete saddled the mules, and about eight in the morning, they started for Barcelona, not intending to take the famous monastery of Monserrate on their way, but to visit it on a future occasion, whenever it might please God to send them home again with hearts more at ease.

Words are not adequate to describe the feelings of the two brothers, or with what different eyes they severally regarded Leocadia; Teodosia wishing for her death, and Don Rafael for her life; Teodosia striving to find faults in her, in order that she might not despair of her own hopes; and Don Rafael finding out new perfections, that more and more obliged him to love her. All these thoughts, however, did not hinder their speed, for they reached Barcelona before sunset. They admired the magnificent situation of the city, and esteemed it to be the flower of the world, the honour of Spain, the terror of all enemies near and far, the delight of its inhabitants, the refuge of strangers, the school of chivalry, the model of loyalty, in a word, a union of all that a judicious curiosity could desire in a grand, famous, wealthy, and well-built city. Upon their entering it they heard a great uproar, and saw a multitude of people running with loud cries. They inquired the cause, and were told that the people of the galleys in the port had fallen upon those of the town. Don Rafael desired to see what was going on, though Calvete would have dissuaded him; for, as the muleteer said, he knew well what mischief came of interfering in such frays as this, which usually occurred in Barcelona when galleys put in there.

In spite of this good advice, Don Rafael and his fellow-travellers went down at once towards the beach, where they saw many swords drawn, and numbers of people slashing at each other without mercy, and they approached so near the scene without dismounting, that they could distinctly see the faces of the combatants, for the sun was still above the horizon. The number of townspeople engaged was immense, and great crowds issued from the galleys, although their commander, Don Pedro Vique, a gentleman of Valencia, stood on the prow of the flagship, threatening all who entered the boats to succour their comrades. Finding his commands disregarded, he ordered a gun to be fired without ball, as a warning that if the combatants did not separate, the next gun he fired would be shotted. Meanwhile, Don Rafael, who narrowly watched the fray, observed among those who took part with the seamen a young man of about two-and-twenty, dressed in green, with a hat of the same colour, adorned with a rich loop and buttons apparently of diamonds. The skill and courage with which he fought, and the elegance of his dress, drew upon him the attention of all the spectators, and Teodosia and Leocadia both cried out, as if with one voice, "Good heavens! either my eyes deceive me, or he in green is Marco Antonio." Then, with great nimbleness, they dismounted, drew their swords and daggers, cleared their way through the crowd, and placed themselves one on each side of Marco Antonio. "Fear nothing, Señor Marco Antonio," cried Leocadia, "for there is one by your side who will defend your life at the cost of his own." "Who doubts it," ejaculated Teodosia, on the other side, "since I am here?" Don Rafael, who had seen and heard all this, followed his two companions, and took sides as they did.

Marco Antonio was too busy smiting and defending himself to heed what his two seconds had said; he could think of nothing but fighting, and no man ever fought more bravely; but as the party of the town was every moment increasing in numbers, the people of the galleys were forced to retreat and take to the water. Marco Antonio retreated with the rest, much against his will, still attended on either side by his two valiant Amazons. By this time a Catalonian knight of the renowned House of Cardonas, made his appearance on a noble charger, and, throwing himself between the two parties, ordered the townspeople to retire. The majority obeyed, but some still continued to fling stones, one of which unluckily struck Marco Antonio on the breast with such force that he fell senseless into the water, in which he was wading up to his knees. Leocadia instantly raised and supported him in her arms, and Teodosia aided her.

Don Rafael, who had turned aside a little to avoid a shower of stones, saw the accident which had befallen Marco Antonio, and was hastening forward to his aid, when the Catalonian knight stopped him, saying, "Stay, señor, and do me the favour to put yourself by my side. I will secure you from the insolence of this unruly rabble."

"Ah, señor!" replied Rafael, "let me pass, for I see that in great danger which I most love in this world."

The knight let him pass, but before he could reach the spot, the crew of the flagship's boat had already taken on board Marco Antonio and Leocadia, who never let him out of her arms. As for Teodosia, whether it was that she was weary, or overcome with grief to see her lover wounded, or enraged with jealousy to see her rival with him, she had not strength to get into the boat, and would certainly have fallen in a fainting fit into the water, if her brother had not opportunely come to her aid, while he himself felt no less torment than his sister at seeing Leocadia go away with Marco Antonio.

The Catalonian knight being very much taken with the goodly presence of Don Rafael and his sister (whom he supposed to be a man), called them from the shore, and requested them to go with him, and they were constrained to accept his friendly offer, lest they should suffer some injury from the people, who were not yet pacified. Thereupon, the knight dismounted, and with his drawn sword in his hand, led them through the tumultuous throng, who made way at his command. Don Rafael looked round to see if he could discover Calvete with the mules; but he was not to be seen, for the moment his employers dismounted, he had gone off to an inn where he had lodged on previous occasions. On their arrival at the knight's abode, which was one of the principal houses in the city, he asked them in which of the galleys they had arrived. Don Rafael replied that they had not come in any, for they had arrived in the city just as the fray began; and it was because they had recognised the gentleman who was wounded with a stone that they had involved themselves in danger. Moreover, he entreated the knight would have the gentleman brought on shore, as he was one on whom his own dearest interests depended. "I will do so with great pleasure," replied the knight, "and I am sure the general will allow it, for he is a worthy gentleman and a relation of mine." Thereupon he went at once to the galley, where he found Marco Antonio under the hands of the surgeon, who pronounced his wound dangerous, being near the heart. With the general's consent he had him brought on shore with great care, accompanied by Leocadia, and carried to his own house in a litter, where he entertained the whole party with great hospitality.

A famous surgeon of the city was now sent for, but he would not touch the patient's wound until the following day, alleging that it had no doubt been properly treated already, army and navy surgeons being always men of skill, in consequence of their continual experience in cases of wounds. He only desired that the patient should be placed in a quiet room and left to rest. Presently the surgeon of the galley arrived, and had a conference with his colleague, who approved of what he had done, and agreed with him in thinking the case highly dangerous. Leocadia and Teodosia heard this with as much anguish of heart as if it had been a sentence of death upon themselves; but not wishing to betray their grief, they strove to conceal it in silence. Leocadia, however, determined to do what she thought requisite for her honour, and as soon as the surgeons were gone, she entered Marco Antonio's room, where, going up to his bed side, and taking his hand in presence of the master of the house, Don Rafael, Teodosia, and others, "Señor Marco Antonio Adorno," she said, "it is now no seasonable time, considering your condition, to utter many words; and therefore I shall only entreat you to lend your ear to some few which concern, if not the safety of your body, at least that of your soul. But I must have your permission to speak; for it would ill become me, who have striven never to disoblige you from the first moment I knew you, to disturb you now in what seems almost your last.”

At these words Marco Antonio opened his eyes, looked steadfastly at Leocadia, and recognising her rather by the tone of her voice than by her face, said with a feeble voice, like one in pain, “Say on, señor, what you please, for I am not so far gone but that I can listen to you; nor is that voice of yours so harsh and unpleasing that I should dislike to hear it.”

Teodosia hearkened most attentively, and every word that Leocadia spoke pierced her heart like an arrow, and at the same time harrowed the soul of Don Rafael. “If the blow you have received,” continued Leocadia, “or rather that which has struck my heart, has not effaced from your memory, señor Marco Antonio, the image of her whom not long ago you called your glory and your heaven, you must surely call to mind who Leocadia was, and what was the promise you gave her in writing under your own hand; nor can you have forgotten the worth of her parents, her own modesty and virtue, and the obligation you are under to her for having always gratified you in everything you desired. If you have not forgotten all this, you may readily know, in spite of this disguise, that I am Leocadia. As soon as I heard of your departure from home, dreading lest new chances and opportunities should deprive me of what is so justly mine, I resolved, in defiance of the worst miseries, to follow you in this garb, and to search the wide world over till I found you. Nor need you wonder at this, if you have ever felt what the strength of true love is capable of, or know the frenzy of a deceived woman. I have suffered some hardships in my quest, all of which I regard as pastime since they have resulted in my seeing you; for, though you are in this condition, if it be God’s will to remove you to a better world, I shall esteem myself more than happy if before your departure you do what becomes you, in which case I promise you to live in such a manner after your death that I shall soon follow you on that last inevitable journey. I beseech you then, for the love of heaven, for your own honour, and for my sake, to whom you owe more than to all the world, receive me at once as your lawful wife, not leaving it to the law to do what you have so many righteous motives for doing of your own accord.”

Here Leocadia ceased speaking. All present had listened to her in profound silence, and in the same way they awaited the reply of Marco Antonio. “I cannot deny, señora,” he said, “that I know you; your voice and your face will not suffer me to do that. Nor yet can I deny how much I owe to you, nor the great worth of your parents and your own incomparable modesty and virtue. I do not, and never shall, think lightly of you for what you have done in coming to seek me in such a disguise; on the contrary, I shall always esteem you for it in the highest degree.

But since, as you say, I am so near my end, I desire to make known to you a truth, the knowledge of which, if it be unpleasant to you now, may hereafter be useful to you.

“I confess, fair Leocadia, that I loved you, and you loved me; and yet I confess also that my written promise was given more in compliance with your desire than my own; for before I had long signed it my heart was captivated by a lady named Teodosia, whom you know, and whose parentage is as noble as your own. If I gave you a promise signed with my hand, to her I gave that hand itself in so unequivocal a manner that it is impossible for me to bestow it on any other person in the world. My amour with you was but a pastime from which I culled only some flowers, leaving you nothing the worse; from her I obtained the consummate fruit of love upon my plighted faith to be her husband. That I afterwards deserted you both was the inconsiderate act of a young man who thought that all such things were of little importance, and might be done without scruple. My intention was to go to Italy, and after spending some of the years of my youth there, to return and see what had become of you and my real wife; but Heaven in its mercy, as I truly believe, has permitted me to be brought to the state in which you see me, in order that in thus confessing my great faults, I may fulfil my last duty in this world, by leaving you disabused and free, and ratifying on my deathbed the pledge I gave to Teodosia. If there is anything, señora Leocadia, in which I can serve you during the short time that remains to me, let me know it; so it be not to receive you as my wife, for that I cannot, there is nothing else which I will not do, if it be in my power, to please you.”

Marco Antonio, who had raised himself on one arm while he spoke, now fell back senseless. Don Rafael then came forward. “Recover yourself, dear señor,” he said, embracing him affectionately, “and embrace your friend and your brother, since such you desire him to be.”

Marco Antonio opened his eyes, and recognising Don Rafael, embraced him with great warmth. “Dear brother and señor,” he said, “the extreme joy I feel in seeing you must needs be followed by a proportionate affliction, since, as they say, after gladness comes sorrow; but whatever befalls me now I will receive with pleasure in exchange for the happiness of beholding you.”

“To make your happiness more complete,” replied Don Rafael, “I present to you this jewel as your own.” Then, turning to look for his sister, he found her behind the rest of the people in the room, bathed in tears, and divided between joy and grief at what she saw and what she had heard. Taking her by the hand, her brother led her passively to the bed-side, and presented her to Marco Antonio, who embraced her with loving tears.

The rest of those present stared in each others’ faces in speechless amazement

at these extraordinary occurrences; but the hapless Leocadia, seeing her whom she had mistaken for Don Rafael's brother locked in the arms of him she looked on as her own husband, and all her hopes mocked and ruined, stole out of the room unperceived by the others, whose attention was engrossed by the scene about the bed. She rushed wildly into the street, intending to wander over the world, no matter whither; but she was hardly out of doors before Don Rafael missed her, and, as if he had lost his soul, began to inquire anxiously after her; but nobody could tell what had become of her. He hastened in dismay to the inn where he was told Calvete lodged, thinking she might have gone thither to procure a mule; but, not finding her there, he ran like a madman through the streets, seeking her in every quarter, till the thought struck him that she might have made for the galleys, and he turned in that direction. As he approached the shore he heard some one calling from the land for the boat belonging to the general's galley, and soon recognised the voice as that of the beautiful Leocadia. Hearing his footsteps as he hastened towards her, she drew her sword and stood upon her guard; but perceiving it was Don Rafael, she was vexed and confused at his having found her, especially in so lonely a place; for she was aware, from many indications, that he was far from regarding her with indifference; on the contrary, she would have been delighted to know that Marco Antonio loved her as well. How shall I relate all that Don Rafael now said to Leocadia? I can give but a faint idea of the glowing language in which he poured out his soul.

"Were it my fate, beautiful Leocadia," he said, "along with the favours of fortune to lack also at this moment the courage to disclose to you the secret of my soul, then would there be doomed to perpetual oblivion the most ardent and genuine affection that ever was harboured in a lover's breast. But not to do it that wrong, I will make bold, señora, come of it what may, to beg you will observe, if your wounded feelings allow you, that in nothing has Marco Antonio the advantage of me, except the happiness of being loved by you. My lineage is as good as his, and in fortune he is not much superior to me. As for the gifts of nature, it becomes me not to laud myself, especially if in your eyes those which have fallen to my share are of no esteem. All this I say, adored señora, that you may seize the remedy for your disasters which fortune offers to your hand. You see that Marco Antonio cannot be yours, since Heaven has already made him my sister's; and the same Heaven which has taken him from you is now willing to compensate you with me, who desire no higher bliss in this life than that of being your husband. See how good fortune stands knocking at the door of the evil fortune you have hitherto known. And do not suppose that I shall ever think the worse of you for the boldness you have shown in seeking after Marco Antonio; for from the moment I determine to match myself with you, I am bound to forget all that is past. Well I know that the same power which has constrained me so irresistibly to adore you, has brought you also to your present pass, and therefore there will be no need to seek an excuse where there has been no fault.”

Leocadia listened in silence to all Don Rafael said, only from time to time heaving a sigh from the bottom of her heart. Don Rafael ventured to take her hand; she did not withdraw it; and kissing it again and again, he said, “Tell me, lady of my soul, that you will be so wholly, in presence of these starry heavens, this calm listening sea, and these watery sands. Say that yes, which surely behoves your honour as well as my happiness. I repeat to you that I am a gentleman, as you know, and wealthy; that I love you, which you ought to esteem above every other consideration; and that whereas I find you alone, in a garb that derogates much from your honour, far from the home of your parents and your kindred, without any one to aid you at your need, and without the hope of obtaining what you were in quest of, you may return home in your own proper and seemly garb, accompanied by as good a husband as you had chosen for yourself, and be wealthy, happy, esteemed, and even applauded by all who may become acquainted with the events of your story. All this being so, I know not why you hesitate. Say the one word that shall raise me from the depth of wretchedness to the heaven of bliss, and in so doing, you will do what is best for yourself; you will comply with the demands of courtesy and good sense, and show yourself at once grateful and discreet.”

“Well,” said the doubting Leocadia, at last, “since Heaven has so ordained, and neither I nor any one living can oppose its will, be it as Heaven and you desire, señor. I take the same power to witness with what bashfulness I consent to your wishes, not because I am unconscious of what I gain by complying with them, but because I fear that when I am yours you will regard me with other eyes than those with which hitherto perhaps you have mistakingly beheld me. But be it as it may, to be the lawful wife of Don Rafael de Villavicencio is an honour I cannot lose, and with that alone I shall live contented. But if my conduct after I am your wife give me any claim to your esteem, I will thank Heaven for having brought me through such strange circumstances and such great misfortunes to the happiness of being yours. Give me your hand, Don Rafael, and take mine in exchange; and, as you say, let the witnesses of our mutual engagement be the sky, the sea, the sands, and this silence, interrupted only by my sighs and your entreaties.”

So saying, she permitted Don Rafael to embrace her, and taking each other’s hand they solemnised their betrothal with a few tears drawn from their eyes by the excess of joy succeeding to their past sorrows. They immediately returned to the knight's house, where their absence had occasioned great anxiety, and where the nuptials of Marco Antonio and Teodosia had already been celebrated by a priest, at the instance of Teodosia, who dreaded lest any untoward chance should rob her of her new-found hopes. The appearance of Don Rafael and Leocadia, and the account given by the former of what had passed between them, augmented the general joy, and the master of the house rejoiced as if they were his own near relations; for it is an innate characteristic of the Catalonian gentry to feel and act as friends towards such strangers as have any need of their services.

The priest, who was still present, desired that Leocadia should change her dress for one appropriate to her sex, and the knight at once supplied both the ladies with handsome apparel from the wardrobe of his wife, who was a lady of the ancient house of the Granolliques, famous in that kingdom. The surgeon was moved by charity to complain that the wounded man talked so much and was not left alone; but it pleased God that Marco Antonio's joy, and the little silence he observed, were the very means of his amendment, so that when they came to dress his wound next day, they found him out of danger, and in a fortnight more he was fit to travel. During the time he kept his bed he had made a vow that if he recovered he would go on a pilgrimage on foot to Santiago de Galicia, and in the fulfilment of that vow he was accompanied by Don Rafael, Leocadia, Teodosia, and even by the muleteer Calvete, unusual as such pious practices are with men of his calling; but he had found Don Rafael so liberal and good-humoured that he would not quit him till he had returned home. The party having to travel on foot as pilgrims, the mules were sent on to Salamanca.

The day fixed for their departure arrived, and equipped in their dalmaticas and with all things requisite, they took leave of their generous and hospitable friend, the knight Don Sancho de Cardona, a man of most illustrious blood and personally famous; and they pledged themselves that they and their descendants, to whom they should bequeath it as a duty, should perpetually preserve the memory of the singular favours received from him, in order that they might not be wanting at least in grateful feeling, if they could not repay them in any other way. Don Sancho embraced them all, and said it was a matter of course with him to render such services or others to all whom he knew or supposed to be Castilian hidalgos. They repeated their embraces twice, and departed with gladness, mingled with some sorrow. Travelling by easy stages to suit the strength of the lady pilgrims, they reached Monserrate in three days, remained as many more there, fulfilling their duties as good Catholic Christians, and resuming their journey, arrived without accident at Santiago, where they accomplished their vows with all possible devotion. They determined not to quit their pilgrim garbs until they reached their homes. After travelling towards them leisurely, they came at last to a rising ground whence Leocadia and Teodosia looked down upon their respective birthplaces, nor could they restrain their tears at the glad sight which brought back to their recollection all their past vicissitudes.

From the same spot they discovered a broad valley, which divided the two townships, and in it they saw under the shades of an olive a stalwart knight, mounted on a powerful charger, armed with a strong keen lance and a dazzlingly white shield. Presently they saw issuing from among some olive trees two other knights similarly armed, and of no less gallant appearance. These two rode up to the first, and after remaining awhile together they separated. The first knight and one of the two others set spurs to their horses, and charging each other like mortal enemies, began mutually to deal such vigorous thrusts, and to avoid or parry them with such dexterity, that it was plain they were masters in that exercise. The third knight remained a spectator of the fight without quitting his place. Don Rafael, who could not be content with a distant view of the gallant conflict, hurried down the hill, followed by the other three, and came up close to the two champions just as they had both been slightly wounded. The helmet of one of them had fallen off, and as he turned his face towards Don Rafael, the latter recognised his father, and Marco Antonio knew that the other was his own, whilst Leocadia discovered hers in the third knight who had not fought. Astounded at this spectacle, the two brothers instantly rushed between the champions, crying out "Stop, cavaliers! Stop! We who call on you to do so are your own sons! Father, I am Marco Antonio, for whose sake, as I guess, your honoured life is put to this peril. Allay your anger; cast away your weapons, or turn them against another enemy; for the one before you must henceforth be your brother."

The two knights instantly stopped; and looking round they observed that Don Sancho had dismounted and was embracing his daughter, who briefly narrated to him the occurrences at Barcelona. Don Sancho was proceeding to make peace between the combatants, but there was no need of that, for he found them already dismounted and embracing their sons with tears of joy. There now appeared at the entrance of the valley a great number of armed men on foot and on horseback: these were the vassals of the three knights, who had come to support the cause of their respective lords; but when they saw them embracing the pilgrims they halted, and knew not what to think until Don Sancho briefly recounted to them what he had learned from his daughter. The joy of all was unbounded. Five of the vassals immediately mounted the pilgrims on their own horses, and the whole party set out for the house of Marco Antonio's father, where it was arranged that the two weddings should be celebrated. On the way Don Rafael and Marco Antonio learned that the cause of the quarrel which had been so happily ended was a challenge sent to the father of the latter by the fathers of Teodosia and Leocadia, under the belief that he had been privy to the acts of seduction committed by his son. The two challengers having found him alone would not take any advantage of him, but agreed to fight him one after the other, like brave and generous knights. The combat, nevertheless, must have ended in the death of one or all of them but for the timely arrival of their children, who gave thanks to God for so happy a termination of the dispute.

The day after the arrival of the pilgrims, Marco Antonio's father celebrated the marriages of his son and Teodosia, Don Rafael and Leocadia, with extraordinary magnificence. The two wedded pairs lived long and happily together, leaving an illustrious progeny which still exists in their two towns, which are among the best in Andalusia. Their names, however, we suppress, in deference to the two ladies, whom malicious or prudish tongues might reproach with levity of conduct. But I would beg of all such to forbear their sentence, until they have examined themselves and seen whether they too have not been assailed some time or other by what are called the arrows of Cupid, weapons whose force is truly irresistible. Calvete was made happy with the gift of the mule which Don Rafael had left at Salamanca, and with many other presents; and the poets of the time took occasion to employ their pens in celebrating the beauty and the adventures of the two damsels, as bold as they were virtuous, the heroines of this strange story.

The Spanish Texts

Calle Cervantes, esquina con León, Madrid — the house where Cervantes died on April 22, 1611

A plaque commemorating the death of the author

LIST OF CERVANTES' WORKS

In this section readers can browse Cervantes' complete works in the original Spanish.

Índice

Novelas

LA GALATEA

EL INGENIOSO HIDALGO DON QUIJOTE DE LA MANCHA

EL INGENIOSO CABALLERO DON QUIJOTE DE LA MANCHA

LOS TRABAJOS DE PERSILES Y SIGISMUNDA

Novela cortas

NOVELAS EJEMPLARES

Teatro

EL TRATO DE ARGEL

LA NUMANCIA

EL GALLARDO ESPAÑOL

LA CASA DE LOS CELOS

LOS BAÑOS DE ARGEL

EL RUFIÓN DICHOSO

LA GRAN SULTANA

EL LABERINTO DE AMOR

LA ENTRETENIDA

PEDRO DE URDEMALAS

EL JUEZ DE LOS DIVORCIOS

EL RUFIÓN VIUDO

LA ELECCIÓN DE LOS ALCALDES DE DAGANZO

LA GUARDA CUIDADOSA

EL VIZCAÍNO FINGIDO

EL RETABLO DE LAS MARAVILLAS

LA CUEVA DE SALAMANCA

EL VIEJO CELOSO

Poesía

POESÍAS SUELTAS

VIAJE DEL PARNASO

LISTA DE POEMAS EN ORDEN CRONOLÓGICO

LISTA DE POEMAS EN ORDEN ALFABÉTICO

Novelas

LA GALATEA

ÍNDICE

Curiosos lectores

Primero libro de Galatea

Segundo libro de Galatea

Tercero libro de Galatea

Cuarto libro de Galatea

Quinto libro de Galatea

Sexto y último libro de Galatea

Tasa

Yo, Miguel de Ondarza Zavala, escribano de Cámara de Su Majestad, de los que residen en el su Consejo, doy fe que, habiéndose visto por los dichos señores del Consejo un libro que con privilegio real imprimió Miguel de Cervantes, intitulado Los seis libros de Galatea, tasaron a tres maravedís el pliego escrito en molde, para que sin pena alguna se pueda vender. Y mandaron que esta tasa se ponga al principio de cada volumen de los que así fueren impresos, para que no se exceda dello; y, en fe dello, lo firmé de mi nombre. Fecha en Madrid, a trece días del mes de marzo de mil y quinientos y ochenta y cinco años.

Miguel de Ondarza Zavala.

Erratas

Folio 2, página 2, línea 1: la desdeñaba, le desdeñaba; folio 3, página 1, línea 8: tal mala, tan mala; folio 20, página 2, línea 9: acababan, acababa; folio 25, página 1, línea 14: sus a padres, a sus padres; folio 29, página 2, línea 15: esfogado, desfogado; folio 69, página 2, línea última: por toda, por todo; folio 90, página 1, línea penúltima: valla, allá; folio 90, página 2, línea 10: ne se diese, no se diese; folio 93, página 2, línea 5: que tan doloroso, que en tan doloroso; folio 98, página 2, línea 1: no da la luz, no da luz; folio 105, página 2, línea 18: se hallase, me hallase; folio 107, página 1, línea 2: acordara, acobardara; folio 119, página 1, línea 11: ePro, Pero; folio 138, página 1, línea penúltima: no pudo, no puedo; folio 144, página 1, línea 4: tierra, tierna; folio 147, página 1, línea 2: flor tierra, flor tierna; folio 203, página 2, línea 22: derriban, derivan; folio 214, página 1, línea 13: deleitar, dilatar; folio 219, página 1, línea 4: alegar, alegra; folio 221, página 1, línea 5: creer que, creer lo que; folio 223, página 1, línea 14: es gusto, es justo; folio 229, página 1, línea 17: al te adora, al que te adora; folio 262, página 2, línea 8: ímpelu, ímpetu; folio 278, página 1, línea 19: valeroso amo, valeroso ánimo; folio 330, página 2, línea 2: Y así, Y si; folio 335, página 1, línea 2: León el que, León es el que; folio 339, página 1, línea 10: Romero, Romeo; folio 343, página 1, línea 14: sin las obras, sin las sombras; folio 344, página 1, línea 16: un fin hermoso, si un fin hermoso; folio 354, página 2, línea 5: desechas, endechas; folio 355, página 1, tras el verso 5: di este, anchas, cortas y extendidas; folio 362, página 2, línea 1: ardiente, ardientes; folio 193, página 1, línea 13: después que dice el oro, el brocado, diga que sobre nuestros cuerpos echamos. Como, &c.

Yo, el licenciado Várez de Castro, corrector por Su Majestad en esta Universidad de Alcalá, vi este libro, intitulado Primera parte de la Galatea, y le hallé bien impreso conforme a su original, sacadas las erratas arriba dichas; y por la verdad, di ésta, firmada de mi nombre. Fecha hoy, postrero de febrero de ochenta y cinco años.

El licenciado Várez de Castro.

Aprobación

Por mandado de los señores del Real Consejo, he visto este libro, intitulado Los seis libros de Galatea, y lo que me parece es que se puede y debe imprimir, atento a ser tratado apacible y de mucho ingenio, sin perjuicio de nadie, así la prosa como el verso; antes, por ser libro provechoso, de muy casto estilo, buen romance y galana invención, sin tener cosa malsonante, deshonesto ni contraria a buenas costumbres, se le puede dar al autor, en premio de su trabajo, el privilegio y licencia que pide. Fecha en Madrid, a primero de febrero de MDLXXXIII.

Lucas Gracián de Antisco.

El rey

Por cuanto por parte de vos, Miguel de Cervantes, estante en nuestra Corte, nos ha sido hecha relación que vos habíades compuesto un libro intitulado Galatea, en verso y en prosa castellano, y que os había costado mucho trabajo y estudio, por ser obra de mucho ingenio, suplicándonos os mandásemos dar licencia para lo poder imprimir, y privilegio por doce años, o como la nuestra merced fuese; lo cual visto por los del nuestro Consejo, y como por su mandado se hizo en el dicho libro la diligencia que la pregmática por nos ahora nuevamente hecha sobre ello dispone, fue acordado que debíamos mandar dar esta nuestra cédula para vos en la dicha razón, e nos tuvimoslo por bien, por lo cual vos damos licencia y facultad para que, por tiempo de diez años primeros siguientes, que corren y se cuentan desde el día de la data della, vos, o la persona que vuestro poder hubiere, podáis imprimir y vender el dicho libro, que desuso se hace mención, en estos nuestros reinos. Y por la presente damos licencia y facultad a cualquier impresor dellos que vos nombráredes para que por esta vez le pueda imprimir por el original que en el nuestro Consejo se vio, que van rubricadas las planas y firmado al fin dél de Miguel de Ondarza Zavala, nuestro escribano de Cámara de los que en el nuestro Consejo residen; y con que, antes que se venda, le traigáis al nuestro Consejo, juntamente con el original, para que se vea si la dicha impresión está conforme a él, o trayáis fe en pública forma en cómo por el corretor nombrado por nuestro mandado se vio y corrigió la dicha impresión con el original, y se imprimió conforme a él, y quedan asimismo impresas las erratas por él apuntadas para cada un libro de los que así fueren impresos; y tase el precio que por cada volumen hubiéredes de haber, so pena de caer e incurrir en las penas contenidas en la dicha pregmática y leyes de nuestros reinos. Y mandamos que, durante el dicho tiempo, persona alguna, sin vuestra licencia, no lo pueda imprimir, so pena que el que le imprimiere o vendiere en estos nuestros reinos haya perdido y pierda todos y cualesquier libros y moldes que dél tuviere y vendiere; y más, incurra en pena de cincuenta mil maravedís: la tercera parte para el denunciador, y la otra tercera parte para la nuestra Cámara, y la otra tercera parte para el juez que lo sentenciare. Y mandamos a los del nuestro Consejo, presidentes, oidores de las nuestras audiencias, alcaldes, alguaciles de la nuestra Casa y Corte y chancillerías, y a todos los corregidores, asistentes, gobernadores, alcaldes mayores y ordinarios, y otros jueces y justicias cualesquier de todas las ciudades, villas y lugares de nuestros reinos y señoríos, así a los que ahora son como los que serán de aquí adelante, que vos guarden y cumplan esta cédula y merced que así vos hacemos, y contra el tenor y forma della no vayan ni pasen en manera alguna, so pena de la nuestra merced y de diez mil maravedís para la nuestra Cámara. Fecha en Madrid, a XXII días del mes de febrero de mil y quinientos y ochenta y cuatro años.

Yo, el rey.

Por mandado de Su Majestad: Antonio de Eraso.

Dedicatoria

Al Ilustrísimo señor Ascanio Colona, abad de Sancta Sofía.

Ha podido tanto conmigo el valor de V. S. Ilustrísima, que me ha quitado el miedo que, con razón, debiera tener en osar ofrescerle estas primicias de mi corto ingenio. Mas, considerando que el estremado de V. S. Ilustrísima no sólo vino a España para ilustrar las mejores universidades della, sino también para ser norte por donde se encaminen los que alguna virtuosa sciencia profesan, especialmente los que en la de la poesía se ejercitan, no he querido perder la ocasión de seguir esta guía, pues sé que en ella y por ella todos hallan seguro puerto y favorable acogimiento. Hágale V. S. Ilustrísima bueno a mi deseo, el cual envío delante, para dar algún ser a este mi pequeño servicio. Y si por esto no lo meresciere, merézcalo, a lo menos, por haber seguido algunos años las vencedoras banderas de aquel sol de la milicia que ayer nos quitó el cielo delante de los ojos, pero no de la memoria de aquellos que procuran tenerla de cosas dignas della, que fue el Excelentísimo padre de V. S. Ilustrísima. Juntando a esto el efecto de reverencia que hacían en mi ánimo las cosas que, como en profecía, oí muchas veces decir de V. S. Ilustrísima al cardenal de Aquaviva, siendo yo su camarero en Roma, las cuales ahora no sólo las veo cumplidas, sino todo el mundo que goza de la virtud, cristiandad, magnificiencia y bondad de V. S. Ilustrísima, con que da cada día señales de la clara y generosa estirpe do deciendo, la cual en antigüedad compite con el principio y príncipes de la grandeza romana, y en las virtudes y heroicas obras con la misma virtud y más encumbradas hazañas, como nos lo certifican mil verdaderas historias, llenas de los famosos hechos del tronco y ramos de la real casa Colona, debajo de cuya fuerza y sitio yo me pongo ahora, para hacer escudo a los murmuradores que ninguna cosa perdonan; aunque si V. S. Ilustrísima perdona este mi atrevimiento, ni tendré qué temer, ni más que desear, sino que Nuestro Señor guarde la Ilustrísima persona de V. S. con el acrescentamiento de dignidad y estado que sus servidores deseamos.

Ilustrísimo Señor, B. L. M. de V. S.

Su mayor servidor: Miguel de Cervantes Saavedra.

Curiosos lectores

La ocupación de escribir églogas en tiempo que, en general, la poesía anda tan desfavorecida, bien recelo que no será tenido por ejercicio tan loable que no sea necesario dar alguna particular satisfacción a los que, siguiendo el diverso gusto de su inclinación natural, todo lo que es diferente dél estiman por trabajo y tiempo perdido. Mas, pues a ninguno toca satisfacer a ingenios que se encierran en términos tan limitados, sólo quiero responder a los que, libres de pasión, con mayor fundamento se mueven a no admitir las diferencias de la poesía vulgar, creyendo que los que en esta edad tratan della se mueven a publicar sus escritos con ligera consideración, llevados de la fuerza que la pasión de las composiciones propias suele tener en los autores dellas; para lo cual puedo alegar de mi parte la inclinación que a la poesía siempre he tenido y la edad, que, habiendo apenas salido de los límites de la juventud, parece que da licencia a semejantes ocupaciones. De más de que no puede negarse que los estudios desta facultad (en el pasado tiempo, con razón, tan estimada) traen consigo más que medianos provechos, como son enriquecer el poeta, considerando su propia lengua, y enseñorearse del artificio de la elocuencia que en ella cabe, para empresas más altas y de mayor importancia, y abrir camino para que, a su imitación, los ánimos estrechos, que en la brevedad del lenguaje antiguo quieren que se acabe la abundancia de la lengua castellana, entiendan que tienen campo abierto, fértil y espacioso, por el cual, con facilidad y dulzura, con gravedad y elocuencia, pueden correr con libertad, descubriendo la diversidad de conceptos agudos, graves, sotiles y levantados que en la fertilidad de los ingenios españoles la favorable influencia del cielo con tal ventaja en diversas partes ha producido, y cada hora produce en la edad dichosa nuestra, de lo cual puedo ser yo cierto testigo, que conozco algunos que, con justo derecho, y sin el empacho que yo llevo, pudieran pasar con seguridad carrera tan peligrosa.

Mas son tan ordinarias y tan diferentes las humanas dificultades, y tan varios los fines y las acciones, que unos, con deseo de gloria, se aventuran; otros, con temor de infamia, no se atreven a publicar lo que, una vez descubierto, ha de sufrir el juicio del vulgo, peligroso y casi siempre engañado. Yo, no porque tenga razón para ser confiado, he dado muestras de atrevido en la publicación deste libro, sino porque no sabría determinarme destos dos inconvenientes cuál sea el mayor: o el de quien con ligereza, deseando comunicar el talento que del cielo ha rescibido, temprano se aventura a ofrescer los frutos de su ingenio a su patria y amigos, o el que, de puro escrupuloso, perezoso y tardío, jamás acabando de contentarse de lo que hace y entiende, tiniendo sólo por acertado lo que no alcanza, nunca se determina a descubrir y comunicar sus escriptos. De manera que, así como la osadía y confianza del uno podría condenarse por la licencia demasiada, que con seguridad se concede, asimesmo el recelo y la tardanza del otro es vicioso, pues tarde o nunca aprovecha con el fruto de su ingenio y estudio a los que esperan y desean ayudas y ejemplos semejantes para pasar adelante en sus ejercicios.

Huyendo destos dos inconvenientes, no he publicado antes de ahora este libro, ni tampoco quise tenerle para mí solo más tiempo guardado, pues para más que para mi gusto solo le compuso mi entendimiento. Bien sé lo que suele condenarse exceder nadie en la materia del estilo que debe guardarse en ella, pues el príncipe de la poesía latina fue calumniado en alguna de sus églogas por haberse levantado más que en las otras; y así, no temeré mucho que alguno condemne haber mezclado razones de filosofía entre algunas amorosas de pastores, que pocas veces se levantan a más que a tratar cosas del campo, y esto con su acostumbrada llaneza. Mas, advirtiéndolo, como en el discurso de la obra alguna vez se hace, que muchos de los disfrazados pastores della lo eran sólo en el hábito, queda llana esta objeción. Las demás que en la invención y en la disposición se pudieren poner, discúlpelas la intención segura del que leyere, como lo hará siendo discreto, y la voluntad del autor, que fue de agradar, haciendo en esto lo que pudo y alcanzó; que, ya que en esta parte la obra no responda a su deseo, otras ofresce para adelante de más gusto y de mayor artificio.

De Luis Gálvez de Montalvo al autor

Soneto

Mientra del yugo sarracino anduvo
tu cuello preso y tu cerviz domada,
y allí tu alma, al de la fe amarrada,
a más rigor, mayor firmeza tuvo,

gozóse el cielo; mas la tierra estuvo 5
casi viuda sin ti, y, desamparada
de nuestras musas, la real morada
tristeza, llanto, soledad mantuvo.

Pero después que diste al patrio suelo
tu alma sana y tu garganta suelta 10
dentre las fuerzas bárbaras confusas,

descubre claro tu valor el cielo,
gózase el mundo en tu felice vuelta
y cobra España las perdidas musas.

De don Luis de Vargas Manrique

Soneto

Hicieron muestra en vos de su grandeza,
gran Cervantes, los dioses celestiales,
y, cual primera, dones inmortales
sin tasa os repartió naturaleza.

Jove su rayo os dio, que es la viveza 5
de palabras que mueven pedernales;
Diana, en exceder a los mortales
en castidad de estilo con pureza;

Mercurio, las historias marañadas;
Marte, el fuerte vigor que el brazo os mueve; 10
Cupido y Venus, todos sus amores;
Cupido y Venus, todos sus amores;

Apolo, las canciones concertadas;
su sciencia, las hermanas todas nueve;
y, al fin, el dios silvestre, sus pastores. 15

De López Maldonado

Soneto

Salen del mar, y vuelven a sus senos,

después de una veloz, larga carrera,
como a su madre universal primera,
los hijos della largo tiempo ajenos.

Con su partida no la hacen menos, 5
ni con su vuelta más soberbia y fiera, porque tiene, quedándose ella entera,
de su humor siempre sus estanques llenos.

La mar sois vos, ¡oh Galatea estremada!, los ríos, los loores, premio y fruto 10 con que ensalzáis la más ilustre vida.

Por más que deis, jamás seréis menguada, y menos cuando os den todos tributo,
con él vendréis a veros más crecida.

Primero libro de Galatea

Mientras que al triste, lamentable acento
del mal acorde son del canto mío,
en eco amarga de cansado aliento, responde el monte, el prado, el llano, el río, demos al sordo y presuroso viento

5 las quejas que del pecho ardiente y frío

salen a mi pesar, pidiendo en vano
ayuda al río, al monte, al prado, al llano.

Crece el humor de mis cansados ojos
las aguas deste río, y deste prado 10
las variadas flores son abrojos
y espinas que en el alma s'han entrado.
No escucha el alto monte mis enojos,
y el llano de escucharlos se ha cansado;
y así, un pequeño alivio al dolor mío 15
no hallo en monte, en llano, en prado, en río.

Creí que el fuego que en el alma enciende
el niño alado, el lazo con que aprieta,
la red sutil con que a los dioses prende
y la furia y rigor de su saeta, 20
que así ofendiera como a mí me ofende
al sujeto sin par que me subjeta;
mas contra un alma que es de mármol hecha,
la red no puede, el fuego, el lazo y flecha.

Yo sí que al fuego me consumo y quemo, 25
y al lazo pongo humilde la garganta,
y a la red invisible poco temo,
y el rigor de la flecha no me espanta.
Por esto soy llegado a tal extremo,
a tanto daño, a desventura tanta, 30
que tengo por mi gloria y mi sosiego
la saeta, la red, el lazo, el fuego.

Esto cantaba Elicio, pastor en las riberas de Tajo, con quien naturaleza se mostró tan liberal, cuanto la fortuna y el amor escasos, aunque los discursos del tiempo, consumidor y renovador de las humanas obras, le trujeron a términos que tuvo por dichosos los infinitos y desdichados en que se había visto, y en los que su deseo le había puesto, por la incomparable belleza de la sin par Galatea, pastora en las mismas riberas nacida; y, aunque en el pastoral y rústico ejercicio criada, fue de tan alto y subido entendimiento, que las discretas damas, en los reales palacios crecidas y al discreto tracto de la corte acostumbradas, se tuvieran por dichosas de parescerla en algo, así en la discreción como en la hermosura. Por los infinitos y ricos dones con que el cielo a Galatea había adornado, fue querida, y con entrañable ahínco amada, de muchos pastores y ganaderos que por las riberas de Tajo su ganado apascentaban; entre los cuales se atrevió a quererla el gallardo Elicio, con tan puro y sincero amor cuanto la virtud y honestidad de Galatea permitía.

De Galatea no se entiende que aborresciese a Elicio, ni menos que le amase; porque a veces, casi como convencida y obligada a los muchos servicios de Elicio, con algún honesto favor le subía al cielo; y otras veces, sin tener cuenta con esto, de tal manera le desdeñaba que el enamorado pastor la suerte de su estado apenas conocía. No eran las buenas partes y virtudes de Elicio para aborrecerse, ni la hermosura, gracia y bondad de Galatea para no amarse. Por lo uno, Galatea no desechaba de todo punto a Elicio; por lo otro, Elicio no podía, ni debía, ni quería olvidar a Galatea. Parescíale a Galatea que, pues Elicio con tanto miramiento de su honra la amaba, que sería demasiada ingratitud no pagarle con algún honesto favor sus honestos pensamientos. Imaginábase Elicio que, pues Galatea no desdeñaba sus servicios, que tendrían buen suceso sus deseos. Y cuando estas imaginaciones le avivaban la esperanza, hallábase tan contento y atrevido, que mil veces quiso descubrir a Galatea lo que con tanta dificultad encubría. Pero la discreción de Galatea conocía bien, en los movimientos del rostro, lo que Elicio en el alma traía; y tal el suyo mostraba, que al enamorado pastor se le helaban las palabras en la boca, y quedábase solamente con el gusto de aquel primer movimiento, por parescerle que a la honestidad de Galatea se le hacía agravio en tratarle de cosas que en alguna manera pudiesen tener sombra de no ser tan honestas que la misma honestidad en ellas se transformase.

Con estos altibajos de su vida, la pasaba el pastor tan mala que a veces tuviera por bien el mal de perderla, a trueco de no sentir el que le causaba no acabarla. Y así, un día, puesta la consideración en la variedad de sus pensamientos, hallándose en medio de un deleitoso prado, convidado de la soledad y del murmurio de un deleitoso arroyuelo que por el llano corría, sacando de su zurrón un polido rabel, al son del cual sus querellas con el cielo cantando comunicaba, con voz en extremo buena, cantó los siguientes versos: Amoroso pensamiento, si te precias de ser mío,

camina con tan buen tiento que ni te humille el desvío ni ensoberbezca el contento. 5

Ten un medio -si se acierta
a tenerse en tal porfía-:
no huyas el alegría,
ni menos cierres la puerta
al llanto que amor envía. 10

Si quieres que de mi vida
no se acabe la carrera,
no la lleves tan corrida
ni subas do no se espera
sino muerte en la caída. 15 Esa vana presunción
en dos cosas parará:
la una, en tu perdición;
la otra, en que pagará
tus deudas el corazón. 20

Dél naciste, y en naciendo, pecaste, y págalo él;
huyes dél, y si pretendo
recogerte un poco en él,
ni te alcanzo ni te entiendo. 25

Ese vuelo peligroso
con que te subes al cielo,
si no fueres venturoso,
ha de poner por el suelo
mi descanso y tu reposo. 30

Dirás que quien bien se emplea
y se ofrece a la ventura, que no es posible que sea

del tal juzgado a locura
el brío de que se arrea. 35
Y que, en tan alta ocasión, es gloria que par no tiene
tener tanta presunción,
cuanto más si le conviene
al alma y al corazón. 40

Yo lo tengo así entendido, mas quiero desengañarte;
que es señal ser atrevido
tener de amor menos parte
qu'el humilde y encogido. 45
Subes tras una beldad

que no puede ser mayor:
no entiendo tu calidad,
que puedas tener amor
con tanta desigualdad. 50

Que si el pensamiento mira un sujeto levantado,
contéplalo y se retira,
por no ser caso acertado
poner tan alta la mira. 55
Cuanto más, que el amor nasce
junto con la confianza,
y en ella se ceba y paze;
y, en faltando la esperanza,
como niebla se deshace. 60

Pues tú, que vees tan distante
el medio del fin que quieres,
sin esperanza y constante,
si en el camino murieres,
morirás como ignorante. 65
Pero no se te dé nada,
que en esta empresa amorosa,

do la causa es sublimada,
el morir es vida honrosa;
la pena, gloria estremada. 70

No dejara tan presto el agradable canto el enamorado Elicio, si no sonaran a su derecha mano las voces de Erastro, que con el rebaño de sus cabras hacia el lugar donde él estaba se venía. Era Erastro un rústico ganadero, pero no le valió tanto su rústica y selvática suerte que defendiese que de su robusto pecho el blando amor no tomase entera posesión, haciéndole querer más que a su vida a la hermosa Galatea, a la cual sus querellas, cuando ocasión se le ofrecía, declaraba. Y, aunque rústico, era, como verdadero enamorado, en las cosas del amor tan discreto que, cuando en ellas hablaba, parecía que el mismo amor se las mostraba y por su lengua las profería; pero, con todo eso, puesto que de Galatea eran escuchadas, eran en aquella cuenta tenidas en que las cosas de burla se tienen. No le daba a Elicio pena la competencia de Erastro, porque entendía del ingenio de Galatea que a cosas más altas la inclinaba. Antes tenía lástima y envidia a Erastro: lástima, en ver que al fin amaba, y en parte donde era imposible coger el fruto de sus deseos; envidia, por parescerle que quizá no era tal su entendimiento, que diese lugar al alma a que sintiese los desdenes o favores de Galatea, de suerte, o que los unos le acabasen, o los otros lo enloqueciesen.

Venía Erastro acompañado de sus mastines, fieles guardadores de las simples ovejuelas (que debajo de su amparo están seguras de los carniceros dientes de los hambrientos lobos), holgándose con ellos, y por sus nombres los llamaba, dando a cada uno el título que su condición y ánimo merecía: a quién llamaba León, a quién Gavilán, a quién Robusto, a quién Manchado; y ellos, como si de entendimiento fueran dotados, con el mover las cabezas, viniéndose para él, daban a entender el gusto que de su gusto sentían. Desta manera llegó Erastro adonde de Elicio fue agradablemente rescibido, y aun rogado que, si en otra parte no había determinado de pasar el sol de la calurosa siesta, pues aquella en que estaban era tan aparejada para ello, no le fuese enojoso pasarla en su compañía.

-Con nadie -respondió Erastro-la podría yo tener mejor que contigo, Elicio, si ya no fuese con aquella que está tan enrobrescida a mis demandas, cuan hecha encina a tus continuos quejidos.

Luego los dos se sentaron sobre la menuda yerba, dejando andar a sus anchuras el ganado despuntando con los rumiadores dientes las tiernas yerbezuelas del herboso llano. Y como Erastro, por muchas y descubiertas señales, conocía claramente que Elicio a Galatea amaba, y que el merescimiento de Elicio era de mayores quilates que el suyo, en señal de que reconocía esta verdad, en medio de sus pláticas, entre otras razones, le dijo las siguientes: -No sé, gallardo y enamorado Elicio, si habrá sido causa de darte pesadumbre el amor que a Galatea tengo; y si lo ha sido, debes perdonarme, porque jamás imaginé de enojarte, ni de Galatea quise otra cosa que servirla. Mala rabia o cruda roña consume y acabe mis retozadores chivatos, y mis ternezuelos corderillos, cuando dejaren las tetas de las queridas madres, no hallen en el verde prado para sustentarse sino amargos tueros y ponzoñosas adelfas, si no he procurado mil veces quitarla de la memoria, y si otras tantas no he andado a los médicos y curas del lugar a que me diesen remedio para las ansias que por su causa padezco. Los unos me mandan que tome no sé qué bebedizos de paciencia; los otros dicen que me encomiende a Dios, que todo lo cura, o que todo es locura. Permíteme, buen Elicio, que yo la quiera, pues puedes estar seguro que si tú con tus habilidades y estremadas gracias y razones no la ablandas, mal podré yo con mis simplezas enternecerla. Esta licencia te pido por lo que estoy obligado a tu merescimiento; que, puesto que no me la dieses, tan imposible sería dejar de amarla, como hacer que estas aguas no mojasen, ni el sol con sus peinados cabellos no nos alumbrase.

No pudo dejar de reírse Elicio de las razones de Erastro y del comedimiento con que la licencia de amar a Galatea le pedía; y así, le respondió: -No me pesa a mí, Erastro, que tú ames a Galatea; pésame bien de entender de su condición que podrán poco para con ella tus verdaderas razones y no fingidas palabras; déte Dios tan buen suceso en tus deseos, cuanto meresce la sinceridad de tus pensamientos. Y de aquí adelante no dejes por mi respecto de querer a Galatea, que no soy de tan ruin condición que, ya que a mí me falte ventura, huelgue de que otros no la tengan; antes te ruego, por lo que debes a la voluntad que te muestro, que no me niegues tu conversación y amistad, pues de la mía puedes estar tan seguro como te he certificado. Anden nuestros ganados juntos, pues andan nuestros pensamientos apareados. Tú, al son de tu zampoña, publicarás el contento o pena que el alegre o triste rostro de Galatea te causare; yo, al de mi rabel, en el silencio de las sosegadas noches, o en el calor de las ardientes siestas, a la fresca sombra de los verdes árboles de que esta nuestra ribera está tan adornada, te ayudaré a llevar la pesada carga de tus trabajos, dando noticia al cielo de los míos. Y, para señal de nuestro buen propósito y verdadera amistad, en tanto que se hacen mayores las sombras destos árboles y el sol hacia el occidente se declina, acordemos nuestros instrumentos y demos principio al ejercicio que de aquí adelante hemos de tener.

No se hizo de rogar Erastro; antes, con muestras de extraño contento por verse en tanta amistad con Elicio, sacó su zampoña y Elicio su rabel; y, comenzando el uno y replicando el otro, cantaron lo que sigue:

ELICIO

Blanda, süave, reposadamente,
ingrato Amor, me sujetaste el día que los cabellos de oro y bella frente
miré del sol que al sol escurecía;
tu tósigo cruel, cual de serpiente, 5
en las rubias madejas se escondía;
yo, por mirar el sol en los manojos,
todo vine a beberle por los ojos.

ERASTRO

Atónito quedé y embelesado,
como estatua sin voz de piedra dura, 10
cuando de Galatea el estremado
donaire vi, la gracia y hermosura.
Amor me estaba en el siniestro lado,
con las saetas de oro, ¡ay muerte dura!,
haciéndome una puerta por do entrase 15
Galatea y el alma me robase.

ELICIO

¿Con qué milagro, amor, abres el pecho
del miserable amante que te sigue,
y de la llaga interna que le has hecho
crecida gloria muestra que consigue? 20
¿Cómo el daño que haces es provecho?
¿Cómo en tu muerte alegre vida vive?
L'alma que prueba estos efectos todos

la causa sabe, pero no los modos.

ERASTRO

No se ven tantos rostros figurados 25
en roto espejo o hecho por tal arte que, si uno en él se mira, retratados
se ve una multitud en cada parte, cuantos nacen cuidados y cuidados
de un cuidado crüel que no se parte 30
del alma mía a su rigor vencida,
hasta apartarse junto con la vida.

ELICIO

La blanca nieve y colorada rosa,
qu'el verano no gasta ni el invierno;
el sol de dos luceros, do reposa 35
el blando amor, y a do estará in eterno;
la voz, cual la de Orfeo poderosa
de suspender las furias del infierno,
y otras cosas que vi quedando ciego,
yesca me han hecho al invisible fuego. 40

ERASTRO

Dos hermosas manzanas coloradas,

que tales me semejan dos mejillas,
y el arco de dos cejas levantadas,
quel de Iris no llegó a sus maravillas;
dos rayos, dos hileras estremadas 45

de perlas entre grana y, si hay decillas,
mil gracias que no tienen par ni cuento,
niebla m'han hecho al amoroso viento.

ELICIO

Yo ardo y no me abraso, vivo y muero;
estoy lejos y cerca de mí mismo; 50
espero en solo un punto y desespero;
súbome al cielo, bájome al abismo;
quiero lo que aborrezco, blando y fiero;
me pone el amaros parasismo;
y con estos contrarios, paso a paso, 55
cerca estoy ya del último traspaso.

ERASTRO

Yo te prometo, Elicio, que le diera
todo cuanto en la vida me ha quedado
a Galatea, porque me volviera
el alma y corazón que m'ha robado; 60
y después del ganado, le añadiera mi perro Gavilán con el Manchado; pero, como ella debe de ser diosa, el alma querrá más que no otra cosa.

ELICIO

Erastro, el corazón que en alta parte 65
es puesto por el hado, suerte o signo, quererle derribar por fuerza o arte
o diligencia humana, es desatino.
Debes de su ventura contentarte;

que, aunque mueras sin ella, yo imagino 70
que no hay vida en el mundo más dichosa
como el morir por causa tan honrosa.

Ya se aparejaba Erastro para seguir adelante en su canto, cuando sintieron, por un espeso montecillo que a sus espaldas estaba, un no pequeño estruendo y ruido; y, levantándose los dos en pie por ver lo que era, vieron que del monte salía un pastor corriendo a la mayor priesa del mundo, con un cuchillo desnudo en la mano y la color del rostro mudada; y que tras él venía otro ligero pastor, que a pocos pasos alcanzó al primero; y, asiéndole por el cabezón del pellico, levantó el brazo en el aire cuanto pudo, y un agudo puñal que sin vaina traía se le escondió dos veces en el cuerpo, diciendo: -Recibe, ¡oh mal lograda Leonida!, la vida deste traidor, que en venganza de tu muerte sacrífico.

Y esto fue con tanta presteza hecho que no tuvieron lugar Elicio y Erastro de estorbárselo, porque llegaron a tiempo que ya el herido pastor daba el último aliento, envuelto en estas pocas y mal formadas palabras.

-Dejárasme, Lisandro, satisfacer al cielo con más largo arrepentimiento el agravio que te hice, y después quitárasme la vida, que agora, por la causa que he dicho, mal contenta destas carnes se aparta.

Y, sin poder decir más, cerró los ojos en sempiterna noche.

Por las cuales palabras imaginaron Elicio y Erastro que no con pequeña causa había el otro pastor ejecutado en él tan cruda y violenta muerte. Y, por mejor informarse de todo el suceso, quisieran preguntárselo al pastor homicida, pero él, con tirado paso, dejando al pastor muerto y a los dos admirados, se tornó a entrar por el montecillo adelante. Y, queriendo Elicio seguirle y saber dél lo que deseaba, le vieron tornar a salir del bosque; y, estando por buen espacio desviado dellos, en alta voz les dijo: -Perdonadme, comedidos pastores, si yo no lo he sido en haber hecho en vuestra presencia lo que habéis visto, porque la justa y mortal ira que contra ese traidor tenía concebida no me dio lugar a más moderados discursos. Lo que os aviso es que, si no queréis enojar a la deidad que en el alto cielo mora, no hagáis las obsequias ni plegarias acostumbradas por el alma traidora dese cuerpo que delante tenéis, ni a él deis sepultura, si ya aquí en vuestra tierra no se acostumbra darla a los traidores.

Y, diciendo esto, a todo correr se volvió a entrar por el monte, con tanta priesa que quitó la esperanza a Elicio de alcanzarle aunque le siguiese. Y así, se volvieron los dos con tiernas entrañas a hacer el piadoso oficio y dar sepultura, como mejor pudiesen, al miserable cuerpo que tan repentinamente había acabado el curso de sus cortos días. Erastro fue a su cabaña, que no lejos estaba, y, trayendo suficiente aderezo, hizo una sepultura en el mismo lugar do el cuerpo estaba, y, dándole el último vale, le pusieron en ella; y, no sin compasión de su desdichado caso, se volvieron a sus ganados, y, recogiénolos con alguna priesa, porque ya el sol se entraba a más andar por las puertas de occidente, se recogieron a sus acostumbrados albergues, donde no su sosiego dellos, ni el poco que sus cuidados le concedían, podían apartar a Elicio de pensar qué causas habían movido a los dos pastores para venir a tan desesperado trance; y ya le pesaba de no haber seguido al pastor homicida, y saber dél, si fuera posible, lo que deseaba.

Con este pensamiento y con los muchos que sus amores le causaban, después de haber dejado en segura parte su rebaño, se salió de su cabaña, como otras veces solía; y con la luz de la hermosa Diana, que resplandeciente en el cielo se mostraba, se entró por la espesura de un espeso bosque adelante, buscando algún solitario lugar adonde en el silencio de la noche con más quietud pudiese soltar la rienda a sus amorosas imaginaciones, por ser cosa ya averiguada que a los tristes imaginativos corazones ninguna cosa les es de mayor gusto que la soledad, despertadora de memorias tristes o alegres. Y así, yéndose poco a poco gustando de un templado céfiro que en el rostro le hería, lleno del suavísimo olor que de las olorosas flores, de que el verde suelo estaba colmado, al pasar por ellas blandamente robaba, envuelto en el aire delicado, oyó una voz como de persona que dolorosamente se quejaba; y, recogiendo por un poco en sí mismo el aliento, porque el ruido no le estorbaba de oír lo que era, sintió que de unas apretadas zarzas que poco desviadas dél estaban, la entristecida voz salía; y, aunque interrota de infinitos sospiros, entendió que estas tristes razones pronunciaba: -Cobarde y temeroso brazo, enemigo mortal de lo que a ti mismo debes; mira que ya no queda de quién tomar venganza, sino de ti mismo. ¿De qué te sirve alargar la vida que tan aborrecida tengo? Si piensas que es nuestro mal de los que el tiempo suele curar, vives engañado, porque no hay cosa más fuera de remedio que nuestra desventura; pues quien la pudiera hacer buena la tuvo tan corta que en los verdes años de su alegre juventud ofreció la vida al carnicero cuchillo, que se la quitase por la traición del malvado Carino, que hoy, con perder la suya, habrá aplacado en parte a aquella venturosa alma de Leonida, si en la celeste parte donde mora puede caber deseo de venganza alguna. ¡Ah, Carino, Carino! Ruego yo a los altos cielos, si dellos las justas plegarias son oídas, que no admitan la disculpa, si alguna dieres, de la traición que me heciste, y que permitan que tu cuerpo carezca de sepultura, así como tu alma careció de misericordia. Y tú, hermosa y mal lograda Leonida, recibe en muestra del amor que en vida te tuve, las lágrimas que en tu muerte derramo; y no atribuyas a poco sentimiento el no acabar la vida con el que de tu muerte recibo, pues sería poca re compensa a lo que debo y deseo sentir el dolor que tan presto se acabase. Tú verás, si de las cosas de acá tienes cuenta, cómo este miserable cuerpo quedará un día consumido del dolor poco a poco, para mayor pena y sentimiento: bien así como la mojada y encendida pólvora, que, sin hacer estrépito ni levantar llama en alto, entre sí misma se consume, sin dejar de sí sino el rastro de las consumidas cenizas. Duéleme cuanto puede dolerme, ¡oh alma del alma mía!, que ya que no pude gozarte en la vida, en la muerte no puedo hacerte las obsequias y honras que a tu bondad y virtud se convenían. Pero yo te prometo y juro que el poco tiempo -que será bien poco-que esta apasionada ánima mía rigiere la pesada carga deste miserable cuerpo, y la voz cansada tuviere aliento que la forme, de no tratar otra cosa en mis tristes y amargas canciones que de tus alabanzas y merescimientos.

A este punto cesó la voz, por la cual Elicio conoció claramente que aquél era el pastor homicida, de que recibió mucho gusto, por parecerle que estaba en parte donde podría saber dél lo que deseaba. Y, queriéndose llegar más cerca, hubo de tornarse a parar, porque le pareció que el pastor templaba un rabel, y quiso escuchar primero si al son dél alguna cosa diría; y no tardó mucho que con suave y acordada voz oyó que desta manera cantaba:

LISANDRO

¡Oh alma venturosa,
que del humano velo
libre al alta región viva volaste, dejando en tenebrosa
cárcel de desconsuelo 5
mi vida, aunque contigo la llevaste!
Sin ti, oscura dejaste
la luz clara del día;

por tierra derribada,
la esperanza fundada 10
en el más firme asiento de alegría;
en fin, con tu partida
quedó vivo el dolor, muerta la vida.

Envuelto en tus despojos,
la muerte s'ha llevado 15

el más subido extremo de belleza,
la luz de aquellos ojos
qu'en haberte mirado
tenían encerrada su riqueza;
con presta ligereza, 20
del alto pensamiento
y enamorado pecho,
la gloria se ha deshecho,
como la cera al sol o niebla al viento;
y toda mi ventura 25
cierra la piedra de tu sepultura.

¿Cómo pudo la mano
inexorable y cruda,
y el intento cruel, facinoroso,

del vengativo hermano 30
dejar libre y desnuda
tu alma del mortal velo hermoso?
¿Por qué turbó el reposo
de nuestros corazones?
Que, si no se acabaran, 35
en uno se juntaran
con honestas y sanctas condiciones.
¡Ay, fiera mano esquivá!,
¿cómo ordenaste que muriendo viva?

En llanto sempiterno 40
mi ánima mezquina
los años pasará, meses y días;
la tuya, en gozo eterno
y edad firme y continua,
no temerá del tiempo las porfías; 45
con dulces alegrías
verás firme la gloria que tu loable vida
te tuvo merescida;
y si puede caber en tu memoria 50
del suelo no perderla,

de quien tanto te amó debes tenerla.

Mas, ¡oh!, cuán simple he sido,
alma bendita y bella,
de pedir que te acuerdes, ni aun burlando 55
de mí que t'he querido,
pues sé que mi querella
se irá con tal favor eternizando.
Mejor es que, pensando que soy de ti olvidado, 60
me apriete con mi llaga,
hasta que se deshaga
con el dolor la vida, qu'ha quedado
en tan estraña suerte,
que no tiene por mal el de la muerte. 65

Goza en el sancto coro
con otras almas sanctas,
alma, de aquel seguro bien entero,
alto, rico tesoro,
mercedes, gracias tantas 70
que goza el que no huye el buen sendero;
allí gozar espero,

si por tus pasos guío,
contigo en paz entera
de eterna primavera, 75
sin temor, sobresalto ni desvío;
a esto me encamina,
pues será hazaña de tus obras digna.

Y, pues vosotras, celestiales almas,
veis el bien que deseo, 80
creced las alas a tan buen deseo.

Aquí cesó la voz, pero no los suspiros del desdichado que cantado había, y lo uno y lo otro fue parte de acrescentar en Elicio la gana de saber quién era. Y, rompiendo por las espinosas zarzas, por llegar más presto a do la voz salía, salió

a un pequeño prado, que todo en redondo, a manera de teatro, de espesísimas e intrincadas matas estaba ceñido, en el cual vio un pastor que con estremado brío estaba con el pie derecho delante y el izquierdo atrás, y el diestro brazo levantado, a guisa de quien esperaba hacer algún recio tiro. Y así era la verdad, porque, con el ruido que Elicio al romper por las matas había hecho, pensando ser alguna fiera de la cual convenía defenderse, el pastor del bosque se había puesto a punto de arrojarle una pesada piedra que en la mano tenía. Elicio, conociendo por su postura su intento, antes que le efectuase le dijo: -Sosiega el pecho, lastimado pastor, que el que aquí viene trae el suyo aparejado a lo que mandarle quisieres, y quien el deseo de saber tu ventura le ha hecho romper tus lágrimas y turbar el alivio que de estar solo se te podría seguir.

Con estas blandas y comedidas palabras de Elicio, se sosegó el pastor, y con no menos blandura le respondió diciendo: -Tu buen ofrecimiento agradezco, cualquiera que tú seas, comedido pastor, pero si ventura quieres saber de mí, que nunca la tuve, mal podrás ser satisfecho.

-Verdad dices -respondió Elicio-, pues por las palabras y quejas que esta noche te he oído, muestras bien claro la poca o ninguna que tienes; pero no menos satisfacerás mi deseo con decirme tus trabajos que con declararme tus contentos; y así la Fortuna te los dé en lo que desees, que no me niegues lo que te suplico si ya el no conocerme no lo impide; aunque, para asegurarte y moverte, te hago saber que no tengo el alma tan contenta que no sienta en el punto que es razón las miserias que me contares. Esto te digo porque sé que no hay cosa más escusada, y aun perdida, que contar el miserable sus desdichas a quien tiene el pecho colmo de contentos.

-Tus buenas razones me obligan -respondió el pastora que te satisfaga en lo que me pides, así porque no imagines que de poco y acobardado ánimo nacen las quejas y lamentaciones que dices que de mí has oído, como porque conozcas que aún es muy poco el sentimiento que muestro a la causa que tengo de mostrarlo.

Elicio se lo agradeció mucho; y, después de haber pasado entre los dos más palabras de comedimiento, dando señales Elicio de ser verdadero amigo del pastor del bosque, y conociendo él que no eran fingidos ofrecimientos, vino a conceder lo que Elicio rogaba. Y, sentándose los dos sobre la verde yerba, cubiertos con el resplandor de la hermosa Diana, que en claridad aquella noche con su hermano competir podía, el pastor del bosque, con muestras de un interno dolor, comenzó a decir desta manera: -«En las riberas de Betis, caudalosísimo río que la gran Vandalia enriquece, nació Lisandro -que éste es el nombre desdichado mío-, y de tan nobles padres cual pluviera al soberano Dios que en más baja fortuna fuera engendrado; porque muchas veces la nobleza del linaje pone alas y esfuerza el ánimo a levantar los ojos adonde la humilde suerte no osara jamás levantarlos, y de tales atrevimientos suelen suceder a menudo semejantes calamidades como las que de mí oirás si con atención me escuchas.

»Nació ansimesmo en mi aldea una pastora, cuyo nombre era Leonida, summa de toda la hermosura que en gran parte de la tierra -según yo imagino-pudiera hallarse; de no menos nobles y ricos padres nacida que su hermosura y virtud merescían. De do nació que, por ser los parientes de entrambos de los más principales del lugar y estar en ellos el mando y gobernación del pueblo, la envidia, enemiga mortal de la sosegada vida, sobre algunas diferencias del gobierno del pueblo, vino a poner entre ellos cizaña y mortalísima discordia; de manera que el pueblo fue dividido en dos parcialidades: la una seguía la de mis parientes, la otra la de los de Leonida, con tan arraigado rencor y mal ánimo, que no ha sido parte para ponerlos en paz ninguna humana diligencia. Ordenó, pues, la suerte, para echar de todo punto el sello a nuestra enemistad, que yo me enamorase de la hermosa Leonida, hija de Parmindro, principal cabeza del bando contrario. Y fue mi amor tan de veras que, aunque procuré con infinitos medios quitarle de mis entrañas, el fin de todos venía a parar a quedar más vencido y sujeto. Poníaseme delante un monte de dificultades que conseguir el fin de mi deseo me estorbaban, como eran el mucho valor de Leonida, la endurecida enemistad de nuestros padres, las pocas coyunturas, o ninguna, que se me ofrecían para descubrirle mi pensamiento; y, con todo esto, cuando ponía los ojos de la imaginación en la singular belleza de Leonida, cualquiera dificultad se allanaba, de suerte que me parecía poco romper por entre agudas puntas de diamantes, para llegar al fin de mis amorosos y honestos pensamientos. Habiendo, pues, por muchos días combatido conmigo mismo, por ver si podría apartar el alma de tan ardua empresa, y viendo ser imposible, recogí toda mi industria a considerar con cuál podría dar a entender a Leonida el secreto amor de mi pecho; y, como los principios en cualquier negocio sean siempre dificultosos, en los que tratan de amor son, por la mayor parte, dificultosísimos, hasta que el mismo Amor, cuando se quiere mostrar favorable, abre las puertas del remedio donde parece que están más cerradas. Y así se pareció en mí, pues, guiado por su pensamiento el mío, vine a imaginar que ningún medio se ofrecía mejor a mi deseo que hacerme amigo de los padres de Silvia, una pastora que era en extremo amiga de Leonida, y muchas veces la una a la otra, en compañía de sus padres, en sus casas se visitaban. Tenía Silvia un pariente que se llamaba Carino, compañero familiar de Crisalbo, hermano de la hermosa Leonida, cuya bizarría y aspereza de costumbres le habían dado renombre de cruel; y así, de todos los que le conocían, “el cruel Crisalbo” era llamado; y ni más ni menos a Carino, el pariente de Silvia y compañero de Crisalbo, por ser entremetido y agudo de ingenio, “el astuto Carino” le llamaban; del cual y de Silvia, por parecerme que me convenía, con el medio de muchos presentes y dádivas, forjé la amistad -al parecer-posible; a lo menos, de parte de Silvia fue más firme de lo que yo quisiera, pues los regalos y favores que ella con limpias entrañas me hacía, obligada de mis continuos servicios, tomó por instrumentos mi fortuna para ponerme en la desdicha en que ahora me veo.

»Era Silvia hermosa en extremo, y de tantas gracias adornada que la dureza del crudo corazón de Crisalbo se movió a amarla; y esto yo no lo supe sino con mi daño, y de allí a muchos días. Y, ya que con la larga experiencia estuve seguro de la voluntad de Silvia, un día, ofreciéndoseme comodidad, con las más tiernas palabras que pude, le descubrí la llaga de mi lastimado pecho, diciéndole que, aunque era tan profunda y peligrosa, no la sentía tanto, sólo por imaginar que en su solicitud estaba el remedio della; advirtiéndole ansimesmo el honesto fin a que mis pensamientos se encaminaban, que era a juntarme por legítimo matrimonio con la bella Leonida; y que, pues era causa tan justa y buena, no se había de desdeñar de tomarla a su cargo.

»En fin, por no serte prolijo, el amor me ministró tales palabras que le dijese, que ella, vencida dellas, y más por la pena que ella, como discreta, por las señales de mi rostro conoció que en mi alma moraba, se determinó de tomar a su cargo mi remedio y decir a Leonida lo que yo por ella sentía, prometiendo de hacer por mí todo cuanto su fuerza e industria alcanzase, puesto que se le hacía dificultosa tal empresa, por la inimicicia grande que entre nuestros padres conocía, aunque, por otra parte, imaginaba poder dar principio al fin de sus discordias si Leonida conmigo se casase. Movida, pues, con esta buena intención, y enternecida de las lágrimas que yo derramaba -como ya he dicho-, se aventuró a ser intercesora de mi contento. Y, discurriendo consigo qué entrada tendría para con Leonida, me mandó que le escribiese una carta, la cual ella se ofrecía a darla cuando tiempo le pareciese. Parecióme a mí bien su parecer, y aquel mismo día le envié una que, por haber sido principio del contento que por su respuesta sentí, siempre la he tenido en la memoria, puesto que fuera mejor no acordarme de cosas alegres en tiempo tan triste como es el en que ahora me hallo. Recibió la carta Silvia, y aguardaba ocasión de ponerla en las manos de Leonida.»

-No -dijo Elicio, atajando las razones de Lisandro-, no es justo que me dejes de decir la carta que a Leonida enviaste, que por ser la primera y por hallarte tan enamorado en aquella sazón, sin duda debe de ser discreta. Y, pues me has dicho que la tienes en la memoria y el gusto que por ella granjeaste, no me lo niegues ahora en no decírmela.

-Bien dices, amigo -respondió Lisandro-; que yo estaba entonces tan enamorado y temeroso, como ahora descontento y desesperado, y por esta razón me parece que no acerté a decir alguna, aunque fue harto acertamiento que Leonida las creyese las que en la carta iban. Ya que tanto deseas saberlas, decía desta manera:

LISANDRO A LEONIDA

«Mientras que he podido, aunque con grandísimo dolor mío, resistir con las propias fuerzas a la amorosa llama que por ti, ¡oh, hermosa Leonida!, me abrasa, jamás he tenido ardimiento, temeroso del subido valor que en ti conozco, de descubrirte el amor que te tengo; mas, ya que es consumida aquella virtud que hasta aquí me ha hecho fuerte, hame sido forzoso, descubriendo la llaga de mi pecho, tentar con escrebirte su primero y último remedio. Que sea el primero, tú lo sabes, y de ser el último está en tu mano, de la cual espero la misericordia que tu hermosura promete y mis honestos deseos merescen, los cuales y el fin adonde se encaminan conocerás de Silvia, que ésta te dará. Y, pues ella se ha atrevido, con ser quien es, a llevártela, entiende que son tan justos cuanto a tu merescimiento se deben.»

No le parecieron mal a Elicio las razones de la carta de Lisandro, el cual, prosiguiendo la historia de sus amores, dijo: -«No pasaron muchos días sin que esta carta viniese a las hermosas manos de Leonida, por medio de las piadosas de Silvia, mi verdadera amiga, la cual, junto con dársela, le dijo tales cosas que con ellas templó en gran parte la ira y alteración que con mi carta Leonida había recibido: como fue decirle cuánto bien se seguiría si por nuestro casamiento la enemistad de nuestros padres se acababa, y que el fin de tan buena intención la había de mover a no desechar mis deseos; cuanto más, que no se debía compadecer con su hermosura dejar morir sin más respecto a quien tanto como yo la amaba; añadiendo a estas otras razones que Leonida conoció que lo eran. Pero, por no mostrarse al primer encuentro rendida y a los primeros pasos alcanzada, no dio tan agradable respuesta a Silvia como ella quisiera. Pero, con todo esto, por intercesión de Silvia, que a ello le forzó, respondió con esta carta que agora te diré:

LEONIDA A LISANDRO

»Si entendiera, Lisandro, que tu mucho atrevimiento había nacido de mi poca honestidad, en mí mesma ejecutara la pena que tu culpa meresce; pero, por asegurarme desto lo que yo de mí conozco, vengo a conocer que más ha procedido tu osadía de pensamientos ociosos que de enamorados. Y, aunque ellos sean de la manera que dices, no pienses que me has de mover a mí para remediallos como a Silvia para creellos, de la cual tengo más queja por haberme forzado a responderte que de ti que te atreviste a escrebirme, pues el callar fuera digna respuesta a tu locura. Si te retraes de lo comenzado, harás como discreto, porque te hago saber que pienso tener más cuenta con mi honra que con tus vanidades.

»Esta fue la respuesta de Leonida, la cual, junto con las esperanzas que Silvia me dio, aunque ella parecía algo áspera, me hizo tener por el más bien afortunado del mundo.

»Mientras estas cosas entre nosotros pasaban, no se descuidaba Crisalbo de solicitar a Silvia con infinitos mensajes, presentes y servicios; mas, era tan fuerte y desabrida la condición de Crisalbo, que jamás pudo mover a la de Silvia a que un pequeño favor le diese, de lo cual estaba tan desesperado e impaciente como un agarrochado y vencido toro.

»Por causa de sus amores había tomado amistad con el astuto Carino, pariente de Silvia, habiendo los dos sido primero mortales enemigos, porque, en cierta lucha que un día de una grande fiesta delante de todo el pueblo los zagales más diestros del lugar tuvieron, Carino fue vencido de Crisalbo y maltratado; de manera que concibió en su corazón odio perpetuo contra Crisalbo. Y no menos lo tenía contra otro hermano mío, por haberle sido contrario en unos amores, de los cuales mi hermano llevó el fruto que Carino esperaba. Este rancor y mala voluntad tuvo Carino secreta, hasta que el tiempo le descubrió ocasión cómo a un mismo punto se vengase de entrambos por el más cruel estilo que imaginarse puede.

»Yo le tenía por amigo, porque la entrada en casa de Silvia no se me impidiese; Crisalbo le adoraba, porque favoreciese sus pensamientos con Silvia; y era de suerte su amistad, que todas las veces que Leonida venía a casa de Silvia Carino la acompañaba. Por la cual causa le pareció bien a Silvia darle cuenta, pues era mi amigo, de los amores que yo con Leonida trataba, que en aquella sazón andaban ya tan vivos y venturosos, por la buena intercesión de Silvia, que ya no esperábamos sino tiempo y lugar donde coger el honesto fruto de nuestros limpios deseos, los cuales sabidos de Carino, tomó por instrumento para hacer la mayor traición del mundo. Porque un día, haciendo del leal con Crisalbo, y dándole a entender que tenía en más su amistad que la honra de su parienta, le dijo que la principal causa porque Silvia no le amaba ni favorecía era por estar de mí enamorada, y que él lo sabía inefaliblemente; y que ya nuestros amores iban tan al descubierto, que si él no hubiera estado ciego de la pasión amorosa, en mil señales lo hubiera ya conocido; y que para certificarse más de la verdad que le decía, que de allí adelante mirase en ello, porque vería claramente cómo, sin empacho alguno, Silvia me daba extraordinarios favores. Con estas nuevas debió de quedar tan fuera de sí Crisalbo, como pareció por lo que dellas sucedió.

»De allí adelante Crisalbo traía espías por ver lo que yo con Silvia pasaba; y, como yo muchas veces procurase hallarme solo con ella para tratar, no de los amores que él pensaba, sino de lo que a los míos convenía, éranle a Crisalbo referidas, con otros favores que, de limpia amistad procedidos, Silvia a cada paso me hacía; por lo que vino Crisalbo a términos tan desesperados que muchas veces procuró matarme, aunque yo no pensaba que era por semejante ocasión, sino por lo de la antigua enemistad de nuestros padres. Mas, por ser él hermano de Leonida, tenía yo más cuenta con guardarme que con ofenderle, teniendo por cierto que, si yo con su hermana me casaba, tendrían fin nuestras enemistades; de lo que él estaba bien ajeno, antes se pensaba que por serle yo enemigo, había procurado tratar amores con Silvia, y no porque yo bien la quisiese. Y esto le acrescentaba la cólera y enojo de manera que le sacaba de juicio, aunque él tenía tan poco, que poco era menester para acabárselo. Y pudo tanto en él este mal pensamiento, que vino a aborrecer a Silvia tanto cuanto la había querido, sólo porque a mí me favorecía, no con la voluntad que él pensaba, sino como Carino le decía. Y así, en cualesquier corrillos y juntas que se hallaba, decía mal de Silvia, dándole títulos y renombres deshonestos; pero, como todos conocían su terrible condición y la bondad de Silvia, daban poco o ningún crédito a sus palabras.

»En este medio, había concertado Silvia con Leonida que los dos nos desposásemos y que, para que más a nuestro salvo se hiciese, sería bien que un día que con Carino Leonida viniese a su casa, no volviese por aquella noche a la de sus padres, sino que desde allí, en compañía de Carino, se fuese a una aldea que media legua de la nuestra estaba, donde unos ricos parientes míos vivían, en cuya casa con más quietud podíamos poner en efecto nuestras intenciones; porque si del suceso dellas los padres de Leonida no fuesen contentos, a lo menos estando ella ausente sería más fácil el concertarse. Tomado, pues, este apuntamiento y dada cuenta dél a Carino, se ofreció, con muestras de grandísimo ánimo, que llevaría a Leonida a la otra aldea, como ella fuese contenta. Los servicios que yo hice a Carino por la buena voluntad que mostraba, las palabras de ofrecimiento que le dije, los abrazos que le di, me parece que bastaran a deshacer en un corazón de acero cualquiera mala intención que contra mí tuviera. Pero el traidor de Carino, echando a las espaldas mis palabras, obras y promesas, sin tener cuenta con la que a sí mismo debía, ordenó la traición que agora oirás.

»Informado Carino de la voluntad de Leonida, y viendo ser conforme a la que Silvia le había dicho, ordenó que la primera noche que, por las muestras del día, entendiesen que había de ser oscura, se pusiese por obra la ida de Leonida, ofreciéndose de nuevo a guardar el secreto y lealtad posible. Después de hecho este concierto que has oído, se fue a Crisalbo, según después acá he sabido, y le dijo que su parienta Silvia iba tan adelante en los amores que conmigo traía, que en una cierta noche había determinado de sacarla de casa de sus padres y llevarla a la otra aldea, do mis parientes moraban; donde se le ofrecía coyuntura de vengar su corazón en entrambos: en Silvia, por la poca cuenta que de sus servicios había hecho; en mí, por nuestra vieja enemistad y por el enojo que le había hecho en quitarle a Silvia, pues por sólo mi respecto le dejaba. De tal manera le supo encarecer y decir Carino lo que quiso, que con mucho menos a otro corazón no tan cruel como el suyo moviera a cualquier mal pensamiento.

»Llegado, pues, ya el día que yo pensé que fuera el de mi mayor contento, dejando dicho a Carino, no lo que hizo, sino lo que había de hacer, me fui a la otra aldea a dar orden cómo recibir a Leonida. Y fue el dejarla encomendada a Carino como quien deja a la simple corderuela en poder de los hambrientos lobos, o a la mansa paloma entre las uñas del fiero gavilán que la despedace. ¡Ay, amigo!, que llegando a este paso con la imaginación, no sé cómo tengo fuerzas para sostener la vida, ni pensamiento para pensarlo, cuanto más, lengua para decirlo. ¡Ay, mal aconsejado Lisandro!, ¿cómo, y no sabías tú las condiciones dobladas de Carino? Mas, ¿quién no se fiara de sus palabras, aventurando él tan poco en hacerlas verdaderas con las obras? ¡Ay, mal lograda Leonida, cuán mal supe gozar de la merced que me heciste en escogermelo por tuyo!

»En fin, por concluir con la tragedia de mi desgracia, sabrás, discreto pastor, que la noche que Carino había de traer consigo a Leonida a la aldea donde yo la esperaba, él llamó a otro pastor, que debía de tener por enemigo, aunque él se lo encubría debajo de su falsa acostumbrada disimulación, el cual Libeo se llamaba, y le rogó que aquella noche le hiciese compañía, porque determinaba llevar una pastora, su aficionada, a la aldea que te he dicho, donde pensaba desposarse con ella. Libeo, que era gallardo y enamorado, con facilidad le ofreció su compañía. Despidióse Leonida de Silvia con estrechos abrazos y amorosas lágrimas, como présaga que había de ser la última despedida. Debía de considerar entonces la sin ventura la traición que a sus padres hacía, y no la que a ella Carino le ordenaba, y cuán mala cuenta daba de la buena opinión que della en el pueblo se tenía. Mas, pasando de paso por todos estos pensamientos, forzada del enamorado que la vencía, se entregó a la guardia de Carino, que adonde yo la aguardaba la trujese.

»¡Cuántas veces se me viene a la memoria, llegando a este punto, lo que soñé el día que le tuviera yo por dichoso, si en él feneciera la cuenta de los de mi vida! Acuérdomé que, saliendo del aldea un poco antes que el sol acabase de quitar sus rayos de nuestro horizonte, me senté al pie de un alto fresno, en el mismo camino por donde Leonida había de venir, esperando que cerrase algo más la noche para adelantarme y recibirla; y, sin saber cómo y sin yo quererlo, me quedé dormido. Y apenas hube entregado los ojos al sueño, cuando me pareció que el árbol donde estaba arrimado, rindiéndose a la furia de un recísimo viento que soplaba, desarraigando las hondas raíces de la tierra, sobre mi cuerpo se caía; y que, procurando yo evadirme del grave peso, a una y otra parte me revolvía. Y, estando en esta pesadumbre, me pareció ver una blanca cierva junto a mí, a la cual yo ahincadamente suplicaba que, como mejor pudiese, apartase de mis hombros la pesada carga; y que, queriendo ella, movida de compasión, hacerlo, al mismo instante salió un fiero león del bosque, y, cogiéndola entre sus agudas uñas, se metía con ella por el bosque adelante; y que, después que con gran trabajo me había escapado del grave peso, la iba a buscar al monte, y la hallaba despedazada y herida por mil partes; de lo cual tanto dolor sentía, que el alma se me arrancaba sólo por la compasión que ella había mostrado de mi trabajo. Y así, comencé a llorar entre sueños de manera que las mismas lágrimas me despertaron, y, hallando las mejillas bañadas del llanto quedé fuera de mí, considerando lo que había soñado. Pero con la alegría que esperaba tener de ver a mi Leonida, no eché de ver entonces que la fortuna en sueños me mostraba lo que de allí a poco rato despierto me había de suceder.

»A la sazón que yo desperté, acababa de cerrar la noche, con tanta escuridad, con tan espantosos truenos y relámpagos, como convenía para cometerse con más facilidad la crueldad que en ella se cometió. Así como Carino salió de casa de Silvia con Leonida, se la entregó a Libeo, diciéndole que se fuese con ella por el camino de la aldea que he dicho; y, aunque Leonida se alteró de ver a Libeo, Carino le aseguró que no era menor amigo mío Libeo que él propio, y que con toda seguridad podía ir con él poco a poco, en tanto que él se adelantaba a darme a mí las nuevas de su llegada. Creyó la simple -en fin, como enamorada-las palabras del falso Carino, y, con menor recelo del que convenía, guiada del comedido Libeo, tendía los temerosos pasos para venir a buscar el último de su vida, pensando hallar el mejor de su contento.

»Adelantóse Carino de los dos, como ya te he dicho, y vino a dar aviso a Crisalbo de lo que pasaba, el cual, con otros cuatro parientes suyos, en el mismo camino por donde habían de pasar, que todo era cerrado de bosque de una y otra parte, escondidos estaban. Y díjoles cómo Silvia venía, y solo yo que la

acompañaba, y que se alegrasen de la buena ocasión que la suerte les ponía en las manos para vengarse de la injuria que los dos les habíamos hecho; y que él sería el primero que en Silvia, aunque era parienta suya, probase los filos de su cuchillo. Apercibiéronse luego los cinco crueles carniceros para colorarse en la inocente sangre de los dos que tan sin cuidado de traición semejante por el camino se venían, los cuales, llegados a do la celada estaba, al instante fueron con ellos los pérfidos homicidas y cerráronlos en medio. Crisalbo se llegó a Leonida, pensando ser Silvia, y con injuriosas y turbadas palabras, con la infernal cólera que le señoreaba, con seis mortales heridas la dejó tendida en el suelo, a tiempo que ya Libeo por los otros cuatro -creyendo que a mí me las daban-con infinitas puñaladas se revolcaba por la tierra. Carino, que vio cuán bien había salido el traidor intento suyo, sin aguardar razones, se les quitó delante, y los cinco traidores, contentísimos, como si hubieran hecho alguna famosa hazaña, se volvieron a su aldea; y Crisalbo se fue a casa de Silvia a dar él mismo a sus padres la nueva de lo que había hecho, por acrescentarles el pesar y sentimiento, diciéndoles que fuesen a dar sepultura a su hija Silvia, a quien él había quitado la vida por haber hecho más caudal de la fría voluntad de Lisandro, su enemigo, que no de los continuos sirvicios suyos. Silvia, que sintió lo que Crisalbo decía, dándole el alma lo que había sido, le dijo cómo ella estaba viva, y aun libre de todo lo que la imputaba, y que mirase no hubiese muerto a quien le doliese más su muerte que perder él mismo la vida. Y con esto le dijo que su hermana Leonida se había partido aquella noche de su casa en traje no acostumbrado. Atónito quedó Crisalbo de ver a Silvia viva, teniendo él por cierto que la dejaba ya muerta, y con no pequeño sobresalto acudió luego a su casa, y, no hallando en ella a su hermana, con grandísima confusión y furia volvió él solo a ver quién era la que había muerto, pues Silvia estaba viva.

»Mientras todas estas cosas pasaban, estaba yo con una ansia estraña esperando a Carino y Leonida, y, pareciéndome que ya tardaban más de lo que debían, quise ir a encontrarlos, o a saber si por algún caso aquella noche se habían detenido, y no anduve mucho por el camino cuando oí una lastimada voz que decía: “¡Oh soberano hacedor del cielo!, encoge la mano de tu justicia y abre la de tu misericordia, para tenerla desta alma, que presto te dará cuenta de las ofensas que te ha hecho. ¡Ay, Lisandro, Lisandro!, y cómo la amistad de Carino te costará la vida, pues no es posible sino que te la acabe el dolor de haberla yo por ti perdido. ¡Ay, cruel hermano!, ¿es posible que sin oír mis disculpas tan presto me quesiste dar la pena de mi yerro?” Cuando estas razones oí, en la voz y en ellas conocí luego ser Leonida la que las decía, y présago de mi desventura, con el sentido turbado, fui a tienta a dar adonde Leonida estaba envuelta en su propia sangre; y, habiéndola conocido luego, dejándome caer sobre el herido

cuerpo, haciendo los extremos de dolor posible, le dije: “¿Qué desdicha es esta, bien mío? Ánima mía, ¿cuál fue la cruel mano que no ha tenido respecto a tanta hermosura?” En estas palabras fui conocido de Leonida, y, levantando con gran trabajo los cansados brazos, los echó por cima de mi cuello, y, apretando con la mayor fuerza que pudo, juntando su boca con la mía, con flacas y mal pronunciadas razones, me dijo solas estas: “Mi hermano me ha muer to; Carino, vendido; Libeo está sin vida, la cual te dé Dios a ti, Lisandro mío, largos y felices años, y a mí me deje gozar en la otra del reposo que aquí me ha negado”. Y, juntando más su boca con la mía, habiendo cerrado los labios para darme el primero y último beso, al abrillos se le salió el alma y quedó muer ta en mis brazos. Cuando yo lo sentí, abandonándome sobre el helado cuerpo, quedé sin ningún sentido. Y si como era yo el vivo, fuera el muerto, quien en aquel trance nos viera, el lamentable de Píramo y Tisbe trujera a la memoria. Mas, después que volví en mí, abriendo ya la boca para llenar el aire de voces y suspiros, sentí que hacia donde yo estaba venía uno con apresurados pasos; y, llegándose cerca, aunque la noche hacía oscura, los ojos del alma me dieron a conocer que el que allí venía era Crisalbo; como era la verdad, porque él tornaba a certificarse si por ventura era su hermana Leonida la que había muerto. Y, como yo le conocí, sin que de mí se guardase, llegué a él como sañudo león y, dándole dos heridas, di con él en tierra; y, antes que acabase de espirar, le llevé arrastrando adonde Leonida estaba; y, puniendo en la mano muerta de Leonida el puñal que su hermano traía, que era el mismo con que él la había muerto, ayudándole yo a ello, tres veces se le hiqué por el corazón. Y, consolado en algo el mío con la muerte de Crisalbo, sin más detenerme, tomé sobre mis hombros el cuerpo de Leonida y llevéle al aldea donde mis parientes vivían; y, contándoles el caso, les rogué le diesen honrada sepultura, y luego puse por obra y determiné de tomar en Carino la venganza que en Crisalbo; la cual, por haberse él ausentado de nuestra aldea, se ha tardado hasta hoy, que le hallé a la salida deste bosque, después de haber seis meses que ando en su de man da. Él ha hecho ya el fin que su traición merescía, y a mí no me queda ya de quién tomar venganza, si no es de la vida que tan contra mi voluntad sostengo.» Esta es, pastor, la causa de do proceden los lamentos que me has oído. Si te parece que es bastante para causar mayores sentimientos, a tu buena discreción dejo que lo considere.

Y con esto dio fin a su plática y principio a tantas lágrimas, que no pudo dejar Elicio de tenerle compañía en ellas. Pero, después que por largo espacio habían desfogado con tiernos suspiros, el uno la pena que sentía, el otro la compasión que della tomaba, Elicio comenzó con las mejores razones que supo a consolar a Lisandro, aunque era su mal tan sin consuelo como por el suceso dél había visto. Y entre otras cosas que le dijo, y la que a Lisandro más le cuadró, fue decirle que en los males sin remedio, el mejor era no esperarles ninguno; y que, pues de la honestidad y noble condición de Leonida se podría creer -según él decía-que de dulce vida gozaba, antes debía alegrarse del bien que ella había ganado, que no entristecerse por el que él había perdido. A lo cual respondió Lisandro: -Bien conozco, amigo, que tienen fuerza tus razones para hacerme creer que son verdaderas, pero no que la tienen, ni la tendrán las que todo el mundo decirme pudiese, para darme consuelo alguno. En la muerte de Leonida comenzó mi desventura, la cual se acabará cuando yo la torne a ver; y, pues esto no puede ser sin que yo muera, al que me induciere a procurar la muerte tendré yo por más amigo de mi vida.

No quiso Elicio darle más pesadumbre con sus consuelos, pues él no los tenía por tales; sólo le rogó que se viniese con él a su cabaña, en la cual estaría todo el tiempo que gusto le diese, ofreciéndole su amistad en todo aquello que podía ser buena para servirle. Lisandro se lo agradeció cuanto fue posible; y, aunque no quería acetar el venir con Elicio, todavía lo hubo de hacer forzado de su importunación; y así, los dos se levantaron y se vinieron a la cabaña de Elicio, donde reposaron lo poco que de la noche quedaba. Pero ya que la blanca Aurora dejaba el lecho del celoso marido y comenzaba a dar muestras del venidero día, levantándose Erastro, comenzó a poner en orden el ganado de Elicio y suyo, para sacarle al pasto acostumbrado. Elicio convidó a Lisandro a que con él se viniese, y así, viniendo los tres pastores con el manso rebaño de sus ovejas por una cañada abajo, al subir de una ladera oyeron el sonido de una suave zampoña, que luego por Elicio y Erastro fue conocido que era Galatea quien la sonaba. Y no tardó mucho que por la cumbre de la cuesta se comenzaron a descubrir algunas ovejas, y luego tras ellas Galatea, cuya hermosura era tanta que sería mejor dejarla en su punto, pues faltan palabras para encarecerla. Venía vestida a la serrana, con los luengos cabellos sueltos al viento, de quien el mismo sol parecía tener envidia, porque, hiriéndoles con sus rayos, procuraba quitarles la luz si pudiera, mas la que la salía de la vislumbre dellos, otro nuevo sol semejava. Estaba Erastro fuera de sí mirándola, y Elicio no podía apartar los ojos de verla. Cuando Galatea vio que el rebaño de Elicio y Erastro con el suyo se juntaba, mostrando no gustar de tenerles aquel día compañía, llamó a la borrega mansa de su manada, a la cual siguieron las demás, y encaminóla a otra parte diferente de la que los pastores llevaban. Viendo Elicio lo que Galatea hacía, sin poder sufrir tan notorio desdén, llegándose a do la pastora estaba, le dijo: -Deja, hermosa Galatea, que tu rebaño venga con el nuestro, y si no gustas de nuestra compañía, escoge la que más te agradare; que no por tu ausencia dejarán tus ovejas de ser bien apacentadas, pues yo, que nací para servirte, tendré más cuenta dellas que de las mías propias. Y no quieras tan a la clara desdeñarme, pues no lo merece la limpia voluntad que te tengo; que, según el viaje que traías, a la fuente de las Pizarras le encaminabas, y ahora que me has visto quieres torcer el camino. Y si esto es así como pienso, dime adónde quieres hoy y siempre apascentar tu ganado, que yo te juro de no llevar allí jamás el mío.

-Yo te prometo, Elicio -respondió Galatea-, que no por huir de tu compañía ni de la de Erastro he vuelto del camino que tú imaginas que llevaba, porque mi intención es pasar hoy la siesta en el arroyo de las Palmas, en compañía de mi amiga Florisa, que allá me aguarda, porque desde ayer concertamos las dos de apascentar hoy allí nuestros ganados; y, como yo venía descuidada sonando mi zampoña, la mansa borrega tomó el camino de las Pizarras, como della más acostumbrado. La voluntad que me tienes y ofrecimientos que me haces te agradezco, y no tengas en poco haber dado yo disculpa a tu sospecha.

-¡Ay, Galatea! -replicó Elicio-, y cuán bien que finges lo que te parece, teniendo tan poca necesidad de usar conmigo artificio, pues al cabo no tengo de querer más de lo que tú quisieres. Ora vayas al arroyo de las Palmas, al soto del Concejo o a la fuente de las Pizarras, ten por cierto que no has de ir sola, que siempre mi alma te acompaña, y si tú no la vees, es porque no quieres verla, por no obligarte a remediarla.

-Hasta agora -respondió Galatea-tengo por ver la primera alma, y así no tengo culpa si no he remediado a ninguna.

-No sé cómo puedes decir eso -respondió Elicio-, hermosa Galatea, que las veas para herirlas y no para curarlas.

-Testimonio me levantas -replicó Galatea-en decir que yo, sin armas, pues a mujeres no son concedidas, haya herido a nadie.

-¡Ay, discreta Galatea! -dijo Elicio-, cómo te burlas con lo que de mi alma sientes, a la cual invisiblemente has llagado, y no con otras armas que con las de tu hermosura. Y no me quejo yo tanto del daño que me has hecho, como de que le tengas en poco.

-En menos me tendría yo -respondió Galatea-si en más le tuviese.

A esta sazón llegó Erastro, y, viendo que Galatea se iba y les dejaba, le dijo: -¿Adónde vas, o de quién huyes, hermosa Galatea? Si de nosotros, que te adoramos, te alejas, ¿quién esperará de ti compañía? ¡Ay, enemiga!, cuán al desgaire te vas, triunfando de nuestras voluntades. El cielo destruya la buena que tengo, si no deseo verte enamorada de quien estime tus quejas en el grado que tú estimas las mías. ¿Ríeste de lo que digo, Galatea? Pues yo lloro de lo que tú haces.

No pudo Galatea responder a Erastro, porque andaba guiando su ganado hacia el arroyo de las Palmas, y, abajando desde lejos la cabeza en señal de despedirse, los dejó. Y, como se vio sola, en tanto que llegaba adonde su amiga Florisa creyó que estaría, con la estremada voz que al cielo plugo darle, fue cantando este soneto:

GALATEA

Afuera el fuego, el lazo, el yelo y flecha
de amor, que abrasa, aprieta, enfría y hiere; que tal llama mi alma no la quiere, ni queda de tal ñudo satisfecha.

Consuma, ciña, yele, mate; estrecha 5
tenga otra la voluntad cuanto quisiere;
que por dardo, o por nieve, o red no'spere
tener la mía en su calor deshecha.

Su fuego enfriará mi casto intento,
el ñudo romperé por fuerza o arte, 10
la nieve deshará mi ardiente celo,

la flecha embotará mi pensamiento;
y así, no temeré en segura parte
de amor el fuego, el lazo, el dardo, el yelo.

Con más justa causa se pudieran parar los brutos, mover los árboles y juntar las piedras a escuchar el suave canto y dulce armonía de Galatea, que cuando a la cítara de Orfeo, lira de Apolo y música de Anfión los muros de Troya y Tebas por sí mismos se fundaron, sin que artífice alguno pusiese en ellos las manos, y las hermanas, negras moradoras del hondo caos, a la estremada voz del incauto amante se ablandaron. El acabar el canto Galatea y llegar adonde Florisa estaba, fue todo a un tiempo, de la cual fue con alegre rostro recebida, como aquella que era su amiga verdadera y con quien Galatea sus pensamientos comunicaba. Y, después que las dos dejaron ir a su albedrío a sus ganados a que de la verde yerba paciesen, convidadas de la claridad del agua de un arroyo que allí corría, determinaron de lavarse los hermosos rostros, pues no era menester para acrecentarles hermosura el vano y enfadoso artificio con que los suyos martirizan las damas que en las grandes ciudades se tienen por más hermosas. Tan hermosas quedaron después de lavadas como antes lo estaban, excepto que por haber llegado las manos con movimiento al rostro, quedaron sus mejillas encendidas y sonroseadas, de modo que un no sé qué de hermosura les acrescentaba; especialmente a Galatea, en quien se vieron juntas las tres Gracias, a quien los antiguos griegos pintaban desnudas por mostrar, entre otros efectos, que eran señoras de la belleza. Comenzaron luego a coger diversas flores del verde prado, con intención de hacer sendas guirnaldas con que recoger los desornados cabellos que sueltos por las espaldas traían.

En este ejercicio andaban ocupadas las dos hermosas pastoras, cuando por el arroyo abajo vieron al improviso venir una pastora de gentil donaire y apostura, de que no poco se admiraron, porque les pareció que no era pastora de su aldea ni de las otras comarcas a ella, a cuya causa con más atención la miraron, y vieron que venía poco a poco hacia donde ellas estaban. Y, aunque estaban bien cerca, ella venía tan embebida y transportada en sus pensamientos, que nunca las vio hasta que ellas quisieron mostrarse. De trecho en trecho se paraba, y, vueltos los ojos al cielo, daba unos sospiros tan dolorosos que de lo más íntimo de sus entrañas parecían arrancados. Torcía asimesmo sus blancas manos y dejaba correr por sus mejillas algunas lágrimas, que líquidas perlas semejaban. Por los extremos de dolor que la pastora hacía, conocieron Galatea y Florisa que de algún interno dolor traía el alma ocupada, y por ver en qué paraban sus sentimientos, entrambas se escondieron entre unos cerrados mirtos, y desde allí con curiosos ojos miraban lo que la pastora hacía. La cual, llegándose al margen del arroyo, con atentos ojos se paró a mirar el agua que por él corría, y, dejándose caer a la orilla dél como persona cansada, corvando una de sus hermosas manos, cogió en ella del agua clara, con la cual lavándose los húmidos ojos, con voz baja y debilitada dijo: -¡Ay, claras y frescas aguas!, ¡cuán poca parte es vuestra frialdad para templar el fuego que en mis entrañas sienten! Mal podré esperar de vosotras, ni aun de todas las que contiene el gran mar océano, el remedio que he menester, pues, aplicadas todas al ardor que me consume, haríades el mismo efecto que suele hacer la pequeña cantidad en la ardiente fragua, que más su llama acrecienta. ¡Ay, tristes ojos, causadores de mi perdición, y en qué fuerte punto os alcé para tan gran caída! ¡Ay, Fortuna, enemiga de mi descanso, con cuánta velocidad me derribaste de la cumbre de mis contentos al abismo de la miseria en que me hallo! ¡Ay, cruda hermana!, ¿cómo no aplacó la ira de tu desamorado pecho la humilde y amorosa presencia de Artidoro? ¿Qué palabras te pudo decir él para que le diceses tan aceda y cruel respuesta? Bien parece, hermana, que tú no le tenías en la cuenta que yo le tengo, que si así fuera, a fe que tú te mostraras tan humilde cuanto él a ti sujeto.

Todo esto que la pastora decía mezclaba con tantas lágrimas, que no hubiera corazón que escuchándola no se enterneciera. Y, después que por algún espacio hubo sosegado el afligido pecho, al son del agua que mansamente corría, acomodando a su propósito una copla antigua, con suave y delicada voz cantó esta glosa: Ya la esperanza es perdida,

y un solo bien me consuela:
qu'el tiempo, que pasa y vuela,
llevará presto la vida.

Dos cosas hay en amor 5
con que su gusto se alcanza:
deseo de lo mejor,
es la otra la esperanza
que pone esfuerzo al temor.
Las dos hicieron manida 10
en mi pecho, y no las veo;
antes en l'alma afligida,
porque me acabe el deseo,
ya la esperanza es perdida.

Si el deseo desfallece 15
cuando la esperanza mengua,
al contrario en mí parece,
pues cuanto ella más desmengua
tanto más él s'engrandece.
Y no hay usar de cautela 20
con las llagas que me atizan,

que en esta amorosa escuela
mil males me martirizan,
y un solo bien me consuela.

Apenas hubo llegado 25
el bien a mi pensamiento,
cuando el cielo, suerte y hado,
con ligero movimiento
l'han del alma arrebatado.
Y si alguno hay que se duela 30
de mi mal tan lastimero,
al mal amaina la vela,
y al bien pasa más ligero

qu'el tiempo, que pasa y vuela.

¿Quién hay que no se consuma 35
con estas ansias que tomo?,
pues en ellas se ve en suma
ser los cuidados de plomo
y los placeres de pluma.
Y aunque va tan de caída 40
mi dichosa buena andanza
en ella este bien se anida:

que quien llevó la esperanza
llevará presto la vida.

Presto acabó el canto la pastora, pero no las lágrimas con que lo solemnizaba, de las cuales movidas a compasión Galatea y Florisa, salieron de do escondidas estaban, y con amorosas y corteses palabras a la triste pastora saludaron, diciéndole, entre otras razones: -Así los cielos, hermosa pastora, se muestren favorables a lo que pedirles quisieres, y dellos alcances lo que desees, que nos digas, si no te es enojoso, qué ventura o qué destino te ha traído por esta tierra, que según la plática que nosotras tenemos della, jamás por estas riberas te habemos visto. Y por haber oído lo que poco ha cantaste, y entender por ello que no tiene tu corazón el sosiego que ha menester, y por las lágrimas que has derramado, de que dan indicio tus húmidos y hermosos ojos, en ley de buen comedimiento estamos obligadas a procurarte el consuelo que de nuestra parte fuere posible. Y si fuere tu mal de los que no sufren ser consolados, a lo menos conocerás en nosotras una buena voluntad de servirte.

-No sé con qué poder pagaros -respondió la forastera pastora-, hermosas zagalas, los corteses ofrecimientos que me hacéis, si no es con callar y agradecello, y estimarlos en el punto que merecen, y con no negaros lo que de mí saber quisiéredes, puesto que me sería mejor pasar en silencio los sucesos de mi ventura, que no, con decirlos, daros indicios para que me tengáis por liviana.

-No muestra tu rostro y gentil apostura, hermosa pastora -respondió Galatea-, que el cielo te ha dado tan grosero entendimiento que con él hicieses cosa que después hubieses de perder reputación en decirla. Y, pues tu vista y palabras en tan poco ha hecho esta impresión en nosotras, que ya te tenemos por discreta, muéstranos, con contarnos tu vida, si llega a tu discreción tu ventura.

-A lo que yo creo -respondió la pastora-, en un igual andan entrambas, si ya no me ha dado la suerte más juicio para que sienta más los dolores que se ofrecen. Pero yo estoy bien cierta que sobrepujan tanto mis males a mi discreción, cuanto dellos es vencida toda mi habilidad, pues no tengo ninguna para saber remediallos. Y, porque la experiencia os desengañe, si quisiéredes oírme, bellas zagalas, yo os contaré con las más breves razones que pudiere, cómo, del mucho entendimiento que juzgáis que tengo, ha nascido el mal que le hace ventaja.

-Con ninguna cosa, discreta zagala, satisfarás más nuestros deseos -respondió Florisa-, que con darnos cuenta de lo que te hemos rogado.

-Apartémonos, pues -dijo la pastora-, deste lugar y busquemos otro donde, sin ser vistas ni estorbadas, pueda deciros lo que me pesa de haberos prometido, porque adivino que no estará más en perderse la buena opinión que con vosotras he cobrado, que cuanto tarde en descubriros mis pensamientos, si acaso los vuestros no han sido tocados de la enfermedad que yo padezco.

Deseosas de que la pastora cumpliese lo que prometía, se levantaron luego las tres y se fueron a un lugar secreto y apartado que ya Galatea y Florisa sabían, donde, debajo de la agradable sombra de unos acopados mirtos, sin ser vistas de alguno, podían todas tres estar sentadas. Y luego, con estremado donaire y gracia, la forastera pastora comenzó a decir desta manera: -«En las riberas del famoso Henares, que al vuestro dorado Tajo, hermosísimas pastoras, da siempre fresco y agradable tributo, fui yo nascida y criada, y no en tan baja fortuna que me tuviese por la peor de mi aldea. Mis padres son labradores y a la labranza del campo acostumbrados, en cuyo ejercicio les imitaba, trayendo yo una manada de simples ovejas por las dehesas concejiles de nuestra aldea, acomodando tanto mis pensamientos al estado en que mi suerte me había puesto, que ninguna cosa me daba más gusto que ver multiplicar y crecer mi ganado, sin tener cuenta con más que con procurarle los más fructíferos y abundosos pastos, claras y frescas aguas que hallar pudiese. No tenía ni podía tener más cuidados que los que podían nacer del pastoral oficio en que me ocupaba. Las selvas eran mis compañeras, en cuya soledad muchas veces, convidada de la suave armonía de los dulces pajarillos, despedía la voz a mil honestos cantares, sin que en ellos mezclase suspiros ni razones que de enamorado pecho diesen indicio alguno. ¡Ay!, cuántas veces, sólo por contentarme a mí mesma y por dar lugar al tiempo que se pasase, andaba de ribera en ribera, de valle en valle, cogiendo aquí la blanca azucena, allí el cárdeno lirio, acá la colorada rosa, acullá la olorosa clavellina, haciendo de todas suertes de odoríferas flores una tejida guirnalda, con que adornaba y recogía mis cabellos; y después, mirándome en las claras y reposadas aguas de alguna fuente, quedaba tan gozosa de haberme visto que no trocara mi contento por otro alguno. Y cuántas hice burla de algunas zagalas que, pensando hallar en mi pecho alguna manera de compasión del mal que los suyos sentían, con abundancia de lágrimas y suspiros, los secretos enamorados de su alma me descubrían.

»Acuérdome ahora, hermosas pastoras, que llegó a mí un día una zagala amiga mía, y, echándome los brazos al cuello y juntando su rostro con el mío, hechos sus ojos fuentes, me dijo: “¡Ay, hermana Teolinda -que éste es el nombre desta desdichada-, y cómo creo que el fin de mis días es llegado, pues amor no ha tenido la cuenta conmigo que mis deseos merecían!”. Yo, entonces, admirada de los extremos que la veía hacer, creyendo que algún gran mal le había sucedido de pérdida de ganado, o de muerte de padre o hermano, limpiándole los ojos con la manga de mi camisa, le rogué que me dijese qué mal era el que tanto la aquejaba. Ella, prosiguiendo en sus lágrimas y no dando tregua a sus suspiros, me dijo: “¿Qué mayor mal quieres, ¡oh Teolinda!, que me haya sucedido que el haberse ausentado sin decirme nada el hijo del mayoral de nuestra aldea, a quien yo quiero más que a los propios ojos de la cara; y haber visto esta mañana en poder de Leocadia, la hija del rabadán Lisalco, una cinta encarnada que yo había dado a aquel fementido de Eugenio, por donde se me ha confirmado la sospecha que yo tenía de los amores que el traidor con ella trataba?” Cuando yo acabé de entender sus quejas, os juro, amigas y señoras mías, que no pude acabar conmigo de no reírme y decirle: “Mía fe, Lidia -que así se llama la sin ventura-, pensé que de otra mayor llaga venías herida, según te quejabas, pero ahora conozco cuán fuera de sentido andáis vosotras, las que presumís de enamoradas, en hacer caso de semejantes niñerías. Dime, por tu vida, Lidia amiga: ¿cuánto vale una cinta encarnada, para que te duela de verla en poder de Leocadia, ni de que se la haya dado Eugenio? Mejor harías de tener cuenta con tu honra y con lo que conviene al pasto de tus ovejas, y no entremeterte en estas burlerías de amor, pues no se saca dellas, según veo, sino menoscabo de nuestras honras y sosiego”. Cuando Lidia oyó de mi boca tan contraria respuesta de la que esperaba de mi piadosa condición, no hizo otra cosa sino abajar la cabeza, y, acrescentando lágrimas a lágrimas y sollozos a sollozos, se apartó de mí; y, volviendo a cabo de poco trecho el rostro, me dijo: “Ruego yo a Dios, Teolinda, que presto te veas en estado que tengas por dichoso el mío, y que el amor te trate de manera que cuentes tu pena a quien la estime y sienta en el grado que tú has hecho la mía”. Y con esto se fue, y yo me quedé riendo de sus desvaríos. Mas, ¡ay, desdichada, y cómo a cada paso conozco que me va alcanzando bien su maldición, pues aun ahora temo que estoy contando mi pena a quien se dolerá poco de haberla sabido!»

A esto respondió Galatea:

-Pluviera a Dios, discreta Teolinda, que así como hallarás en nosotras compasión de tu daño, pudieras hallar el remedio dél, que presto perdieras la sospecha que de nuestro conocimiento tienes.

-Vuestra hermosa presencia y agradable conversación, dulces pastoras -respondió Teolinda-, me hace esperar eso, pero mi corta ventura me fuerza a temer estotro. Mas, suceda lo que sucediere, que al fin habré de contaros lo que os he prometido.

«Con la libertad que os he dicho, y en los ejercicios que os he contado, pasaba yo mi vida tan alegre y sosegadamente que no sabía qué pedirme el deseo, hasta que el vengativo Amor me vino a tomar estrecha cuenta de la poca que con él tenía, y alcanzóme en ella de manera que, con quedar su esclava, creo que aún no está pagado ni satisfecho.

»Acaeció, pues, que un día -que fuera para mí el más venturoso de los de mi vida, si el tiempo y las ocasiones no hubieran traído tal descuento a mis alegrías-, viniendo yo con otras pastoras de nuestra aldea a cortar ramos y a coger juncia y flores y verdes espadañas para adornar el templo y calles de nuestro lugar, por ser el siguiente día solemnísimas fiestas y estar obligados los moradores de nuestro pueblo por promesa y voto a guardalla, acertamos a pasar todas juntas por un deleitoso bosque que entre el aldea y el río está puesto, adonde hallamos una junta de agraciados pastores, que a la sombra de los verdes árboles pasaban el ardor de la caliente siesta, los cuales, como nos vieron, al punto fuimos dellos conocidas, por ser todos cuál primo y cuál hermano y cuál pariente nuestro. Y, saliéndonos al encuentro y entendido de nosotras el intento que llevábamos, con corteses palabras nos persuadieron y forzaron a que adelante no pasásemos, porque algunos dellos tomarían el trabajo de traer hasta allí los ramos y flores por que íbamos. Y así, vencidas de sus ruegos, por ser ellos tales, hubimos de conceder lo que querían; y luego seis de los más mozos, apercebidos de sus hocinos, se partieron con gran contento a traernos los verdes despojos que buscábamos. Nosotras, que seis éramos, nos juntamos donde los demás pastores estaban, los cuales nos recibieron con el comedimiento posible, especialmente de un pastor forastero que allí estaba, que de ninguna de nosotras fue conocido, el cual era de tan gentil donaire y brío que quedaron todas admiradas en verle; pero yo quedé admirada y rendida. No sé qué os diga, pastoras, sino que, así como mis ojos le vieron, sentí entermecérseme el corazón, y comenzó a discurrir por todas mis venas un yelo que me encendía, y, sin saber cómo, sentí que mi alma se alegraba de tener puestos los ojos en el hermoso rostro del no conocido pastor. Y en un punto, sin ser en los casos de amor experimentada, vine a conocer que era amor el que salteado me había. Y luego quisiera quejarme dél, si el tiempo y la ocasión me dieran lugar a ello.

»En fin, yo quedé cual ahora estoy, vencida y enamorada, aunque con más confianza de salud que la que ahora tengo. ¡Ay!, cuántas veces en aquella sazón

me quise llegar a Lidia, que con nosotras estaba y decirle: “Perdóname, Lidia hermana, de la desabrida respuesta que te di el otro día, porque te hago saber que ya tengo más experiencia del mal de que te quejabas que tú misma”. Una cosa me tiene maravillada: de cómo cuantas allí estaban no conocieron, por los movimientos de mi rostro, los secretos de mi corazón; y debiólo de causar que todos los pastores se volvieron al forastero y le rogaron que acabase de cantar una canción que había comenzado antes que nosotras llegásemos; el cual, sin hacerse de rogar, siguió su comenzado canto con tan estremada y maravillosa voz, que todos los que la escuchaban estaban transportados en oírla. Entonces acabé yo de entregarme de todo en todo a todo lo que el amor quiso, sin quedar en mí más voluntad que si no la hubiera tenido para cosa alguna en mi vida. Y, puesto que yo estaba más suspensa que todos escuchando la suave armonía del pastor, no por eso dejé de poner grandísima atención a lo que en sus versos cantaba, porque me tenía ya el amor puesta en tal extremo que me llegara al alma si le oyera cantar cosas de enamorado, que imaginara que ya tenía ocupados sus pensamientos, y quizá en parte que no tuviesen alguna los míos en lo que deseaban. Mas lo que él entonces cantó no fueron sino ciertas alabanzas del pastoral estado y de la sosegada vida del campo, y algunos avisos útiles a la conservación del ganado, de que no poco quedé yo contenta, pareciéndome que si el pastor estuviera enamorado, que de ninguna cosa tratara que de sus amores, por ser condición de los amantes parecerles mal gastado el tiempo que en otra cosa que en ensalzar y alabar la causa de sus tristezas o contentos se gasta. Ved, amigas, en cuán poco espacio estaba ya maestra en la escuela de amor.

»El acabar el pastor su canto y el descubrir los que con los ramos venían fue todo a un tiempo; los cuales, a quien de lejos los miraba, no parecían sino un pequeño montecillo que con todos sus árboles se movía, según venían pomposos y enramados. Y, llegando ya cerca de nosotras, todos seis entonaron sus voces, y comenzando el uno y respondiendo todos, con muestras de grandísimo contento, y con muchos placenteros alaridos, dieron principio a un gracioso villancico. Con este contento y alegría llegaron más presto de lo que yo quisiera, porque me quitaron la que yo sentía de la vista del pastor. Descargados, pues, de la verde carga, vimos que traía cada uno una hermosa guirnalda enroscada en el brazo, compuesta de diversas y agradables flores, las cuales con graciosas palabras a cada una de nosotras la suya presentaron, y se ofrecieron de llevar los ramos hasta el aldea. Mas, agradeciéndoles nosotras su buen comedimiento, llenas de alegría, queríamos dar la vuelta al lugar, cuando Eleuco, un anciano pastor que allí estaba, nos dijo: “Bien será, hermosas pastoras, que nos paguéis lo que por vosotras nuestros zagales han hecho, con dejarnos las guirnaldas, que demasiadas lleváis de lo que a buscar veníades; pero ha de ser con condición que

de vuestra mano las deis a quien os pareciere”. “Si con tan pequeña paga quedaréis de nosotras satisfechos -respondió la una-, yo por mí soy contenta”. Y, tomando la guirnalda con ambas manos, la puso en la cabeza de un gallardo primo suyo. Las otras, guiadas deste ejemplo, dieron las suyas a diferentes zagales que allí estaban; que todos, sus parientes eran. Yo, que a lo último quedaba, y que allí deudo alguno no tenía, mostrando hacer de la desenvuelta, me llegué al forastero pastor, y, puniéndole la guirnalda en la cabeza, le dije: “Ésta te doy, buen zagal, por dos cosas: la una, por el contento que a todos nos has dado con tu agradable canto; la otra, porque en nuestra aldea se usa honrar a los extranjeros”. Todos los circunstantes recibieron gusto de lo que yo hacía; pero, ¿qué os diré yo de lo que mi alma sintió, viéndome tan cerca de quien me la tenía robada, sino que diera cualquiera otro bien que acertara a desear en aquel punto, fuera de quererle, por poder ceñirle con mis brazos al cuello, como le ceñí las sienes con la guirnalda? El pastor se me humilló y con discretas palabras me agradeció la merced que le hacía, y, al despedirse de mí, con voz baja, hurtando la ocasión a los muchos ojos que allí había, me dijo: “Mejor te he pagado de lo que piensas, hermosa pastora, la guirnalda que me has dado: prenda llevas contigo que, si la sabes estimar, conocerás que me quedas deudora”. Bien quisiera yo responderle, pero la priesa que mis compañeras me daban era tanta, que no tuve lugar de replicarle.

»Desta manera me volví al aldea, con tan diferente corazón del con que había salido, que yo mesma de mí mesma me maravillaba. La compañía me era enojosa, y cualquiera pensamiento que me viniese, que a pensar en mi pastor no se encaminase, con gran presteza procuraba luego de desecharle de mi memoria, como indigno de ocupar el lugar que de amorosos cuidados estaba lleno. Yo no sé cómo en tan pequeño espacio de tiempo me transformé en otro ser del que tenía, porque yo ya no vivía en mí, sino en Artidoro -que así se llama la mitad de mi alma que ando buscando-: doquiera que volvía los ojos me parecía ver su figura; cualquiera cosa que escuchaba, luego sonaba en mis oídos su suave música y armonía; a ninguna parte movía los pies, que no diera por hallarle en ella mi vida, si él la quisiera; en los manjares no hallaba el acostumbrado gusto, ni las manos acertaban a tocar cosa que se le diese. En fin, todos mis sentidos estaban trocados del ser que primero tenían, ni el alma obraba por ellos como era acostumbrada.

»En considerar la nueva Teolinda que en mí había nacido, y en contemplar las gracias del pastor, que impresas en el alma me quedaron, se me pasó todo aquel día y la noche antes de la solemne fiesta, la cual venida, fue con grandísimo regocijo y aplauso de todos los moradores de nuestra aldea y de los circunvecinos lugares solemnizada. Y, después de acabadas en el templo las

sacras oblacones, y cumplidas las debidas ceremonias, en una ancha plaza que delante del templo se hacía, a la sombra de cuatro antiguos y frondosos álamos que en ella estaban, se juntó casi la más gente del pueblo, y, haciéndose todos un corro, dieron lugar a que los zagales vecinos y forasteros se ejercitasen, por honra de la fiesta, en algunos pastoriles ejercicios. Luego en el instante, se mostraron en la plaza un buen número de dispuestos y gallardos pastores, los cuales, dando alegres muestras de su juventud y destreza, dieron principios a mil graciosos juegos: ora tirando la pesada barra, ora mostrando la ligereza de sus sueltos miembros en los desusados saltos, ora descubriendo su crecida fuerza e industriosa maña en las intrincadas luchas, ora enseñando la velocidad de sus pies en las largas carreras, procurando cada uno de ser tal en todo, que el primero premio alcanzase de muchos que los mayores del pueblo tenían puestos para los mejores que en tales ejercicios se aventajasen. Pero, en estos que he contado, ni en otros muchos que callo por no ser prolija, ningunos de cuantos allí estaban, vecinos y comarcanos, llegó al punto que mi Artidoro, el cual con su presencia quiso honrar y alegrar nuestra fiesta, y llevarse el primero honor y premio de todos los juegos que se hicieron. Tal era, pastoras, su destreza y gallardía; las alabanzas que todas le daban eran tantas, que yo mesma me ensoberbecía, y un desusado contento en el pecho me retozaba, sólo en considerar cuán bien había sabido ocupar mis pensamientos. Pero, con todo esto, me daba grandísima pesadumbre que Artidoro, como forastero, se había de partir presto de nuestra aldea, y que si él se iba sin saber, a lo menos, lo que de mí llevaba -que era el alma-, ¿qué vida sería la mía en su ausencia, o cómo podría yo aliviar mi pena siquiera con quejarme, pues no tenía de quién, sino de mí mesma? Estando yo, pues, en estas imaginaciones, se acabó la fiesta y regocijo, y, queriendo Artidoro despedirse de los pastores sus amigos, todos ellos juntos le rogaron que, por los días que había de durar el octavario de la fiesta, fuese contento de pasarlos con ellos, si otra cosa de más gusto no se lo impedía. “Ninguna me la puede dar a mí mayor, graciosos pastores -respondió Artidoro-, que serviros en esto y en todo lo que más fuere vuestra voluntad, que, puesto que la mía era por agora querer buscar a un hermano mío que pocos días ha falta de nuestra aldea, cumpliré vuestro deseo, por ser yo el que gano en ello”. Todos se lo agradecieron mucho, y quedaron contentos de su quedada, pero más lo quedé yo, considerando que en aquellos ocho días no podía dejar de ofrecérseme ocasión donde le descubriese lo que ya encubrir no podía. Toda aquella noche casi se nos pasó en bailes y juegos, y en contar unas a otras las pruebas que habíamos visto hacer a los pastores aquel día, diciendo: “Fulano bailó mejor que fulano, puesto que el tal sabía más mudanzas que el tal; Mingo derribó a Bras, pero Bras corrió más que Mingo”. Y, al fin fin, todas concluían que Artidoro, el pastor forastero, había llevado la ventaja a todos, loándole cada una en particular sus particulares gracias; las cuales alabanzas, como ya he dicho, todas en mi contento redundaban.

»Venida la mañana del día después de la fiesta, antes que la fresca aurora perdiese el rocío aljofarado de sus hermosos cabellos, y que el sol acabase de descubrir sus rayos por las cumbres de los vecinos montes, nos juntamos hasta una docena de pastoras, de las más miradas del pueblo, y asidas unas de otras de las manos, al son de una gaita y de una zampoña, haciendo y deshaciendo intrincadas vueltas y bailes, nos salimos de la aldea a un verde prado que no lejos della estaba, dando gran contento a todos los que nuestra enmarañada danza miraban. Y la ventura, que hasta entonces mis cosas de bien en mejor iba guiando, ordenó que en aquel mismo prado hallásemos todos los pastores del lugar, y con ellos a Artidoro, los cuales, como nos vieron, acordando luego el son de un tamborino suyo con el de nuestras zampoñas, con el mismo compás y baile nos salieron a recibir, mezclándonos unos con otros confusa y concertadamente, y mudando los instrumentos el son, mudamos el baile, de manera que fue menester que las pastoras nos desasiésemos y diésemos las manos a los pastores; y quiso mi buena dicha que acerté yo a dar la mía a Artidoro. No sé cómo os encarezca, amigas, lo que en tal punto sentí, si no es deciros que me turbé de manera que no acertaba a dar paso concertado en el baile; tanto, que le convenía a Artidoro llevarme con fuerza tras sí, porque no rompiese, soltándome, el hilo de la concertada danza. Y, tomando dello ocasión, le dije: “¿En qué te ha ofendido mi mano, Artidoro, que así la aprietas?” Él me respondió, con voz que de ninguno pudo ser oída: “Mas, ¿qué te ha hecho a ti mi alma, que así la maltratas?” “Mi ofensa es clara -respondí yo mansamente-; mas la tuya, ni la veo ni podrá verse”. “Y aun ahí está el daño -replicó Artidoro-: que tengas vista para hacer el mal y te falte para sanarle”. En esto cesaron nuestras razones, porque los bailes cesaron, quedando yo contenta y pensativa de lo que Artidoro me había dicho; y, aunque consideraba que eran razones enamoradas, no me aseguraban si era de enamorado.

»Luego nos sentamos todos los pastores y pastoras sobre la verde yerba; y, habiendo reposado un poco del cansancio de los bailes pasados, el viejo Eleuco, acordando su instrumento, que un rabel era, con la zampoña de otro pastor, rogó a Artidoro que alguna cosa cantase, pues él más que otro alguno lo debía hacer, por haberle dado el cielo tal gracia que sería ingrato si encubrir la quisiese. Artidoro, agradeciendo a Eleuco las alabanzas que le daba, comenzó luego a cantar unos versos, que, por haberme puesto en mí sospecha aquellas palabras que antes me había dicho, los tomé tan en la memoria que aun hasta agora no se me han olvidado; los cuales, aunque os dé pesadumbre oírlos, sólo porque hacen

al caso para que entendáis punto por punto por los que me ha traído el amor al desdichado en que me hallo, os los habré de decir, que son estos: En áspera, cerrada, oscura noche, sin ver jamás el esperado día,

y en continuo, crecido, amargo llanto,
ajeno de placer, contento y risa,
meresce estar, y en una viva muerte, 5
aquel que sin amor pasa la vida.

¿Qué puede ser la más alegre vida,
sino una sombra de una breve noche,
o natural retrato de la muerte,
si en todas cuantas horas tiene el día, 10
puesto silencio al congojoso llanto,
no admite del amor la dulce risa?

Do vive el blando amor, vive la risa,
y adonde muere, muere nuestra vida,
y el sabroso placer se vuelve en llanto, 15
y en tenebrosa sempiterna noche
la clara luz del sosegado día,

y es el vivir sin él amarga muerte.

Los rigurosos trances de la muerte
no huye el amador; antes con risa 20
desea la ocasión y espera el día
donde pueda ofrescer la cara vida
hasta ver la tranquila última noche,
al amoroso fuego, al dulce llanto.

No se llama de amor el llanto, llanto, 25
ni su muerte llamarse debe muerte,
ni a su noche dar título de noche;
que su risa llamarse debe risa,
y su vida tener por cierta vida,
y sólo festejar su alegre día. 30

¡Oh venturoso para mí este día,

do pude poner freno al triste llanto,
y alegrarme de haber dado mi vida
a quien dárme la puede, o darme muerte!
Mas ¿qué puede esperarse, si no es risa, 35
de un rostro que al sol vence y vuelve en noche?

Vuelto ha mi escura noche en claro día
amor, y en risa mi crecido llanto,
y mi cercana muerte en larga vida.

»Estos fueron los versos, hermosas pastoras, que con maravillosa gracia y no menos satisfacción de los que le escuchaban aquel día, cantó mi Artidoro, de los cuales y de las razones que antes me había dicho, tomé yo ocasión de imaginar si por ventura mi vista algún nuevo accidente amoroso en el pecho de Artidoro había causado; y no me salió tan vana mi sospecha que él mismo no me la certificase al volvernó al aldea.»

A este punto del cuento de sus amores llegaba Teolinda, cuando las pastoras sintieron grandísimo estruendo de voces de pastores y ladridos de perros, que fue causa para que dejaran la comenzada plática y se parasen a mirar por entre las ramas lo que era. Y así, vieron que por un verde llano que a su mano derecha estaba, atravesaban una multitud de perros, los cuales venían siguiendo una temerosa liebre, que a toda furia a las espesas matas venía a guarecerse. Y no tardó mucho que por el mismo lugar donde las pastoras estaban la vieron entrar y irse derecha al lado de Galatea; y allí, vencida del cansancio de la larga carrera y casi como segura del cercano peligro, se dejó caer en el suelo con tan cansado aliento que parecía que faltaba poco para dar el espíritu. Los perros, por el olor y rastro, la siguieron hasta entrar adonde estaban las pastoras; mas Galatea, tomando la temerosa liebre en los brazos, estorbó su vengativo intento a los cobdiciosos perros, por parecerle no ser bien si dejaba de defender a quien della había querido valerse. De allí a poco llegaron algunos pastores, que en seguimiento de los perros y de la liebre venían, entre los cuales venía el padre de Galatea, por cuyo respecto ella, Florisa y Teolinda le salieron a rescebir con la debida cortesía. Él y los pastores quedaron admirados de la hermosura de Teolinda, y con deseo de saber quién fuese, porque bien conocieron que era forastera. No poco les pesó desta llegada a Galatea y Florisa, por el gusto que les había quitado de saber el suceso de los amores de Teolinda, a la cual rogaron fuese servida de no partirse por algunos días de su compañía, si en ello no se estorbaba acaso el cumplimiento de sus deseos.

-Antes, por ver si pueden cumplirse -respondió Teolinda-, me conviene estar

algún día en esta ribera; y, así por esto como por no dejar imperfecto mi comenzado cuento, habré de hacer lo que me mandáis.

Galatea y Florisa la abrazaron y le ofrecieron de nuevo su amistad, y de servirla en cuanto sus fuerzas alcanzasen. En este entre tanto, habiendo el padre de Galatea y los otros pastores en el margen del claro arroyo tendido sus gabanes y sacado de sus zurroneos algunos rústicos manjares, convidaron a Galatea y a sus compañeras a que con ellos comiesen. Acetaron ellas el convite; y, sentándose luego, desecharon la hambre, que por ser ya subido el día comenzaba a fatigarles. En estos y en algunos cuentos que, por entretener el tiempo, los pastores contaron, se llegó la hora acostumbrada de recogerse al aldea. Y luego Galatea y Florisa, dando vuelta a sus rebaños, los recogieron, y en compañía de Teolinda y de los otros pastores hacia el lugar poco a poco se encaminaron; y, al quebrar de la cuesta donde aquella mañana habían topado a Elicio, oyeron todos la zampoña del desamorado Lenio, el cual era un pastor en cuyo pecho el amor jamás pudo hacer morada, y desto vivía él tan alegre y satisfecho que, en cualquiera conversación y junta de pastores que se hallaba, no era otro su intento sino decir mal de amor y de los enamorados, y todos sus cantares a este fin se encaminaban. Y por esta tan estraña condición que tenía, era de los pastores de todas aquellas comarcas conocido, y de unos aborrecido y de otros estimado. Galatea y los que allí venían se pararon a escuchar, por ver si Lenio, como de costumbre tenía, alguna cosa cantaba. Y luego vieron que, dando su zampoña a otro compañero suyo, al son della comenzó a cantar lo que se sigue:

LENIO

Un vano, descuidado pensamiento,
una loca, altanera fantasía,
un no sé qué, que la memoria cría,
sin ser, sin calidad, sin fundamento;

una esperanza que se lleva el viento,   5
un dolor con renombre de alegría,
una noche confusa do no hay día,
un ciego error de nuestro entendimiento,

son las raíces propias de do nasce esta quimera antigua celebrada   10

que amor tiene por nombre en todo el suelo.

Y el alma qu'en amor tal se complace,
meresce ser del suelo desterrada,
y que no la recojan en el cielo.

A la sazón que Lenio cantaba lo que habéis oído, habían ya llegado con sus rebaños Elicio y Erastro, en compañía del lastimado Lisandro; y, pareciéndole a Elicio que la lengua de Lenio en decir mal de amor a más de lo que era razón se estendía, quiso mostrarle a la clara su engaño; y, aprovechándose del mismo concepto de los versos que él había cantado, al tiempo que ya llegaban Galatea, Florisa y Teolinda y los demás pastores, al son de la zampoña de Erastro, comenzó a cantar desta manera:

ELICIO

*Meresce quien en el suelo en su pecho a amor no encierra, que lo desechen del cielo
y no le sufra la tierra.*

Amor, que es virtud entera, 5
con otras muchas que alcanza,
de una en otra semejanza
sube a la causa primera.
Y meresce el que su celo
de tal amor le destierra, 10
*que le desechen del cielo
y no le acoja la tierra.*

Un bello rostro y figura,
aunque caduca y mortal,
es un traslado y señal 15
de la divina hermosura.
Y el que lo hermoso en el suelo
desama y echa por tierra, desechado sea del cielo

y no le sufra la tierra. 20

Amor tomado en sí solo,
sin mezcla de otro accidente,
es al suelo conviniente,
como los rayos de Apolo.

Y el que tuviere recelo 25
de amor que tal bien encierra,
meresce no ver el cielo
y que le trague la tierra.

Bien se conoce que amor
está de mil bienes lleno, 30
pues hace del malo bueno
y del qu'es bueno, mejor.
Y así el que discrepa un pelo

en limpia amorosa guerra,
ni meresce ver el cielo, 35
ni sustentarse en la tierra.

El amor es infinito,
si se funda en ser honesto,
y aquel que se acaba presto,
no es amor sino apetito. 40
Y al que sin alzar el vuelo,
con su voluntad se cierra,
mátele rayo del cielo
y no le cubra la tierra.

No recibieron poco gusto los enamorados pastores de ver cuán bien Elicio su parte defendía, pero no por esto el desamorado Lenio dejó de estar firme en su opinión; antes, quería de nuevo volver a cantar y a mostrar en lo que cantase de cuán poco momento eran las razones de Elicio para escurecer la verdad tan clara que él a su parecer sustentaba. Mas el padre de Galatea, que Aurelio el Venerable se llamaba, le dijo: -No te fatigues por agora, discreto Lenio, en querernos mostrar en tu canto lo que en tu corazón sientes, que el camino de aquí al aldea es breve, y me parece que es menester más tiempo del que piensas para defenderte de los muchos que tienen tu contrario parescer. Guarda tus razones para lugar más oportuno, que algún día te juntarás tú y Elicio con otros pastores en la fuente de las Pizarras o arroyo de las Palmas, donde con más comodidad y sosiego podáis argüir y aclarar vuestras diferentes opiniones.

-La que Elicio tiene es opinión -respondió Lenio-, que la mía no es sino sciencia averiguada, la cual en breve o en largo tiempo, por traer ella consigo la verdad, me obligo a sustentarla; pero no faltará tiempo, como dices, más aparejado para este efecto.

-Ese procuraré yo -respondió Elicio-, porque me pesa que tan subido ingenio como el tuyo, amigo Lenio, le falte quien le pueda requintar y subir de punto, como es el limpio y verdadero amor, de quien te muestras tan enemigo.

-Engañado estás, ¡oh Elicio! -replicó Lenio-, si piensas con afeitadas y sofísticas palabras hacerme mudar de lo que no me tendría por hombre si me mudase.

-Tan malo es -dijo Elicio-ser pertinaz en el mal, como bueno perseverar en el bien, y siempre he oído decir a mis mayores que de sabios es mudar consejo.

-No niego yo eso -respondió Lenio-, cuando yo entendiese que mi parecer no es justo, pero en tanto que la experiencia y la razón no me mostraren el contrario de lo que hasta aquí me han mostrado, yo creo que mi opinión es tan verdadera cuanto la tuya falsa.

-Si se castigasen los herejes de amor -dijo a esta sazón Erastro-, desde agora comenzara yo, amigo Lenio, a cortar leña con que te abrasaran, por el mayor hereje y enemigo que el amor tiene.

-Y aun si yo no viera otra cosa del amor sino que tú, Erastro, le sigues, y eres del bando de los enamorados -respondió Lenio-, sola ella me bastara a renegar dél con cien mil lenguas, si cien mil lenguas tuviera.

-Pues, ¿parécete, Lenio -replicó Erastro-, que no soy bueno para enamorado?

-Antes me parece -respondió Lenio-que los que fueren de tu condición y entendimiento son propios para ser ministros suyos; porque quien es cojo, con el más mínimo traspí da de ojos; y el que tiene poco discurso, poco ha menester para que le pierda del todo. Y los que siguen la bandera deste vuestro valeroso capitán, yo tengo para mí que no son los más sabios del mundo, y si lo han sido, en el punto que se enamoraron dejaron de serlo.

Grande fue el enojo que Erastro recibió de lo que Lenio le dijo, y así le respondió: -Paréceme, Lenio, que tus desvariadas razones merescen otro castigo que palabras, mas yo espero que algún día pagarás lo que agora has dicho, sin que te valga lo que en tu defensa dijeres.

-Si yo entendiese de ti, Erastro -respondió Lenio-, que fueses tan valiente como enamorado, no dejarían de darme temor tus amenazas; mas, como sé que te quedas tan atrás en lo uno como vas adelante en lo otro, antes me causan risa que espanto.

Aquí acabó de perder la paciencia Erastro, y si no fuera por Lisandro y por Elicio, que en medio se pusieron, él respondiera a Lenio con las manos, porque ya su lengua, turbada con la cólera, apenas podía usar su oficio. Grande fue el gusto que todos recibieron de la graciosa pendencia de los pastores, y más de la cólera y enojo que Erastro mostraba, que fue menester que el padre de Galatea hiciese las amistades de Lenio y suyas; aunque Erastro, si no fuera por no perder el respecto al padre de su señora, en ninguna manera las hiciera. Luego que la cuestión fue acabada, todos con regocijo se encaminaron al aldea; y, en tanto que llegaban, la hermosa Florisa, al son de la zampoña de Galatea, cantó este soneto:

FLORISA

Crezcan las simples ovejuelas mías
en el cerrado bosque y verde prado,
y el caluroso estío e invierno helado
abunde en yerbas verdes y aguas frías.

Pase en sueños las noches y los días, 5
en lo que toca al pastoral estado,
sin que de amor un mínimo cuidado
sienta, ni sus ancianas niñerías.

Éste mil bienes del amor pregona;
aquél publica dél vanos cuidados; 10
yo no sé si los dos andan perdidos,

ni sabré al vencedor dar la corona:
sé bien que son de amor los escogidos
tan pocos, cuanto muchos los llamados.

Breve se les hizo a los pastores el camino, engañados y entretenidos con la graciosa voz de Florisa, la cual no dejó el canto hasta que estuvieron bien cerca del aldea y de las cabañas de Elicio y Erastro, que con Lisandro se quedaron en ellas, despidiéndose primero del venerable Aurelio, de Galatea y Florisa, que con Teolinda al aldea se fueron, y los demás pastores cada cual adonde tenía su

cabaña. Aquella misma noche pidió el lastimado Lisandro licencia a Elicio para volverse a su tierra, o adonde pudiese, conforme a sus deseos, acabar lo poco que, a su parecer, le quedaba de vida. Elicio, con todas las razones que supo decirle y con infinitos ofrecimientos de verdadera amistad que le ofreció, jamás pudo acabar con él que en su compañía, siquiera algunos días, se quedase. Y así, el sin ventura pastor, abrazando a Elicio, con abundantes lágrimas y suspiros se despidió dél, prometiendo de avisarle de su estado donde quiera que estuviese. Y, habiéndole acompañado Elicio hasta media legua de su cabaña, le tornó a abrazar estrechamente; y, tornándose a hacer de nuevo nuevos ofrecimientos, se apartaron, quedando Elicio con harto pesar del que Lisandro llevaba. Y así, se volvió a su cabaña a pasar lo más de la noche en sus amorosas imaginaciones, y a esperar el venidero día para gozar el bien que de ver a Galatea se le causaba. La cual, después que llegó a su aldea, deseando saber el suceso de los amores de Teolinda, procuró hacer de manera que aquella noche estuviesen solas ella y Florisa y Teolinda; y, hallando la comodidad que deseaba, la enamorada pastora prosiguió su cuento, como se verá en el segundo libro.

FIN DEL PRIMERO LIBRO DE GALATEA

Segundo libro de Galatea

LIBRES ya y desembarazadas de lo que aquella noche con sus ganados habían de hacer, procuraron recogerse y apartarse con Teolinda en parte donde, sin ser de nadie impedidas, pudiesen oír lo que del suceso de sus amores les faltaba. Y así, se fueron a un pequeño jardín que estaba en casa de Galatea; y, sentándose las tres debajo de una verde y pomposa parra que entricadamente por unas redes de palos se entretejía, tornando a repetir Teolinda algunas palabras de lo que antes había dicho, prosiguió diciendo: -«Después de acabado nuestro baile y el canto de Artidoro -como ya os he dicho, bellas pastoras-, a todos nos pareció volvernos al aldea a hacer en el templo los solemnes sacrificios, y por parecernos asimesmo que la solemnidad de la fiesta daba en alguna manera licencia para que, no teniendo cuenta tan a punto con el recogimiento, con más libertad nos holgásemos; y por esto, todos los pastores y pastoras, en montón confuso, alegre y regocijadamente al aldea nos volvimos, hablando cada uno con quien más gusto le daba. Ordenó, pues, la suerte y mi diligencia, y aun la solicitud de Artidoro, que sin mostrar artificio en ello, los dos nos apareamos, de manera que a nuestro salvo pudiéramos hablar en aquel camino más de lo que hablamos, si cada uno por sí no tuviera respecto a lo que a sí mismo y al otro debía. En fin, yo, por sacarle a barrera -como decirse suele-, le dije: “Años se te harán, Artidoro, los días que en nuestra aldea estuvieres, pues debes de tener en la tuya cosas en que ocuparte que te deben de dar más gusto”. “Todo el que yo puedo esperar en mi vida trocara yo -respondió Artidoro-porque fueran, no años, sino siglos, los días que aquí tengo de estar, pues, en acabándose, no espero tener otros que más contento me hagan”. “¿Tanto es el que rescibes -respondí yo-en mirar nuestras fiestas?” “No nasce de ahí -respondió él-, sino de contemplar la hermosura de las pastoras desta vuestra aldea”. “¡Es verdad -repliqué yo-, que deben de faltar hermosas zagalas en la tuya!”. “Verdad es que allá no faltan -respondió él-, pero aquí sobran, de manera que una sola que yo he visto, basta para que, en su comparación, las de allá se tengan por feas”. “Tu cortesía te hace decir eso, ¡oh Artidoro! -respondí yo-, porque bien sé que en este pueblo no hay ninguna que tanto se aventaje como dices”. “Mejor sé yo ser verdad lo que digo -respondió él-, pues he visto la una y mirado las otras”. “Quizá la miraste de lejos, y la distancia del lugar -dije yo-te hizo parecer otra cosa de lo que debe de ser”. “De la misma manera -respondió él-que a ti te veo y estoy mirando agora, la he mirado y visto a ella; y yo me holgaría de haberme engañado, si no conforma su condición con su hermosura”. “No me pesara a mí ser la que dices, por el gusto que debe sentir la que se vee pregonada y tenida por hermosa”. “Harto más -respondió Artidoro-quisiera yo que tú no fueras”. “Pues, ¿qué perdieras tú -respondí yo-si, como yo no soy la que dices, lo fuera?” “Lo que he ganado -respondió él-bien lo sé; de lo que he de perder estoy incierto y temeroso”. “Bien sabes hacer del enamorado -dije yo-, ¡oh Artidoro!” “Mejor sabes tú enamorar, ¡oh Teolinda!”, respondió él. A esto le dije: “No sé si te diga, Artidoro, que deseo que ninguno de los dos sea el engañado”. A lo que él respondió: “De que yo no me engaño estoy bien seguro, y de querer tú desengañarte, está en tu mano, todas las veces que quisieres hacer experiencia de la limpia voluntad que tengo de servirte”. “Ésa te pagaré yo con la misma -repliqué yo-, por parecerme que no sería bien a tan poca costa quedar en deuda con alguno”.

»A esta sazón, sin que él tuviese lugar de responderme, llegó Eleuco, el mayoral, y dijo con voz alta: “¡Ea, gallardos pastores y hermosas pastoras!, haced que sientan en el aldea vuestra venida, entonando vosotras, zagalas, algún villancico, de modo que nosotros os respondamos; porque vean los del pueblo cuánto hacemos al caso los que aquí vamos para alegrar nuestra fiesta”. Y porque en ninguna cosa que Eleuco mandaba dejaba de ser obedecido, luego los pastores me dieron a mí la mano para que comenzase. Y así, sirviéndome de la ocasión y aprovechándome de lo que con Artidoro había pasado, di principio a este villancico: En los estados de amor,

*nadie llega a ser perfecto,
sino el honesto y secreto.*

Para llegar al süave
gusto de amor, si se acierta, 5
es el secreto la puerta,
y la honestidad la llave.
Y esta entrada no la sabe
quien presume de discreto,
sino el honesto y secreto. 10

Amar humana beldad
suele ser reprehendido,
si tal amor no es medido
con razón y honestidad.
Y amor de tal calidad 15
luego le alcanza, en efecto,

el qu'es honesto y secreto.

Es ya caso averiguado,
que no se puede negar,
que a veces pierde el hablar 20
lo qu'el callar ha ganado.
Y el que fuere enamorado,
jamás se verá en aprieto,
si fuere honesto y secreto.

Cuanto una parlera lengua 25
y unos atrevidos ojos
suelen causar mil enojos
y poner al alma en mengua, tanto este dolor desmengua
y se libra deste aprieto 30
el qu'es honesto y secreto.

»No sé si acerté, hermosas pastoras, en cantar lo que habéis oído, pero sé bien que se supo aprovechar dello Artidoro, pues, en todo el tiempo que en nuestra aldea estuvo, puesto que me habló muchas veces, fue con tanto recato, secreto y honestidad, que los ociosos ojos y lenguas parleras ni tuvieron ni vieron que decir cosa que a nuestra honra perjudicase. Mas con el temor que yo tenía que, acabado el término que Artidoro había prometido de estar en nuestra aldea, se había de ir a la suya, procuré, aunque a costa de mi vergüenza, que no quedase mi corazón con lástima de haber callado lo que después fuera escusado decirse estando Artidoro ausente. Y así, después que mis ojos dieron licencia que los suyos amorosamente me mirasen, no estuvieron quedas las lenguas, ni dejaron de mostrar con palabras lo que hasta entonces por señas los ojos habían bien claramente manifestado.

»En fin, sabréis, amigas mías, que un día, hallándome acaso sola con Artidoro, con señales de un encendido amor y comedimiento, me descubrió el verdadero y honesto amor que me tenía; y, aunque yo quisiera entonces hacer de la retirada y melindrosa, porque temía, como ya os he dicho, que él se partiese, no quise desdeñarle ni despedirle; y también por parecerme que los sinsabores que se dan y sienten en el principio de los amores son causa de que abandonen y dejen la comenzada empresa los que en sus sucesos no son muy experimentados. Y por esto le di respuesta tal cual yo deseaba dársela, quedando, en resolución, concertados en que él se fuese a su aldea, y que, de allí a pocos días, con alguna

honrosa tercería me enviase a pedir por esposa a mis padres; de lo que él fue tan contento y satisfecho, que no acababa de llamar venturoso el día en que sus ojos me miraron. De mí os sé decir que no trocara mi contento por ningún otro que imaginar pudiera, por estar segura que el valor y calidad de Artidoro era tal, que mi padre sería contento de recibirle por yerno.

»En el dichoso punto que habéis oído, pastoras, estaba el de nuestros amores, que no quedaban sino dos o tres días a la partida de Artidoro, cuando la Fortuna, como aquella que jamás tuvo término en sus cosas, ordenó que una hermana mía de poco menos edad que yo a nuestra aldea tornase, de otra donde algunos días había estado en casa de una tía nuestra que mal dispuesta se hallaba. Y porque consideréis, señoras, cuán estraños y no pensados casos en el mundo suceden, quiero que entendáis una cosa que creo no os dejará de causar alguna admiración estraña; y es que esta hermana mía que os he dicho, que hasta entonces había estado ausente, me parece tanto en el rostro, estatura, donaire y brío, si alguno tengo, que no sólo los de nuestro lugar, sino nuestros mismos padres muchas veces nos han desconocido, y a la una por la otra hablado; de manera que, para no caer en este engaño, por la diferencia de los vestidos, que diferentes eran, nos diferenciaban. En una cosa sola, a lo que yo creo, nos hizo bien diferentes la naturaleza, que fue en las condiciones, por ser la de mi hermana más áspera de lo que mi contento había menester, pues por ser ella menos piadosa que advertida, tendré yo que llorar todo el tiempo que la vida me durare.

»Sucedió, pues, que luego que mi hermana vino al aldea, con el deseo que tenía de volver al agradable pastoral ejercicio suyo, madrugó luego otro día más de lo que yo quisiera, y con las ovejas propias que yo solía llevar se fue al prado; y, aunque yo quise seguirla, por el contento que se me seguía de la vista de mi Artidoro, con no sé qué ocasión, mi padre me detuvo todo aquel día en casa, que fue el último de mis alegrías. Porque aquella noche, habiendo mi hermana recogido su ganado, me dijo, como en secreto, que tenía necesidad de decirme una cosa que mucho me importaba. Yo, que cualquiera otra pudiera pensar de la que me dijo, procuré que presto a solas nos viésemos, adonde ella, con rostro algo alterado, estando yo colgada de sus palabras, me comenzó a decir: “No sé, hermana mía, lo que piense de tu honestidad, ni menos sé si calle lo que no puedo dejar de decirte, por ver si me das alguna disculpa de la culpa que imagino que tienes; y, aunque yo, como hermana menor, estaba obligada a hablarte con más respecto, debes perdonarme, porque en lo que hoy he visto hallarás la disculpa de lo que te dijere”. Cuando yo desta manera la oí hablar, no sabía qué responderle, sino decirle que pasase adelante con su plática. “Has de saber, hermana -siguió ella-, que esta mañana, saliendo con nuestras ovejas al prado, y yendo sola con ellas por la ribera de nuestro fresco Henares, al pasar

por el alameda del Concejo, salió a mí un pastor que con verdad osaré jurar que jamás le he visto en estos nuestros contornos, y, con una estraña desenvoltura, me comenzó a hacer tan amorosas saluciones que yo estaba con vergüenza y confusa, sin saber qué responderle; y él, no escarmentado del enojo que, a lo que yo creo, en mi rostro mostraba, se llegó a mí diciéndome: ‘¿Qué silencio es éste, hermosa Teolinda, último refugio de esta ánima que os adora?’. Y faltó poco que no me tomó las manos para besármelas, añadiendo a lo que he dicho un catálogo de requiebros, que parecía que los traía estudiados. Luego di yo en la cuenta, considerando que él daba en el error en que otros muchos han dado, y que pensaba que con vos estaba hablando, de donde me nació sospecha que si vos, hermana, jamás le hubiéradéis visto, ni familiarmente tratado, no fuera posible tener el atrevimiento de hablaros de aquella manera. De lo cual tomé tanto enojo, que apenas podía formar palabra para responderle; pero al fin respondí de la suerte que su atrevimiento merescía, y cual a mí me pareció que estábades vos, hermana, obligada a responder a quien con tanta libertad os hablara. Y si no fuera porque en aquel instante llegó la pastora Licea, yo le añadiera tales razones, que fuera bien arrepentido de haberme dicho las tuyas. Y es lo bueno, que nunca le quise decir el engaño en que estaba, sino que así creyó él que yo era Teolinda como si con vos misma estuviera hablando. En fin, él se fue llamándome ingrata, desagradecida y de poco conocimiento; y, a lo que yo puedo juzgar del semblante que él llevaba, a fe, hermana, que otra vez no ose hablaros, aunque más sola os encuentre. Lo que deseo saber es quién es este pastor y qué conversación ha sido la de entrambos, de do nasce que con tanta desenvoltura él se atreviese a hablaros”.

»A vuestra mucha discreción dejo, discretas pastoras, lo que mi alma sentiría, oyendo lo que mi hermana me contaba. Pero al fin, disimulando lo mejor que pude, le dije: “La mayor merced del mundo me has hecho, hermana Leonarda - que así se llama la turbadora de mi descanso-, en haberme quitado con tus ásperas razones el fastidio y desasosiego que me daban las importunas de ese pastor que dices, el cual es un forastero que habrá ocho días que está en esta nuestra aldea, en cuyo pensamiento ha cabido tanta arrogancia y locura que, doquiera que me vee, me trata de la manera que has visto, dándose a entender que tiene granjeada mi voluntad; y, aunque yo le he desengañado, quizá con más ásperas palabras de las que tú le dijiste, no por eso deja él de proseguir en su vano propósito; y a fe, hermana, que deseo que venga ya el nuevo día, para ir a decirle que si no se aparta de su vanidad, que espere el fin della que mis palabras siempre le han significado”. Y así era la verdad, dulces amigas, que diera yo porque ya fuera el alba cuanto pedírseme pudiera, sólo por ir a ver a mi Artidoro y desengañarle del error en que había caído, temerosa que con la aceda y desabrida respuesta que mi hermana le había dado, él no se desdeñase y hiciese alguna cosa que en perjuicio de nuestro concierto viniese.

»Las largas noches del escabroso diciembre no dieron más pesadumbre al amante que del venidero día algún contento esperase, cuanto a mí me dio disgusto aquella, puesto que era de las cortas del verano, según deseaba la nueva luz, para ir a ver a la luz por quien mis ojos veían. Y así, antes que las estrellas perdiesen del todo la claridad, estando aún en duda si era de noche o de día, forzada de mi deseo, con la ocasión de ir a apacentar las ovejas, salí del aldea; y, dando más priesa al ganado de la acostumbrada para que caminase, llegué al lugar adonde otras veces solía hallar a Artidoro, el cual hallé solo y sin ninguno que dél noticia me diese, de que no pocos saltos me dio el corazón, que casi adivinó el mal que le estaba guardado. ¡Cuántas veces, viendo que no le hallaba, quise con mi voz herir el aire, llamando el amado nombre de mi Artidoro, y decir: “¡Ven, bien mío, que yo soy la verdadera Teolinda, que más que a sí te quiere y ama!”, sino que el temor que de otro que dél fuesen mis palabras oídas, me hizo tener más silencio del que quisiera. Y así, después que hube rodeado una y otra vez toda la ribera y el soto del manso Henares, me senté cansada al pie de un verde sauce, esperando que del todo el claro sol sus rayos por la faz de la tierra estendiese, para que con su claridad no quedase mata, cueva, espesura, choza ni cabaña que de mí mi bien no fuese buscado. Mas, apenas había dado la nueva luz lugar para discernir las colores, cuando luego se me ofreció a los ojos un cortecido álamo blanco, que delante de mí estaba, en el cual y en otros muchos vi escritas unas letras, que luego conocí ser de la mano de Artidoro allí fijadas; y, levantándome con priesa a ver lo que decían, vi, hermosas pastoras, que era esto:

Pastora en quien la belleza
en tanto extremo se halla, que no hay a quien comparalla
sino a tu misma crüeza.
Mi firmeza y tu mudanza 5

han sembrado a mano llena
tus promesas en la arena
y en el viento mi esperanza.
Nunca imaginara yo que cupiera en lo que vi, 10
tras un dulce alegre sí, tan amargo y triste no.
Mas yo no fuera engañado
si pusiera en mi ventura,

así como en tu hermosura, 15
los ojos que te han mirado.
Pues cuanto tu gracia estraña
promete, alegre y conierta, tanto turba y desconierta
mi desdicha, y enmaraña. 20
Unos ojos me engañaron,
al parecer piadosos.
¡Ay, ojos falsos, hermosos!,
los que os ven, ¿en qué pecaron?
Dime, pastora crüel: 25

¿a quién no podrá engañar
tu sabio honesto mirar
y tus palabras de miel?
De mí ya está conoscido que, con menos que hicieras, 30
días ha que me tuvieras
preso, engañado y rendido.
Las letras que fijaré
en esta áspera corteza
crecerán con más firmeza 35
que no ha crecido tu fe;
la cual pusiste en la boca
y en vanos prometimientos,
no firme al mar y a los vientos,
como bien fundada roca. 40
Tan terrible y rigurosa
como víbora pisada,
tan crüel como agraciada,
tan falsa como hermosa;
lo que manda tu crueldad 45
cumpliré sin más rodeo,

pues nunca fue mi deseo
contrario a tu voluntad.
Yo moriré desterrado
porque tú vivas contenta, 50
mas mira que amor no sienta

del modo que me has tratado;
porque, en la amorosa danza,
aunque amor ponga estrechez,
sobre el compás de firmeza 55
no se sufre hacer mudanza.

Así como en la belleza
pasas cualquiera mujer,
creí yo que en el querer
fueras de mayor firmeza; 60
mas ya sé, por mi pasión,
que quiso pintar natura
un ángel en tu figura,
y el tiempo en tu condición.
Si quieres saber dó voy 65
y el fin de mi triste vida,

la sangre por mí vertida
te llevará donde estoy;
y, aunque nada no te cale
de nuestro amor y concierto, 70
no niegues al cuerpo muerto
el triste y último vale; que bien serás rigurosa,
y más que un diamante dura,
si el cuerpo y la sepultura 75
no te vuelven piadosa.
Y en caso tan desdichado
tendré por dulce partido,
si fui vivo aborrecido,
ser muerto y por ti llorado. 80

»¿Qué palabras serán bastantes, pastoras, para daros a entender el extremo de dolor que ocupó mi corazón cuando claramente entendí que los versos que había leído eran de mi querido Artidoro? Mas no hay para qué encarescérosle, pues no llegó al punto que era menester para acabarme la vida, la cual, desde entonces acá tengo tan aborrecida, que no sentiría ni me podría venir mayor gusto que perderla. Los suspiros que entonces di, las lágrimas que derramé, las lástimas que hice, fueron tantas y tales, que ninguno me oyera que por loca no me juzgara.

»En fin, yo quedé tal que, sin acordarme de lo que a mi honra debía, propuse de desamparar la cara patria, amados padres y queridos hermanos, y dejar con la guardia de sí mismo al simple ganado mío. Y, sin entremeterme en otras cuentas, mas de en aquellas que para mi gusto entendí ser necesarias, aquella misma mañana, abrazando mil veces la corteza donde las manos de mi Artidoro habían llegado, me partí de aquel lugar con intención de venir a estas riberas, donde sé que Artidoro tiene y hace su habitación, por ver si ha sido tan inconsiderado y cruel consigo que haya puesto en ejecución lo que en los últimos versos dejó escrito; que si así fuese, desde aquí os prometo, amigas mías, que no sea menor el deseo y presteza con que le siga en la muerte, que ha sido la voluntad con que le he amado en la vida. Mas, ¡ay de mí, y cómo creo que no hay sospecha que en mi daño sea que no salga verdadera!, pues ha ya nueve días que a estas frescas riberas he llegado, y en todos ellos no he sabido nuevas de lo que deseo; y quiera Dios que cuando las sepa, no sean las últimas que sospecho.» Veis aquí, discretas zagalas, el lamentable suceso de mi enamorada vida. Ya os he dicho quién soy y lo que busco; si algunas nuevas sabéis de mi contento, así la fortuna os conceda el mayor que deseáis, que no me las neguéis.

Con tantas lágrimas acompañaba la enamorada pastora las palabras que decía, que bien tuviera corazón de acero quien dellas no se doliera. Galatea y Florisa, que naturalmente eran de condición piadosa, no pudieron detener las suyas, ni menos dejaron, con las más blandas y eficaces razones que pudieron, de consolarla, dándole por consejo que se estuviese algunos días en su compañía; quizá haría la fortuna que en ellos algunas nuevas de Artidoro supiese; pues no permitiría el cielo que, por tan extraño engaño, acabase un pastor tan discreto como ella le pintaba el curso de sus verdes años; y que podría ser que Artidoro, habiendo con el discurso del tiempo vuelto a mejor discurso y propósito su pensamiento, volviese a ver la deseada patria y dulces amigos; y que por esto, allí mejor que en otra parte podía tener esperanza de hallarle. Con estas y otras razones, la pastora, algo consolada, holgó de quedarse con ellas, agradeciéndoles la merced que le hacían y el deseo que mostraban de procurar su contento. A esta sazón, la serena noche, aguijando por el cielo el estrellado carro, daba señal que el nuevo día se acercaba; y las pastoras, con el deseo y necesidad de reposo, se levantaron y del fresco jardín a sus estancias se fueron. Mas, apenas el claro sol había con sus calientes rayos deshecho y consumido la cerrada niebla que en las frescas mañanas por el aire suele estenderse, cuando las tres pastoras, dejando los ociosos lechos, al usado ejercicio de apascentar su ganado se volvieron, con harto diferentes pensamientos Galatea y Florisa del que la hermosa Teolinda llevaba, la cual iba tan triste y pensativa que era maravilla. Y a esta causa, Galatea, por ver si podría en algo divertirla, le rogó que, puesta aparte un poco la melancolía, fuese servida de cantar algunos versos al son de la zampoña de Florisa. A esto respondió Teolinda: -Si la mucha causa que tengo de llorar, con la poca que de cantar tengo, entendiera que en algo se menguara, bien pudieras, hermosa Galatea, perdonarme porque no hiciera lo que me mandas; pero, por saber ya por experiencia que lo que mi lengua cantando pronuncia mi corazón llorando lo solemniza, haré lo que quieres, pues en ello, sin ir contra mi deseo, satisfaré el tuyo.

Y luego la pastora Florisa tocó su zampoña, a cuyo son Teolinda cantó este soneto:

TEOLINDA

Sabido he por mi mal adónde llega
la cruda fuerza de un notorio engaño,
y cómo amor procura, con mi daño,
darme la vida qu'el temor me niega.

Mi alma de las carnes se despega, 5
siguiendo aquella que, por hado extraño, la tiene puesta en pena, en mal tamaño, qu'el bien la turba y el dolor sosiega.

Si vivo, vivo en fe de la esperanza, que, aunque es pequeña y débil, se sustenta 10
siendo a la fuerza de mi amor asida.

¡Oh firme comenzar, frágil mudanza,
amarga suma de una dulce cuenta,
cómo acabáis por términos la vida!

No había bien acabado de cantar Teolinda el soneto que habéis oído, cuando las tres pastoras sintieron a su mano derecha, por la ladera de un fresco valle, el son de una zampoña, cuya suavidad era de suerte que todas se suspendieron y pararon, para con más atención gozar de la suave armonía. Y de allí a poco oyeron que al son de la zampoña el de un pequeño rabel se acordaba, con tanta gracia y destreza que las dos pastoras Galatea y Florisa estaban suspensas, imaginando qué pastores podrían ser los que tan acordadamente sonaban, porque bien vieron que ninguno de los que ellas conocían, si Elicio no, era en la música tan diestro. A esta sazón, dijo Teolinda: -Si los oídos no me engañan, hermosas pastoras, yo creo que tenéis hoy en vuestras riberas a los dos nombrados y famosos pastores Tirsi y Damón, naturales de mi patria; a lo menos Tirsi, que en la famosa Compluto, villa fundada en las riberas de nuestro Henares, fue nacido. Y Damón, su íntimo y perfecto amigo, si no estoy mal informada, de las montañas de León trae su origen, y en la nombrada Mantua Carpentanea fue criado: tan aventajados los dos en todo género de discreción, sciencia y loables ejercicios, que no sólo en el circuito de nuestra comarca son conocidos, pero por todo el de la tierra conocidos y estimados. Y no penséis, pastoras, que el ingenio destos dos pastores sólo se estiende en saber lo que al pastoral estado se conviene, porque pasa tan adelante que lo escondido del cielo y lo no sabido de la tierra, por términos y modos concertados, enseñan y disputan. Y estoy confusa en pensar qué causa les habrá movido a dejar Tirsi su dulce y querida Fili, y Damón su hermosa y honesta Amarili: Fili de Tirsi, Amarili de Damón, tan amadas, que no hay en nuestra aldea, ni en los contornos della, persona, ni en la campaña, bosque, prado, fuente o río, que de sus encendidos y honestos amores no tengan entera noticia.

-Deja por agora, Teolinda -dijo Florisa-, de alabarnos estos pastores, que más nos importa escuchar lo que vienen cantando, pues no menor gracia me parece que tienen en la voz que en la música de los instrumentos.

-Pues ¿qué diréis -replicó Teolinda-cuando veáis que a todo eso sobrepuja la excelencia de su poesía, la cual es de manera que al uno ya le ha dado renombre de «divino» y al otro de «más que humano»?

Estando en estas razones las pastoras, vieron que por la ladera del valle por donde ellas mismas iban, se descubrían dos pastores de gallarda dispusición y estremado brío, de poca más edad el uno que el otro; tan bien vestidos, aunque pastorilmente, que más parecían en su talle y apostura bizarros cortesanos que serranos ganaderos. Traía cada uno un bien tallado pellico de blanca y finísima lana, guarnecidos de leonado y pardo, colores a quien más sus pastoras eran aficionadas; pendían de sus hombros sendos zurrone, no menos vistosos y adornados que los pellicos; venían de verde laurel y fresca yerba coronados, con los retorcidos cayados debajo del brazo puestos. No traían compañía alguna, y tan embebecidos en su música venían, que estuvieron gran espacio sin ver a las pastoras, que por la misma ladera iban caminando, no poco admiradas del gentil donaire y gracia de los pastores; los cuales, con concertadas voces, comenzando el uno y replicando el otro, esto que se sigue cantaban: DAMÓN TIRSI

DAMÓN

Tirsi, qu'el solitario cuerpo alejas,
con atrevido paso, aunque forzoso,
de aquella luz con quien el alma dejas:
¿cómo en son no te dueles doloroso, pues hay tanta razón para quejarte 5
del fiero turbador de tu reposo?

TIRSI

Damón, si el cuerpo miserable parte sin la mitad del alma en la partida, dejando della la más alta parte, ¿de qué virtud o ser será movida 10
mi lengua, que por muerta ya la cuento,
pues con el alma se quedó la vida?
Y, aunque muestro que veo, oigo y siento, fantasma soy por el amor formada, que con sola esperanza me sustento. 15

DAMÓN

¡Oh Tirsi venturoso, y qué envidiada es tu suerte de mí con causa justa,
por ser de las de amor más estremada!
A ti sola la ausencia te disgusta,

y tienes el arrimo de esperanza 20
con quien el alma en sus desdichas gusta.
Pero, ¡ay de mí!, que adonde voy me alcanza la fría mano del temor esquivo
y del desdén la rigurosa lanza.
Ten la vida por muerta, aunque más viva 25
se te muestre, pastor; que es cual la vela, que cuando muere, más su luz aviva.
Ni con el tiempo que ligero vuela, ni con los medios que el ausencia ofrece, mi alma fatigada se consuela. 30

TIRSI

El firme y puro amor jamás descrece
en el discurso de la ausencia amarga;
antes en fe de la memoria crece.
Así que, en el ausencia, corta o larga,
no vee remedio el amador perfecto 35
de dar alivio a la amorosa carga.
Que la memoria puesta en el objeto que amor puso en el alma, representa
la amada imagen viva al intelecto.
Y allí en blando silencio le da cuenta 40
de su bien o su mal, según la mira amorosa, o de amor libre y esenta.

Y si ves que mi alma no sospira,
es porque veo a Fili acá en mi pecho,
de modo que a cantar me llama y tira. 45

DAMÓN

Si en el hermoso rostro algún despecho
vieras de Fili, cuando te partiste
del bien que así te tiene satisfecho, yo sé, discreto Tirsi, que tan triste
vinieras como yo cuitado vengo, 50
que vi al contrario de lo que tú viste.

TIRSI

Damón, con lo que he dicho me entretengo, y el extremo del mal de ausencia tiempo, y alegre voy, si voy, si quedo o vengo.
Que aquella que nació por vivo ejemplo 55
de la inmortal belleza acá en el suelo,

digna de mármol, de corona y templo,
con su rara virtud y honesto celo
así los ojos codiciosos ciega, que de ningún contrario me recelo. 60
La estrecha sujeción que no le niega
mi alma al alma suya, el alto intento,
que sólo en la adorar para y sosiega,
el tener deste amor conocimiento
Fili, y corresponder a fe tan pura, 65

destierran el dolor, traen el contento.

DAMÓN

¡Dichoso Tirsi, Tirsi con ventura, de la cual goces siglos prolongados
en amoroso gusto, en paz segura!
Yo, a quien los cortos implacables hados 70 trujeron a un estado tan incierto,
pobre en el merecer, rico en cuidados,
bien es que muera; pues, estando muerto, no temeré a Amarili rigurosa, ni del ingrato amor el desconcierto. 75
¡Oh más que el cielo, oh más que el sol hermosa, y para mí más dura que un diamante,
presta a mi mal y al bien muy perezosa!
¿Cuál ábrego, cuál cierzo, cuál levante
te sopló de aspereza, que así ordenas 80
que huiga el paso y no te esté delante?
Yo moriré, pastora, en las ajenas
tierras, pues tú lo mandas, condenado
a hierros, muertes, yugos y cadenas.

TIRSI

Pues con tantas ventajas te ha dotado, 85
Damón amigo, el piadoso cielo

de un ingenio tan vivo y levantado, tiempla con él el llanto, tiempla el duelo, considerando bien que no contino
nos quema el sol ni nos enfría el yelo. 90
Quiero decir, que no sigue un camino
siempre con pasos llanos reposados para darnos el bien nuestro destino;
que alguna vez, por trances no pensados, lejos, al parecer, de gusto y gloria, 95
nos lleva a mil contentos regalados.
Revuelve, dulce amigo, la memoria por los honestos gustos que algún tiempo amor te dio por prendas de victoria;
y si es posible, busca un pasatiempo 100 que al alma engañe, en tanto que se pasa este desamorado airado tiempo.

DAMÓN

Al yelo que por términos me abrasa,
y al fuego que sin término me yela, ¿quién le pondrá, pastor, término o tasa? 105
En vano cansa, en vano se desvela
el desfavorecido que procura
a su gusto cortar de amor la tela, que si sobra en amor, falta en ventura.

Aquí cesó el estremado canto de los agraciados pastores, pero no el gusto que las pastoras habían recibido en escucharle; antes quisieran que tan presto no se acabara, por ser de aquellos que no todas veces suelen oírse. A esta sazón, los dos gallardos pastores encaminaban sus pasos hacia donde las pastoras estaban, de que pesó a Teolinda, porque temió ser dellos conocida; y por esta causa rogó a Galatea que de aquel lugar se desviasen. Ella lo hizo, y ellos pasaron, y, al pasar, oyó Galatea que Tirsi a Damón decía: -Estas riberas, amigo Damón, son en las que la hermosa Galatea apascienta su ganado, y adonde trae el suyo el enamorado Elicio, íntimo y particular amigo tuyo, a quien dé la ventura tal suceso en sus amores, cuanto merescen sus honestos y buenos deseos. Yo ha muchos días que no sé en qué términos le trae su suerte; pero, según he oído decir de la recatada condición de la discreta Galatea, por quien él muere, temo que más aína debe de estar quejoso que satisfecho.

-No me maravillaría yo deso -respondió Damón-, porque con cuantas gracias

y particulares dones que el cielo enriqueció a Galatea, al fin fin la hizo mujer, en cuyo frágil sujeto no se halla todas veces el conocimiento que se debe, y el que ha menester el que por ellas lo menos que aventura es la vida. Lo que yo he oído decir de los amores de Elicio, es que él adora a Galatea sin salir del término que a su honestidad se debe, y que la discreción de Galatea es tanta, que no da muestras de querer ni de aborrecer a Elicio. Y así, debe de andar el desdichado sujeto a mil contrarios accidentes, esperando en el tiempo y la fortuna, medios harto perdidos, que le alarguen o acorten la vida, de los cuales está más cierto el acortarla que el entretenerla.

Hasta aquí pudo oír Galatea de lo que della y de Elicio los pastores tratando iban, de que no recibió poco contento, por entender que lo que la fama de sus cosas publicaba era lo que a su limpia intención se debía. Y, desde aquel punto, determinó de no hacer por Elicio cosa que diese ocasión a que la fama no saliese verdadera en lo que de sus pensamientos publicaba. A este tiempo, los dos bizarros pastores, con vagarosos pasos, poco a poco hacia el aldea se encaminaban, con deseo de hallarse a las bodas del venturoso pastor Daranio, que con Silveria «de los verdes ojos» se casaba. Y ésta fue una de las causas por que ellos habían dejado sus rebaños y al lugar de Galatea se venían. Pero, ya que les faltaba poco del camino, a la mano derecha dél sintieron el son de un rabel que acordada y suavemente sonaba; y parándose Damón, trabó a Tirsi del brazo, diciéndole: -Espera y escucha un poco, Tirsi, que si los oídos no me mienten, el son que a ellos llega es del rabel de mi buen amigo Elicio, a quien dio naturaleza tanta gracia en muchas y diversas habilidades, cuanto las oirás si le escuchas y conocerás si le tratas.

-No creas, Damón -respondió Tirsi-, que hasta agora estoy por conocer las buenas partes de Elicio, que días ha que la fama me las tiene bien manifiestas. Pero calla agora, y escuchemos si canta alguna cosa que del estado de su vida nos dé algún manifiesto indicio.

-Bien dices -replicó Damón-, mas será menester, para que mejor le oigamos, que nos lleguemos por entre estas ramas, de modo que, sin ser vistos dél, de más cerca le escuchemos.

Hiciéronlo así, y pusiéronse en parte tan buena que ninguna palabra que Elicio dijo o cantó dejó de ser de ellos oída, y aun notada. Estaba Elicio en compañía de su amigo Erastro, de quien pocas veces se apartaba por el entretenimiento y gusto que de su buena conversación recibía, y todos o los más ratos del día en cantar y tañer se les pasaba. Y, a este punto, tocando su rabel Elicio y su zampoña Erastro, a estos versos dio principio Elicio:

ELICIO

Rendido a un amoroso pensamiento,
con mi dolor contento,
sin esperar más gloria,

sigo la que persigue mi memoria,
porque contino en ella se presenta 5
de los lazos de amor libre y esenta.

Con los ojos del alma aun no es posible
ver el rostro apacible
de la enemiga mía,
gloria y honor de cuanto el cielo cría; 10
y los del cuerpo quedan, sólo en vella,
ciegos por haber visto el sol en ella.

¡Oh dura servidumbre, aunque gustosa!
¡Oh mano poderosa
de Amor, que así pudiste 15
quitarme, ingrato, el bien que prometiste de hacerme, cuando libre me burlaba de ti, del arco tuyo y de tu aljaba!

¡Cuánta belleza, cuánta blanca mano
me mostraste, tirano! 20 ¡Cuánto te fatigaste
primero que a mi cuello el lazo echaste!
Y aun quedaras vencido en la pelea,
si no hubiera en el mundo Galatea.

Ella fue sola la que sola pudo 25
rendir el golpe crudo

el corazón esento,
y avasallar el libre pensamiento,
el cual, si a su querer no se rindiera,
por de mármol o acero le tuviera. 30

¿Qué libertad puede mostrar su fuero
ante el rostro severo,
y más quel sol hermoso,
de la que turba y cansa mi reposo?
¡Ay rostro, que en el suelo 35
descubres cuanto bien encierra el cielo!

¿Cómo pudo juntar naturaleza
tal rigor y aspereza
con tanta hermosura,
tanto valor y condición tan dura? 40
Mas mi dicha consiente
en mi daño juntar lo diferente.

Esle tan fácil a mi corta suerte
ver con la amarga muerte
junta la dulce vida, 45
y estar su mal a do su bien se anida,
que entre contrarios veo
que mengua la esperanza y no el deseo.

No cantó más el enamorado pastor, ni quisieron más detenerse Tirsi y Damón; antes, haciendo de sí gallarda e improvisa muestra, hacia donde estaba Elicio se fueron; el cual, como los vio, conociendo a su amigo Damón, con increíble alegría le salió a rescebir, diciéndole: -¿Qué ventura ha ordenado, discreto Damón, que la des tan buena con tu presencia a estas riberas, que grandes tiempos ha que te desean?

-No puede ser sino buena -respondió Damón-, pues me ha traído a verte, ¡oh Elicio!, cosa que yo estimo en tanto, cuanto es el deseo que dello tenía, y la larga ausencia y la amistad que te tengo me obligaba. Pero si por alguna cosa puedes decir lo que has dicho, es porque tienes delante al famoso Tirsi, gloria y honor del castellano suelo.

Cuando Elicio oyó decir que aquél era Tirsi, dél solamente por fama conocido, rescibiéndole con mucha cortesía, le dijo: -Bien conforma tu agradable semblante, nombrado Tirsi, con lo que de tu valor y discreción en las cercanas y apartadas tierras la parlera fama pregona. Y así, a mí, a quien tus escriptos han admirado e inclinado a desear conocerte y servirte, puedes, de hoy más, tener y tratar como verdadero amigo.

-Es tan conocido lo que yo gano en eso -respondió Tirsi-, que en vano pregonaría la fama lo que la afición que me tienes te hace decir que de mí pregonas, si no conociese la merced que me haces en querer ponerme en el número de tus amigos; y, porque entre los que lo son las palabras de comedimiento han de ser excusadas, cesen las nuestras en este caso, y den las obras testimonio de nuestras voluntades.

-La mía será contino de servirte -replicó Elicio-, como lo verás, ¡oh Tirsi!, si el tiempo o la fortuna me ponen en estado que valga algo para ello; porque el que agora tengo, puesto que no le trocaría con otro de mayores ventajas, es tal, que apenas me deja con libertad de ofrecer el deseo.

-Tiniendo como tienes el tuyo en lugar tan alto -dijo Damón-, por locura tendría procurar bajarle a cosa que menos fuese. Y así, amigo Elicio, no digas mal del estado en que te hallas, porque yo te prometo que, cuando se comparase con el mío, hallaría yo ocasión de tenerte más envidia que lástima.

-Bien parece, Damón -dijo Elicio-, que ha muchos días que faltas destas riberas, pues no sabes lo que en ellas amor me hace sentir; y si esto no es, no debes conocer ni tener experiencia de la condición de Galatea; que si della tuvieses noticia, trocarías en lástima la envidia que de mí tendrías.

-Quien ha gustado de la condición de Amarili, ¿qué cosa nueva puede esperar de la de Galatea? -respondió Damón.

-Si la estada tuya en estas riberas -replicó Elicio- fuere tan larga como yo deseo, tú, Damón, conocerás y verás en ella, y oirás en otros, cómo andan en igual balanza su crueldad y gentileza: estremos que acaban la vida al que su desventura trujo a términos de adorarla.

-En las riberas de nuestro Henares -dijo a esta sazón Tirsi- más fama tiene Galatea de hermosa que de cruel; pero, sobre todo, se dice que es discreta; y si esta es la verdad, como lo debe ser, de su discreción nasce conocerse, y de conocerse estimarse, y de estimarse no querer perderse, y del no querer perderse viene el no querer contentarte; y viendo tú, Elicio, cuán mal corresponde a tus deseos, das nombre de crueldad a lo que deberías llamar honroso recato; y no me maravillo, que, en fin, es condición propia de los enamorados poco favorecidos.

-Razón tendrías en lo que has dicho, ¡oh Tirsi! -replicó Elicio-, cuando mis deseos se desviarán del camino que a su honra y honestidad conviene; pero si van tan medidos como a su valor y crédito se debe, ¿de qué sirve tanto desdén, tan amargas y desabridas respuestas, y tan a la clara esconder el rostro al que tiene puesta toda su gloria en sólo verle?

-¡Ay, Tirsi, Tirsi! -respondió Elicio-, y cómo te debe tener el amor puesto en lo alto de sus contentos, pues con tan sosegado espíritu hablas de sus efectos. No sé yo cómo viene bien lo que tú agora dices con lo que un tiempo decías cuando cantabas:

«¡Ay, de cuán ricas esperanzas vengo
al deseo más pobre y encogido!»;

con lo demás que a esto añadiste.

Hasta este punto había estado callando Erastro, mirando lo que entre los pastores pasaba, admirado de ver su gentil donaire y apostura, con las muestras que cada uno daba de la mucha discreción que tenía. Pero, viendo que, de lance en lance, a razonar de casos de amor se habían reducido, como aquél que tan experimentado en ellos estaba, rompió el silencio y dijo: -Bien creo, discretos pastores, que la larga experiencia os habrá mostrado que no se puede reducir a continuado término la condición de los enamorados corazones, los cuales, como se gobiernan por voluntad ajena, a mil contrarios accidentes están sujetos. Y así, tú, famoso Tirsi, no tienes de qué maravillarte de lo que Elicio ha dicho, ni él tampoco de lo que tú dices, ni traer por ejemplo aquello que él dice que cantabas; ni menos lo que yo sé que cantaste cuando dijiste:

«La amarillez y la flaqueza mía»;

donde claramente mostrabas el afligido estado que entonces poseías; porque de allí a poco llegaron a nuestras cabañas las nuevas de tu contento, solemnizadas en aquellos versos tan nombrados tuyos, que si mal no me acuerdo comenzaban:

«Sale el aurora y de su fértil manto»;

por do claro se conoce la diferencia que hay de tiempos a tiempos, y cómo con ellos suele mudar amor los estados, haciendo que hoy se ría el que ayer lloraba y que mañana llore el que hoy ríe. Y, por tener yo tan conocida esta su condición, no puede la aspereza y desdén zahareño de Galatea acabar de derribar mis esperanzas, puesto que yo no espero della otra cosa si no es que se contente de que yo la quiera.

-El que no esperase buen suceso de un tan enamorado y medido deseo como el que has mostrado, ¡oh pastor! -respondió Damón-, renombre más que de desesperado merescía. Por cierto que es gran cosa la que de Galatea pretendes. Pero dime, pastor, así ella te la conceda: ¿es posible que tan a regla tienes tu deseo, que no se adelanta a desear más de lo que has dicho?

-Bien puedes creerle, amigo Damón -dijo Elicio-, porque el valor de Galatea no da lugar a que della otra cosa se desee ni se espere; y aun ésta es tan difícil de obtenerse, que a veces a Erastro se entibia la esperanza y a mí se enfriaba, de manera que él tiene por cierto, y yo por averiguado, que primero ha de llegar la muerte que el cumplimiento della. Mas, porque no es razón recibir tan honrados huéspedes con los amargos cuentos de nuestras miserias, quédense ellas aquí y recojámonos al aldea, donde descansaréis del pesado trabajo del camino, y con más sosiego, si dello gustáredes, entenderéis el desasosiego nuestro.

Holgaron todos de acomodarse a la voluntad de Elicio, el cual y Erastro, recogiendo sus ganados, puesto que era algunas horas antes de lo acostumbrado, en compañía de los dos pastores, hablando en diversas cosas, aunque todas enamoradas, hacia el aldea se encaminaron. Mas, como todo el pasatiempo de Erastro era tañer y cantar, así por esto como por el deseo que tenía de saber si los dos nuevos pastores lo hacían tan bien como dellos se sonaba, por moverlos y convidarlos a que otro tanto hiciesen, rogó a Elicio que su rabel tocase, al son del cual así comenzó a cantar:

ERASTRO

Ante la luz de unos serenos ojos que al sol dan luz con que da luz al suelo, mi alma así se enciende, que recelo que presto tendrá muerte sus despojos.

Con la luz se conciertan los manojos 5
de aquellos rayos del señor de Delo:
tales son los cabellos de quien suelo
adorar su beldad puesto de hinojos.

¡Oh clara luz, oh rayos del sol claro, antes el mismo sol! De vos espero 10
sólo que consintáis que Erastro os quiera.

Si en esto el cielo se me muestra avaro, antes que acabe del dolor que muero, haced, ¡oh rayos!, que de un rayo muera.

No les pareció mal el soneto a los pastores, ni les descontentó la voz de Erastro; que, puesto que no era de las muy estremadas, no dejaba de ser de las acordadas. Y luego Elicio, movido del ejemplo de Erastro, le hizo que tocase su zampoña, al son de la cual este soneto dijo:

ELICIO

¡Ay, que al alto designio que se cría en mi amoroso firme pensamiento, contradicen el cielo, el fuego, el viento, la agua, la tierra y la enemiga mía!

Contrarios son de quien temer debería, 5
y abandonar la empresa el sano intento;
mas, ¿quién podrá estorbar lo qu'el violento hado implacable quiere, amor porfía?

El alto cielo, amor, el viento, el fuego, la agua, la tierra y mi enemiga bella, 10 cada cual con fuerza, y con mi hado, mi bien estorbe, esparza, abrase y luego deshaga mi esperanza; que, aun sin

ella, imposible es dejar lo comenzado.

En acabando Elicio, luego Damón, al son de la misma zampoña de Erastro, desta manera comenzó a cantar: DAMÓN

Más blando fui que no la blanda cera, cuando imprimí en mi alma la figura
de la bella Amarili, esquiva y dura
cual duro mármol o silvestre fiera.

Amor me puso entonces en la esfera 5
más alta de su bien y su ventura;
y agora temo que la sepultura
ha de acabar mi presunción primera.

Arrimóse el amor a la esperanza
cual vid al olmo y fue subiendo apriesa; 10
mas faltóle el humor, y cesó el vuelo:

no el de mis ojos, que por larga usanza, Fortuna sabe bien que jamás cesa de dar tributo al rostro, al pecho, al suelo.

Acabó Damón y comenzó Tirsi, al son de los instrumentos de los tres pastores, a cantar este soneto:

TIRSI

Por medio de los filos de la muerte
rompió mi fe, y a tal punto he llegado, que no envidio el más alto y rico estado que encierra humana venturosa suerte.

Todo este bien nació de sólo verte, 5
hermosa Fili, ¡oh Fili!, a quien el hado dotó de un ser tan raro y estremado, que en risa el llanto, el mal en bien convierte.

Como amansa el rigor de la sentencia
si el condenado el rostro del rey mira, 10
y es ley que nunca tuerce su derecho,

así ante tu hermosísima presencia
la muerte huye, el daño se retira,
y deja en su lugar vida y provecho.

Al acabar de Tirsi, todos los instrumentos de los pastores formaron tan agradable música, que causaba grande contento a quien la oía; y más, ayudándoles de entre las espesas ramas mil suertes de pintados pajarillos que, con divina armonía, parece que como a coros les iban respondiendo. Desta suerte habían caminado un trecho, cuando llegaron a una antigua ermita que en la ladera de un montecillo estaba, no tan desviada del camino que dejase de oírse el son de una arpa que dentro, al parecer, tañían; el cual oído por Erastro, dijo: - Deteneos, pastores, que según pienso, hoy oiremos todos lo que ha días que yo deseo oír, que es la voz de un agraciado mozo que dentro de aquella ermita habrá doce o catorce días se ha venido a vivir una vida más áspera de lo que a mí me parece que puedan llevar sus pocos años, y algunas veces que por aquí he pasado, he sentido tocar una arpa y entonar una voz tan suave que me ha puesto en grandísimo deseo de escucharla; pero siempre he llegado a punto que él le ponía en su canto. Y, aunque con hablarle he procurado hacerme su amigo, ofreciéndole a su servicio todo lo que valgo y puedo, nunca he podido acabar con él que me descubra quién es y las causas que le han movido a venir de tan pocos años a ponerse en tanta soledad y estrechez.

Lo que Erastro decía del mozo y nuevo ermitaño puso en los pastores el mismo deseo de conocerle que él tenía. Y así, acordaron de llegarse a la ermita de modo que, sin ser sentidos, pudiesen entender lo que cantaba antes que llegasen a hablarle; y, haciéndolo así, les sucedió tan bien, que se pusieron de parte donde, sin ser vistos ni sentidos, oyeron que al son de la arpa, el que estaba dentro semejantes versos decía: Si han sido el cielo, amor y la fortuna, sin ser de mí ofendidos, contentos de ponerme en tal estado,

en vano al aire envió mis gemidos,
en vano hasta la luna 5
se vio mi pensamiento levantado.
¡Oh riguroso hado!,
¡por cuán estrañas desusadas vías
mis dulces alegrías
han venido a parar en tal extremo, 10
que estoy muriendo y aun la vida temo!

Contra mí mismo estoy ardiendo en ira,
por ver que sufro tanto
sin romper este pecho, y dar al viento esta alma, qu'en mitad del duro llanto 15
al corazón retira
las últimas reliquias del aliento;
y allí de nuevo siento
que acude la esperanza a darme fuerza,
y, aunque fingida, a mi vivir es fuerza, 20
y no es piedad del cielo, porque ordena
a larga vida dar más larga pena.

Del caro amigo el lastimado pecho
enterneció este mío,

y la empresa difícil tomé a cargo. 25
¡Oh discreto fingir de desvarío!
¡Oh nunca visto hecho!
¡Oh caso gustosísimo y amargo!
¡Cuán dadivoso y largo
amor se mostró por bien ajeno, 30
y cuán avaro y lleno
de temor y lealtad para conmigo!
Pero a más nos obliga un firme amigo.

Injustas pagas a voluntades justas
a cada paso vemos, 35
dadas por mano de fortuna esquivas;
y de ti, falso amor, de quien sabemos
que te alegras y gustas
de que un firme amador muriendo viva, abrasadora y viva 40
llama se encienda en tus ligeras alas,
y las buenas y malas
saetas en ceniza se resuelvan,
o al dispararlas, contra ti se vuelvan.

¿Por qué camino, con qué fraude y mañas, 45
por qué extraño rodeo
entera posesión de mí tomaste?
Y ¿cómo en mi piadoso alto deseo
y en mis limpias entrañas
la sana voluntad, falso, trocaste? 50 ¿Juicio habrá que baste
a llevar en paciencia el ver, perjurio, que entré libre y seguro
a tratar de tus glorias y tus penas,
y agora al cuello siento tus cadenas? 55

Mas no de ti, sino de mí sería
razón que me quejase,
que a tu fuego no hice resistencia.
Yo me entregué, yo hice que soprase
el viento que dormía 60

de la ocasión con furia y violencia.
Justísima sentencia
ha dado el cielo contra mí que muera, aunque sólo se espera
de mi infelice hado y desventura 65
que no acabe mi mal la sepultura.

¡Oh amigo dulce, oh dulce mi enemiga,
Timbrio y Nísida bella,
dichosos juntamente y desdichados!
¿Cuál dura, inicua, inexorable estrella, 70
de mi daño enemiga;
cuál fuerza injusta de implacables hados nos tiene así apartados?
¡Oh miserable, humana, frágil suerte!
¡Cuán presto se convierte 75
en súbito pesar un alegría,
y sigue oscura noche al claro día!

De la inestabilidad, de la mudanza
de las humanas cosas, ¿cuál será el atrevido que se fíe? 80
Con alas vuela el tiempo presurosas,
y tras sí la esperanza
se lleva del que llora y del que ríe;
y ya que el cielo envíe
su favor, sólo sirve al que con celo 85
sancto levanta al cielo
el alma, en fuego de su amor deshecha,
y al que no, más le daña que aprovecha.

Yo, como puedo, buen señor, levanto
la una y otra palma, 90
los ojos, la intención al cielo sancto, por quien espera el alma
ver vuelto en risa su continuo llanto.

Con un profundo suspiro dio fin al lastimado canto el recogido mozo que dentro de la ermita estaba. Y, sintiendo los pastores que adelante no procedía, sin detenerse más, todos juntos entraron en ella, donde vieron a un cabo, sentado encima de una dura piedra, a un dispuesto y agraciado mancebo, al parecer de edad de veinte y dos años, vestido de un tosco buriel con los pies descalzos y una áspera sogá ceñida al cuerpo, que de cordón le servía. Estaba con la cabeza inclinada a un lado, y la una mano asida de la parte de la túnica que sobre el corazón caía, y el otro brazo a la otra parte flojamente derribado. Y, por verle desta manera, y por no haber hecho movimiento al entrar de los pastores, claramente conocieron que desmayado estaba, como era la verdad, porque la profunda imaginación de sus miserias, muchas veces a semejante término le conducía. Llegóse a él Erastro, y, trabándole recio del brazo, le hizo volver en sí, aunque tan desacordado que parecía que de un pesado sueño recordaba, las cuales muestras de dolor no pequeño le causaron a los que le veían, y luego Erastro le dijo: -¿Qué es esto, señor? ¿Qué es lo que siente vuestro fatigado pecho? No dejéis de decirlo, que presentes tenéis quien no rehusará fatiga alguna por dar remedio a la vuestra.

-No son esos -respondió el mancebo con voz algo desmayada-los primeros ofrecimientos, comedido pastor, que me has hecho, ni aun serían los últimos que yo acertase a servir si pudiese; pero hame traído la Fortuna a términos, que ni ellos pueden aprovecharme ni yo satisfacerlos más de con el deseo. Éste puedes tomar en cuenta del bueno que me ofreces; y si otra cosa de mí deseas saber, el tiempo, que no encubre nada, te dirá más de lo que yo quisiera.

-Si al tiempo dejás que me satisfaga de lo que me dices -respondió Erastro-poco debe agradecerse tal paga, pues él, a pesar nuestro, echa en las plazas lo más secreto de nuestros corazones.

A este tiempo, todos los demás pastores le rogaron que la ocasión de su tristeza les contase, especialmente Tirsi, que con eficaces razones le persuadió, y dio a entender que no hay mal en esta vida que con ella su remedio no se alcanzase, si ya la muerte, atajadora de los humanos discursos, no se opone a ellos. Y a esto añadió otras palabras que al obstinado mozo movieron a que con la suyas hiciese satisfechos a todos de lo que dél saber deseaban. Y así, les dijo: -Puesto que a mí me fuera mejor, ¡oh agradable compañía!, vivir lo poco que me queda de vida sin ella, y haberme recogido a mayor soledad de la que tengo, todavía, por no mostrarme esquivo a la voluntad que me habéis mostrado, determino de contaros todo aquello que entiendo bastará, y los términos por donde la mudable Fortuna me ha traído al estrecho estado en que me hallo; pero, porque me parece que es ya algo tarde, y, según mis desventuras son muchas, sería posible que antes de contároslas la noche sobreviniese, será bien que todos juntos a la aldea nos vamos, pues a mí no me hace otra descomodidad de hacer el camino esta noche que mañana tenía determinado, y esto me es forzoso, pues de vuestra aldea soy proveído de lo que he menester para mi sustento, y por el camino, como mejor pudiere, os haré ciertos de mis desgracias.

A todos pareció bien lo que el mozo ermitaño decía, y, puniéndole en medio dellos, con vagarosos pasos tornaron a seguir el camino de la aldea, y luego el lastimado ermitaño, con muestras de mucho dolor, desta manera al cuento de sus miserias dio principio: -«En la antigua y famosa ciudad de Jerez, cuyos moradores de Minerva y Marte son favorecidos, nació Timbrio, un valeroso caballero, del cual, si sus virtudes y generosidad de ánimo hubiese de contar, a difícil empresa me pondría. Basta saber que, no sé si por la mucha bondad suya o por la fuerza de las estrellas, que a ello me inclinaban, yo procuré, por todas las vías que pude, serle particular amigo, y fueme el cielo en esto tan favorable que, casi olvidándose a los que nos conocían el nombre de Timbrio y el de Silerio -que es el mío-, solamente los dos amigos nos llamaban, haciendo nosotros, con nuestra continua conversación y amigables obras, que tal opinión no fuese vana.

»Desta suerte los dos, con increíble gusto y contento, los mozos años pasábamos, ora en el campo en el ejercicio de la caza, ora en la ciudad en el del honroso Marte entreteniéndonos, hasta que un día, de los muchos aciagos que el enemigo tiempo en el discurso de mi vida me ha hecho ver, le sucedió a mi amigo Timbrio una pesada pendencia con un poderoso caballero, vecino de la misma ciudad. Llegó a término la questión que el caballero quedó lastimado en la honra, y a Timbrio fue forzoso ausentarse, por dar lugar a que la furiosa discordia cesase que entre los dos parentales se comenzaba a encender, dejando escrita una carta a su enemigo, dándole aviso que le hallaría en Italia, en la ciudad de Milán o de Nápoles, todas las veces que, como caballero, de su agravio satisfacerse quisiese. Con esto cesaron los bandos entre los parientes de entrambos, y ordenóse que a igual y mortal batalla el ofendido caballero, que Pransiles se llamaba, a Timbrio desafiase, y que, en hallando campo seguro para la batalla, se avisase a Timbrio. Ordenó más mi suerte: que al tiempo que esto sucedió yo me hallase tan falto de salud, que apenas del lecho levantarme podía, y por esta ocasión se me pasó la de seguir a mi amigo dondequiera que fuese, el cual al partir se despidió de mí con no pequeño descontento, encargándome que, en cobrando fuerzas, le buscase, que en la ciudad de Nápoles le hallaría. Y así, se partió, dejándome con más pena que yo sabré agora significaros. Mas, al cabo de pocos días, pudiendo en mí más el deseo que de verle tenía, que no la flaqueza que me fatigaba, me puse luego en camino; y, para que con más brevedad y más seguro le hiciese, la ventura me ofreció la comodidad de cuatro galeras que en la famosa Isla de Cádiz, de partida para Italia, prestas y aparejadas estaban. Embarquéme en una dellas, y, con próspero viento, en tiempo breve, las riberas catalanas descubrimos; y, habiendo dado fondo en un puerto dellas, yo, que algo fatigado de la mar venía, asegurado primero de que por aquella noche las galeras de allí no partirían, me desembarqué con solo un amigo y un criado mío. Y no creo que debía de ser la media noche, cuando los marineros y los que a cargo las galeras llevaban, viendo que la serenidad del cielo calma o próspero viento señalaba, por no perder la buena ocasión que se les ofrecía, a la segunda guardia hicieron la señal de partida, y, zarpando las áncoras, dieron con mucha presteza los remos al sesgo mar y las velas al sosegado viento. Y fue, como digo, con tanta diligencia hecho que, por mucha que yo puse para volver a embarcarme, no fui a tiempo; y así, me hube de quedar en la marina con el enojo que podrá considerar quien por semejantes y ordinarios casos habrá pasado, porque quedaba mal acomodado de todas las cosas que para seguir mi viaje por tierra eran necesarias. Mas, considerando que, de quedarme allí, poco remedio se esperaba, acordé de volverme a Barcelona, adonde, como ciudad más grande, podría ser hallar quien me acomodase de lo que me faltaba, correspondiendo a Jerez o a Sevilla con la paga dello.

»Amanecióme en estos pensamientos, y, con determinación de ponerlos en efecto, aguardaba a que el día más se levantase; y, estando a punto de partirme, sentí un grande estruendo por la tierra y que toda la gente corría a la calle más principal del pueblo, y, preguntando a uno qué era aquello, me respondió: “Llegaos, señor, aquella esquina, que a voz de pregonero sabréis lo que deseáis”. Hícelo así, y lo primero en que puse los ojos fue en un alto crucifijo y en mucho tumulto de gente, señales que alguno sentenciado a muerte entre ellos venía, todo lo cual me certificó la voz del pregonero, que declaraba que, por haber sido salteador y bandolero, la justicia mandaba ahorcar un hombre, que, como a mí llegó, luego conocí que era el mi buen amigo Timbrio, el cual venía a pie, con unas esposas a las manos y una soga a la garganta, los ojos enclavados en el crucifijo que delante llevaba, diciendo y protestando a los clérigos que con él iban, que por la estrecha cuenta que pensaba dar en breves horas al verdadero Dios, cuyo retrato delante los ojos tenía, que nunca en todo el discurso de su vida había cometido cosa por donde públicamente mereciese recibir tan ignominiosa muerte; y que a todos rogaba rogasen a los jueces le diesen algún término para probar cuán inocente estaba de lo que le acusaban.

»Considérese aquí, si tanto la consideración pudo levantarse, cuál quedaría yo al horrendo espectáculo que a los ojos se me ofrecía. No sé qué os diga, señores, sino que quedé tan embelesado y fuera de mí, y de tal modo quedé ajeno de todos mis sentidos, que una estatua de mármol debiera de parecer a quien en aquel punto me miraba. Pero ya que el confuso rumor del pueblo, las levantadas voces de los pregoneros, las lastimosas palabras de Timbrio y las consoladoras de los sacerdotes, y el verdadero conocimiento de mi buen amigo, me hubieron

vuelto de aquel embelesamiento primero, y la alterada sangre acudió a dar ayuda al desmayado corazón, y despertado en él la cólera debida a la notoria venganza de la ofensa de Timbrio, sin mirar al peligro que me ponía, sino al de Timbrio, por ver si podía librarle, o seguirle hasta la otra vida, con poco temor de perder la mía, eché mano a la espada, y con más que ordinaria furia entré por medio de la confusa turba, hasta que llegué adonde Timbrio iba, el cual, no sabiendo si en provecho suyo tantas espadas se habían desenvainado, con perplejo y angustiado ánimo, estaba mirando lo que pasaba, hasta que yo le dije: “¿Adónde está, ¡oh Timbrio!, el esfuerzo de tu valeroso pecho? ¿Qué esperas, o qué aguardas? ¿Por qué no te favoreces de la ocasión presente? Procura, ¡oh verdadero amigo!, salvar tu vida, en tanto que esta mía hace escudo a la sinrazón que, según creo, aquí te es hecha”. Estas palabras mías y el conocerme Timbrio, fue parte para que, olvidado todo temor, rompiese las ataduras o esposas de las manos; mas todo su ardimiento fuera poco si los sacerdotes, de compasión movidos, no ayudaran su deseo, los cuales, tomándole en peso, a pesar de los que estorbarlo querían, se entraron con él en una iglesia que allí junto estaba, dejándome a mí en medio de toda la justicia, que con grande instancia procuraba prenderme, como al fin lo hizo, pues a tantas fuerzas juntas no fue poderosa la sola mía de resistirlas. Y, con más ofensas que, a mi parecer, mi pecado merecía, a la cárcel pública, herido de dos heridas, me llevaron.

»El atrevimiento mío, y el haberse escapado Timbrio, aumentó mi culpa y el enojo en los jueces, los cuales, condenando bien el exceso por mí cometido, pareciéndoles ser justo que yo muriese, y luego luego, la cruel sentencia pronunciaron, y para otro día guardaban la ejecución. Llegó a Timbrio esta triste nueva allá en la iglesia donde estaba, y, según yo después supe, más alteración le dio mi sentencia que le había dado la de su muerte; y, por librarme della, de nuevo se ofrecía a entregarse otra vez en poder de la justicia, pero los sacerdotes le aconsejaron que servía de poco aquello, antes era añadir mal a mal y desgracia a desgracia, pues no sería parte el entregarse él para que yo fuese suelto, pues no lo podía ser sin ser castigado de la culpa cometida. No fueron menester pocas razones para persuadir a Timbrio no se diese a la justicia; pero sosegóse con proponer en su ánimo de hacer otro día por mí lo que yo por él había hecho, por pagarme en la misma moneda, o morir en la demanda. De toda su intención fui avisado por un clérigo que a confesarme vino, con el cual le envié a decir que el mejor remedio que mi desdicha podía tener era que él se salvase, y procurase que, con toda brevedad, el virrey de Barcelona supiese todo el suceso antes que la justicia de aquel pueblo la ejecutase en él. Supe también la causa por que a mi amigo Timbrio llevaban al amargo suplicio, según me contó el mismo sacerdote que os he dicho; y fue que, viniendo Timbrio caminando por el reino de

Cataluña, a la salida de Perpiñán, dieron con él una cantidad de bandoleros, los cuales tenían por señor y cabeza a un valeroso caballero catalán, que por ciertas enemistades andaba en la compañía, como es ya antiguo uso de aquel reino, cuando los enemistados son personas de cuenta, salirse a ella y hacerse todo el mal que pueden, no solamente en las vidas, pero en las haciendas: cosa ajena de toda cristiandad y digna de toda lástima.

»Sucedió, pues, que, al tiempo que los bandoleros estaban ocupados en quitar a Timbrio lo que llevaba, llegó en aquella sazón el señor y caudillo dellos, y como en fin era caballero, no quiso que delante de sus ojos agravio alguno a Timbrio se hiciese; antes, pareciéndole hombre de valor y prendas, le hizo mil cortesés ofrecimientos, rogándole que por aquella noche se quedase con él en un lugar allí cerca, que otro día por la mañana le daría una señal de seguro para que sin temor alguno pudiese seguir su camino hasta salir de aquella provincia. No pudo Timbrio dejar de hacer lo que el cortés caballero le pedía, obligado de las buenas obras dél rescibidas. Fuéronse juntos, y llegaron a un pequeño lugar, donde por los del pueblo alegremente rescebidos fueron. Mas la Fortuna, que hasta entonces con Timbrio se había burlado, ordenó que aquella mesma noche diesen con los bandoleros una compañía de soldados, sólo para este efecto juntada; y, habiéndolos cogido de sobresalto, con facilidad los desbarataron, y, puesto que no pudieron prender al caudillo, prendieron y mataron a otros muchos, y uno de los presos fue Timbrio, a quien tuvieron por un famoso salteador que en aquella compañía andaba; y, según se debe imaginar, sin duda le debía de parecer mucho, pues con atestiguar los demás presos que aquél no era el que pensaban, contando la verdad de todo el caso, pudo tanto la malicia en el pecho de los jueces que, sin más averiguaciones, le sentenciaron a muerte, la cual fuera puesta en efecto si el cielo, favorecedor de los justos intentos, no ordenara que las galeras se fuesen y yo en tierra quedase, para hacer lo que hasta agora os he contado que hice.

»Estábase Timbrio en la iglesia, y yo en la cárcel, ordenando de partirse aquella noche a Barcelona; y yo, que esperando estaba en qué pararía la furia de los ofendidos jueces, cuando con otra mayor desventura suya, Timbrio y yo de la nuestra fuimos librados. Mas, ¡ójala fuera servido el cielo que en mí solo se ejecutara la furia de su ira, con tal que la alzarán de aquel pequeño y desventurado pueblo, que a los filos de mil bárbaras espadas tuvo puesto el miserable cuello! Poco más de media noche sería, hora acomodada a facinorosos insultos, y en la cual la trabajada gente suele entregar los trabajados miembros en brazos del dulce sueño, cuando improvisamente por todo el pueblo se levantó una confusa vocería, diciendo: “¡Al arma, al arma, que turcos hay en tierra!” Los ecos destas tristes voces ¿quién duda que no causaron espanto en los mujeriles

pechos, y aun pusieron confusión en los fuertes ánimos de los varones? No sé qué os diga, señores, sino que en un punto la miserable tierra comenzó a arder con tanta gana, que no parecía sino que las mismas piedras, con que las casas fabricadas estaban, ofrecían acomodada materia al encendido fuego, que todo lo consumía. A la luz de las furiosas llamas se vieron relucir los bárbaros alfanjes y parecerse las blancas tocas de la turca gente, que, encendida, con sigures o hachas de duro acero, las puertas de las casas derribaban, y, entrando en ellas, de cristianos despojos salían cargados. Cuál llevaba la fatigada madre, y cuál el pequeñuelo hijo, que con cansados y débiles gemidos, la madre por el hijo, y el hijo por la madre, preguntaba; y alguno sé que hubo que con sacrílega mano estorbó el cumplimiento de los justos deseos de la casta recién desposada virgen y del esposo desdichado, ante cuyos llorosos ojos quizá vio coger el fruto de que el sin ventura pensaba gozar en tiempo breve. La confusión era tanta, tantos los gritos y mezclas de las voces tan diferentes, que gran espanto ponían. La fiera y endiablada canalla, viendo cuán poca resistencia se les hacía, se atrevieron a entrar en los sagrados templos y poner las descomulgadas manos en las sanctas reliquias, poniendo en el seno el oro con que guarnecidas estaban, y arrojándolas en el suelo con asqueroso menosprecio. Poco le valía al sacerdote su santimonia, y al fraile su retrainimiento, y al viejo sus nevadas canas, y al mozo su juventud gallarda, y al pequeño niño su inocencia simple, que de todos llevaban el saco aquellos descreídos perros; los cuales, después de abrasadas las casas, robado los templos, desflorado las vírgines, muertos los defensores, más cansados que satisfechos de lo hecho, al tiempo que el alba venía, sin impedimento alguno se volvieron a sus bajeles, habiéndolos ya cargado de todo lo mejor que en el pueblo había, dejándole desolado y sin gente, porque toda la más gente se llevaban, y la otra a la montaña se había recogido.

»¿Quién en tan triste espectáculo pudiera tener quedas las manos y enjutos los ojos? Mas, ¡ay!, que está tan llena de miserias nuestra vida, que en tan doloroso suceso como el que os he contado, hubo cristianos corazones que se alegraron; y estos fueron los de aquellos que en la cárcel estaban, que con la desdicha general cobraron la dicha propia, porque, en son de ir a defender el pueblo, rompieron las puertas de la prisión y en libertad se pusieron, procurando cada uno, no de ofender a los contrarios, sino de salvar a sí mismos, entre los cuales yo gocé de la libertad tan caramente adquirida. Y, viendo que no había quien hiciese rostro a los enemigos, por no venir a su poder ni tornar al de la prisión, desamparando el consumido pueblo, con no pequeño dolor de lo que había visto y con el que mis heridas me causaban, seguí a un hombre que me dijo que seguramente me llevaría a un monasterio que en aquellas montañas estaba, donde de mis llagas sería curado, y aun defendido si de nuevo prenderme quisiesen. Seguíle, en fin, como os he dicho, con deseo de saber qué habría hecho la Fortuna de mi amigo Timbrio, el cual, como después supe, con algunas heridas se había escapado y seguido por la montaña otro camino diferente del que yo llevaba; vino a parar al puerto de Rosas, donde estuvo algunos días, procurando saber qué suceso habría sido el mío, y que, en fin, sin saber nuevas algunas, se partió en una nave y con próspero viento llegó a la gran ciudad de Nápoles. Yo volví a Barcelona, y allí me acomodé de lo que menester había; y después, ya sano de mis heridas, torné a seguir mi viaje, y, sin sucederme revés alguno, llegué a Nápoles, donde hallé enfermo a Timbrio; y fue tal el contento que en vernos los dos recibimos, que no me siento con fuerzas para encarecérosle por agora.

»Allí nos dimos cuenta de nuestras vidas y de todo aquello que hasta aquel momento nos había sucedido; pero todo este placer mío se aguaba con el ver a Timbrio no tan bueno como yo quisiera; antes, tan malo, y de una enfermedad tan estraña, que si yo a aquella sazón no llegara, pudiera llegar a tiempo de hacerle las obsequias de su muerte y no solemnizar las alegrías de su vista. Después que él hubo sabido de mí todo lo que quiso, con lágrimas en los ojos, me dijo: “¡Ay, amigo Silerio, y cómo creo que el cielo procura cargar la mano en mis desventuras, para que, dándome la salud por la vuestra, quede yo cada día con más obligación de serviros!” Palabras fueron estas de Timbrio que me enternecieron; mas, por parecerme de comedimientos, tan poco usados entre nosotros, me admiraron. Y, por no cansaros en deciros punto por punto lo que yo le respondí y lo que él más replicó, sólo os diré que el desdichado de Timbrio estaba enamorado de una señora principal de aquella ciudad, cuyos padres eran españoles, aunque ella en Nápoles había nacido. Su nombre era Nísida y su hermosura tanta, que me atrevo a decir que la naturaleza cifró en ella el extremo de sus perfecciones; y andaban tan a una en ella la honestidad y belleza, que lo que la una encendía la otra enfriaba, y los deseos que su gentileza hasta el más subido cielo levantaba, su honesta gravedad hasta lo más bajo de la tierra abatía. A esta causa estaba Timbrio tan pobre de esperanza, cuan rico de pensamientos, y sobre todo falto de salud, y en términos de acabar la vida sin descubrirlos: tal era el temor y reverencia que había cobrado a la hermosa Nísida. Pero, después que tuve bien conocida su enfermedad y hube visto a Nísida, y considerado la calidad y nobleza de sus padres, determiné de posponer por él la hacienda, la vida y la honra, y más si más tuviera y pudiera. Y así, usé de un artificio, el más estraño que hasta hoy se habrá oído ni leído; y fue que acordé de vestirme como truhán y con una guitarra entrarme en casa de Nísida, que por ser, como ya he dicho, sus padres de los principales de la ciudad, de otros muchos truhanes era continuada. Parecióle bien este acuerdo a Timbrio, y resignó luego en las manos de mi industria todo su contento. Hice yo hacer luego muchas y diferentes galas, y, en vistiéndome, comencé a ensayarme en el nuevo oficio delante de Timbrio, que no poco reía de verme tan truhanamente vestido; y, por ver si la habilidad correspondía al hábito, me dijo que, haciendo cuenta que él era un gran príncipe y que yo de nuevo venía a visitarle, le dijese algo. Y si yo no me acuerdo mal, y si vosotros, señores, no os cansáis de escucharme, diréos lo que entonces le canté, con ser la primera vez.»

Todos dijeron que ninguna cosa les daría más contento que saber por estenso todo el suceso de su negocio, y que así, le rogaban que ninguna cosa, por de poco momento que fuese, dejase de contarles.

-Pues esa licencia me dais -dijo el ermitaño-, no quiero dejaros de decir cómo comencé a dar muestras de mi locura; que fue con estos versos que a Timbrio canté, imaginando ser un gran señor a quien los decía:

SILERIO

«De príncipe que en el suelo
va por tan justo nivel, *¿qué se puede esperar dél
que no sean obras del cielo?*

»No se vee en la edad presente, 5 ni se vio en la edad pasada, república gobernada
de príncipe tan prudente.
Y del que mide su cielo
por tan cristiano nivel, 10
*¿qué se puede esperar dél
que no sean obras del cielo?*

»Del que trae por bien ajeno,
sin codiciar más despojos,
misericordia en los ojos 15
y la justicia en el seno;
del que lo más deste suelo
es lo menos que hay en él, *¿qué se puede esperar dél
que no sean obras del cielo?* 20

»La liberal fama vuestra, que hasta'l cielo se levanta,
de que tenéis alma sancta
nos da indicio y clara muestra.
Del que no discrepa un pelo 25
de ser al cielo fiel,
¿qué se puede esperar dél
que no sean obras del cielo?

»Del que con cristiano pecho siempre en el rigor se tarda, 30
y a la justicia le guarda,
con clemencia, su derecho;
de aquel que levanta el vuelo
do ninguno llega a él,
¿qué se puede esperar dél 35
que no sean obras del cielo?

»Estas y otras cosas de más risa y juego canté entonces a Timbrio, procurando acomodar el brío y donaire del cuerpo a que en todo diese muestras de ejercitado truhán; y salí tan bien con ello que en pocos días fui conocido de toda la más gente principal de la ciudad; y la fama del truhán español por toda ella volaba, hasta tanto que ya en casa del padre de Nísida me deseaban ver, el cual deseo les cumpliera yo con mucha facilidad, si de industria no aguardara a ser rogado. Mas, en fin, no me pude excusar que un día de un banquete allá no fuese, donde vi más cerca la justa causa que Timbrio tenía de padecer, y la que el cielo me dio para quitarme el contento todos los días que en esta vida durare. Vi a Nísida, a Nísida vi, para no ver más, ni hay más que ver después de haberla visto. ¡Oh fuerza poderosa de amor, contra quien valen poco las poderosas nuestras! ¿Y es posible que en un punto, en un momento, los reparos y pertrechos de mi lealtad pusieses en términos de dar con todos ellos por tierra? ¡Ay, que si se tardara un poco en socorrerme la consideración de quien yo era, la amistad que a Timbrio debía, el mucho valor de Nísida, el afrentoso hábito en que me hallaba ...; que todo era impedimento a que, con el nuevo y amoroso deseo que en mí había nascido, no nasciese también la esperanza de alcanzarla, que es el arrimo con que el amor camina o vuelve atrás en los enamorados principios! En fin, vi la belleza que os he dicho, y, porque me importaba tanto el verla, siempre procuré granjear el amistad de sus padres y de todos los de su casa, y esto con hacer del gracioso y bien criado, haciendo mi oficio con la mayor discreción y gracia a mí posible. Y, rogándome un caballero que aquel día a la mesa estaba que alguna cosa en loor de la hermosura de Nísida cantase, quiso la ventura que me acordase de unos versos que muchos días antes, para otra ocasión casi semejante, yo había hecho; y, sirviéndome para la presente, los dije; que eran estos:

SILERIO

»Nísida, con quien el cielo
tan liberal se ha mostrado, que en daros a vos, dio al suelo

una imagen y traslado
de cuanto encubre su velo, 5
si él no tuvo más que os dar,
ni vos más que desear,
con facilidad se entiende
que lo posible pretende
quien os pretende loar. 10

»Desa beldad peregrina
la perfección soberana,
que al cielo nos encamina,
pues no es posible la humana,
cante la lengua divina, 15
y diga: bien se conviene
que al alma que en sí contiene
ser tan alto y milagroso,
se le diese el velo hermoso
más qu'el mundo tuvo o tiene. 20

»Tomó del sol los cabellos;
del sesgo cielo, la frente;
la luz de los ojos bellos,
de la estrella más luciente,

que ya no da luz ante ellos. 25

Como quien puede y se atreve,
a la grana y a la nieve
robó las colores bellas,
que lo más perfecto dellas
a tus mejillas se debe. 30

»De marfil y de coral
formó los dientes y labios,
do sale rico caudal
de agudos dichos y sabios,
y armonía celestial. 35
De duro mármol ha hecho
el blanco y hermoso pecho,
y de tal obra ha quedado
tanto el suelo mejorado,
cuanto el cielo satisfecho. 40

»Con estas y otras cosas que entonces canté, quedaron todos tan mis aficionados, especialmente los padres de Nísida, que me ofrecieron todo lo que menester hubiese y me rogaron que ningún día dejase de visitarlos. Y así, sin descubrirse ni imaginarse mi industria, vine a salir con mi primero disignio, que era facilitar la entrada en casa de Nísida, la cual gustaba en extremo de mis desenvolturas. Pero ya que los muchos días y la mucha conversación mía, y la grande amistad que todos los de aquella casa me mostraban, hubieron quitado algunas sombras al demasiado temor que de descubrir mi intento a Nísida tenía, determiné ver a do llegaba la ventura de Timbrio, que sólo de mi solicitud la esperaba. Mas, ¡ay de mí!, que yo estaba entonces más para pedir medicina para mi llaga que salud para la ajena, porque el donaire, belleza, discreción, gravedad de Nísida, habían hecho en mi alma tal efecto, que no estaba en menos extremo de dolor y de amor puesta que la del lastimado Timbrio. A vuestra consideración discreta dejo el imaginar lo que podía sentir un corazón a quien de una parte combatían las leyes de la amistad, y de otra las inviolables de Cupido; porque si las unas le obligaban a no salir de lo que ellas y la razón le pedían, las otras le forzaban que tuviese cuenta con lo que a su contento era obligado.

»Estos sobresaltos y combates me apretaban de manera que, sin procurar la salud ajena, comencé a dudar de la propia y a ponerme tan flaco y amarillo que causaba general compasión a todos los que me miraban; y los que más la mostraban eran los padres de Nísida; y aun ella mesma, con limpias y cristianas entrañas, me rogó muchas veces que la causa de mi enfermedad le dijese, ofreciéndome todo lo necesario para el remedio della. “¡Ay -decía yo entre mí cuando Nísida tales ofrecimientos me hacía-, y con cuánta facilidad, hermosa Nísida, podría remediar vuestra mano el mal que vuestra hermosura ha hecho! Pero préciome tanto de buen amigo que, aunque tuviese tan cierto mi remedio como le tengo por imposible, imposible sería que le acetase”. Y, como estas consideraciones en aquellos instantes me turbasen la fantasía, no acertaba a responder a Nísida cosa alguna, de lo cual ella y otra hermana suya, que Blanca se llamaba, de menos años, aunque no de menos discreción y hermosura que Nísida, estaban maravilladas; y con más deseo de saber el origen de mi tristeza, con muchas importunaciones me rogaban que nada de mi dolor les encubriese. Viendo, pues, yo que la ventura me ofrecía la comodidad de poner en efecto lo que hasta aquel punto mi industria había fabricado, una vez que, acaso, Nísida y su hermana solas se hallaban, tornando ellas de nuevo a pedirme lo que tantas veces, les dije: “No penséis, señoras, que el silencio que hasta agora he tenido en no deciros la causa de la pena que imagináis que siento lo haya causado tener yo poco deseo de obedeceros, pues ya se sabe que si algún bien mi abatido estado en esta vida tiene, es haber granjeado con él venir a términos de conoceros y como criado serviros; sólo ha sido la causa imaginar que, aunque la descubra, no servirá para más de daros lástima, viendo cuán lejos está el remedio della. Pero, ya que me es forzoso satisfaceros en esto, sabréis, señoras, que en esta ciudad está un caballero natural de mi misma patria, a quien tengo por señor, por amparo y por amigo, el más liberal, discreto y gentilhomme que en gran parte hallarse pueda, el cual está aquí ausente de la amada patria por ciertas quistiones que allá le sucedieron, que le forzaron a venir a esta ciudad, creyendo que si allá en la suya dejaba enemigos, acá en la ajena no le faltarán amigos; más hale salido tan al revés su pensamiento, que un solo enemigo, que él mismo, sin saber cómo, aquí se ha procurado, le tiene puesto en tal extremo, que si el cielo no le socorre, con acabar la vida acabará sus amistades y enemistades. Y como yo conozco el valor de Timbrio -que este es el nombre del caballero cuya desgracia os voy contando-, y sé lo que perderá el mundo en perderle, y lo que yo perderé si le pierdo, doy las muestras de sentimiento que habéis visto, y aun son pocas, según a lo que me obliga el peligro en que Timbrio está puesto. Bien sé que deseáis saber, señoras, quién es el enemigo que a tan valeroso caballero, como es el que os he pintado, tiene puesto en tal extremo; pero también sé que, en diciéndosle, no os maravillaréis sino de cómo ya no le tiene consumido y muerto. Su enemigo es amor, universal destruidor de nuestros sosiegos y bienandanzas. Este fiero enemigo tomó posesión de sus entrañas. En entrando en esta ciudad, vio Timbrio una hermosa dama, de singular valor y hermosura, mas tan principal y honesta que jamás el miserable se ha aventurado a descubrirle su pensamiento”.

»A este punto llegaba yo cuando Nísida me dijo: “Por cierto, Astor -que entonces era este el nombre mío-, que no sé yo si crea que ese caballero sea tan valeroso y discreto como dices, pues tan fácil mente se ha dejado rendir a un mal deseo tan recién nacido, entregándose tan sin ocasión alguna en los brazos de la desesperación. Y, aunque a mí se me alcanza poco destos amorosos efectos, todavía me parece que es simplicidad y flaqueza dejar, el que se vee fatigado dellos, de descubrir su pensamiento a quien se le causa, puesto que sea del valor que imaginar se puede; porque, ¿qué afrenta se le puede seguir a ella de saber que es bien querida, o a él qué mayor mal de su aceda y desabrida respuesta, que la muerte que él mismo se procura callando? Y no sería bien que por tener un juez fama de riguroso, dejase alguno de alegar de su derecho. Pero pongamos que sucede la muerte de un amante tan callado y temeroso como ese tu amigo; dime, ¿llamarías tú cruel a la dama de quien estaba enamorado? No, por cierto; que mal puede remediar nadie la necesidad que no llega a su noticia, ni cae en su obligación procurar saberla para remediarla. Así que, Astor, perdóname, que las obras de ese tu amigo no hacen muy verdaderas las alabanzas que le das”.

»Cuando yo oí a Nísida semejantes razones, luego luego quisiera con las mías descubrirle todo el secreto de mi pecho; mas, como yo entendía la bondad y llaneza con que ella las hablaba, hube de detenerme y esperar más sola y mejor coyuntura; y así, le respondí: “Cuando los casos de amor, hermosa Nísida, con libres ojos se miran, tantos desatinos se veen en ellos, que no menos de risa que de compasión son dignos; pero si de la sutil red amorosa se halla enlazada el alma, allí están los sentidos tan trabados y tan fuera de su propio ser, que la memoria sólo sirve de tesorera y guardadora del objeto que los ojos miraron, y el entendimiento en escudriñar y conocer el valor de la que bien ama, y la voluntad de consentir de que la memoria y entendimiento en otra cosa no se ocupen; y así, los ojos veen como por espejo de alinde, que todas las cosas se les hacen mayores: ora cresce la esperanza cuando son favorecidos, ora el temor cuando desechados; y así, sucede a muchos lo que a Timbrio ha sucedido, que, pareciéndoles a los principios altísimo el objeto a quien los ojos levantaron, pierden la esperanza de alcanzarle; pero no de manera que no les diga amor allá dentro en el alma: ‘¿Quién sabe? Podría ser...’. Y con esto anda la esperanza, como decirse suele, entre dos aguas, la cual si del todo les desamparase, con ella huiría el amor. Y de aquí nasce andar, entre el temor y osar, el corazón del amante tan afligido que, sin aventurarse a decirla, se recoge y aprieta en su llaga, y espera, aunque no sabe de quién, el remedio de que se vee tan apartado. En este mismo extremo he yo hallado a Timbrio, aunque todavía, a persuaciones mías, ha escripto una carta a la dama por quien muere, la cual me dio para que la viese y mirase si en alguna manera se mostraba en ella descomedido, porque la enmendaría. Encargóme asimesmo que buscasse orden de ponerla en manos de su señora, que creo será imposible, no porque yo no me aventure a ello, pues lo menos que aventuraré será la vida por servirle, mas porque me parece que no he de hallar ocasión para darla”. “Veámosla -dijo Nísida-, porque deseo ver cómo escriben los enamorados discretos”. Luego saqué yo una carta del seno, que algunos días antes estaba escripta, esperando ocasión de que Nísida la viese; y, ofreciéndome la ventura ésta, se la mostré; la cual, por haberla yo leído muchas veces, se me quedó en la memoria, cuyas razones eran éstas: TIMBRIO A NÍSIDA

»Determinado había, hermosa señora, que el fin desastrado mío os diese noticia de quien yo era, pareciéndome ser mejor que alabárades mi silencio en la muerte, que no que vituperárades mi atrevimiento en la vida; mas, porque imagino que a mi alma conviene partirse deste mundo en gracia vuestra, porque en el otro no le niegue amor el premio de lo que ha padecido, os hago sabidora del estado en que vuestra rara beldad me tiene puesto, que es tal, que, a poder significarle, no procurara su remedio, pues por pequeñas cosas nadie se ha de aventurar a ofender el valor estremado vuestro, del cual y de vuestra honesta liberalidad espero restaurar la vida para serviros, o alcanzar la muerte para nunca más ofenderos.

»Con mucha atención estuvo Nísida escuchando esta carta, y, en acabándola de oír, dijo: “No tiene de qué agraviarse la dama a quien esta carta se envía, si ya de puro grave no da en ser melindrosa, enfermedad de quien no se escapa la mayor parte de las damas desta ciudad. Pero, con todo eso, no dejes, Astor, de dársela, pues, como ya te he dicho, no se puede esperar más mal de su respuesta, que no sea peor el que agora dices que tu amigo padece. Y, para más animarte, te quiero asegurar que no hay mujer tan recatada y tan puesta en atalaya para mirar por su honra, que le pese mucho de ver y saber que es querida, porque entonces conoce ella que no es vana la presunción que de sí tiene, lo cual sería al revés si viese que de nadie era solicitada”. “Bien sé, señora, que es verdad lo que dices -respondí yo-, mas tengo temor que el atreverme a darla, por lo menos, me ha de costar negarme de allí adelante la entrada en aquella casa, de que no menor daño me vendría a mí que a Timbrio”. “No quieras, Astor -replicó Nísida-, confirmar tú la sentencia que aún el juez no tiene dada. Muestra buen ánimo, que no es riguroso trance de batalla éste a que te aventuras”. “¡Pluguiera al cielo, hermosa Nísida -respondí yo-, que en ese término me viera, que de mejor gana ofreciera el pecho al peligro y rigor de mil contrapuestas armas, que no la mano a dar esta amorosa carta a quien temo que, siendo con ella ofendida, ha de arrojar sobre

mis hombros la pena que la ajena culpa meresce! Pero, con todos estos inconvenientes, pienso seguir, señora, el consejo que me has dado, puesto que aguardaré tiempo en que el temor no tenga tan ocupados mis sentidos como agora; y en este entretanto te suplico que, haciendo cuenta que tú eres a quien esta carta se envía, me des alguna respuesta que lleve a Timbrio, para que con este engaño él se entretenga un poco, y a mí el tiempo y las ocasiones me descubran lo que tengo de hacer”. “De mal artificio quieres usar -respondió Nísida-, porque, puesto caso que yo agora diese en nombre ajeno alguna blanda o esquivada respuesta, ¿no ves que el tiempo, descubridor de nuestros fines, aclarará el engaño y Timbrio quedará de ti más quejoso que satisfecho?; cuanto más que, por no haber dado hasta agora respuesta a semejantes cartas, no querría comenzar a darlas mentirosa y fingidamente; mas, aunque sepa ir contra lo que a mí mesma debo, si me prometes de decir quién es la dama, yo te diré qué digas a tu amigo, y cosa tal, que él quede contento por agora; y, puesto que después las cosas sucedan al revés de lo que él pensare, no por eso se averiguará la mentira”. “Eso no me lo mandes, ¡oh Nísida! -respondí yo-, porque en tanta confusión me pone decirte yo a ti su nombre, como me pondría el darle a ella la carta; basta saber que es principal, y que, sin hacerte agravio alguno, no te debe nada en la hermosura, que con esto me parece que la encarezco sobre cuantas son nascidas”. “No me maravillo que digas eso de mí -dijo Nísida-, pues los hombres de vuestra condición y trato, lisonjear es su propio oficio. Mas, dejando todo esto a una parte, porque deseo que no pierdas la comodidad de un tan buen amigo, te aconsejo que le digas que fuiste a dar la carta a su dama, y que has pasado con ella todas las razones que conmigo, sin faltar punto, y cómo leyó tu carta, y el ánimo que te daba para que a su dama la llevases, pensando que no era ella a quien venía; y que, aunque no te atreviste a declarar del todo, que has conocido della que, cuando sepa ser ella para quien la carta venía, no le causará el engaño y desengaño mucha pesadumbre. Desta suerte rescibirá él algún alivio en su trabajo; y después, al descubrir tu intención a su dama, puedes responder a Timbrio lo que ella te respondiere, pues hasta el punto que ella lo sepa, queda en fuerza esta mentira y la verdad de lo que sucediere, sin que haga al caso el engaño de agora”.

»Admirado quedé de la discreta traza de Nísida, y aun no sin sospecha de la verdad de mi artificio. Y así, besándole las manos por el buen aviso, y quedando con ella que de cualquiera cosa que en este negocio sucediere le había de dar particular cuenta, vine a contar a Timbrio todo lo que con Nísida me había sucedido, que fue parte para que la tuviese en su alma la esperanza, y volviese de nuevo a sustentarle y a desterrar de su corazón los nublados del frío temor que hasta entonces le tenían ofuscado. Y todo este gusto se le acrescentaba el

prometerle yo a cada paso que los míos no serían dados sino en servicio suyo, y que otra vez que con Nísida me hallase, sacaría el juego de maña con tan buen suceso como sus pensamientos merecían. Una cosa se me ha olvidado de deciros: que en todo el tiempo que con Nísida y su hermana estuve hablando, jamás la menor hermana habló palabra, sino que, con un estraño silencio, estuvo siempre colgada de las mías. Y seos decir, señores, que si callaba, no era por no saber hablar con toda discreción y donaire, porque en estas dos hermanas mostró naturaleza todo lo que ella puede y vale; y, con todo esto, no sé si os diga que holgara que me hubiera negado el cielo la ventura de haberlas conocido, especialmente a Nísida, principio y fin de toda mi desdicha. Pero, ¿qué puedo hacer, si lo que los hados tienen ordenado no puede por discursos humanos estorbarse? Yo quise, quiero y querré bien a Nísida, tan sin ofensa de Timbrio cuanto lo ha mostrado bien mi cansada lengua, que jamás la habló que en favor de Timbrio no fuese, encubriendo siempre, con más que ordinaria discreción, la pena propia por remediar la ajena.

»Sucedió, pues, que, como la belleza de Nísida tan esculpida en mi alma quedó desde el primer punto que mis ojos la vieron, no pudiendo tener mi pecho tan rico tesoro encubierto, cuando solo o apartado alguna vez me hallaba, con algunas amorosas y lamentables canciones le descubría con velo de fingido nombre. Y así, una noche, pensando que ni Timbrio ni otro alguno me escuchaba, por dar alivio un poco al fatigado espíritu, en un retirado aposento, sólo de un laúd acompañado, canté unos versos, que, por haberme puesto en una confusión gravísima, os los habré de decir, que eran éstos:

SILERIO

»¿Qué laberinto es éste do se encierra mi loca, levantada fantasía?
¿Quién ha vuelto mi paz en cruda guerra, y en tal tristeza toda mi alegría?
¿O cuál hado me trujo a ver la tierra   5
qu'ha de servir de sepultura mía,
o quién reducirá mi pensamiento
al término que pide un sano intento?

»Si por romper este mi frágil pecho
y despojarme de la dulce vida,   10
quedase el suelo y cielo satisfecho

de que a Timbrio guardé la fe debida,
sin que me acobardara el crudo hecho,
yo fuera de mí mismo el homicida;
mas si yo acabo, en él acaba luego 15
la amorosa esperanza y cresce el fuego.

»Lluevan y caigan las doradas flechas
del ciego dios, y con rigor insano
al triste corazón vengan derechas, disparadas con fiera airada mano; 20
que, aunque ceniza y polvo queden hechas las heridas entrañas, lo que gano en encubrir su dolorosa llaga es rica de mi mal ilustre paga.

»Silencio eterno a mi cansada lengua 25
pondrá la ley de la amistad sincera,
por cuya sin igual virtud desmengua
la pena que acabar jamás espera;
mas, aunque nunca acabe y ponga en mengua la honra y la salud, será cual era 30
mi limpia fe: más firme y contrastada que roca en medio de la mar airada.

»Del humor que derraman estos ojos,
y de la lengua el pñadoso oficio;
del bien que se le debe a mis enojos, 35
y de la voluntad el sacrificio,
lleve los dulces premios y despojos
el caro amigo, y muéstrese propicio
el cielo a mi deseo, que pretende
el bien ajeno y a sí mismo ofende. 40

»Socorre, ¡oh blando amor!, levanta y guía mi bajo ingenio en la ocasión dudosa;
y al esperado punto esfuerzo envía
al alma y a la lengua temerosa, la cual podrá, si lleva tu osadía, 45
facilitar la más difícil cosa,

y romper contra el hado y desventura,
hasta llegar a la mayor ventura.

»El estar tan trasportado en mis continuas imaginaciones fue ocasión para que yo no tuviese cuenta en cantar estos versos que he dicho con tan baja voz como debiera, ni el lugar do estaba era tan escondido que estorbara que de Timbrio no fueran escuchados, el cual, así como los oyó, le vino al pensamiento que el mío no estaba libre de amor, y que si yo alguno tenía, era a Nísida, según se podía colegir de mi canto. Y, aunque él alcanzó la verdad de mis pensamientos, no alcanzó la de mis deseos; antes, entendiendo ser al contrario de lo que yo pensaba, determinó de ausentarse aquella misma noche e irse adonde de ninguno fuese hallado, sólo por dejarme comodidad de que solo a Nísida sirviese. Todo esto supe yo de un paje suyo, sabidor de todos sus secretos, el cual vino a mí muy angustiado y me dijo: “Acudid, señor Silerio, que Timbrio, mi señor y vuestro amigo, nos quiere dejar y partirse esta noche, y no me ha dicho adónde, sino que le apareje no sé qué dineros, y que a nadie diga que se parte. Principalmente me dijo que a vos no lo dijese. Y este pensamiento le ha venido después que estuvo escuchando no sé qué versos que poco ha cantábades, y, según los extremos que le he visto hacer, creo que va a desesperarse. Y, por parecerme que debo antes acudir a su remedio que a obedecer su mandado, os lo vengo a decir, como a quien puede ser parte para que no ponga en efecto tan dañado propósito”.

»Con estraño sobresalto escuché lo que el paje me decía, y fui luego a ver a Timbrio a su aposento, y, antes que dentro entrase, me paré a ver lo que hacía, el cual estaba tendido encima de su lecho boca abajo, derramando infinitas lágrimas, acompañadas de profundos suspiros, y con baja voz y mal formadas razones me pareció que éstas decía: “Procura, verdadero amigo Silerio, alcanzar el fruto que tu solicitud y trabajo tiene bien merecido, y no quieras, por lo que te parece que debes a mi amistad, dejar de dar gusto a tu deseo, que yo refrenaré el mío, aunque sea con el medio extremo de la muerte, que, pues tú della me libraste, cuando con tanto amor y fortaleza al rigor de mil espadas te ofreciste, no es mucho que yo agora te pague en parte tan buena obra con dar lugar a que, sin el impedimento que mi presencia causarte puede, goces de aquélla en quien cifró el cielo toda su belleza y puso el amor todo mi contento. De una sola cosa me pesa, dulce amigo, y es que no puedo despedirme de ti en esta amarga partida; mas, admite por disculpa el ser tú la causa della. ¡Oh Nísida, Nísida, y cuán cierto está de tu hermosura, que se ha de pagar la culpa del que se atreve a mirarla con la pena de morir por ella! Silerio la vio, y si no quedara cual imagino que ha quedado, perdiera en gran parte conmigo la opinión que tiene de discreto.

Mas, pues mi ventura así lo ha querido, sepa el cielo que no soy menos amigo de Silerio que él lo es mío; y, para muestras desta verdad, apártese Timbrio de su gloria, destiérrese de su contento, vaya peregrino de tierra en tierra, ausente de Silerio y de Nísida, dos verdaderas y mejores mitades de su alma”. Y luego, con mucha furia, se levantó del lecho y abrió la puerta, y, hallándome allí, me dijo: “¿Qué quieres, amigo, a tales horas? ¿Hay, por ventura, algo de nuevo?” “Hay tanto -le respondí yo-que, aunque hubiera menos no me pesara”. En fin, por no cansaros más, yo llegué a tales términos con él, que le persuadí y di a entender ser su imaginación falsa, no en cuanto estaba yo enamorado, sino en el de quién, porque no era de Nísida, sino de su hermana Blanca; y súpelo decir esto de manera que él lo tuvo por verdadero. Y, porque más crédito a ello diese, la memoria me ofreció unas estancias que muchos días antes yo mesmo había hecho a otra dama del mismo nombre, y díjele que para la hermana de Nísida las había compuesto, las cuales vinieron tan a pro pósito que, aunque sea fuera dél decirlas ahora, no las quiero pasar en silencio, que fueron estas:

SILERIO

»¡Oh Blanca, a quien rendida está la nieve, y en condición más que la nieve helada!, no presumáis ser mi dolor tan leve que estéis de remediarle descuidada.

Mirad que si mi mal no ablanda y mueve 5

vuestra alma, en mi desdicha conjurada,
se volverá tan negra mi ventura
cuanta sois blanca en nombre y hermosura.

»¡Blanca gentil, en cuyo blanco pecho
el contento de amor se anida y cierra!: 10
antes qu’el mío, en lágrimas deshecho,
se vuelva polvo y miserable tierra,
mostrad el vuestro en algo satisfecho
del amor y dolor qu’el mío encierra, que ésta será tan caudalosa paga, 15
que a cuanto mal padezco satisfaga.

»Blanca, sois vos por quien trocar querría de oro el más finísimo ducado,

y por tan alta posesión tendría
por bien perder la del más alto estado. 20
Pues esto conocéis, ¡oh Blanca mía!,
dejad ese desdén desamorado,
y haced, ¡oh Blanca!, que el amor acierte a sacar, si sois vos, blanca mi suerte.

»Puesto que con pobreza tal me hallara 25

que tan sola una blanca poseyera, si ella fuérades vos, no me trocara
por el más rico que en el mundo hubiera; y si mi ser en aquel ser tornara de Juan de Espera en Dios, dichoso fuera 30 si al tiempo que las tres blancas buscase, a vos, ¡oh Blanca!, entre ellas os
hallase.»

Adelante pasara con su cuento Silerio, si no lo estorbara el son de muchas zampoñas y acordados caramillos que a sus espaldas se oía; y, volviendo la cabeza, vieron venir hacia ellos hasta una docena de gallardos pastores puestos en dos hileras, y en medio venía un dispuesto pastor, coronado con una guirnalda de madreselva y de otras diferentes flores. Traía un bastón en la una mano, y con grave paso poco a poco se movía; y los demás pastores, andando con el mismo aplauso y tocando todos sus instrumentos, daban de sí agradable y estraña muestra. Luego que Elicio los vio, conoció ser Daranio el pastor que en medio traían, y los demás ser todos circunvecinos que a sus bodas querían hallarse, a las cuales asimesmo Tirsi y Damón vinieron, y, por alegrar la fiesta del desposorio y honrar al nuevo desposado, de aquella manera hacia el aldea se encaminaban. Pero, viendo Tirsi que su venida había puesto silencio al cuento de Silerio, le rogó que aquella noche juntos en la aldea la pasasen, donde sería servido con la voluntad posible, y haría satisfechas las suyas con acabar el comenzado suceso. Silerio lo prometió. Y a esta sazón llegó el montón alegre de pastores, los cuales conociendo a Elicio y Daranio, a Tirsi y a Damón, sus amigos, con señales de grande alegría se recibieron; y, renovando la música y renovando el contento, tornaron a proseguir el comenzado camino; y, ya que llegaban junto al aldea, llegó a sus oídos el son de la zampoña del desamorado Lenio, de que no poco gusto recibieron todos, porque ya conocían la estremada condición suya. Y, así como Lenio los vio y conoció, sin interromper el suave canto, desta manera cantando hacia ellos se vino:

LENIO

Por bienaventurada,
por llena de contento y alegría,
será por mí juzgada
tan dulce compañía,
si no siente de amor la tiranía. 5
Y besaré la tierra
que pisa aquel que de su pensamiento
el falso amor destierra
y tiene el pecho esento
desta furia cruel, deste tormento. 10
Y llamaré dichoso
al rústico advertido ganadero
que vive cuidadoso
del pobre manso apero
y muestra el rostro al crudo amor severo. 15
Deste tal las corderas,
antes que venga la sazón madura,

serán ya parideras,
y en la peña más dura
hallarán claras aguas y verdura. 20
Si, estando amor airado
con él, pusiere en su salud desvío,
llevaré su ganado,
con el ganado mío,
al abundoso pasto, al claro río. 25
Y en tanto, del encienso
el humo sancto irá volando al cielo,
a quien decirle pienso
con pío y justo celo,
las rodillas prostradas por el suelo: 30
«¡Oh cielo sancto y justo!,
pues eres protector del que pretende
hacer lo que es tu gusto,
a la salud atiende

de aquel que por servirte amor le ofende. 35
No lleve este tirano

los despojos a ti solo debidos;
antes, con larga mano
y premios merescidos,
restituye su fuerza a los sentidos». 40

En acabando de cantar Lenio, fue de todos los pastores cortésmente rescibido, el cual, como oyese nombrar a Damón y a Tirsi, a quien él sólo por fama conocía, quedó admirado en ver su estremada presencia; y así, les dijo: -¿Qué encarecimientos bastarían, aunque fueran los mejores que en la elocuencia pudieran hallarse, a poder levantar y encarecer el valor vuestro, famosos pastores, si por ventura las niñerías de amor no se mezclaran con las veras de vuestros celebrados escritos? Pero, pues ya estáis éticos de amor, enfermedad al parecer incurable, puesto que mi rudeza, con estimar y alabar vuestra rara discreción, os pague lo que os debe, imposible será que yo deje de vituperar vuestros pensamientos.

-Si los tuyos tuvieras, discreto Lenio -respondió Tirsi-, sin las sombras de la vana opinión que los ocupa, vieras luego la claridad de los nuestros, y que, por ser amorosos, merescen más gloria y alabanza que por ninguna otra sutileza o discreción que encerrar pudieran.

-No más, Tirsi, no más -replicó Lenio-, que bien sé que contra tantos y tan obstinados enemigos poca fuerza tendrán mis razones.

-Si ellas lo fueran -respondió Elicio-, tan amigos son de la verdad los que aquí están, que ni aun burlando la contradijeran; y en esto podrás ver, Lenio, cuán fuera vas della, pues no hay ninguno que apruebe tus palabras, ni aun tenga por buenas tus intenciones.

-Pues, a fe -dijo Lenio-, que no te salve a ti la tuya, ¡oh Elicio! Si no, dígalo el aire, a quien contino acrescientas con sospiros, y la yerba destos prados, que va creciendo con tus lágrimas, y los versos que el otro día en las hayas de aquel bosque escribiste, que en ellos se verá qué es lo que en ti alabas y en mí vituperas.

No quedara Lenio sin respuesta, si no vieran venir hacia donde ellos estaban a la hermosa Galatea con las discretas pastoras Florisa y Teolinda, la cual, por no ser conocida de Damón y Tirsi, se había puesto un blanco velo ante su hermoso rostro. Llegaron y fueron de los pastores con alegre acogimiento rescebidas, principalmente de los enamorados Elicio y Erastro, que con la vista de Galatea tan extraño contento rescibieron que, no pudiendo Erastro disimularle, en señal dél, sin mandárselo alguno, hizo señas a Elicio que su zampoña tocase, al son de la cual, con alegres y suaves acentos, cantó los siguientes versos:

ERASTRO

Vea yo los ojos bellos
deste sol que estoy mirando,
y si se van apartando,
váyase el alma tras ellos.
Sin ellos no hay claridad, 5
ni mi alma no la espere, que, ausente dellos, no quiere
luz, salud, ni libertad.

Mire quien puede estos ojos, que no es posible alaballos; 10
mas ha de dar por mirallos
de la vida los despojos.
Yo los veo y yo los vi,
y cada vez que los veo
les doy un nuevo deseo 15
tras el alma que les di.
Ya no tengo más que dar
ni imagino más que dé, si por premio de mi fe
no se admite el desear. 20
Cierta está mi perdición
si estos ojos do el bien sobra
los pusieren en la obra
y no en la sana intención.
Aunque durase este día 25
mil siglos, como deseo,
a mí, que tanto bien veo,
un punto parecería.
No hace el tiempo ligero

curso en alterar mi edad, 30
mientras miro la beldad
de la vida por quien muero.
En esta vista reposa
mi alma y halla sosiego,
y vive en el vivo fuego 35
de su luz pura, hermosa.
Y hace amor tan alta prueba con ella, que en esta llama a dulce vida la llama
y, cual fénix, la renueva. 40
Salgo con mi pensamiento
buscando mi dulce gloria,
y al fin hallo en mi memoria
encerrado mi contento.
Allí está y allí se encierra, 45
no en mandos, no en poderíos,
no en pompas, no en señoríos
ni en riquezas de la tierra.

Aquí acabó su canto Erastro, y se acabó el camino de llegar a la aldea, adonde Tirsi y Damón y Silerio en casa de Elicio se recogieron, por no perder la ocasión de saber en qué paraba el comenzado cuento de Silerio. Las hermosas pastoras Galatea y Florisa, ofreciendo de hallarse el venidero día a las bodas de Daranio, dejaron a los pastores, y todos o los más con el desposado se quedaron, y ellas a sus casas se fueron. Y aquella misma noche, solicitado Silerio de su amigo Erastro, y por el deseo que le fatigaba de volver a su ermita, dio fin al suceso de su historia, como se verá en el siguiente libro.

FIN DEL SEGUNDO LIBRO

Tercero libro de Galatea

EL REGOCIJADO alboroto que con la ocasión de las bodas de Daranio aquella noche en el aldea había, no fue parte para que Elicio, Tirsi, Damón y Erastro dejasen de acomodarse en parte donde, sin ser de alguno estorbados, pudiese seguir Silerio su comenzada historia. El cual, después que todos juntos grato silencio le prestaron, siguió desta manera: -«Con las fingidas estancias de Blanca que os he dicho que a Timbrio dije, quedó él satisfecho de que mi pena procedía, no de amores de Nísida, sino de su hermana. Y, con este seguro, pidiéndome perdón de la falsa imaginación que de mí había tenido, me tornó a encargar su remedio. Y así, yo, olvidado del mío, no me descuidé un punto de lo que al suyo tocaba. Algunos días se pasaron, en los cuales la fortuna no me mostró tan abierta ocasión como yo quisiera para descubrir a Nísida la verdad de mis pensamientos, aunque ella siempre me preguntaba cómo a mi amigo en sus amores le iba, y si su dama tenía ya alguna noticia dellos. A lo que yo le dije que todavía el temor de ofenderla no me dejaba aventurar a decirle cosa alguna. De lo cual Nísida se enojaba mucho, y me llamaba cobarde y de poca discreción, añadiendo a esto que, pues yo me acobardaba, o que Timbrio no sentía el dolor que yo dél publicaba, o que yo no era tan verdadero amigo suyo como decía. Todo esto fue parte para que me determinase y en la primera ocasión me descubriese, como lo hice un día que sola estaba, la cual escuchó con estraño silencio todo lo que decirle quise; y yo, como mejor pude, le encarecí el valor de Timbrio, el verdadero amor que le tenía, el cual era de suerte que me había movido a mí a tomar tan abatido ejercicio como era el de truhán, sólo por tener lugar de decirle lo que le decía, añadiendo a éstas otras razones que a Nísida le debió parecer que lo eran. Mas no quiso mostrar entonces por palabras lo que después con obras no pudo tener cubierto; antes, con gravedad y honestidad estraña, reprehendió mi atrevimiento, acusó mi osadía, afeó mis palabras y desmayó mi confianza; pero no de manera que me desterrase de su presencia, que era lo que yo más temía. Sólo concluyó con decirme que de allí adelante tuviese más cuenta con lo que a su honestidad era obligado, y procurase que el artificio de mi mentido hábito no se descubriese. Conclusión fue esta que cerró y acabó la tragedia de mi vida, pues por ella entendí que Nísida daría oídos a las quejas de Timbrio.

»¿En qué pecho pudo caber ni puede el extremo de dolor que entonces en el mío se encerraba, pues el fin de su mayor deseo era el remate y fin de su

contento? Alegrábame el buen principio que al remedio de Timbrio había dado, y esta alegría en mi pesar redundaba, por parecerme, como era la verdad, que en viendo a Nísida en poder ajeno el propio mío se acababa. ¡Oh fuerza poderosa de verdadera amistad, a cuánto te estiendes y a cuánto me obligaste, pues yo mismo, forzado de tu obligación, afilé con mi industria el cuchillo que había de degollar mis esperanzas, las cuales, muriendo en mi alma, vivieron y resucitaron en la de Timbrio cuando de mí supo todo lo que con Nísida pasado había! Pero ella andaba tan recatada con él y conmigo, que nunca de todo punto dio a entender que de la solicitud mía y amor de Timbrio se contentaba, ni menos se desdeñó de suerte que sus sinsabores y desvíos hiciesen a los dos abandonar la empresa, hasta que, habiendo llegado a noticia de Timbrio cómo su enemigo Pransiles -aquel caballero a quien él había agraviado en Jerez-, deseoso de satisfacer su honra, le enviaba a desafiar, señalándole campo franco y seguro en una tierra del estado del duque de Gravina, dándole término de seis meses, desde entonces hasta el día de la batalla. El cuidado deste aviso no fue parte para que se descuidase de lo que a sus amores convenía; antes, con nueva solicitud mía y servicios suyos, vino a estar Nísida de manera que no se mostraba esquivada aunque la mirase Timbrio y en casa de sus padres visitase, guardando en todo tan honesto decoro, cuanto a su valor era obligada. Acercándose ya el término del desafío, y viendo Timbrio serle inexcusable aquella jornada, determinó de partirse, y, antes que lo hiciese, escribió a Nísida una carta tal, que acabó con ella en un punto lo que yo en muchos meses atrás y en muchas palabras no había comenzado. Tengo la carta en la memoria, y, por hacer al caso de mi cuento, no os dejaré de decir que así decía: TIMBRIO A NÍSIDA »Salud te envía aquél que no la tiene, Nísida, ni la espera en tiempo alguno si por tus manos mismas no le viene.

El nombre aborrecible de importuno temo me adquirirán estos renglones, 5 escriptos con mi sangre de uno en uno.

Mas, la furia cruel de mis pasiones de tal modo me turba, que no puedo huir las amorosas sinrazones.

Entre un ardiente osar y un frío miedo, 10

arrimado a mi fe y al valor tuyo, mientras ésta rescibes triste quedo, por ver que en escrebirte me destruyo, si tienes a donaire lo que digo y entregas al desdén lo que no es suyo. 15

El cielo verdadero me es testigo si no te adoro desde el mismo punto que vi ese rostro hermoso y mi enemigo.

El verte y adorarte llegó junto; porque, ¿quién fuera aquél que no adorara 20

de un ángel bello el sin igual trasumpto?

Mi alma tu belleza, al mundo rara, vio tan curiosamente que no quiso en el rostro parar la vista clara.

Allá en el alma tuya un paraíso 25

fue descubriendo de bellezas tantas, que dan de nueva gloria cierto aviso.

Con estas ricas alas te levantas hasta llegar al cielo, y en la tierra al sabio admiras y al que es simple espantas. 30

Dichosa el alma que tal bien encierra, y no menos dichoso el que por ella la suya rinde a la amorosa guerra.

En deuda soy a mi fatal estrella, que me quiso rendir a quien encubre 35 en tan hermoso cuerpo alma tan bella.

Tu condición, señora, me descubre el desengaño de mi pensamiento, y de temor a mi esperanza cubre.

Pero, en fe de mi justo honroso intento, 40

hago buen rostro a la desconfianza, y cobro al postrer punto nuevo aliento.

Dicen que no hay amor sin esperanza; pienso que es opinión, que yo no espero, y del amor la fuerza más me alcanza. 45

Por sola tu bondad te adoro y quiero, atraído también de tu belleza, que fue la red que amor tendió primero para atraer con rara subtileza al alma descuidada libre mía 50

al amoroso ñudo y su estrechez.

Sustenta amor su mando y tiranía con cualquiera belleza en algún pecho; pero no en la curiosa fantasía, que mira, no de amor el lazo estrecho 55

que tiende en los cabellos de oro fino, dejando al que los mira satisfecho, ni en el pecho, a quien llama alabastrino quien del pecho no pasa más adentro, ni en el marfil del cuello peregrino, 60 sino del alma el escondido centro mira, y contempla mil bellezas puras que le acuden y salen al encuentro.

Mortales y caducas hermosuras no satisfacen a la inmortal alma, 65
si de la luz perfecta no anda a oscuras.

Tu sin igual virtud lleva la palma y los despojos de mis pensamientos, y a los torpes sentidos tiene en calma.

Y en esta subjeción están contentos, 70

porque miden su dura amarga pena con el valor de tus merescimientos.

Aro en el mar y siembro en el arena cuando la fuerza estraña del deseo a más que a contemplarte me condena. 75

Tu alteza entiendo, mi bajeza veo, y, en extremos que son tan diferentes, ni hay medio que esperar ni le poseo.

Ofrécense por esto inconvenientes tantos a mi remedio, cuantas tiene 80 el cielo estrellas y la tierra gentes.

Conozco lo que al alma le conviene, sé lo mejor, y a lo peor me atengo, llevado del amor que me entretiene.

Mas ya, Nísida bella, al paso vengo, 85
de mí con mortal ansia deseado, do acabaré la pena que sostengo.

El enemigo brazo levantado me espera, y la feroz aguda espada, contra mí con
tu saña conjurado. 90

Presto será tu voluntad vengada del vano atrevimiento desta mía, de ti sin causa alguna desechada.

Otro más duro trance, otra agonía, aunque fuera mayor que de la muerte 95
no turbara mi triste fantasía, si cupiera en mi corta amarga suerte verte de mis deseos satisfecha, así como al contrario puedo verte.

La senda de mi bien hállola estrecha; 100

la de mi mal, tan ancha y espaciosa, cual de mi desventura ha sido hecha.

Por ésta corre airada y presurosa la muerte, en tu desdén fortalecida, de triunfar de mi vida deseosa. 105

Por aquélla mi bien va de vencida, de tu rigor, señora, perseguido, qu'es el que ha de acabar mi corta vida.

A términos tan tristes conducido me tiene mi ventura, que ya temo 110

al enemigo airado y ofendido, sólo por ver qu'el fuego en que me quemo es yelo en ese pecho, y esto es parte para que yo acobarde al paso extremo; que si tú
no te muestras de mi parte, 115

¿a quién no temerá mi flaca mano, aunque más le acompañe esfuerzo y arte?

Pero si me ayudaras, ¿qué romano o griego capitán me contrastara, que al fin su intento no saliera vano? 120

Por el mayor peligro me arrojara, y de las fieras manos de la muerte los despojos seguro arrebatara.

Tú sola puedes levantar mi suerte sobre la humana pompa, o derribarla 125

al centro do no hay bien con que se acierte; que, si como ha podido sublimarla el puro amor, quisiera la fortuna en la difícil cumbre sustentarla, subida sobre el cielo de la luna 130

se viera mi esperanza, que ahora yace en lugar do no espera en cosa alguna.

Tal estoy ya, que ya me satisface el mal que tu desdén airado, esquivo, por tan estraños términos me hace, 135

sólo por ver que en tu memoria vivo, y que te acuerdas, Nísida, siquiera de hacerme mal, que yo por bien rescibo.

Con más facilidad contar pudiera del mar los granos de la blanca arena, 140

y las estrellas de la octava esfera, que no las ansias, el dolor, la pena a qu'el fiero rigor de tu aspereza, sin haberte ofendido, me condena.

No midas tu valor con mi bajeza, 145

que al respecto de tu ser famoso, por tierra quedará cualquiera alteza.

Así cual soy te amo, y decir oso que me adelanto en firme enamorado al más subido término amoroso. 150

Por esto no merezco ser tratado como enemigo; antes, me parece que debería de ser remunerado.

Mal con tanta beldad se compadece tamaña crueldad, y mal asienta 155

ingratitude do tal valor floresce.

Quisiérate pedir, Nísida, cuenta de un alma que te di: ¿dónde la echaste, o cómo, estando ausente, me sustenta?

Ser señora de un alma no aceptaste; 160

pues, ¿qué te puede dar quien más te quiera?

¡Cuán bien tu presunción aquí mostraste!

Sin alma estoy desde la vez primera que te vi, por mi mal y por bien mío, que todo fuera mal si no te viera. 165

Allí el freno te di de mi albedrío, tú me gobiernas, por ti sola vivo, y aun puede mucho más tu poderío.

En el fuego de amor puro me avivo y me deshago, pues, cual fénix, luego 170 de la muerte de amor vida rescibo.

En fe desta mi fe, te pido y ruego sólo que creas, Nísida, que es cierto que vivo ardiendo en amoroso fuego, y que tú puedes ya, después de muerto, 175

reducirme a la vida, y en un punto del mar airado conducirme al puerto; que está para conmigo en ti tan junto el querer y el poder, que es todo uno, sin discrepar y sin faltar un punto; 180

y acabo, por no ser más importuno.

»No sé si las razones desta carta, o las muchas que yo antes a Nísida había dicho, asegurándole el verdadero amor que Timbrio la tenía, o los continuos servicios de Timbrio, o los cielos, que así lo tenían ordenado, movieron las entrañas de Nísida para que, en el punto que la acabó de leer, me llamase y con lágrimas en los ojos me dijese: “¡Ay, Silerio, Silerio, y cómo creo que a costa de la salud mía has querido granjear la de tu amigo! Hagan los hados, que a este punto me han traído, con las obras de Timbrio verdaderas tus palabras. Y si las unas y las otras me han engañado, tome de mi ofensa venganza el cielo, al cual pongo por testigo de la fuerza que el deseo me hace, para que no le tenga más encubierto. Mas ¡ay, cuán liviano descargo es éste para tan pesada culpa, pues debiera yo primero morir callando porque mi honra viviera, que, con decir lo que agora quiero decirte, enterrarla a ella y acabar mi vida!” Confuso me tenían estas palabras de Nísida, y más el sobresalto con que las decía; y, queriendo con las mías animarla a que sin temor alguno se declarase, no fue menester importunarla mucho, que al fin me dijo que no sólo amaba, pero que adoraba a Timbrio, y que aquella voluntad tuviera ella cubierta siempre, si la forzosa ocasión de la partida de Timbrio no la forzara a descubrirla.

»Cuál yo quedé, pastores, oyendo lo que Nísida decía y la voluntad amorosa que tener a Timbrio mostraba, no es posible encarecerlo, y aun es bien que carezca de encarecimiento dolor que a tanto se estiende; no porque me pesase de ver a Timbrio querido, sino de verme a mí imposibilitado de tener jamás contento, pues estaba y está claro que ni podía, ni puedo vivir sin Nísida, a la cual, como otras veces he dicho, viéndola en ajenas manos puesta, era enajenarme yo de todo gusto. Y si alguno la suerte en este trance me concedía, era considerar el bien de mi amigo Timbrio, y esto fue parte para que no llegase a un mismo punto mi muerte. Y la declaración de la voluntad de Nísida escuchéla como pude, y aseguréla como supe de la entereza del pecho de Timbrio, a lo cual ella me respondió que ya no había necesidad de asegurarle aquello, porque estaba de manera que no podía, ni le convenía, dejar de creerme, y que sólo me rogaba, si fuese posible, procurase de persuadir a Timbrio buscase algún medio honroso para no venir a batalla con su enemigo; y, respondiéndole yo ser esto imposible sin quedar deshonado, se sosegó, y, quitándose del cuello unas preciosas reliquias, me las dio para que a Timbrio de su parte las diese. Quedó ansimesmo concertado entre los dos que ella sabía que sus padres habían de ir a ver el combate de Timbrio, y que llevarían a ella y a su hermana consigo; mas, porque no le bastaría el ánimo de estar presente al riguroso trance de Timbrio, que ella fingiría estar mal dispuesta, con la cual ocasión se quedaría en una casa de placer donde sus padres habían de posar, que media legua estaba de la villa donde se había de hacer el combate; y que allí esperaría su buena o mala suerte, según la tuviese Timbrio. Mandóme también que, para acortar el deseo que tendría de saber el suceso de Timbrio, que llevase yo conmigo una toca blanca que ella me dio, y que si Timbrio venciese, me la atase al brazo y volviese a darle las nuevas; y si fuese vencido, que no la atase, y así ella sabría por la señal de la toca desde lejos el principio de su contento o el fin de su vida.

»Prometile de hacer todo lo que me mandaba, y, tomando las reliquias y la toca, me despedí della, con la mayor tristeza y el mayor contento que jamás tuve: mi poca ventura causaba la tristeza, y la mucha de Timbrio el alegría. Él supo de mí lo que de parte de Nísida le llevaba, y quedó con ello tan lozano, contento y

orgullosa, que el peligro de la batalla que esperaba por ninguno le tenía, pareciéndole que en ser favorecido de su señora, aun la misma muerte contrastar no le podría. Paso ahora en silencio los encarecimientos que Timbrio hizo para mostrarse agradecido a lo que a mi solicitud debía, porque fueron tales, que mostraba estar fuera de seso tratando en ello.

»Esforzado, pues, y animado con esta buena nueva, comenzó a aparejar su partida, llevando por padrinos un principal caballero español y otro napolitano. Y a la fama deste particular duelo, se movió a verlo infinita gente del reino, y yendo también allá los padres de Nísida, llevando con ellos a ella y a su hermana Blanca. Y, como a Timbrio tocaba escoger las armas, quiso mostrar que no en la ventaja dellas, sino en la razón que tenía fundaba su derecho; y así, las que escogió fueron espada y daga, sin otra arma defensiva alguna. Pocos días faltaban al término señalado, cuando de la ciudad de Nápoles se partieron, con otros muchos caballeros, Nísida y sus padres, habiendo llegado primero ella, acordándome muchas veces que no se olvidase nuestro concierto. Pero mi cansada memoria, que jamás sirvió sino de acordarme solas las cosas de mi desgusto, por no mudar su condición, se olvidó tanto de lo que Nísida me había dicho, cuanto vio que convenía para quitarme la vida, o, a lo menos, para ponerme en el miserable estado en que ahora me veo.»

Con grande atención estaban los pastores escuchando lo que Silerio contaba, cuando interrumpió el hilo de su cuento la voz de un lastimado pastor que entre unos árboles cantando estaba, y no tan lejos de las ventanas de la estancia donde ellos estaban que dejase de oírse todo lo que decía. La voz era de suerte que puso silencio a Silerio, el cual en ninguna manera quiso pasar adelante, antes rogó a los demás pastores que la escuchasen, pues, «para lo poco que de mi cuento quedaba, tiempo habría de acabarlo». Hiciéraseles de mal esto a Tirsi y Damón, si no les dijera Elicio: -Poco se perderá, pastores, en escuchar al desdichado Mireno -que, sin duda, es el pastor que canta-, y a quien ha traído la fortuna a términos que imagino que no espera él ninguno en su contento.

-¿Cómo le ha de esperar -dijo Erastro-, si mañana se desposa Daranio con la pastora Silveria, con quien él pensaba casarse? Pero en fin, han podido más con los padres de Silveria las riquezas de Daranio que las habilidades de Mireno.

-Verdad dices -replicó Elicio-, pero con Silveria más había de poder la voluntad que de Mireno tenía conocida que otro tesoro alguno; cuanto más, que no es Mireno tan pobre que, aunque Silveria se casara con él, fuera su necesidad notada.

Por estas razones que Elicio y Erastro dijeron, creció el deseo en los pastores de escuchar lo que Mireno cantaba. Y así, rogó Silerio que más no se hablase, y todos con atento oído se pararon a escucharle, el cual, afligido de la ingratitud de

Silveria, viendo que otro día con Daranio se desposaba, con la rabia y dolor que le causaba este hecho, se había salido de su casa, acompañado de solo su rabel; y, convidándole la soledad y silencio de un pequeño pradecillo que junto a las paredes de la aldea estaba, y confiado que en tan sosegada noche ninguno le escucharía, se sentó al pie de un árbol, y, templando su rabel, desta manera cantando estaba:

MIRENO

Cielo sereno, que con tantos ojos los dulces amorosos hurtos miras, y con tu curso alegras o entristeces a aquel que en tu silencio sus enojos a quien los causa dice, o al que retiras 5

de gusto tal y espacio no le ofreces: si acaso no careces de tu benignidad para conmigo, pues ya con sólo hablar me satisfago, y sabes cuanto hago, 10

no es mucho que ahora escuches lo que digo, que mi voz lastimera saldrá con la doliente ánima fuera.

Ya mi cansada voz, ya mis lamentos bien poco ofenderán al aire vano, 15
pues a término tal soy reducido, que ofrece amor a los airados vientos mis esperanzas, y en ajena mano ha puesto el bien que tuve merecido.

Será el fruto cogido 20 que sembró mi amoroso pensamiento y regaron mis lágrimas cansadas, por las afortunadas

manos a quien faltó merescimiento y sobró la ventura, 25
que allana lo difícil y asegura.

Pues el que vee su gloria convertida en tan amarga dolorosa pena, y tomando su bien cualquier camino, ¿por qué no acaba la enojosa vida? 30

¿Por qué no rompe la vital cadena contra todas las fuerzas del destino?

Poco a poco camino

al dulce trance de la amarga muerte, y así, atrevido aunque cansado brazo, 35
sufrid el embarazo

del vivir, pues ensalza nuestra suerte saber que a amor le place qu'el dolor haga lo qu'el hierro hace.

Cierta mi muerte está, pues no es posible 40 que viva aquél que tiene la esperanza tan muerta y tan ajeno está de gloria;
pero temo que amor haga imposible mi muerte, y que una falsa confianza dé vida, a mi pesar, a la memoria. 45

Mas, ¿qué?, si por la historia de mis pasados bienes la poseo, y miro bien que todos son pasados, y los graves cuidados que triste agora en su lugar poseo, 50
ella será más parte
para que della y del vivir me aparte.

¡Ay, bien único y solo al alma mía, sol que mi tempestad aserenaste, término
del valor que se desea! 55

¿Será posible que se llega el día donde he de conocer que me olvidaste, y que permita amor que yo le vea?

Primero que esto sea,
primero que tu blanco hermoso cuello 60
esté de ajenos brazos rodeado, primero que el dorado
-oro es mejor decir-de tu cabello a Daranio enriquezca,
con fenecer mi vida el mal fenezca. 65

Nadie por fe te tuvo merescida mejor que yo; mas veo que es fe muerta la que con obras no se manifiesta.

Si se estimara el entregar la vida al dolor cierto y a la gloria incierta, 70
pudiera yo esperar alegre fiesta; mas no se admite en esta cruda ley que amor usa el buen deseo, pues es proverbio antiguo entre amadores, que son obras amores; 75
y yo, que por mi mal sólo poseo la voluntad de hacellas, ¿qué no m'ha de faltar faltando en ellas?

En ti pensaba yo que se rompiera esta ley del avaro amor usada, 80 pastora, y que los ojos levantaras a una alma de la tuya prisionera, y a tu proprio querer tan ajustada, que si la conocieras, la estimaras.

Pensé que no trocaras 85
una fe que dio muestras de tan buena por una que quilata sus deseos con los vanos arreos
de la riqueza, de cuidados llena: entregástete al oro, 90
por entregarme a mí contino al lloro.

Abatida pobreza, causadora deste dolor que me atormenta el alma, aquel te loa que jamás te mira.

Turbóse en ver tu rostro mi pastora, 95
a su amor tu aspereza puso en calma; y así, por no encontrarte, el pie retira.
Mal contigo se aspira
a conseguir intentos amorosos: tú derribas las altas esperanzas, 100
y siembras mil mudanzas
en femeniles pechos codiciosos; tú jamás perfeccionas con amor el valor de las personas.

Sol es el oro cuyos rayos ciegan 105
la vista más aguda, si se ceba en la vana apariencia del provecho.
A liberales manos no se niegan las que gustan de hacer notoria prueba de un
blando, codicioso, hermoso pecho. 110
Oro tuerce el derecho
de la limpia intención y fe sincera, y más que la firmeza de un amante, acaba un diamante,
pues su dureza vuelve un pecho cera, 115
por más duro que sea,
pues se le da con él lo que desea.

De ti me pesa, dulce mi enemiga, que tantas tuyas puras perfecciones con una avara muestra has afeado. 120
Tanto del oro te mostraste amiga, que echaste a las espaldas mis pasiones y al olvido entregaste mi cuidado.
En fin, ¡que te has casado!
¡Casado te has, pastora! El cielo haga 125 tan buena tu elección como querías, y de las penas mías injustas no rescibas justa paga; mas, ¡ay!, que el cielo amigo da premio a la virtud, y al mal, castigo. 130

Aquí dio fin a su canto el lastimado Mireno, con muestras de tanto dolor, que le causó a todos los que escuchándole estaban, principalmente a los que le conocían y sabían sus virtudes, gallarda disposición y honroso trato. Y, después de haber dicho entre los pastores algunos discursos sobre la estraña condición de las mujeres, en especial sobre el casamiento de Silveria, que, olvidada del amor y bondad de Mireno, a las riquezas de Daranio se había entregado, deseosos de que Silerio diese fin a su cuento, puesto silencio a todo, sin ser menester pedírselo, él comenzó a seguir diciendo: -«Llegado, pues, el día del riguroso trance, habiéndose quedado Nísida media legua antes de la villa en unos jardines, como conmigo había concertado, con excusa que dio a sus padres de no hallarse bien dispuesta, al partirme della me encargó la brevedad de mi tornada con la señal de la toca, porque, en traerla o no, ella entendiese el bueno o el mal suceso de Timbrio. Tornéselo yo a prometer, agraviándome de que tanto me lo encargase; y con esto me despedí della y de su hermana, que con ella se quedaba. Y, llegado al puesto del combate, y llegada la hora de comenzarle, después de haber hecho los padrinos de entrambos las ceremonias y amonestaciones que en tal caso se requieren, puestos los dos caballeros en el estacado, al temeroso son de una ronca trompeta, se acometieron con tanta destreza y arte que causaba admiración en quien los miraba. Pero el amor, o la razón -que es lo más cierto-, que a Timbrio favorecía, le dio tal esfuerzo que, aunque a costa de algunas heridas, en poco espacio puso a su contrario de suerte que, tiniéndole a sus pies herido y desangrado, le importunaba que si quería salvar la vida, se rindiese. Pero el desdichado Pransiles le persuadía que le acabase de matar, pues le era más fácil a él, y de menos daño, pasar por mil muertes que rendirse una. Mas el generoso ánimo de Timbrio es de manera que, ni quiso matar a su enemigo, ni menos que se confesase por rendido; sólo se contentó con que dijese y conociese que era tan bueno Timbrio como él, lo cual Pransiles confesó de buena gana, pues hacía en esto tan poco, que, sin verse en aquel término, pudiera muy bien decirlo.

»Todos los circunstantes, que entendieron lo que Timbrio con su enemigo había pasado, lo alabaron y estimaron en mucho. Y, apenas hube yo visto el feliz suceso de mi amigo, cuando, con alegría increíble y presta ligereza, volví a dar las nuevas a Nísida. Pero, ¡ay de mí!, que el descuido de entonces me ha puesto en el cuidado de agora. ¡Oh memoria, memoria mía! ¿Por qué no la tuviste para lo que tanto me importaba? Mas creo que estaba ordenado en mi ventura que el principio de aquella alegría fuese el remate y fin de todos mis contentos. Yo volví a ver a Nísida con la presteza que he dicho, pero volví sin ponerme la blanca toca al brazo. Nísida, que con crecido deseo estaba esperando y mirando desde unos altos corredores mi tornada, viéndome volver sin la toca, entendió que algún siniestro revés a Timbrio había sucedido, y creyólo y sintiólo de manera que, sin ser parte otra cosa, faltándole todos los espíritus, cayó en el suelo con tan extraño desmayo que todos por muerta la tuvieron. Cuando ya yo llegué, hallé a toda la gente de su casa alborotada, y a su hermana haciendo mil extremos de dolor sobre el cuerpo de la triste Nísida. Cuando yo la vi en tal estado, creyendo firmemente que era muerta y viendo que la fuerza del dolor me iba sacando de sentido, temeroso que, estando fuera dél, no diese o descubriese algunas muestras de mis pensamientos, me salí de la casa, y poco a poco volvía a dar las desdichadas nuevas al desdichado Timbrio. Pero, como me hubiesen privado las ansias de mi fatiga las fuerzas de cuerpo y alma, no fueron tan ligeros mis pasos que no lo hubiesen sido más otros que la triste nueva a los padres de Nísida llevasen, certificándoles cierto que de un agudo paracismo había quedado muerta. Debió de oír esto Timbrio, y debió de quedar cual yo quedé, si no quedó peor; sólo sé decir que cuando llegué a do pensaba hallarle, era ya algo anochecido, y supe de uno de sus padrinos que con el otro, y por la posta, se había partido a Nápoles, con muestras de tanto descontento, como si de la contienda vencido y deshonorado salido hubiera. Luego imaginé yo lo que ser podía, y púseme luego en camino para seguirle; y, antes que a Nápoles llegase, tuve nuevas ciertas de que Nísida no era muerta, sino que le había dado un desmayo que le duró veinte y cuatro horas, al cabo de las cuales había vuelto en sí con muchas lágrimas y sospiros. Con la certidumbre desta nueva me consolé, y con más contento llegué a Nápoles, pensando hallar allí a Timbrio; pero no fue así, porque el caballero con quien él había venido me certificó que, en llegando a Nápoles, se partió sin decir cosa alguna, y que no sabía a qué parte; sólo imaginaba que, según le vio triste y malencólico después de la batalla, que no podía creer sino que a desesperarse hubiese ido.

»Nuevas fueron estas que me tornaron a mis primeras lágrimas; y aun no contenta mi ventura con esto, ordenó que, al cabo de pocos días, llegasen a Nápoles los padres de Nísida, sin ella y sin su hermana, las cuales, según supe y según era pública voz, entrambas a dos se habían ausentado una noche viniendo con sus padres a Nápoles, sin que se supiese dellas nueva alguna. Tan confuso quedé con esto, que no sabía qué hacerme ni decirme; y, estando puesto en esta confusión tan estraña, vine a saber, aunque no muy cierto, que Timbrio, en el puerto de Gaeta, en una gruesa nave que para España iba, se había embarcado. Y, pensando que podría ser verdad, me vine luego a España, y en Jerez y en todas las partes que imaginé que podría estar, le he buscado sin hallar dél rastro alguno. Finalmente, he venido a la ciudad de Toledo, donde están todos los parientes de los padres de Nísida, y lo que he alcanzado a saber es que ellos se vuelven a Toledo sin haber sabido nuevas de sus hijas. Viéndome, pues, yo ausente de Timbrio, ajeno de Nísida, y considerando que ya que los hallase, ha de ser para gusto suyo y perdición mía, cansado ya y desengañado de las cosas deste falso mundo en que vivimos, he acordado de volver el pensamiento a mejor norte, y gastar lo poco que de vivir me queda en servicio del que estima los deseos y las obras en el punto que merescen. Y así, he escogido este hábito que veis y la ermita que habéis visto, adonde en dulce soledad reprima mis deseos y encamine mis obras a mejor paradero, puesto que, como viene de tan atrás la corrida de las malas inclinaciones que hasta aquí he tenido, no son tan fáciles de parar que no trascorran algo y vuelva la memoria a combatirme, representándome las pasadas cosas; y, cuando en estos puntos me veo, al son de aquella arpa que escogí por compañera en mi soledad, procuro aliviar la pesada carga de mis cuidados, hasta que el cielo le tenga y se acuerde de llamarme a mejor vida.» Éste es, pastores, el suceso de mi desventura; y si he sido largo en contárosle, es porque no ha sido ella corta en fatigarme. Lo que os ruego es me dejéis volver a mi ermita, porque, aunque vuestra compañía me es agradable, he llegado a términos que ninguna cosa me da más gusto que la soledad; y de aquí entenderéis la vida que paso y el mal que sostengo.

Acabó con esto Silerio su cuento, pero no las lágrimas con que muchas veces le había acompañado. Los pastores le consolaron en ellas lo mejor que pudieron, especialmente Damón y Tirsi, los cuales con muchas razones le persuadieron a no perder la esperanza de ver a su amigo Timbrio con más contento que él sabría imaginar, pues no era posible sino que tras tanta fortuna aserenase el cielo, del cual se debía esperar que no consintiría que la falsa nueva de la muerte de Nísida a noticia de Timbrio con más verdadera relación no viniese antes que la desesperación le acabase. Y que de Nísida se podía creer y conjeturar que, por ver a Timbrio ausente, se habría partido en su busca; y que si entonces la Fortuna por tan estraños accidentes los había apartado, agora por otros no menos estraños sabría juntarlos. Todas estas razones y otras muchas que le dijeron le consolaron algo, pero no de manera que despertase en él la esperanza de verse en vida más contenta; ni aun él la procuraba, por parecerle que la que había escogido era la que más le convenía.

Gran parte era ya pasada de la noche, cuando los pastores acordaron de reposar el poco tiempo que hasta el día quedaba, en el cual se habían de celebrar las bodas de Daranio y Silveria. Mas, apenas había dejado la blanca aurora el enfadoso lecho del celoso marido, cuando dejaron los suyos todos los más pastores de la aldea, y cada cual, como mejor pudo, comenzó por su parte a regocijar la fiesta: cuál trayendo verdes ramos para adornar la puerta de los desposados, y cuál con su tamborino y flauta les daba la madrugada; acullá se oía la regocijada gaita; acá sonaba el acordado rabel; allí, el antiguo salterio; aquí, los cursados albogues; quién con coloradas cintas adornaba sus castañetas para los esperados bailes; quién pulía y repulía sus rústicos aderezos para mostrarse galán a los ojos de alguna su querida pastorcilla; de modo que, por cualquier parte de la aldea que se fuese, todo sabía a contento, placer y fiesta. Sólo el triste y desdichado Mireno era aquél a quien todas estas alegrías causaban summa tristeza; el cual, habiéndose salido de la aldea por no ver hacer sacrificio de su gloria, se subió en una costezuela que junto al aldea estaba, y allí, sentándose al pie de un antiguo fresno, puesta la mano en la mejilla y la caperuza encajada hasta los ojos, que en el suelo tenía clavados, comenzó a imaginar el desdichado punto en que se hallaba y cuán sin poderlo estorbar, ante sus ojos, había de ver coger el fruto de sus deseos. Y esta consideración le tenía de suerte, que lloraba tan tierna y amargamente, que ninguno en tal trance le viera que con lágrimas no le acompañara. A esta sazón, Damón y Tirsi, Elicio y Erastro se levantaron, y, asomándose a una ventana que al campo salía, lo primero en quien pusieron los ojos fue en el lastimado Mireno; y, en verle de la suerte que estaba, conocieron bien el dolor que padecía, y, movidos a compasión, determinaron todos de ir a consolarle, como lo hicieran si Elicio no les rogara que le dejaran ir a él solo, porque imaginaba que por ser Mireno tan amigo suyo, con él más abiertamente que con otro su dolor comunicaría. Los pastores se lo concedieron, y, yendo allá Elicio, hallóle tan fuera de sí y tan en su dolor trasportado, que ni le conoció Mireno, ni le habló palabra; lo cual visto por Elicio, hizo señal a los demás pastores que viniesen, los cuales, temiendo algún extraño accidente a Mireno sucedido, pues Elicio con priesa los llamaba, fueron luego allá, y vieron que estaba Mireno con los ojos tan fijos en el suelo, y tan sin hacer movimiento alguno, que una estatua semejaba, pues con la llegada de Elicio, ni con la de Tirsi, Damón y Erastro, no volvió de su extraño embelesamiento, si no fue que, a cabo de un buen espacio de tiempo, casi como entre dientes, comenzó a decir: -¿Tú eres Silveria, Silveria? Si tú lo eres, yo no soy Mireno; y si soy Mireno, tú no eres Silveria: porque no es posible que esté Silveria sin Mireno, o Mireno sin Silveria. Pues, ¿quién soy yo, desdichado? ¿O quién eres tú, desconocida? Yo bien sé que no soy Mireno, porque tú no has querido ser Silveria; a lo menos, la Silveria que ser debías y yo pensaba que fueras.

A esta sazón, alzó los ojos, y, como vio alrededor de sí los cuatro pastores y conoció entre ellos a Elicio, se levantó, y, sin dejar su amargo llanto, le echó los brazos al cuello, diciéndole: -¡Ay, verdadero amigo mío, y cómo ahora no tendrás ocasión de envidiar mi estado, como le envidiabas cuando de Silveria me veías favorecido; pues si entonces me llamaste venturoso, ahora puedes llamarme desdichado y trocar todos los títulos alegres que en aquel tiempo me dabas, en los de pesar que ahora puedes darme! Yo sí que te podré llamar dichoso, Elicio, pues te consuela más la esperanza que tienes de ser querido, que no te fatiga el verdadero temor de ser olvidado.

-Confuso me tienes, ¡oh Mireno! -respondió Elicio-, de ver los extremos que haces por lo que Silveria ha hecho, sabiendo que tiene padres a quien ha sido justo haber obedecido.

-Si ella tuviera amor -replicó Mireno-, poco inconveniente era la obligación de los padres para dejar de cumplir con lo que al amor debía; de do vengo a considerar, ¡oh Elicio!, que si me quiso bien, hizo mal en casarse, y si fue fingido el amor que me mostraba, hizo peor en engañarme; y ofrécame el desengaño a tiempo que no puede aprovecharme si no es con dejar en sus manos la vida.

-No está en términos la tuya, Mireno -replicó Elicio-, que tengas por remedio el acabarla, pues podría ser que la mudanza de Silveria no estuviese en la voluntad, sino en la fuerza de la obediencia de sus padres; y si tú la quisiste limpia y honestamente doncella, también la puedes querer agora casada, correspondiendo ella ahora como entonces a tus buenos y honestos deseos.

-Mal conoces a Silveria, Elicio -respondió Mireno-, pues imaginas della que ha de hacer cosa de que pueda ser notada.

-Esta misma razón que has dicho te condena -respondió Elicio-, pues si tú, Mireno, sabes de Silveria que no hará cosa que mal le esté, en la que ha hecho no debe de haber errado.

-Si no ha errado -respondió Mireno-, ha acertado a quitarme todo el buen suceso que de mis buenos pensamientos esperaba, y sólo en esto la culpo: que nunca me advirtió deste daño; antes, temiéndome dél, con firme juramento que me aseguraba que eran imaginaciones mías, y que nunca a la suya había llegado pensar con Daranio casarse, ni se casaría, si conmigo no, con él ni con otro alguno, aunque aventurara en ello quedar en perpetua desgracia con sus padres y parientes; y, debajo deste seguro y prometimiento, faltar y romper la fe agora de la manera que has visto, ¿qué razón hay que tal consienta, o qué corazón que tal sufra?

Aquí tornó Mireno a renovar su llanto, y aquí de nuevo le tuvieron lástima los pastores. A este instante, llegaron dos zagales adonde ellos estaban, que el uno era pariente de Mireno y el otro criado de Daranio, que a llamar a Elicio, Tirsi, Damón y Erastro venía, porque las fiestas de su desposorio querían comenzarse. Pesábales a los pastores de dejar solo a Mireno, pero aquel pastor su pariente se ofreció a quedar con él. Y aun Mireno dijo a Elicio que se quería ausentar de aquella tierra, por no ver cada día a los ojos la causa de su desventura. Elicio le loó su determinación, y le encargó que, doquiera que estuviese, le avisase de cómo le iba. Mireno se lo prometió, y, sacando del seno un papel, le rogó que, en hallando comodidad, se le diese a Silveria; y con esto se despidió de todos los pastores, no sin muestras de mucho dolor y tristeza. El cual no se hubo bien apartado de su presencia, cuando Elicio, deseoso de saber lo que en el papel venía, viendo que, pues estaba abierto, importaba poco leerle, le descogió, y, convidando a los otros pastores a escucharle, vio que en él venían escriptos estos versos:

MIRENO A SILVERIA

El pastor que te ha entregado lo más de cuanto tenía, pastora, agora te envía
lo menos que le'ha quedado; que es este pobre papel, 5
adonde claro verás
la fe que en ti no hallarás y el dolor que queda en él.
Pero poco al caso hace
darte desto cuenta estrecha, 10
si mi fe no me aprovecha
y mi mal te satisface.
No pienses que es mi intención quejarme porque me dejas, que llegan tarde las quejas 15
de mi temprana pasión.

Tiempo fue ya que escucharas el cuento de mis enojos,
y aun, si lloraran mis ojos, las lágrimas enjugaras. 20
Entonces era Mireno
el que era de ti mirado;
mas ¡ay, cómo te has trocado, tiempo bueno, tiempo bueno!
Si durara aquel engaño, 25
templárase mi desgusto,
pues más vale un falso gusto, que un notorio y cierto daño.
Pero tú, por quien se ordena mi terrible mala andanza, 30
has hecho con tu mudanza
falso el bien, cierta la pena.
Tus palabras lisonjeras
y mis crédulos oídos,
me han dado bienes fingidos 35
y males que son de veras.
Los bienes, con su apariencia, crecieron mi sanidad;
los males, con su verdad,
han doblado mi dolencia. 40
Por esto juzgo y discierno, por cosa cierta y notoria, que tiene el amor su gloria a las puertas del infierno, y que un desdén acarrea 45
y un olvido en un momento
desde la gloria al tormento al que en amar no se emplea.

Con tanta presteza has hecho este mudamiento extraño, 50 que estoy ya dentro del daño y no salgo del provecho:
porque imagino que ayer
era cuando me querías,
o a lo menos lo fingías, 55
que es lo que se ha de creer; y el agradable sonido

de tus palabras sabrosas
y razones amorosas
aún me suena en el oído. 60
Estas memorias süaves
al fin me dan más tormento, pues tus palabras el viento llevó, y las obras, quien sabes.

¿Eras tú la que jurabas 65
que se acabasen tus días si a Mireno no querías
sobre todo cuanto amabas?
¿Eres tú, Silveria, quien
hizo de mí tal caudal, 70
que siendo todo tu mal,
me tenías por tu bien?
¡Oh, qué títulos te diera
de ingrata, como mereces,
si como tú me aborreces, 75
también yo te aborreciera!
Mas no puedo aprovecharme
del medio de aborrecerte,

que estimo más el quererte que tú has hecho el olvidarme. 80 Triste gemido a mi canto
ha dado tu mano fiera;
invierno a mi primavera,
y a mi risa amargo llanto.
Mi gasajo ha vuelto en luto, 85
y de mis blandos amores
cambio en abrojos las flores y en veneno el dulce fruto.
Y aun dirás -y esto me dañaque es el haberte casado 90
y el haberme así olvidado
una honesta honrosa hazaña.

¡Disculpa fuera admitida,
si no te fuera notorio
que estaba en tu desposorio 95
el fin de mi triste vida!
Mas, en fin, tu gusto fue
gusto; pero no fue justo,

pues con premio tan injusto pagó mi inviolable fe; 100
la cual, por ver que se ofrece de mostrar la fe que alcanza, ni la muda tu
mudanza,
ni mi mal la desfallece.
Quien esto vendrá a entender 105
cierto estoy que no se asombre, viendo al fin que yo soy hombre, y tú, Silveria, mujer,
adonde la ligereza
hace de contino asiento, 110
y adonde en mí el sufrimiento es otra naturaleza.
Ya te contemplo casada,
y de serlo arrepentida,
porque ya es cosa sabida 115
que no estarás firme en nada.
Procura alegre llevarlo
el yugo que echaste al cuello, que podrás aborrecello

y no podrás desecharlo. 120
Mas eres tan inhumana
y de tan mudable ser,
que lo que quisiste ayer
has de aborrecer mañana.
Y así, por estraña cosa, 125
dirá aquél que de ti hable: «Hermosa, pero mudable;
mudable, pero hermosa».

No parecieron mal los versos de Mireno a los pastores, sino la ocasión a que se habían hecho, considerando con cuánta presteza la mudanza de Silveria le había traído a punto de desamparar la amada patria y queridos amigos, temeroso cada uno que en el suceso de sus pretensiones lo mismo le sucediese. Entrados, pues, en el aldea y llegados adonde Daranio y Silveria estaban, la fiesta se comenzó tan alegre y regocijadamente, cuanto en las riberas de Tajo en muchos tiempos se había visto; que, por ser Daranio uno de los más ricos pastores de toda aquella comarca, y Silveria de las más hermosas pastoras de toda la ribera, acudieron a sus bodas toda o la más pastoría de aquellos contornos. Y así, se hizo una célebre junta de discretos pastores y hermosas pastoras, y entre los que a los demás en muchas y diversas habilidades se aventajaron, fueron el triste Orompo, el celoso Orfenio, el ausente Crisio y el desamado Masilio, mancebos todos y todos enamorados, aunque de diferentes pasiones oprimidos; porque al triste Orompo fatigaba la temprana muerte de su querida Listea; y al celoso Orfenio, la insufrible rabia de los celos, siendo enamorado de la hermosa pastora Eandra; al ausente Crisio, el verse apartado de Claraura, bella y discreta pastora, a quien él por único bien suyo tenía; y al desesperado Marsilio, el desamor que para con él en el pecho de Belisa se encerraba. Eran todos amigos y de una misma aldea, y la pasión del uno el otro no la ignoraba; antes, en dolorosa competencia, muchas veces se habían juntado a encarecer cada cual la causa de su tormento, procurando cada uno mostrar, como mejor podía, que su dolor a cualquier otro se aventajaba, teniendo por summa gloria ser en la pena mejorado; y tenían todos tal ingenio, o por mejor decir, tal dolor padecían, que comoquiera que le significasen, mostraban ser el mayor que imaginar se podía. Por estas disputas y competencias eran famosos y conocidos en todas las riberas de Tajo, y habían puesto deseo a Tirsi y a Damón de conocerlos; y, viéndolos allí juntos, unos a otros se hicieron corteses y agradables rescibimientos; principalmente, todos con admiración miraban a los dos pastores Tirsi y Damón, hasta allí dellos solamente por fama conocidos.

A esta sazón, salió el rico pastor Daranio a la serrana vestido: traía camisa alta de cuello plegado, almilla de frisa, sayo verde escotado, zaragüelles de delgado lienzo, antiparas azules, zapato redondo, cinto tachonado, y de la color del sayo una cuarteada caperuza. No menos salió bien aderezada su esposa Silveria, porque venía con saya y cuerpos leonados guarnecidos de raso blanco, camisa de pechos labrada de azul y verde, gorguera de hilo amarillo sembrado de argentería (invención de Galatea y Florisa, que la vistieron), garbín turquesado con fluecos de encarnada seda, alcorque dorado, zapatillas justas, corales ricos y sortija de oro; y, sobre todo, su belleza, que más que todo la adornaba. Salió luego tras ella la sin par Galatea, como sol tras el aurora, y su amiga Florisa, con otras muchas y hermosas pastoras que, por honrar las bodas, a ellas habían venido, entre las cuales también iba Teolinda, con cuidado de hurtar el rostro a los ojos de Damón y Tirsi, por no ser de ellos conocida. Y luego las pastoras, siguiendo a los pastores que guiaban, al son de muchos pastoriles instrumentos, hacia el templo se encaminaron, en el cual espacio le tuvieron Elicio y Erastro de cebar los ojos en el hermoso rostro de Galatea, deseando que durara aquel camino más que la larga peregrinación de Ulises. Y, con el contento de verla, iba tan fuera de sí Erastro que hablando con Elicio le dijo: -¿Qué miras, pastor, si a Galatea no miras? Pero, ¿cómo podrás mirar el sol de sus cabellos, el cielo de su frente, las estrellas de sus ojos, la nieve de su rostro, la grana de sus mejillas, el color de sus labios, el marfil de sus dientes, el cristal de su cuello, el mármol de su pecho?

-Todo eso he podido ver, ¡oh Erastro! -respondió Elicio-, y ninguna cosa de cuantas has dicho es causa de mi tormento, si no es la aspereza de su condición, que si no fuera tal como tú sabes, todas las gracias y bellezas que en Galatea conoces fueran ocasión de mayor gloria nuestra.

-Bien dices -dijo Erastro-; pero todavía no me podrás negar que a no ser Galatea tan hermosa, no fuera tan deseada, y a no ser tan deseada, no fuera tanta nuestra pena, pues toda ella nace del deseo.

-No te puedo yo negar, Erastro -respondió Elicio-, que todo cualquier dolor y pesadumbre no nazca de la privación y falta de aquello que deseamos; mas juntamente con esto te quiero decir que ha perdido conmigo mucho la calidad del amor con que yo pensé que a Galatea querías; porque si solamente la quieres por ser hermosa, muy poco tiene que agradecerte, pues no habrá ningún hombre, por rústico que sea, que la mire que no la desea, porque la belleza, dondequiera que está, trae consigo el hacer desear. Así que, a este simple deseo, por ser tan natural, ningún premio se le debe, porque si se le debiera, con sólo desear el cielo le tuviéramos merecido; mas ya ves, Erastro, ser esto tan al revés como nuestra verdadera ley nos lo tiene mostrado. Y, puesto caso que la hermosura y belleza sea una principal parte para atraernos a desearla y a procurar gozarla, el que fuere verdadero enamorado no ha de tener tal gozo por último fin suyo, sino que, aunque la belleza le acarree este deseo, la ha de querer solamente por ser bueno, sin que otro algún interés le mueva. Y éste se puede llamar, aun en las cosas de acá, perfecto y verdadero amor, y es digno de ser agradecido y premiado, como vemos que premia conocida y aventajadamente el Hacedor de todas las cosas a aquellos que sin moverles otro interés alguno de temor, de pena o de esperanza de gloria, le quieren, le aman y le sirven solamente por ser bueno y digno de ser amado; y ésta es la última y mayor perfección que en el amor divino se encierra, y en el humano también, cuando no se quiere más de por ser bueno lo que se ama, sin haber error de entendimiento; porque muchas veces lo malo nos parece bueno y lo bueno malo; y así, amamos lo uno y aborrecemos lo otro, y este tal amor no merece premio, sino castigo. Quiero inferir de todo lo que he dicho, ¡oh Erastro!, que si tú quieres y amas la hermosura de Galatea con intención de gozarla, y en esto para el fin de tu deseo, sin pasar adelante a querer su virtud, su acrescentamiento de fama, su salud, su vida y bienes, entiende que no amas como debes, ni debes ser remunerado como quieres.

Quisiera Erastro replicar a Elicio y darle a entender cómo no entendía bien del amor con que a Galatea amaba, pero estorbólo el son de la zampoña del desamorado Lenio, el cual quiso también hallarse a las bodas de Daranio y regocijar la fiesta con su canto. Y así, puesto delante de los desposados, en tanto que al templo llegaban, al son del rabel de Eugenio, estos versos fue cantando:

LENIO

¡Desconocido, ingrato Amor, que asombras a veces los gallardos corazones, y con vanas figuras, vanas sombras, pones al alma libre mil prisiones!, si de ser dios te precias, y te nombras 5

con tan subido nombre, no perdones al que, rendido al lazo de Himineo, rindiere a nuevo ñudo su deseo.

En conservar la ley pura y sincera del sancto matrimonio pon tu fuerza; 10

descoge en este campo tu bandera; haz a tu condición en esto fuerza, que bella flor, que dulce fruto espera, por pequeño trabajo, el que se esfuerza a llevar este yugo como debe, 15 que, aunque parece carga, es carga leve.

Tú puedes, si te olvidas de tus hechos y de tu condición tan desabrida, hacer alegres tálamos y lechos do el yugo conyugal a dos anida. 20

Enciérrate en sus almas y en sus pechos hasta que acabe el curso de su vida y vayan a gozar, como se espera, de la agradable eterna primavera.

Deja las pastoriles cabañuelas, 25

y al libre pastorcillo hacer su oficio; vuela más alto ya, pues tanto vuelas, y aspira a mejor grado y ejercicio.

En vano te fatigas y desvelas en hacer de las almas sacrificio, 30 si no las rindes con mejor intento al dulce de Himineo ayuntamiento.

Aquí puedes mostrar la poderosa mano de tu poder maravilloso, haciendo que

la nueva tierna esposa 35

quiera, y que sea querida de su esposo, sin que aquella infernal rabia celosa les turbe su contento y su reposo, ni el desdén sacudido y zahareño les prive del sabroso y dulce sueño. 40

Mas si, ¡pérfido Amor!, nunca escuchadas fueron de ti plegarias de tu amigo, bien serán estas mías desechadas, que te soy y seré siempre enemigo.

Tu condición, tus obras mal miradas, 45

de quien es todo el mundo buen testigo, hacen que yo no espere de tu mano contento alegre, venturoso y sano.

Ya se maravillaban los que al desamorado Lenio escuchando iban, de ver con cuanta mansedumbre las cosas de amor trataba, llamándole dios y de mano poderosa, cosa que jamás le habían oído decir. Mas, habiendo oído los versos con que acabó su canto, no pudieron dejar de reírse, porque ya les pareció que se iba colerizando, y, que si adelante en su canto pasara, él pusiera al amor como otras veces solía; pero faltóle el tiempo, porque se acabó el camino. Y así, llegados al templo y hechas en él por los sacerdotes las acostumbradas ceremonias, Daranio y Silveria quedaron en perpetuo y estrecho ñudo ligados, no sin envidia de muchos que los miraban, ni sin dolor de algunos que la hermosura de Silveria codiciaban; pero a todo dolor sobrepujara el que sintiera el sin ventura Mireno, si a este espectáculo se hallara presente. Vueltos, pues, los desposados del templo con la misma compañía que habían llevado, llegaron a la plaza de la aldea, donde hallaron las mesas puestas, y adonde quiso Daranio hacer públicamente demostración de sus riquezas, haciendo a todo el pueblo un generoso y sumptuoso convite. Estaba la plaza tan enramada que una hermosa verde floresta parecía, entretejidas las ramas por cima de tal modo, que los agudos rayos del sol en todo aquel circuito no hallaban entrada para calentar el fresco suelo, que cubierto con muchas espadañas y con mucha diversidad de flores se mostraba.

Allí, pues, con general contento de todos, se solemnizó el generoso banquete, al son de muchos pastorales instrumentos, sin que diesen menos gusto que el que suelen dar las acordadas músicas que en los reales palacios se acostumbran. Pero lo que más autorizó la fiesta fue ver que, en alzándose las mesas, en el mismo lugar, con mucha presteza, hicieron un tablado, para efecto de que los cuatro discretos y lastimados pastores, Orompo, Marsilo, Crisio y Orfenio, por honrar las bodas de su amigo Daranio, y por satisfacer el deseo que Tirsi y Damón tenían de escucharles, querían allí en público recitar una égloga que ellos mismos de la ocasión de sus mismos dolores habían compuesto. Acomodados, pues, en sus asientos todos los pastores y pastoras que allí estaban, después que la zampoña de Erastro y la lira de Lenio y los otros instrumentos hicieron prestar a los presentes un sosegado y maravilloso silencio, el primero que se mostró en el humilde teatro fue el triste Orompo, con un pellico negro vestido y un cayado de amarillo boj en la mano, el remate del cual era una fea figura de la muerte; venía con hojas de funesto ciprés coronado, insinias todas de la tristeza que en él reinaba por la inmadura muerte de su querida Listea; y, después que con triste semblante los llorosos ojos a una y a otra parte hubo tendido, con muestras de infinito dolor y amargura, rompió el silencio con semejantes razones:

OROMPO

Salid de lo hondo del pecho cuitado, palabras sangrientas, con muerte mezcladas; y si los suspiros os tienen atadas, abrid y romped el siniestro costado.

El aire os impide, que está ya inflamado 5
del fiero veneno de vuestros acentos; salid, y siquiera os lleven los vientos, que todo mi bien también me han llevado.

Poco perdéis en veros perdidas, pues ya os ha faltado el alto sujeto 10 por quien en estilo grave y perfecto hablábades cosas de punto subidas;
notadas un tiempo y bien conocidas fuistes por dulces, alegres, sabrosas; agora
por tristes, amargas, llorosas, 15
seréis de la tierra y del cielo tenidas.

Pero, aunque salgáis, palabras, temblando, ¿con cuáles podréis decir lo que siento?, si es incapaz mi fiero tormento de irse cual es al vivo pintando. 20

Mas, ya que me falta el cómo y el cuándo de significar mi pena y mi mengua, aquello que falta y no puede la lengua, suplan mis ojos, contino llorando.

¡Oh muerte, que atajas y cortas el hilo 25
de mil pretensiones gustosas humanas, y en un volver de ojos las sierras allanas y haces iguales a Henares y al Nilo!

¿Por qué no templaste, traidora, el estilo tuyo cruel? ¿Por qué a mi despecho, 30

probaste en el blanco y más lindo pecho, de tu fiero alfanje la furia y el filo?

¿En qué te ofendían, ¡oh falsa!, los años tan tiernos y verdes de aquella cordera?

¿Por qué te mostraste con ella tan fiera? 35

¿Por qué en el suyo creciste mis daños?

¡Oh mi enemiga, y amiga de engaños!, de mí, que te busco, te escondes y ausentas, y quieres y trabas razones y cuentas con el que más teme tus males tamaños. 40

En años maduros, tu ley, tan injusta, pudiera mostrar su fuerza crecida, y no descargar la dura herida en quien del vivir ha poco que gusta.

Mas esa tu hoz, que todo lo ajusta, 45

y mando ni ruego jamás la doblega, así con rigor la flor tierna siega, como la caña ñudosa y robusta.

Cuando a Listea del suelo quitaste, tu ser, tu valor, tu fuerza, tu brío, 50 tu ira, tu mando y tu señorío con solo aquel triunfo al mundo mostraste.

Llevando a Listea, también te llevaste la gracia, el donaire, belleza y cordura mayor de la tierra, y en su sepultura 55

este bien todo con ella encerraste.

Sin ella, en tiniebla perpetua ha quedado mi vida penosa, que tanto se alarga, que es insufrible a mis hombros su carga: que es muerte la vida del que es desdichado. 60

Ni espero en fortuna, ni espero en el hado, ni espero en el tiempo, ni espero en el cielo, ni tengo de quién espere consuelo, ni es bien que se espere en mal tan sobrado.

¡Oh vos, que sentís qué cosa es dolores!, 65

venid y tomad consuelo en los míos; que en viendo su ahínco, sus fuerzas, sus bríos, veréis que los vuestros son mucho menores.

¿Dó estáis agora, gallardos pastores?

Crisio, Marsilo y Orfenio, ¿qué hacéis? 70

¿Por qué no venís? ¿Por qué no tenéis por más que los vuestros mis daños mayores?

Mas, ¿quién es aquel que asoma y que quiebra por la encrucijada de aqueste sendero?

Marsilo es, sin duda, de amor prisionero: 75

Belisa es la causa, a quien siempre celebra.

A éste le roe la fiera culebra del crudo desdén el pecho y el alma, y pasa su vida en tormenta sin calma, y aun no es, cual la mía, su suerte tan negra. 80

Él piensa qu'el mal qu'el alma le aqueja es más que el dolor de mi desventura.

Aquí será bien que entre esta espesura me esconda, por ver si acaso se queja.

Mas, ¡ay!, que a la pena que nunca me deja 85

pensar igualarla es gran desatino, pues abre la senda y cierra el camino al mal que se acerca y al bien que se aleja.

MARSILO

¡Pasos que al de la muerte me lleváis paso a paso, 90
forzoso he de acusar vuestra pereza!
Seguid tan dulce suerte,
que en este amargo paso
está mi bien y en vuestra ligereza.
Mirad que la dureza 95
de la enemiga mía
en el airado pecho,
contrario a mi provecho,
en su entereza está cual ser solía; huigamos, si es posible, 100
del áspero rigor suyo terrible.
¿A qué apartado clima,
a qué región incierta
iré a vivir, que pueda asegurarme del mal que me lastima, 105
del ansia triste y cierta

que no se ha de acabar hasta acabarme?
Ni estar quedo, o mudarme
a la arenosa Libia,
o al lugar donde habita 110
el fiero y blanco scita,
un solo punto mi dolor alivia: que no está mi contento
en hacer de lugares mudamiento.
Aquí y allí me alcanza 115
el desdén riguroso
de la sin par cruel pastora mía, sin que amor ni esperanza
un término dichoso
me puedan prometer en tal porfía. 120 ¡Belisa, luz del día,
gloria de la edad nuestra, si valen ya contigo
ruegos de un firme amigo, tiempla el rigor airado de tu diestra, 125

y el fuego deste mío
pueda en tu pecho deshacer el frío!
Más sorda a mi lamento,

más implacable y fiera
que a la voz del cansado marinero 130
el riguroso viento
qu'el mar turba y altera
y amenaza a la vida el fin postrero; mármol, diamante, acero, alpestre y dura roca, 135
robusta, antigua encina,
roble que nunca inclina
la altiva rama al cierzo que le toca: todo es blando y suave, comparado al rigor que'n tu alma cabe. 140
Mi duro amargo hado,
mi inexorable estrella,
mi voluntad, que todo lo consiente, me tienen condenado, Belisa ingrata y bella, 145
a que te sirva y ame eternamente.
Y, aunque tu hermosa frente, con riguroso ceño,
y tus serenos ojos
me anuncien mil enojos, 150

serás desta alma conocida dueño, en tanto que en el suelo
la cubriere mortal corpóreo velo.
¿Hay bien que se le iguale al mal que me atormenta? 155
¿Y hay mal en todo el mundo tan esquivo?
El uno y otro sale
de toda humana cuenta,
y aun yo sin ella en viva muerte vivo.
En el desdén avivo 160
mi fe, y allí se enciende
con el helado frío;
mirad qué desvarío,
y el dolor desusado que me ofende, y si podrá igualarse 165
al mal que más quisiere aventajarse.
Mas, ¿quién es el que mueve las ramas intrincadas
deste acopado mirto y verde asiento?

OROMPO

Un pastor que se atreve, 170
con razones fundadas

en la pura verdad de su tormento, mostrar que el sentimiento de su dolor
crescido

al tuyo se aventaja, 175
por más que tú le estimes, levantes y sublimes.

MARSILO

Vencido quedarás en tal baraja, Orompo, fiel amigo,
y tú mismo serás dello testigo. 180
Si de las ansias mías,
si de mi mal insano
la más mínima parte conocieras, cesaran tus porfías, Orompo, viendo llano 185
que tú penas de burla y yo de veras.

OROMPO

Haz, Marsilo, quimeras
de tu dolor extraño,
y al mío menoscaba
que la vida me acaba, 190
que yo espero sacarte d'ese engaño, mostrando al descubierto que el tuyo es sombra de mi mal, que's cierto.

Pero la voz sonora
de Crisio oigo que suena, 195
pastor que en la opinión se te parece; escuchémosle ahora, que su cansada pena

no menos que la tuya la engrandece.

MARSILO

Hoy el tiempo me ofrece 200
lugar y coyuntura
donde pueda mostraros
a entrambos y enteraros
de que sola la mía es desventura.

OROMPO

Atiende ahora, Marsilo, 205
la voz de Crisio y lamentable estilo.

CRISIO

¡Ay dura, ay importuna, ay triste ausencia!, ¡cuán fuera debió estar de conocerte el que igualó tu fuerza y violencia al poder invencible de la muerte!

210

Que, cuando con mayor rigor sentencia, ¿qué puede más su limitada suerte que deshacer el ñudo y recia liga que a cuerpo y alma estrechamente liga?

Tu duro alfanje a mayor mal se estiende, 215
pues un espíritu en dos mitades parte.

¡Oh milagros de amor que nadie entiende, ni se alcanzan por sciencia ni por arte!

¡Que deje su mitad con quien la enciende allá mi alma, y traiga acá la parte 220 más frágil, con la cual más mal se siente que estar mil veces de la vida ausente!

Ausente estoy de aquellos ojos bellos que serenaban la tormenta mía; ojos vida de aquél que pudo vellos, 225

si de allí no pasó la fantasía: que verlos y pensar de merescellos es loco atrevimiento y demasía.

Yo los vi, ¡desdichado!, y no los veo, y márame de verlos el deseo. 230

Deseo, y con razón, ver dividida, por acortar el término a mi daño, esta antigua amistad, que tiene unida mi alma al cuerpo con amor tamaño, que siendo de las carnes despedida 235 con ligereza presta y vuelo extraño, podrá tornar a ver aquellos ojos, que son descanso y gloria a sus enojos.

Enojos son la paga y recompensa que amor concede al amador ausente, 240 en quien se cifra el mayor mal y ofensa que en los males de amor s'encierra y siente.

Ni poner discreción a la defensa, ni un querer firme, levantado, ardiente, aprovecha a temprar deste tormento 245 la dura pena y el furor violento.

Violento es el rigor desta dolencia; pero junto con esto, es tan durable, que se acaba primero la paciencia, y aun de la vida el curso miserable. 250

Muertes, desvíos, celos, inclemencia de airado pecho, condición mudable, no atormentan así ni dañan tanto como este mal, que'l nombre aun pone espanto.

Espanto fuera si dolor tan fiero 255

dolores tan mortales no causara; pero todos son flacos, pues no muero, ausente de mi vida dulce y cara.

Mas cese aquí mi canto lastimero, que a compañía tan discreta y rara 260 como es la que allí veo, será justo que muestre al verla más sabroso gusto.

OROMPO

Gusto nos da, buen Crisio, tu presencia, y más viniendo a tiempo que podremos acabar nuestra antigua diferencia. 265

CRISIO

Orompo, si es tu gusto, comencemos, pues que juez de la contienda nuestra tan recto aquí en Marsilo le tendremos.

MARSILO

Indicio dais y conocida muestra del error en que os trae tan embebidos 270 esa vana opinión notoria vuestra, pues queréis que a los míos preferidos vuestros dolores, tan pequeños, sean, hartos llorados más que conocidos.

Mas, porque el suelo y cielo juntos vean 275

cuánto vuestro dolor es menos grave que las ansias que el alma me rodean, la más pequeña que en mi pecho cabe pienso mostrar en vuestra competencia, así como mi ingenio torpe sabe; 280

y dejaré a vosotros la sentencia y el juzgar si mi mal es muy más fuerte que el riguroso de la larga ausencia, o el amargo espantoso de la muerte, de quien entrambos os quejáis sin tiento, 285

llamando dura y corta a vuestra suerte.

OROMPO

Deso yo, soy, Marsilo, muy contento, pues la razón que tengo de mi parte el triunfo le asegura a mi tormento.

CRISIO

Aunque de exagerar me falta el arte, 290

veréis, cuando yo os muestre mi tristeza, cómo quedan las vuestras a una parte.

MARSILO

¿Qué ausencia llega a la inmortal dureza de mi pastora?, que es, con ser tan dura, señora universal de la belleza. 295

OROMPO

¡Oh, a qué buen tiempo llega y coyuntura Orfenio! ¿Veisle?, asoma. Estad atentos: oiréisle ponderar su desventura.

Celos es la ocasión de sus tormentos: celos, cuchillo y ciertos turbadores 300

de las paces de amor y los contentos.

CRISIO

Escuchad, que ya canta sus dolores.

ORFINIO

¡Oh sombra oscura que contino sigues a mi confusa triste fantasía; enfadosa tiniebla, siempre fría, 305 que a mi contento y a mi luz persigues!

¿Cuándo será que tu rigor mitigues, monstruo cruel y rigurosa harpía?

¿Qué ganas en turbarme la alegría, o qué bien en quitármele consigues? 310

Mas, si la condición de que te arreas se estiende a pretender quitar la vida al que te dio la tuya y te ha engendrado, no me debe admirar que de mí seas y de todo mi bien fiero homicida, 315

sino de verme vivo en tal estado.

OROMPO

Si el prado deleitoso,
Orfinio, te es alegre, cual solía en tiempo más dichoso,
ven; pasarás el día 320
en nuestra lastimada compañía.

Con los tristes el triste
bien ves que se acomoda fácilmente; ven, que aquí se resiste, par desta clara fuente, 325
del levantado sol el rayo ardiente.
Ven, y el usado estilo levanta, y como sueles te defiende de Crisio y de Marsilio, que cada cual pretende 330
mostrar que sólo es mal el que le ofende.
Yo solo, en este caso
contrario habré de ser a ti y a ellos, pues los males que paso
bien podré encarecellos, 335
mas no mostrar la menor parte dellos.

ORFINIO

No al gusto le es sabrosa
así a la corderuela deshambrida la yerba, ni gustosa
salud restituida 340
a aquel que ya la tuvo por perdida, como es a mí sabroso mostrar en la contienda que se ofrece que el dolor riguroso que el corazón padece 345
sobr'el mayor del suelo se engrandece.
Calle su mal sobrado
Orompo; encubra Crisio su dolencia; Marsilo esté callado:
muerte, desdén ni ausencia 350
no tengan con los celos competencia.
Pero si el cielo quiere que hoy salga a campo la contienda nuestra, comience el que quisiere, y dé a los otros muestra 355
de su dolor con torpe lengua o diestra: que no está en la elegancia y modo de

decir el fundamento y principal sustancia
del verdadero cuento 360
que en la pura verdad tiene su asiento.

CRISIO

Siento, pastor, que tu arrogancia mucha en esta lucha de pasiones nuestras dará mil muestras de tu desvarío.

ORFINIO

Tiempla ese brío, o muéstralo a su tiempo; 365

que es pasatiempo, Crisio, tu congoja: que el mal que afloja con volver el paso no hay que hacer caso de su sentimiento.

CRISIO

Es mi tormento tan extraño y fiero, que presto espero que tú mismo digas 370 que a mis fatigas no se iguala alguna.

MARSILO

Desde la cuna soy yo desdichado.

OROMPO

Aun engendrado creo que no estaba, cuando sobraba en mí la desventura.

ORFINIO

En mí se apura la mayor desdicha. 375

CRISIO

Tu mal es dicha, comparado al mío.

MARSILO

Opuesto al brío de mi mal extraño, es gloria el daño que a vosotros daña.

OROMPO

Esta maraña quedará muy clara cuando a la clara mi dolor descubra. 380
Ninguno encubra agora su tormento, que yo del mío doy principio al cuento.
Mis esperanzas, que fueron sembradas en parte buena, dulce fruto prometieron, 385
y cuando darle quisieron
convirtióle el cielo en pena.

Vi su flor maravillosa
en mil muestras deseosa
de darme una rica suerte, 390
y en aquel punto la muerte cortómela de envidiosa.
Yo quedé cual labrador que del trabajo contino

de su espaciosa labor 395
fruto amargo de dolor
le concede su destino;
y aun le quita la esperanza de otra nueva buena andanza, porque cubrió con la tierra 400
el cielo donde se encierra de su bien la confianza.
Pues si a término he llegado que de tener gusto o gloria vivo ya desesperado, 405
de que yo soy más penado
es cosa cierta y notoria:
que la esperanza asegura

en la mayor desventura
un dichoso fin que viene; 410
mas, ¡ay de aquél que la tiene cerrada en la sepultura!

MARSILO

Yo, qu'el humor de mis ojos siempre derramado ha sido en lugar donde han nascido 415 cien mil espinas y abrojos qu'el corazón m'han herido; yo sí soy el desdichado,
pues con nunca haber mostrado un momento el rostro enjuto, 420
ni hoja, ni flor, ni fruto he del trabajo sacado.
Que si alguna muestra viera de algún pequeño provecho, sosegárase mi pecho;
425
y, aunque nunca se cumpliera, quedara al fin satisfecho, porque viera que valía
mi enamorada porfía

con quien es tan desabrida, 430
que a mi yelo está encendida y a mi fuego helada y fría.
Pues si es el trabajo vano de mi llanto y sospirar,
y dél no pienso cesar, 435
a mi dolor inhumano, ¿cuál se le podrá igualar?
Lo que tu dolor concierta

es que está la causa muerta, Orompo, de tu tristeza; 440
la mía, en más entereza,
cuanto más me desconcierta.

CRISIO

Yo, que tiniendo en sazón
el fruto que se debía
a mi continua pasión, 445
una súbita ocasión
de gozarle me desvía;
muy bien podré ser llamado sobre todos desdichado,
pues que vendré a perecer, 450

pues no puedo parecer
adonde el alma he dejado.
Del bien que lleva la muerte el no poder recobrallo
en alivio se convierte, 455
y un corazón duro y fuerte el tiempo suele ablandallo.
Mas en ausencia se siente, con un estraño accidente,
sin sombra de ningún bien, 460
celos, muertes y desdén,
que esto y más teme el ausente.
Cuando tarda el cumplimiento de la cercana esperanza,
aflige más el tormento, 465
y allí llega el sufrimiento adonde ella nunca alcanza.
En las ansias desiguales,
el remedio de los males
es el no esperar remedio; 470
mas carecen deste medio

las de ausencia más mortales.

ORFINIO

El fruto que fue sembrado
por mi trabajo contino,
a dulce sazón llegado, 475
fue con próspero destino
en mi poder entregado.
Y apenas pude llegar
a términos tan sin par,
cuando vine a conocer 480
la ocasión de aquel placer ser para mí de pesar.
Yo tengo el fruto en la mano, y el tenerle me fatiga, porque en mi mal inhumano, 485
a la más granada espiga
la roe un fiero gusano.
Aborrezco lo que quiero,
y por lo que vivo muero,
y yo me fabrico y pinto 490
un revuelto laberinto
de do salir nunca espero.

Busco la muerte en mi daño, que ella es vida a mi dolencia; con la verdad más me engaño, 495
y en ausencia y en presencia va creciendo un mal tamaño.
No hay esperanza que acierte a remediar mal tan fuerte, ni por estar ni
alejarme 500
es imposible apartarme
desta triste viva muerte.

OROMPO

¿No es error conocido
decir que el daño que la muerte hace, por ser tan estendido, 505
en parte satisface,
pues la esperanza quita
qu'el dolor administra y solicita?
Si de la gloria muerta

no se quedara viva la memoria 510
qu'el gusto desconcierta,
es cosa ya notoria

que el no esperar tenella, tiempla el dolor en parte de perdella.
Pero si está presente 515
la memoria del bien ya fenescido, más viva y más ardiente
que cuando poseído, ¿quién duda que esta pena
no está más que otras de miserias llena? 520

MARSILO

Si a un pobre caminante
le sucediese, por estraña vía, huírsele delante,
al fenecer del día,
el albergue esperado 525
y con vana presteza procurado, quedaría, sin duda, confuso del temor que allí le ofrece la escura noche y muda,
y más si no amanesce, 530
que el cielo a su ventura
no concede la luz serena y pura.

Yo soy el que camino para llegar a un albergue venturoso, y cuando más vecino 535
pienso estar del reposo,
cual fugitiva sombra,
el bien me huye y el dolor me asombra.

CRISIO

Cual raudó y hondo río
suele impedir al caminante el paso, 540
y al viento, nieve y frío

le tiene en campo raso,
y el albergue delante
se le muestra de allí poco distante, tal mi contento impide 545
esta penosa y tan prolija ausencia, que nunca se comide
a aliviar su dolencia,
y casi ante mis ojos
veo quien remediará mis enojos. 550
Y el ver de mis dolores tan cerca la salud, tanto me aprieta, que los hace mayores,
pues por causa secreta,
cuanto el bien es cercano, 555
tanto más lejos huye de mi mano.

ORFINIO

Mostróseme a la vista un rico albergue de mil bienes lleno; triunfé de su conquista, y, cuando más sereno 560
se me mostraba el hado,
vilo en escuridad negra cambiado.
Allí donde consiste
el bien de los amantes bien queridos, allí mi mal asiste; 565
allí se ven unidos
los males y desdenes
donde suelen estar todos los bienes.
Dentro desta morada
estoy, de do salir nunca procuro, 570
por mi dolor fundada
de tan estraño muro,

que pienso que le abaten
cuantos le quieren, miran y combaten.

OROMPO

Antes el sol acabará el camino 575

que es propio suyo, dando vuelta al cielo después de haber tocado en cada signo, que la parte menor de nuestro duelo podamos declarar como se siente, por más qu'el bien hablar levante el vuelo. 580

Tú dices, Crisio, qu'el que vive ausente muere; yo, que estoy muerto, pues mi vida a muerte la entregó el hado inclemente.

Y tú, Marsilo, afirmas que perdida tienes de gusto y bien toda esperanza, 585
pues un fiero desdén es tu homicida.

Tú repites, Orfinio, que la lanza aguda de los celos te traspasa, no sólo el pecho, que hasta el alma alcanza.

Y como el uno lo que el otro pasa 590

no siente, su dolor solo exagera, y piensa que al rigor del otro pasa.

Y, por nuestra contienda lastimera, de tristes argumentos está llena del caudaloso Tajo la ribera. 595

Ni por esto desmengua nuestra pena; antes, por el tratar la llaga tanto, a mayor sentimiento nos condena.

Cuanto puede decir la lengua, y cuanto pueden pensar los tristes pensamientos, 600

es ocasión de renovar el llanto.

Cesen, pues, los agudos argumentos, que en fin no hay mal que no fatigue y pene, ni bien que dé seguros los contentos.

¡Harto mal tiene quien su vida tiene 605

cerrada en una estrecha sepultura, y en soledad amarga se mantiene!

¡Desdichado del triste sin ventura que padece de celos la dolencia, con quien no valen fuerzas ni cordura, 610

y aquel que en el rigor de larga ausencia pasa los tristes miserables días, llegado al flaco arrimo de paciencia, y no menos aquel qu'en sus porfías siente, cuando más arde, en su pastora 615

entrañas duras e intenciones frías!

CRISIO

Hágase lo que pide Orompo agora, pues ya de recoger nuestro ganado se va llegando a más andar la hora; y, en tanto que al albergue acostumbrado 620

llegamos, y que el sol claro se aleja, escondiendo su faz del verde prado, con

voz amarga y lamentable queja, al son de los acordes instrumentos, cantemos el dolor que nos aqueja. 625

MARSILO

Comienza, pues, ¡oh Crisio!, y tus acentos lleguen a los oídos de Claraura, llevados mansamente de los vientos, como a quien todo tu dolor restaura.

CRISIO

Al que ausencia viene a dar 630
su cáliz triste a beber,
no tiene mal que temer,
ni ningún bien que esperar.
En esta amarga dolencia
no hay mal que no esté cifrado: 635
temor de ser olvidado,
celos de ajena presencia;
quien la viniere a probar

luego vendrá a conocer
que no hay mal de que temer, 640
ni menos bien que esperar.

OROMPO

Ved si es mal el que me aqueja más que muerte conocida, pues forma quejas la vida
de que la muerte la deja. 645
Cuando la muerte llevó
toda mi gloria y contento, por darme mayor tormento, con la vida me dejó.

El mal viene, el bien se aleja 650
con tan ligera corrida, que forma quejas la vida
de que la muerte la deja.

MARSILO

En mi terrible pesar
ya faltan, por más enojos, 655
las lágrimas a los ojos
y el aliento al sospirar.

La ingratitud y desdén
me tienen ya de tal suerte, que espero y llamo a la muerte 660
por más vida y por más bien.
Poco se podrá tardar,
pues faltan en mis enojos
las lágrimas a los ojos
y el aliento al sospirar. 665

ORFINIO

Celos, a fe, si pudiera,
que yo hiciera por mejor
que fueran celos amor,
y que el amor celos fuera.
Deste trueco granjeara 670
tanto bien y tanta gloria, que la palma y la victoria de enamorado llevara.
Y aun fueran de tal manera los celos en mi favor, 675 que a ser los celos amor,
el amor yo solo fuera.

Con esta última canción del celoso Orfinio dieron fin a su égloga los discretos pastores, dejando satisfechos de su discreción a todos los que escuchado los habían; especialmente a Damón y a Tirsi, que gran contento en oírlos rescibieron, paresciéndoles que más que de pastoril ingenio parecían las razones y argumentos que para salir con su propósito los cuatro pastores habían propuesto. Pero, habiéndose movido contienda entre muchos de los circunstantes sobre cuál de los cuatro había alegado mejor de su derecho, en fin se vino a conformar el parecer de todos con el que dio el discreto Damón, diciéndoles que él para sí tenía que, entre todos los disgustos y sinsabores que el amor trae consigo, ninguno fatiga tanto al enamorado pecho como la incurable pestilencia de los celos; y que no se podían igualar a ella la pérdida de Orompo, ausencia de Crisio, ni la desconfianza de Marsilo.

-La causa es -dijo-que no cabe en razón natural que las cosas que están imposibilitadas de alcanzarse, puedan por largo tiempo apremiar la voluntad a quererlas, ni fatigar al deseo por alcanzarlas, porque el que tuviese voluntad y deseo de alcanzar lo imposible, claro está que, cuanto más el deseo le sobrase, tanto más el entendimiento le faltaría. Y por esta misma razón digo que la pena que Orompo padece no es sino una lástima y compasión del bien perdido; y, por haberle perdido de manera que no es posible tornarle a cobrar, esta imposibilidad ha de ser causa para que su dolor se acabe; que, puesto que el humano entendimiento no puede estar tan unido siempre con la razón que deje de sentir la pérdida del bien que cobrar no se puede, y que en efecto, ha de dar muestras de su sentimiento con tiernas lágrimas, ardientes sospiros y lastimosas palabras, so pena de que quien esto no hiciese, antes por bruto que por hombre racional sería tenido, en fin fin, el discurso del tiempo cura esta dolencia, la razón la mitiga y las nuevas ocasiones tienen mucha parte para borrarla de la memoria.

»Todo esto es al revés en el ausencia, como apuntó bien Crisio en sus versos, que, como la esperanza en el ausente ande tan junta con el deseo, dale terrible fatiga la dilación de la tornada, porque, como no le impide otra cosa el gozar su bien sino algún brazo de mar, o alguna distancia de tierra, parécele que teniendo lo principal, que es la voluntad de la persona amada, que se hace notorio agravio a su gusto que cosas que son tan menos como un poco de agua o tierra le impidan su felicidad y gloria. Júntase asimesmo a esta pena el temor de ser olvidado, las mudanzas de los humanos corazones; y, en tanto que la ausencia dura, sin duda alguna que es extraño el rigor y aspereza con que trata al alma del desdichado ausente; pero, como tiene tan cerca el remedio, que consiste en la tornada, puédese llevar con algún alivio su tormento, y si sucediere ser la ausencia de manera que sea imposible volver a la presencia deseada, aquella imposibilidad viene a ser el remedio, como en el de la muerte.

»El dolor de que Marsilo se queja, puesto que es como el mismo que yo

padezco, y por esta causa me había de parecer mayor que otro alguno, no por eso dejaré de decir lo que en él la razón me muestra, antes que aquello a que la pasión me incita. Confieso que es terrible dolor querer y no ser querido, pero mayor sería amar y ser aborrecido. Y si los nuevos amadores nos guiásemos por lo que la razón y la experiencia nos enseña, veríamos que todos los principios en cualquier cosa son dificultosos, y que no padece esta regla excepción en los casos de amor, antes en ellos más se confirma y fortalece; así que, quejarse el nuevo amante de la dureza del rebelde pecho de su señora, va fuera de todo razonable término, porque, como el amor sea y ha de ser voluntario, y no forzoso, no debo yo quejarme de no ser querido de quien quiero, ni debo hacer caudal del cargo que le hago, diciéndole que está obligada a amarme porque yo la amo; que, puesto que la persona amada debe, en ley de naturaleza y en buena cortesía, no mostrarse ingrata con quien bien la quiere, no por eso le ha de ser forzoso y de obligación que corresponda del todo y por todo a los deseos de su amante; que si esto así fuese, mil enamorados importunos habría que por su solicitud alcanzasen lo que quizá no se les debía de derecho. Y, como el amor tenga por padre al conocimiento, puede ser que no halle en mí la que es de mí bien querida, partes tan buenas que la muevan e inclinen a quererme; y así, no está obligada, como ya he dicho, a amarme, como yo estaré obligado a adorarla, porque hallé en ella lo que a mí me falta. Y por esta razón no debe el desdeñado quejarse de su amada, sino de su ventura, que le negó las gracias que al conocimiento de su señora pudieran mover a bien quererle. Y así, debe procurar con continos servicios, con amorosas razones, con la no importuna presencia, con las ejercitadas virtudes, adobar y enmendar en él la falta que naturaleza hizo, que este es tan principal remedio, que estoy por afirmar que será imposible dejar de ser amado el que con tan justos medios procurase granjear la voluntad de su señora. Y, pues este mal del desdén tiene el bien deste remedio, consuélase Marsilo y tenga lástima al desdichado y celoso Orfinio, en cuya desventura se encierra la mayor que en las de amor imaginar se puede.

»¡Oh celos, turbadores de la sosegada paz amorosa; celos, cuchillo de las más firmes esperanzas! No sé yo qué pudo saber de linajes el que a vosotros os hizo hijos del amor, siendo tan al revés, que por el mismo caso dejara el amor de serlo si tales hijos engendrara. ¡Oh celos, hipócritas y fementidos ladrones, pues, para que se haga cuenta de vosotros en el mundo, en viendo nacer alguna centella de amor en algún pecho, luego procuráis mezclarlos con ella, volviéndoos de su color, y aun procuráis usurparle el mando y señorío que tiene! Y de aquí nasce que, como os ven tan unidos con el amor, puesto que por vuestros efectos dais a conocer que no sois el mismo amor, todavía procuráis que entienda el ignorante que sois sus hijos, siendo, como lo sois, nascidos de una baja sospecha, engendrados de un vil y desastrado temor, criados a los pechos de falsas imaginaciones, crescidos entre vilísimas envidias, sustentados de chismes y mentiras. Y, porque se vea la destrucción que hace en los enamorados pechos esta maldita dolencia de los rabiosos celos, en siendo el amante celoso, conviene -con paz sea dicho de los celosos enamorados-; conviene, digo, que sea, como lo es, traidor, astuto, revoltoso, chismero, antojadizo y aun mal criado; y a tanto se estiende la celosa furia que le señorea, que a la persona que más quiere es a quien más mal desea. Querría el amante celoso que sólo para él su dama fuese hermosa, y fea para todo el mundo; desea que no tenga ojos para ver más de lo que él quisiere, ni oídos para oír, ni lengua para hablar; que sea retirada, desabrida, soberbia y mal acondicionada; y aun a veces desea, apretado desta pasión diabólica, que su dama se muera y que todo se acabe.

»Todas estas pasiones engendran los celos en los ánimos de los amantes celosos; al revés de las virtudes que el puro y sencillo amor multiplica en los verdaderos y comedidos amadores, porque en el pecho de un buen enamorado se encierra discreción, valentía, liberalidad, comedimiento y todo aquello que le puede hacer loable a los ojos de las gentes. Tiene más, asimesmo, la fuerza deste crudo veneno: que no hay antídoto que le preserve, consejo que le valga, amigo que le ayude, ni disculpa que le cuadre; todo esto cabe en el enamorado celoso, y más: que cualquiera sombra le espanta, cualquiera niñería le turba y cualquier sospecha, falsa o verdadera, le deshace; y a toda esta desventura se le añade otra: que con las disculpas que le dan, piensa que le engañan. Y no habiendo para la enfermedad de los celos otra medicina que las disculpas, y no queriendo el enfermo celoso admitirlas, síguese que esta enfermedad es sin remedio, y que a todas las demás debe anteponerse. Y así, es mi parecer que Orfinio es el más penado, pero no el más enamorado, porque no son los celos señales de mucho amor, sino de mucha curiosidad impertinente; y si son señales de amor, es como la calentura en el hombre enfermo, que el tenerla es señal de tener vida, pero vida enferma y mal dispuesta; y así, el enamorado celoso tiene amor, mas es amor enfermo y mal acondicionado. Y también el ser celoso es señal de poca confianza del valor de sí mismo. Y que sea esto verdad nos lo muestra el discreto y firme enamorado, el cual, sin llegar a la escuridad de los celos, toca en las sombras del temor, pero no se entra tanto en ellas que le escurezcan el sol de su contento, ni dellas se aparta tanto que le descuiden de andar solícito y temeroso; que si este discreto temor faltase en el amante, yo le tendría por soberbio y demasiadamente confiado, porque, como dice un común proverbio nuestro: «quien bien ama, teme»; teme, y aun es razón que tema el amante que, como la cosa que ama es en extremo buena, o a él le pareció serlo, no parezca lo mesmo a los ojos de quien la mirare, y por la mesma causa se engendre el amor en otro que pueda y venga a turbar el suyo. Teme y tema el buen enamorado las mudanzas de los tiempos, de las nuevas ocasiones que en su daño podrían ofrecerse, de que con brevedad no se acabe el dichoso estado que goza; y este temor ha de ser tan secreto que no le salga a la lengua para decirle, ni aun a los ojos para significarle; y hace tan contrarios efectos este temor del que los celos hacen en los pechos enamorados, que cría en ellos nuevos deseos de acrescentar más el amor, si pudiesen; de procurar con toda solicitud que los ojos de su amada no vean en ellos cosa que no sea digna de alabanza, mostrándose liberales, comedidos, galanes, limpios y bien criados; y tanto cuanto este virtuoso temor es justo se alabe, tanto y más es digno que los celos se vituperen.

Calló en diciendo esto el famoso Damón, y llevó tras la suya las contrarias opiniones de algunos que escuchado le habían, dejando a todos satisfechos de la verdad que con tanta llaneza les había mostrado. Pero no se quedara sin respuesta si los pastores Orompo, Crisio, Marsilo y Orfinio hubieran estado presentes a su plática, los cuales, cansados de la recitada égloga, se habían ido a casa de su amigo Daranio.

Estando todos en esto, ya que los bailes y danzas querían renovarse, vieron que por una parte de la plaza entraban tres dispuestos pastores, que luego de todos fueron conocidos, los cuales eran el gentil Francenio, el libre Lauso y el anciano Arsindo, el cual venía en medio de los dos pastores con una hermosa guirnalda de verde lauro en las manos; y, atravesando por medio de la plaza, vinieron a parar adonde Tirsi, Damón, Elicio y Erastro y todos los más principales pastores estaban, a los cuales con corteses palabras saludaron, y con no menor cortesía fueron dellos rescebidos, especialmente Lauso de Damón, de quien era antiguo y verdadero amigo. Cesando los comedimientos, puestos los ojos Arsindo en Damón y en Tirsi, comenzó a hablar desta manera: -La fama de vuestra sabiduría, que cerca y lejos se estiende, discretos y gallardos pastores, es la que a estos pastores y a mí nos trae a suplicaros queráis ser jueces de una graciosa contienda que entre estos dos pastores ha nascido; y es que la fiesta pasada, Francenio y Lauso, que están presentes, se hallaron en una conversación de hermosas pastoras, entre las cuales, por pasar sin pesadumbre las horas ociosas del día, entre otros muchos juegos, ordenaron el que se llama de los propósitos. Sucedió, pues, que, llegando la vez de proponer y comenzar a uno destos pastores, quiso la suerte que la pastora que a su lado estaba y a la mano derecha tenía, fuese, según él dice, la tesorera de los secretos de su alma, y la que por más discreta y más enamorada en la opinión de todos estaba. Llegándosele, pues, al oído, le dijo: «Huyendo va la esperanza». La pastora, sin detenerse en nada, prosiguió adelante, y al decir después cada uno en público lo que al otro había dicho en secreto, hallóse que la pastora había seguido el propósito, diciendo: «Tenella con el deseo». Fue celebrada por los que presentes estaban la agudeza desta respuesta, pero el que más la solemnizó fue el pastor Lauso; y no menos le pareció bien a Francenio. Y así, cada uno, viendo que lo propuesto y respondido eran versos medidos, se ofreció de glosallos; y, después de haberlo hecho, cada cual procura que su glosa a la del otro se aventaje; y, para asegurarse desto, me quisieron hacer juez dello. Pero, como yo supe que vuestra presencia alegraba nuestras riberas, aconsejéles que a vosotros viniesen, de cuya estremada sciencia y sabiduría questiones de mayor importancia pueden bien fiarse. Han seguido ellos mi parecer, y yo he querido tomar trabajo de hacer esta guirnalda, para que sea dada en premio al que vosotros, pastores, viéredes que mejor ha glosado.

Calló Arsindo y esperó la respuesta de los pastores, que fue agradecerle la buena opinión que dellos tenía, y ofrecerse de ser jueces desapasionados en aquella honrosa contienda. Con este seguro, luego Francenio tornó a repetir los versos y a decir su glosa, que era ésta: Huyendo va la esperanza; tenella con el deseo.

GLOSA

Cuando me pienso salvar
en la fe de mi querer,
me vienen luego a espantar 5
las faltas del merescer
y las sobras del pesar.
Muérese la confianza,
no tiene pulsos la vida,
pues se ve en mi mala andanza 10
que, del temor perseguida, huyendo va la esperanza.

Huye y llévase consigo
todo el gusto de mi pena,
dejando, por más castigo, 15
las llaves de mi cadena
en poder de mi enemigo.
Tanto se aleja que creo

que presto se hará invisible, y en su ligereza veo 20
que, ni puedo, ni es posible tenerla con el deseo.

Dicha la glosa de Francenio, Lauso comenzó la suya, que así decía: En el punto que os miré,
como tan hermosa os vi,
luego temí y esperé;
pero, en fin, tanto temí
que con el temor quedé. 5
De veros, esto se alcanza: una flaca confianza
y un temor acobardado, que, por no verle a su lado, huyendo va la esperanza. 10

Y, aunque me deja y se va
con tan estraña corrida,
por milagro se verá
que se acabará mi vida
y mi amor no acabará. 15
Sin esperanza me veo;
mas, por llevar el trofeo
de amador sin interese,
no querría, aunque pudiese, tenella con el deseo. 20

En acabando Lauso de decir su glosa, dijo Arsindo: -Veis aquí, famosos Damón y Tirsi, declarada la causa sobre que es la contienda destos pastores; sólo resta agora que vosotros deis la guirnalda a quien viéredes que con más justo título la meresce: que Lauso y Francenio son tan amigos, y vuestra sentencia será tan justa, que ellos tendrán por bien lo que por vosotros fuere juzgado.

-No entiendas Arsindo -respondió Tirsi-, que con tanta presteza, aunque nuestros ingenios fueran de la calidad que tú los imaginas, se puede ni debe juzgar la diferencia, si hay alguna, destas discretas glosas. Lo que yo sé decir dellas, y lo que Damón no querrá contradecirme, es que igualmente entrambas son buenas, y que la guirnalda se debe dar a la pastora que dio la ocasión a tan curiosa y loable contienda. Y si deste parecer quedáis satisfechos, pagádnosle con honrar las bodas de nuestro amigo Daranio, alegrándolas con vuestras agradables canciones y autorizándolas con vuestra honrosa presencia.

A todos pareció bien la sentencia de Tirsi; los dos pastores la consintieron y se ofrecieron de hacer lo que Tirsi les mandaba. Pero las pastoras y pastores que a Lauso conocían se maravillaban de ver la libre condición suya en la red amorosa envuelta, porque luego vieron en la amarillez de su rostro, en el silencio de su lengua y en la contienda que con Francenio había tomado, que no estaba su voluntad tan esenta como solía; y andaban entre sí imaginando quién podría ser la pastora que de su libre corazón triunfado había. Quién imaginaba que la discreta Belisa, y quién que la gallarda Leandra, y algunos que la sin par Arminda, moviéndoles a imaginar esto la ordinaria costumbre que Lauso tenía de visitar las cabañas destas pastoras, y ser cada una dellas para subjectar con su gracia, valor y hermosura otros tan libres corazones como el de Lauso. Y desta duda tardaron muchos días en certificarse, porque el enamorado pastor apenas de sí mismo fiaba el secreto de sus amores. Acabado esto, luego toda la juventud del pueblo renovó las danzas, y los pastoriles instrumentos formaron una agradable música. Pero, viendo que ya el sol apresuraba su carrera hacia el ocaso, cesaron las concertadas voces, y todos los que allí estaban determinaron de llevar a los desposados hasta su casa. Y el anciano Arsindo, por cumplir lo que a Tirsi había prometido, en el espacio que había desde la plaza hasta la casa de Daranio, al son de la zampoña de Erastro, estos versos fue cantando:

ARSINDO

Haga señales el cielo
de regocijo y contento
en tan venturoso día;
celebrese en todo el suelo este alegre casamiento 5
con general alegría.
Cámbiese de hoy más el llanto en süave y dulce canto,
y, en lugar de los pesares, vengan gustos a millares 10
que destierren el quebranto.

Todo el bien suceda en colmo entre desposados tales,
tan para en uno nascidos:
peras les ofrezca el olmo, 15
cerezas los carrascales, guindas los mirtos floridos; hallen perlas en los riscos, uvas les den los lentiscos, manzanas los algarrobos, 20
y sin temor de los lobos
ensanchen más sus apriscos.

Y sus machorras ovejas
vengan a ser parideras,
con que doblen su ganancia; 25
las solícitas abejas
en los surcos de sus eras
hagan miel en abundancia;
logren siempre su semilla
en el campo y en la villa, 30
cogida a tiempo y sazón;
no entre en sus viñas pulgón, ni en su trigo la neguilla.

Y dos hijos presto tengan, tan hechos en paz y amor 35
cuanto pueden desear;
y, en siendo crecidos, vengan a ser el uno doctor,
y otro, cura del lugar.
Sean siempre los primeros 40

en virtudes y en dineros,
que sí serán, y aun señores, si no salen fiadores
de agudos alcabaleros.

Más años que Sarra vivan, 45
con salud tan confirmada
que dello pese al doctor;
y ningún pesar resciban,
ni por hija mal casada,
ni por hijo jugador. 50
Y, cuando los dos estén
viejos cual Matusalén,
mueran sin temor de daño,
y háganles su cabo de año
por siempre jamás, amén. 55

Con grandísimo gusto fueron escuchados los rústicos versos de Arsindo, en los cuales más se alargara si no lo impidiera el llegar a la casa de Daranio, el cual, convidando a todos los que con él venían, se quedó en ella, si no fue que Galatea y Florisa, por temor que Teolinda de Tirsi y Damón no fuese conocida, no quisieron quedarse a la cena de los desposados. Bien quisiera Elicio y Erastro acompañar a Galatea hasta su casa, pero no fue posible que lo consintiese; y así, se hubieron de quedar con sus amigos, y ellas se fueron cansadas de los bailes de aquel día; y Teolinda con más pena que nunca, viendo que en las solemnes bodas de Daranio, donde tantos pastores habían acudido, sólo su Artidoro faltaba. Con esta penosa imaginación, pasó aquella noche en compañía de Galatea y Florisa, que con más libres y desapasionados corazones la pasaron, hasta que, en el nuevo venidero día, les sucedió lo que se dirá en el libro que se sigue.

FIN DEL TERCERO LIBRO

Cuarto libro de Galatea

CON GRAN deseo esperaba la hermosa Teolinda el venidero día, para despedirse de Galatea y Florisa y acabar de buscar por todas las riberas de Tajo a su querido Artidoro, con intención de fenecer la vida en triste y amarga soledad, si fuese tan corta de ventura que del amado pastor alguna nueva no supiese. Llegada, pues, la hora deseada, cuando el sol comenzaba a tender sus rayos por la faz de la tierra, ella se levantó, y, con lágrimas en sus ojos, pidió licencia a las dos pastoras para proseguir su demanda, las cuales con muchas razones la persuadieron que en su compañía algunos días más esperase, ofreciéndole Galatea de enviar algún pastor de los de su padre a buscar a Artidoro por todas las riberas de Tajo y por donde se imaginase que podría ser hallado. Teolinda agradeció sus ofrecimientos, pero no quiso hacer lo que le pedían; antes, después de haber mostrado, con las mejores palabras que supo, la obligación en que quedaba de servir todos los días de su vida las obras que dellas había rescebido, abrazándolas con tierno sentimiento, les rogaba que una sola hora no la detuviesen. Viendo, pues, Galatea y Florisa cuán en vano trabajaban en pensar detenerla, le encargaron que de cualquier suceso bueno o malo que en aquella amorosa demanda le sucediese, procurase de avisarlas, certificándola del gusto que de su contento o la pena que de su desgracia rescibirían. Teolinda se ofreció ser ella misma quien las nuevas de su buena dicha trujese, pues las malas no tendría sufrimiento la vida para resistirlas, y así, sería escusado que della saberse pudiesen. Con esta promesa de Teolinda se satisficieron Galatea y Florisa, y determinaron de acompañarla algún trecho fuera del lugar. Y así, tomando las dos solos sus cayados, y habiendo proveído el zurrón de Teolinda de algunos regalos para el trabajoso camino, se salieron con ella del aldea a tiempo que ya los rayos del sol más derechos y con más fuerzas comenzaban a herir la tierra.

Y, habiéndola acompañado casi media legua del lugar, al tiempo que ya querían volverse y dejarla, vieron atravesar, por una quebrada que poco desviada dellas estaba, cuatro hombres de a caballo y algunos de a pie, que luego conocieron ser cazadores en el hábito y en los halcones y perros que llevaban. Y, estándolos con atención mirando, por ver si los conocían, vieron salir de entre unas espesas matas que cerca de la quebrada estaban, dos pastoras de gallardo talle y brío. Traían los rostros rebozados con dos blancos lienzos; y, alzando la una dellas la voz, pidió a los cazadores que se detuviesen, los cuales así lo hicieron, y, llegándose entrambas a uno dellos, que en su talle y postura el principal de todos parecía, le asieron las riendas del caballo y estuvieron un poco hablando con él, sin que las tres pastoras pudiesen oír palabra de las que decían, por la distancia del lugar, que lo estorbaba. Solamente vieron que, a poco espacio que con él hablaron, el caballero se apeó, y, habiendo, a lo que juzgarse pudo, mandado a los que le acompañaban que se volviesen, quedando sólo un mozo con el caballo, trabó a las dos pastoras de las manos, y poco a poco comenzó a entrar con ellas por medio de un cerrado bosque que allí estaba. Lo cual visto por las tres pastoras, Galatea, Florisa y Teolinda, determinaron de ver, si pudiesen, quién eran las disfrazadas pastoras y el caballero que las llevaba; y así, acordaron de rodear por una parte del bosque, y mirar si podían ponerse en alguna que pudiese serlo para satisfacerles de lo que deseaban. Y, haciéndolo así como pensado lo habían, atajaron al caballero y a las pastoras, y, mirando Galatea por entre las ramas lo que hacían, vio que, torciendo sobre la mano derecha, se emboscaban en lo más espeso del bosque, y luego por sus mismas pisadas les fueron siguiendo, hasta que el caballero y las pastoras, pareciéndoles estar bien adentro del bosque, en medio de un estrecho pradecillo, que de infinitas breñas estaba rodeado, se pararon. Galatea y sus compañeras se llegaron tan cerca que, sin ser vistas ni sentidas, veían todo lo que el caballero y las pastoras hacían y decían; las cuales, habiendo mirado a una y a otra parte por ver si podrían ser vistas de alguno, aseguradas desto, la una se quitó el rebozo; y apenas se le hubo quitado cuando de Teolinda fue conocida, y, llegándose al oído de Galatea, le dijo con la más baja voz que pudo: -Estrañísima ventura es ésta, porque, si no es que con la pena que traigo he perdido el conocimiento, sin duda alguna aquella pastora que se ha quitado el rebozo es la bella Rosaura, hija de Roselio, señor de una aldea que a la nuestra está vecina, y no sé qué pueda ser la causa que la haya movido a ponerse en tan estraño traje y a dejar su tierra, cosas que tan en perjuicio de su honestidad se declaran. Mas, ¡ay desdichada! -añadió Teolinda-, que el caballero que con ella está es Grisaldo, hijo mayor del rico Laurencio, que junto a esta vuestra aldea tiene otras dos suyas.

-Verdad dices, Teolinda -respondió Galatea-, que yo le conozco; pero calla y sosiégate, que presto veremos con qué intento ha sido aquí su venida.

Quietóse con esto Teolinda, y con atención se puso a mirar lo que Rosaura hacía, la cual, llegándose al caballero, que de edad de veinte años parecía, con voz turbada y airado semblante, le comenzó a decir: -En parte estamos, fementido caballero, donde podré tomar de tu desamor y descuido la deseada venganza. Pero, aunque yo la tomase de ti tal que la vida te costase, poca recompensa sería al daño que me tienes hecho. Vesme aquí, desconocido Grisaldo, desconocida por conocerte; ves aquí que ha mudado el traje por buscarte la que nunca mudó la voluntad de quererte. Considera, ingrato y desamorado, que la que apenas en su casa y con sus criadas sabía mover el paso, agora por tu causa anda de valle en valle y de sierra en sierra con tanta soledad buscando tu compañía.

Todas estas razones que la bella Rosaura decía las escuchaba el caballero con los ojos hincados en el suelo y haciendo rayas en la tierra con la punta de un cuchillo de monte que en la mano tenía. Pero, no contenta Rosaura con lo dicho, con semejantes palabras prosiguió su plática: -Dime: ¿conoces, por ventura, conoces, Grisaldo, que yo soy aquélla que no ha mucho tiempo que enjugó tus lágrimas, atajó tus suspiros, remedió tus penas, y sobre todo, la que creyó tus palabras? ¿O, por suerte, entiendes tú que eres aquél a quien parecían cortos y de ninguna fuerza todos los juramentos que imaginarse podían, para asegurarme la verdad con que me engañabas? ¿Eres tú, acaso, Grisaldo, aquél cuyas infinitas lágrimas ablandaron la dureza del honesto corazón mío? Tú eres, que ya te veo, y yo soy, que ya me conozco. Pero si tú eres Grisaldo, el que yo creo, y yo soy Rosaura, la que tú imaginas, cúmpleme la palabra que me diste; darte he yo la promesa que nunca te he negado. Hanme dicho que te casas con Leopersia, la hija de Marcelio, tan a gusto tuyo que eres tú mismo el que la procuras; si esta nueva me ha dado pesadumbre, bien se puede ver por lo que he hecho por venir a estorbar el cumplimiento della; y si tú la puedes hacer verdadera, a tu consciencia lo dejo. ¿Qué respondes a esto, enemigo mortal de mi descanso? ¿Otorgas, por ventura, callando, lo que por el pensamiento sería justo que no te pasase? Alza los ojos ya y ponlos en estos que por su mal te miraron; levántalos y mira a quién engañas, a quién dejas y a quién olvidas. Verás que engañas, si bien lo consideras, a la que siempre te trató verdades, dejas a quien ha dejado a su honra y a sí misma por seguirte, olvidas a la que jamás te apartó de su memoria. Considera, Grisaldo, que en nobleza no te debo nada, y que en riqueza no te soy desigual, y que te aventajo en la bondad del ánimo y en la firmeza de la fe. Cúmpleme, señor, la que me diste, si te precias de caballero y no te desprecias de cristiano. Mira que si no correspondes a lo que me debes, que rogaré al cielo que te castigue, al fuego que te consuma, al aire que te falte, al agua que te anegue, a la tierra que no te sufra, y a mis parientes que me venguen. Mira que si faltas a la obligación que me tienes, que has de tener en mí una perpetua turbadora de tus gustos en cuanto la vida me durare; y aun después de muerta, si ser pudiere, con continuas sombras espantaré tu fermentido espíritu, y con espantosas visiones atormentaré tus engañadores ojos. Advierte que no pido sino lo que es mío, y que tú ganas en darlo lo que en negarlo pierdes. Mueve agora tu lengua para desengañarme de cuantas la has movido para ofenderme.

Calló diciendo esto la hermosa dama, y estuvo un poco esperando a ver lo que Grisaldo respondía; el cual, levantando el rostro, que hasta allí inclinado había

tenido, encendido con la vergüenza que las razones de Rosaura le habían causado, con sosegada voz le respondió desta manera: -Si yo quisiese negar, ¡oh Rosaura!, que no te soy deudor de más de lo que dices, negaría asimesmo que la luz del sol no es clara, y aun diría que el fuego es frío y el aire duro. Así que, en esta parte confieso lo que te debo, y que estoy obligado a la paga. Pero, que yo confiese que puedo pagarte como quieres, es imposible, porque el mandamiento de mi padre lo ha prohibido y tu riguroso desdén imposibilitado; y no quiero en esta verdad poner otro testigo que a ti misma, como a quien tan bien sabe cuántas veces y con cuántas lágrimas rogué que me aceptases por esposo, y que fueses servida que yo cumpliese la palabra que de serlo te había dado. Y tú, por las causas que te imaginaste, o por parecerte ser bien corresponder a las vanas promesas de Artandro, jamás quisiste que a tal ejecución se llegase; antes, de día en día me ibas entretiniendo y haciendo pruebas de mi firmeza, pudiendo asegurarla de todo punto con admitirme por tuyo. También sabes, Rosaura, el deseo que mi padre tenía de ponerme en estado y la priesa que daba a ello, trayendo los ricos honrosos casamientos que tú sabes, y cómo yo con mil excusas me apartaba de sus importunaciones, dándotelas siempre a ti para que no dilatases más lo que tanto a ti convenía y yo deseaba; y que al cabo de todo esto, te dije un día que la voluntad de mi padre era que yo con Leopersia me casase; y tú, en oyendo el nombre de Leopersia, con una furia desesperada me dijiste que más no te hablase, y que me casase norabuena con Leopersia o con quien más gusto me diese. Sabes también que te persuadí muchas veces que dejases aquellos celosos devaneos, que yo era tuyo, y no de Leopersia, y que jamás quisiste admitir mis disculpas ni condescender con mis ruegos; antes, perseverando en tu obstinación y dureza, y en favorecer a Artandro, me enviaste a decir que te daría gusto en que jamás te viese. Yo hice lo que me mandaste, y, por no tener ocasión de quebrar tu mandamiento, viendo también que cumplía el de mi padre, determiné de desposarme con Leopersia, o, a lo menos, desposaréme mañana, que así está concertado entre sus parientes y los míos; porque veas, Rosaura, cuán disculpado estoy de la culpa que me pones, y cuán tarde has tú venido en conocimiento de la sinrazón que conmigo usabas. Mas, porque no me juzgues de aquí adelante por tan ingrato como en tu imaginación me tienes pintado, mira bien si hay algo en que yo pueda satisfacer tu voluntad, que, como no sea casarme contigo, aventuraré por servirte la hacienda, la vida y la honra.

En tanto que estas palabras Grisaldo decía, tenía la hermosa Rosaura los ojos clavados en su rostro, vertiendo por ellos tantas lágrimas que daban bien a entender el dolor que en el alma sentía; pero, viendo ella que Grisaldo callaba, dando un profundo y doloroso suspiro, le dijo: -Como no puede caber en tus

verdes años tener, ¡oh Grisaldo!, larga y conocida experiencia de los infinitos accidentes amorosos, no me maravillo que un pequeño desdén mío te haya puesto en la libertad que publicas; pero si tú conocieras que los celosos temores son espuelas que hacen salir al amor de su paso, vieras claramente que los que yo tuve de Leopersia, en que yo más te quisiese redundaban. Mas, como tú tratabas tan de pasatiempo mis cosas, con la menor ocasión que te imaginaste, descubriste el poco amor de tu pecho, y confirmaste las verdaderas sospechas mías, y en tal manera, que me dices que mañana te casas con Leopersia. Pero yo te certifico que, antes que a ella lleves al tálamo, me has de llevar a mí a la sepultura, si ya no eres tan cruel que niegues de darla al cuerpo de cuya alma fuiste siempre señor absoluto. Y, porque claro conozcas y veas que la que perdió por ti su honestidad y puso en detrimento su honra tendrá en poco perder la vida, este agudo puñal que aquí traigo pondrá en efecto mi desesperado y honroso intento, y será testigo de la crueldad que en ese tu fermentado pecho encierras.

Y, diciendo esto, sacó del seno una desnuda daga, y con gran celeridad se iba a pasar el corazón con ella, si con mayor presteza Grisaldo no le tuviera el brazo y la rebozada pastora, su compañera, no aguijara a abrazarse con ella. Gran rato estuvieron Grisaldo y la pastora primero que quitasen a Rosaura la daga de las manos, la cual a Grisaldo decía: -¡Déjame, traidor enemigo, acabar de una vez la tragedia de mi vida, sin que tantas tu desamorado desdén me haga probar la muerte!

-Esa no gustarás tú por mi ocasión -replicó Grisaldo-, pues quiero que mi padre falte antes la palabra que por mí a Leopersia tiene dada, que faltar yo un punto a lo que conozco que te debo. Sosiega el pecho, Rosaura, pues te aseguro que este mío no sabrá desear otra cosa que la que fuere de tu contento.

Con estas enamoradas razones de Grisaldo resucitó Rosaura de la muerte de su tristeza a la vida de su alegría, y, sin cesar de llorar, se hincó de rodillas ante Grisaldo, pidiéndole las manos en señal de la merced que le hacía. Grisaldo hizo lo mismo, y, echándole los brazos al cuello, estuvieron gran rato sin poderse hablar el uno al otro palabra, derramando entrambos cantidad de amorosas lágrimas. La pastora arrebozada, viendo el feliz suceso de su compañera, fatigada del cansancio que había tomado en ayudar a quitar la daga a Rosaura, no pudiendo más sufrir el velo, se le quitó, descubriendo un rostro tan parecido al de Teolinda, que quedaron admiradas de verle Galatea y Florisa; pero más lo fue Teolinda, pues sin poderlo disimular, alzó la voz, diciendo: -¡Oh cielos!, y ¿qué es lo que veo? ¿No es, por ventura, ésta mi hermana Leonarda, la turbadora de mi reposo? Ella es, sin duda alguna.

Y, sin más detenerse, salió de donde estaba, y con ella Galatea y Florisa. Y, como la otra pastora viese a Teolinda, luego la conoció, y con abiertos brazos se fueron la una a la otra, admiradas de haberse hallado en tal lugar y en tal sazón y coyuntura. Viendo, pues, Grisaldo y Rosaura lo que Leonarda con Teolinda hacía, y que habían sido descubiertos de las pastoras Galatea y Florisa, con no poca vergüenza de que los hubiesen hallado de aquella suerte, se levantaron, y, limpiándose las lágrimas, con disimulación y comedimiento rescibieron a las pastoras, que luego de Grisaldo fueron conocidas. Mas, la discreta Galatea, por volver en siguridad el disgusto que, quizá, de su vista los dos enamorados habían recibido, con aquel donaire con que ella todas las cosas decía, les dijo: -No os pese de nuestra venida, venturosos Grisaldo y Rosaura, pues sólo servirá de acrescentar vuestro contento, pues se ha comunicado con quien siempre le tendrá en serviros. Nuestra ventura ha ordenado que os viésemos, y en parte donde ninguna se nos ha encubierto de vuestros pensamientos; y, pues el cielo los ha traído a término tan dichoso, en satisfacción dello, asegurad vuestros pechos y perdonad nuestro atrevimiento.

-Nunca tu presencia, hermosa Galatea -respondió Grisaldo-, dejó de dar gusto doquiera que estuviese; y, siendo esta verdad tan conocida, antes quedamos en obligación a tu vista que con desabrimiento de tu llegada.

Con éstas, pasaron otras algunas comedidas razones, harto diferentes de las que entre Leonarda y Teo linda pasaban, las cuales, después de haberse abrazado una y dos veces, con tiernas palabras mezcladas con amorosas lágrimas, la cuenta de su vida se demandaban, tiniendo suspensos mirándolas a todos los que allí estaban, porque se parecían tanto que casi no se podían decir semejantes, sino una misma cosa; y si no fuera porque el traje de Teolinda era diferente del de Leonarda, sin duda alguna que Galatea y Florisa no supieran diferenciallas; y entonces vieron con cuánta razón Artidoro se había engañado en pensar que Leonarda Teolinda fuese. Mas, viendo Florisa que el sol estaba hacia la mitad del cielo, y que sería bien buscar alguna sombra que de sus rayos las defendiese, o, a lo menos, volverse a la aldea, pues, faltándoles la ocasión de apascentar sus ovejas, no debían estarse tanto en el prado, dijo a Teolinda y a Leonarda: -Tiempo habrá, pastoras, donde con más comodidad podáis satisfacer nuestros deseos y daros más larga cuenta de vuestros pensamientos, y por agora busquemos a do pasar el rigor de la siesta que nos amenaza: o en una fresca fuente que está a la salida del valle que atrás dejamos, o tornándonos a la aldea, donde será Leonarda tratada con la voluntad que tú, Teolinda, de Galatea y de mí conoces. Y si a vosotras, pastoras, hago sólo este ofrecimiento, no es porque me olvide de Grisaldo y Rosaura, sino porque me parece que a su valor y merescimiento no puedo ofrecerles más del deseo.

-Ése no faltará en mí mientras la vida me durare -respondió Grisaldo-, de hacer, pastora, lo que fuere en tu servicio, pues no se debe pagar con menos la voluntad que nos muestras. Mas, por parecerme que será bien hacer lo que dices, y por tener entendido que no ignoráis lo que entre mí y Rosaura ha pasado, no quiero deteneros ni detenerme en referirlo. Sólo os ruego seáis servidas de llevar a Rosaura en vuestra compañía a vuestra aldea, en tanto que yo aparejo en la mía algunas cosas que son necesarias para concluir lo que nuestros corazones desean. Y, porque Rosaura quede libre de sospecha, y no la pueda tener jamás de la fe de mi pensamiento, con voluntad considerada mía, siendo vosotras testigos della, le doy la mano de ser su verdadero esposo.

Y, diciendo esto, tendió la suya y tomó la de la bella Rosaura. Y ella quedó tan fuera de sí de ver lo que Grisaldo hacía, que apenas pudo responderle palabra, sino que se dejó tomar la mano; y, de allí a un pequeño espacio, dijo: -A términos me había traído el amor, Grisaldo, señor mío, que con menos que por mí hicieras, te quedara perpetuamente obligada; pero, pues tú has querido corresponder antes a ser quien eres que no a mi merescimiento, haré yo lo que en mí es, que es darte de nuevo el alma, en recompensa deste beneficio; y después, el cielo de tan agradecida voluntad te dé la paga.

-No más -dijo a esta sazón Galatea-, no más, señores, que adonde andan las obras tan verdaderas, no han de tener lugar los demasiados comedimientos. Lo que resta es rogar al cielo que traiga a dichoso fin estos principios, y que en larga y saludable paz gocéis vuestros amores. Y en lo que dices, Grisaldo, que Rosaura venga a nuestra aldea, es tanta la merced que en ello nos haces, que nosotras mismas te lo suplicamos.

-De tan buena gana iré en vuestra compañía -dijo Rosaura-, que no sé con qué la encarezca más que con deciros que no sentiré mucho el ausencia de Grisaldo, estando en vuestra compañía.

-Pues, ¡ea! -dijo Florisa-, que el aldea es lejos y el sol mucho, y nuestra tardanza de volver a ella notada. Vos, señor Grisaldo, podéis ir a hacer lo que os conviniere, que en casa de Galatea hallaréis a Rosaura, y a éstas, una pastora, que no merecen ser llamadas dos las que tanto se parecen.

-Sea como queréis -dijo Grisaldo.

Y, tomando a Rosaura de la mano, se salieron todos del bosque, quedando concertado entre ellos que otro día enviaría Grisaldo un pastor, de los muchos de su padre, a avisar a Rosaura de lo que había de hacer; y que, enviando aquel pastor, sin ser notado, podría hablar a Galatea o a Florisa, y dar la orden que más conviniese. A todas pareció bien este concierto; y, habiendo salido del bosque, vio Grisaldo que le estaba esperando su criado con el caballo; y, abrazando de nuevo a Rosaura y despidiéndose de las pastoras, se fue acompañado de lágrimas y de los ojos de Rosaura, que nunca dél se apartaron hasta que le perdieron de vista. Como las pastoras solas quedaron, luego Teolinda se apartó con Leonarda, con deseo de saber la causa de su venida; y Rosaura asimesmo fue contando a Galatea y Florisa la ocasión que la había movido a tomar el hábito de pastora y a venir a buscar a Grisaldo, diciendo: -«No os causara admiración, hermosas pastoras, el verme a mí en este traje, si supiérades hasta dó se estiende la poderosa fuerza de amor, la cual no sólo hace mudar el vestido a los que bien quieren, sino la voluntad y el alma de la manera que más es de su gusto; y hubiera yo perdido el mío eternamente si de la invención deste traje no me hubiera aprovechado, porque sabréis, amigas, que, estando yo en el aldea de Leonarda, de quien mi padre es señor, vino a ella Grisaldo con intención de estarse allí algunos días ocupado en el sabroso ejercicio de la caza; y, por ser mi padre muy amigo del suyo, ordenó de hospedarle en casa y de hacerle todos los regalos que pudiese. Hízolo así; y la venida de Grisaldo a mi casa fue para sacarme a mí della, porque, en efecto, aunque sea a costa de mi vergüenza, os habré de decir que la vista, la conversación, el valor de Grisaldo, hicieron tal impresión en mi alma que, sin saber cómo, a pocos días que él allí estuvo, yo no estuve más en mí, ni quise ni pude estar sin hacerle señor de mi libertad; pero no fue tan arrebatadamente que primero no estuviese satisfecha que la voluntad de Grisaldo de la mía un punto no discrepaba, según él me lo dio a entender con muchas y muy verdaderas señales. Enterada, pues, yo en esta verdad, y viendo cuán bien me estaba tener a Grisaldo por esposo, vine a condescender con sus deseos y a poner en efecto los míos. Y así, con la intercesión de una doncella mía, en un apartado corredor nos vimos Grisaldo y yo muchas veces, sin que nuestra estada solos a más se estendiese que a vernos y a darme él la palabra que hoy con más fuerza delante de vosotras me ha tornado a dar.

»Ordenó, pues, mi triste ventura, que en el tiempo que yo de tan dulce estado gozaba, vino asimesmo a visitar a mi padre un valeroso caballero aragonés que Artandro se llama, el cual, vencido, a lo que él mostró, de mi hermosura -si alguna tengo-, con grandísima solicitud procuró que yo con él me casase sin que mi padre lo supiese. Había en este medio procurado Grisaldo traer a efecto su propósito, y, mostrándome yo algo más dura de lo que fuera menester, le iba entretiniendo con palabras, con intención que mi padre saliese al camino de casarme, y que entonces Grisaldo me pidiese por esposa; pero no quería él hacer esto, porque sabía que la voluntad de su padre era casarle con la rica y hermosa Leopersia, que bien debéis conocerla por la fama de su riqueza y hermosura. Vino esto a mi noticia, y tomé ocasión de pedirle celos, aunque fingidos, sólo por hacer prueba de la entereza de su fe, y fui tan descuidada, o por mejor decir, tan simple, que, pensando que granjeaba algo en ello, comencé a hacer algunos favores a Artandro, lo cual visto por Grisaldo, muchas veces me significó la pena que rescibía de lo que yo con Artandro pasaba; y aun me avisó que, si no era mi voluntad de que él me cumpliera la palabra que me había dado, que no podía dejar de obedecer a la de su padre. A todas estas amonestaciones y avisos respondí yo sin ninguno, llena de soberbia y arrogancia, confiada en que los lazos que mi hermosura habían echado al alma de Grisaldo no podían tan fácilmente ser rompidos ni aun tocados de otra cualquier belleza. Mas salíome tan al revés mi confianza como me lo mostró presto Grisaldo, el cual, cansado de mis necios y esquivos desdenes, tuvo por bien de dejarme y venir obediente al mandado de su padre. Pero, apenas se hubo él partido de mi aldea y apartado de mi presencia, cuando yo conocí el error en que había caído, y con tanto ahínco me comenzó a fatigar el ausencia de Grisaldo y los celos de Leopersia, que el ausencia dél me acababa y los celos della me consumían.

»Considerando, pues, que si mi remedio se dilataba, había de dejar por fuerza en las manos del dolor la vida, determiné de aventurar a perder lo menos, que a mi parecer era la fama, por ganar lo más, que es a Grisaldo. Y así, con escusa que di a mi padre de ir a ver una tía mía, señora de otra aldea a la nuestra cercana, salí de mi casa acompañada de muchos criados de mi padre; y, llegada en casa de mi tía, le descubrí todo el secreto de mi pensamiento, y le rogué fuese servida de que yo me pusiese en este hábito y viniese a hablar a Grisaldo, certificándole que si yo mesma no venía, que tendrían mal suceso mis negocios. Ella me lo concedió, con condición que trujese a Leonarda conmigo, como persona de quien ella mucho se fiaba; y, enviando por ella a nuestra aldea, y acomodándome destos vestidos, y advirtiéndonos de algunas cosas que las dos habíamos de hacer, nos despedimos della habrá ocho días; y, habiendo seis que llegamos a la aldea de Grisaldo, jamás hemos podido hallar lugar de hablarle a solas, como yo deseaba, hasta esta mañana que supe que venía a caza, y le aguardé en el mismo lugar adonde él se despidió. Y he pasado con él todo lo que vosotras, amigas, habéis visto, del cual venturoso suceso quedo tan contenta cuanto es razón lo quede la que tanto lo deseaba.» Esta es, pastoras, la historia de mi vida, y si os he cansado en contárosla, echad la culpa al deseo que teníades de saberla, y al mío, que no pudo hacer menos de satisfaceros.

-Antes quedamos tan obligadas -respondió Florisa-a la merced que nos has hecho que, aunque siempre nos ocupemos en servirla, no saldremos de la deuda.

-Yo soy la que quedo en ella -replicó Rosaura-, y la que procuraré pagarla como mis fuerzas alcanzaren. Pero, dejando esto aparte, volved los ojos, pastoras, y veréis los de Teolinda y Leonarda tan llenos de lágrimas que moverán a los vuestros a no dejar de acompañarlos en ellas.

Volvieron Galatea y Florisa a mirarlas, y vieron ser verdad lo que Rosaura decía; y lo que el llanto de las dos hermanas causaba era que, después de haberle dicho Leonarda a su hermana todo lo que Rosaura había contado a Galatea y a

Floris, le dijo: -«Sabrás, hermana, que así como tú faltaste de nuestra aldea, se imaginó que te había llevado el pastor Artidoro, que aquel mismo día faltó él también, sin que de nadie se despidiera. Confirmé yo esta opinión en mis padres, porque les conté lo que con Artidoro había pasado en la floresta. Con este indicio creció la sospecha, y mi padre procuraba venir en tu busca y de Artidoro, y en efecto lo pusiera por obra si de allí a dos días no viniera a nuestra aldea un pastor que, al momento que fue visto, todos le tuvieron por Artidoro. Llegando estas nuevas a mi padre de que allí estaba el robador tuyo, luego vino con la justicia adonde el pastor estaba, al cual le preguntaron si te conocía, o adónde te había llevado. El pastor negó con juramento que en toda su vida te había visto, ni sabía qué era lo que le preguntaban. Todos los que estaban presentes se maravillaron de ver que el pastor negaba conocerte, habiendo estado diez días en el pueblo, y hablado y bailado contigo muchas veces, y sin duda alguna creyeron todos que Artidoro era culpado en lo que se le imputaba; y, sin querer admitir disculpa suya ni escucharle palabra, le llevaron a la prisión, donde estuvo algunos días sin que ninguno le hablase, al cabo de los cuales, yéndole a tomar su confesión, tornó a jurar que no te conocía y que en toda su vida había estado más de aquella vez en nuestra aldea, y que mirasen -y esto otras veces lo había dicho-que aquel Artidoro que ellos pensaban ser él, por ventura no fuese un hermano suyo que le parecía en tanto extremo, como descubriría la verdad cuando les mostrase que se habían engañado teniendo a él por Artidoro, porque él se llamaba Galercio, hijo de Briseno, natural de la aldea de Grisaldo. Y, en efecto, tantas demostraciones dio y tantas pruebas hizo, que conocieron claramente todos que él no era Artidoro, de que quedaron más admirados; y decían que tal maravilla como la de parecernos yo a ti, y Galercio a Artidoro, no se había visto en el mundo.

»Esto que de Galercio se publicaba me movió a ir a verle muchas veces a do estaba preso; y fue la vista de suerte que quedé sin ella, a lo menos para mirar cosas que me den gusto en tanto que a Galercio no viere. Pero lo que más mal hay en esto, hermana, es que él se fue de la aldea sin que supiese que llevaba consigo mi libertad, ni yo tuve lugar jamás de decírselo; y así, me quedé con la pena que imaginarse puede, hasta que la tía de Rosaura me envió a pedir a mi padre por algunos días, todo a fin de venir a acompañar a Rosaura, de lo que recibí summo contento, por saber que veníamos a la aldea de Galercio y que allí le podría hacer sabidor de la deuda en que me estaba. Pero he sido tan corta de ventura que ha cuatro días que estamos en su aldea y nunca le he visto, aunque he preguntado por él, y me dicen que está en el campo con su ganado. He preguntado también por Artidoro, y hanme dicho que de unos días a esta parte no parece en el aldea; y, por no apartarme de Rosaura, no he tenido lugar de ir a buscar a Galercio, del cual podría ser saber nuevas de Artidoro.» Esto es lo que a mí me ha sucedido, y lo demás que has visto, con Grisaldo, después que faltas, hermana, del aldea.

Admirada quedó Teolinda de lo que su hermana le contaba; pero, cuando llegó a saber que en el aldea de Artidoro no se sabía dél nueva alguna, no pudo tener las lágrimas, aunque en parte se consoló, creyendo que Galercio sabría nuevas de su hermano. Y así, determinó de ir otro día a buscar a Galercio, doquiera que estuviese. Y, habiéndole contado con la más brevedad que pudo a Leonarda todo lo que le había sucedido después que en busca de Artidoro andaba, abrazándola otra vez, se volvió adonde las pastoras estaban, que, un poco desviadas del camino, iban por entre unos árboles, que del calor del sol un poco las defendían. Y, en llegando a ellas, Teolinda les contó todo lo que su hermana le había dicho, con el suceso de sus amores y la semejanza de Galercio y Artidoro, de que no poco se admiraron, aunque dijo Galatea: -Quien vee la semejanza tan estraña que hay entre ti, Teolinda, y tu hermana, no tiene de qué maravillarse aunque otras vea, pues ninguna, a lo que yo creo, a la vuestra iguala.

-No hay duda -respondió Leonarda-sino que la que hay entre Artidoro y Galercio es tanta que, si a la nuestra no excede, a lo menos en ninguna cosa se queda atrás.

-Quiera el cielo -dijo Florisa-, que así como los cuatro os semejáis unos a otros, así os acomodéis y parezcáis en la ventura, siendo tan buena la que la fortuna conceda a vuestros deseos, que todo el mundo envidie vuestros contentos, como admira vuestras semejanzas.

Replicara a estas razones Teolinda, si no lo estorbara una voz que oyeron que dentre los árboles salía; y, parándose todas a escucharla, luego conocieron ser del pastor Lauso, de que Galatea y Florisa grande contento rescibieron, porque en extremo deseaban saber de quién andaba Lauso enamorado, y creyeron que desta duda las sacaría lo que el pastor cantase. Y, por esta ocasión, sin moverse de donde estaban, con grandísimo silencio le escucharon. Estaba el pastor sentado al pie de un verde sauce, acompañado de solos sus pensamientos y de un pequeño rabel, al son del cual desta manera cantaba:

LAUSO

Si yo dijere el bien del pensamiento,
en mal se vuelva cuanto bien poseo;

que no es para decirse el bien que siento.
De mí mismo se encubra mi deseo,
enmudezca la lengua en esta parte 5
y en el silencio ponga su trofeo.
Pare aquí el artificio, cese el arte
de exagerar el gusto qu'en un alma con mano liberal amor reparte.
Baste decir que en sosegada calma 10
paso el mar amoroso, confiado
de honesto triunfo y vencedera palma.
Sin saberse la causa, lo causado
se sepa; que es un bien tan sin medida que sólo para el alma es reservado. 15
Ya tengo nuevo ser, ya tengo vida,
ya puedo cobrar nombre en todo el suelo
de ilustre y clara fama conocida;
qu'el limpio intento, al amoroso celo que encierra el pecho enamorado mío, 20 alzarme puede al más subido cielo.
En ti, Silena, espero; en ti confío,

Silena, gloria de mi pensamiento,
norte por quien se rige mi albedrío.
Espero qu'el sin par entendimiento 25
tuyo levantes a entender que valgo
por fe lo que no está en merescimiento.
Confío que tendrás, pastora, en algo,
después de hacerte cierta la experiencia,
la sana voluntad de un pecho hidalgo. 30
¿Qué bienes no asegura tu presencia?
¿Qué males no destierra? ¿Y quién sin ella sufrirá un punto la terrible ausencia?
¡Oh, más que la belleza misma bella,
más que la propia discreción discreta, 35
sol a mis ojos y a mi mar estrella!
No la que fue de la nombrada Creta
robada por el falso hermoso toro
igualó a tu hermosura tan perfecta;
ni aquella que en sus faldas granos de oro 40

sintió llover, por quien después no pudo
guardar el virginal rico tesoro;
ni aquella que con brazo airado y crudo,
en la sangre castísima del pecho
tiñó el puñal, en su limpieza, agudo; 45

ni aquella que a furor movió y despecho
contra Troya los griegos corazones, por quien fue el Ilión roto y desecho;
ni la que los latinos escuadrones
hizo mover contra la teucra gente, 50
a quien Juno causó tantas pasiones;
ni menos la que tiene diferente
fama de la entereza y el trofeo
con que su honestidad guardó excelente:
digo de aquella que lloró a Siqueo, 55
del mantuano Títiro notada
de vano antojo y no cabal deseo;
no en cuantas tuvo hermosas la pasada
edad, ni la presente tiene agora, ni en la de por venir será hallada 60
quien llegase ni llegue a mi pastora
en valor, en saber, en hermosura,
en merecer del mundo ser señora.
¡Dichoso aquél que con firmeza pura
fuere de ti, Silena, bien querido, 65
sin gustar de los celos la amargura!
¡Amor, que a tanta alteza me has subido,
no me derribes con pesada mano

a la bajeza oscura del olvido!
¡Sé conmigo señor, y no tirano! 70

No cantó más el enamorado pastor, ni por lo que cantado había pudieron las pastoras venir en conocimiento de lo que deseaban; que, puesto que Lauso nombró a Silena en su canto, por este nombre no fue la pastora conocida. Y así, imaginaron que, como Lauso había andado por muchas partes de España y aun de toda la Asia y Europa, que alguna pastora forastera sería la que había rendido la libre voluntad suya. Mas, volviendo a considerar que le habían visto pocos días atrás triunfar de la libertad y hacer burla de los enamorados, sin duda alguna creyeron que con disfrazado nombre celebraba alguna conocida pastora a quien había hecho señora de sus pensamientos. Y así, sin satisfacerse en su sospecha, se fueron hacia el aldea, dejando al pastor en el mismo lugar do se estaba. Mas no hubieron andado mucho, cuando vieron venir de lejos algunos pastores, que luego fueron conocidos, porque eran Tirsi, Damón, Elicio, Erastro, Arsindo, Francenio, Crisio, Orompo, Daranio, Orfinio y Marsilo, con todos los más principales pastores de la aldea, y entre ellos el desamorado Lenio, con el lastimado Silerio, los cuales salían a tener la siesta a la Fuente de las Pizarras, a la sombra que en aquel lugar hacían las entricadas ramas de los espesos y verdes árboles. Y, antes que los pastores llegasen, tuvieron cuidado Teolinda, Leonarda y Rosaura de rebozarse cada una con un blanco lienzo, porque de Tirsi y Damón no fuesen conocidas. Los pastores llegaron haciendo cortés rescibimiento a las pastoras, convidándolas que en su compañía la siesta pasar quisiesen; mas Galatea se escusó con decir que aquellas forasteras pastoras que con ella venían tenían necesidad de ir a la aldea. Con esto se despidió dellos, llevando tras sí las almas de Elicio y Erastro, y aun las encubiertas pastoras los deseos de conocerlas de cuantos allí estaban.

Ellas se fueron al aldea y los pastores a la fresca fuente, pero, antes que allá llegasen, Silerio se despidió de todos, pidiendo licencia para volverse a su ermita; y, puesto que Tirsi, Damón, Elicio y Erastro le rogaron que por aquel día con ellos se quedase, jamás lo pudieron acabar con él, antes, abrazándolos a todos, se despidió, encargando y rogando a Erastro que no dejase de verle todas las veces que por su ermita pasase. Erastro se lo prometió; y con esto, torciendo el camino, acompañado de su continua pesadumbre, se volvió a la soledad de su ermita, dejando a los pastores no sin dolor de ver la estrechez de vida que en tan verdes años había escogido; pero más se sentía entre aquellos que le conocían y sabían la calidad y valor de su persona.

Llegados los pastores a la fuente, hallaron en ella a tres caballeros y a dos hermosas damas que de camino venían, y, fatigados del cansancio y convidados del ameno y fresco lugar, les pareció ser bien dejar el camino que llevaban y pasar allí las calurosas horas de la siesta. Venían con ellos algunos criados, de manera que, en su apariencia, mostraban ser personas de calidad. Quisieran los pastores, así como los vieron, dejarles el lugar desocupado, pero uno de los caballeros, que el principal parecía, viendo que los pastores de comedidos se querían ir a otra parte, les dijo: -Si era, por ventura, vuestro contento, gallardos pastores, pasar la siesta en este deleitoso sitio, no os lo estorbe nuestra compañía; antes, nos haced merced de que con la vuestra augmentéis nuestro contento, pues no promete menos vuestra gentil disposición y manera; y, siendo el lugar, como lo es, tan acomodado para mayor cantidad de gente, haréis agravio a mí y a estas damas si no venís en lo que yo en su nombre y el mío os pido.

-Con hacer, señor, lo que nos mandas -respondió Elicio-, cumpliremos nuestro deseo, que por agora no se estendía a más que venir a este lugar a pasar en él en buena conversación las enfadosas horas de la siesta; y, aunque fuera diferente nuestro intento, lo torciéramos sólo por hacer lo que pides.

-Obligado quedo -respondió el caballero-a muestras de tanta voluntad; y, para más certificarme y obligarme con ella, sentaos, pastores, alrededor desta fresca fuente, donde, con algunas cosas que estas damas traen para regalo del camino, podáis despertar la sed y mitigarla en las frescas aguas que esta clara fuente nos ofrece.

Todos lo hicieron así, obligados de su buen comedimiento. Hasta este punto, habían tenido las damas cubiertos los rostros con dos ricos antifaces; pero, viendo que los pastores se quedaban, se descubrieron, descubriendo una belleza tan estraña que en gran admiración puso a todos los que la vieron, pareciéndoles que, después de la de Galatea, no podía haber en la tierra otra que se igualase. Eran las dos damas igualmente hermosas, aunque la una dellas, que de más edad parecía, a la más pequeña en cierto donaire y brío se aventajaba. Sentados, pues, y acomodados todos, el segundo caballero, que hasta entonces ninguna cosa había hablado, dijo: -Cuando me paro a considerar, agradables pastores, la ventaja que hace al cortesano y soberbio trato el pastoral y humilde vuestro, no puedo dejar de tener lástima a mí mismo y a vosotros una honesta envidia.

-¿Por qué dices eso, amigo Darinto? -dijo el otro caballero.

-Dílogo, señor, -replicó estotro-, porque veo con cuánta curiosidad vos y yo, y los que siguen el trato nuestro, procuramos adornar las personas, sustentar los cuerpos y aumentar las haciendas, y cuán poco viene a lucirnos, pues la púrpura, el oro, el brocado que sobre nuestros cuerpos echamos, como los rostros están marchitos de los mal degiridos manjares, comidos a deshoras, y tan costosos como malgastados, ninguna cosa nos adornan, ni pulen, ni son parte para que más bien parezcamos a los ojos de quien nos mira. Todo lo cual puedes ver diferente en los que siguen el rústico ejercicio del campo, haciendo experiencia en los que tienes delante, los cuales podría ser, y aun es así, que se hubiesen sustentado y sustentan de manjares simples y en todo contrarios de la vana compostura de los nuestros; y, con todo eso, mira el moreno de sus rostros, que promete más entera salud que la blancura quebrada de los nuestros; y cuán bien les está a sus robustos y sueltos miembros un pellico de blanca lana, una caperuza parda y unas antiparas de cualquier color que sean; y con esto, a los ojos de sus pastoras, deben de parecer más hermosos que los bizarros cortesanos a los de las retiradas damas. ¿Qué te diría, pues, si quisiese, de la sencillez de su vida, de la llaneza de su condición y de la honestidad de sus amores? No te digo más, sino que conmigo puede tanto lo que de la vida pastoral conozco, que de buena gana trocaría la mía con ella.

-En deuda te estamos los pastores -dijo Elicio- por la buena opinión que de nosotros tienes; pero, con todo eso, te sé decir que hay en la rústica vida nuestra tantos resbaladeros y trabajos como se encierran en la cortesana vuestra.

-No podré yo dejar de venir en lo que dices, amigo -replicó Darinto-, porque ya se sabe bien que es una guerra nuestra vida sobre la tierra. Pero, en fin, en la pastoral hay menos que en la ciudadana, por estar más libre de ocasiones que alteren y desasosiegen el espíritu.

-Cuán bien se conforma con tu opinión, Darinto -dijo Damón-, la de un pastor amigo mío que Lauso se llama, el cual, después de haber gastado algunos años en cortesanos ejercicios y algunos otros en los trabajosos del duro Marte, al fin se ha reducido a la pobreza de nuestra rústica vida; y, antes que a ella viniese, mostró desearlo mucho, como parece por una canción que compuso y envió al famoso Larsileo, que en los negocios de la Corte tiene larga y ejercitada experiencia. Y, por haberme a mí parecido bien, la tomé toda en la memoria, y aun os la dijera si imaginara que a ello diera lugar el tiempo y a vosotros no os cansara el escucharla.

-Ninguna otra cosa nos dará más gusto que escucharte, discreto Damón -respondió Darinto, llamando a Damón por su nombre, que ya le sabía, por haberle oído nombrar a los otros pastores, sus amigos-; y así, yo de mi parte te ruego nos digas la canción de Lauso; que, pues ella es hecha, como dices, a mi propósito y tú la has tomado de memoria, imposible será que deje de ser buena.

Comenzaba Damón a arrepentirse de lo que había dicho y procuraba escusarse de lo prometido; mas, los caballeros y damas se lo rogaron tanto, y todos los pastores, que él no pudo escusar el decirla. Y así, habiéndose sosegado un poco, con gentil donaire y gracia, dijo desta manera: DAMÓN

El vano imaginar de nuestra mente, de mil contrarios vientos arrojada
acá y allá con curso presuroso;
la humana condición, flaca, doliente,
en caducos placeres ocupada, 5
do busca, sin hallarle, algún reposo;
el falso, el mentiroso

mundo, prometedor de alegres gustos;

la voz de sus sirenas,
mal escuchada apenas 10
cuando cambia su gusto en mil disgustos;
la Babilonia, el caos que miro y leo
en todo cuanto veo;
el cauteloso trato cortesano,
junto con mi deseo, 15
puesto han la pluma en la cansada mano.

Quisiera yo, señor, que allí llegara
do llega mi deseo, el corto vuelo
de mi grosera mal cortada pluma, sólo para que luego se ocupara 20
en levantar el más subido vuelo
vuestra rara bondad y virtud summa.
Mas, ¿quién hay que presuma
echar sobre sus hombros tanta carga, si no es un nuevo Adlante, 25
en fuerzas tan bastante
que poco el cielo le fatiga y carga?
Y aun le será forzoso que se ayude
y el grave peso mude
sobre los brazos de otro Alcides nuevo; 30

y, aunque se encorve y sude,
yo tal fatiga por descanso apruebo.

Ya que a mis fuerzas esto es imposible
y el inútil deseo doy por muestra
de lo que encierra el justo pensamiento, 35
veamos si, quizá, será posible
mover la flaca mal contenta diestra
a mostrar por enigma algún contento;
mas, tan sin fuerzas siento
mi fuerza en esto, que será forzoso 40
que apliquéis los oídos
a los tristes gemidos

de un desdenado pecho congojoso,
a quien el fuego, el aire, el mar, la tierra
hacen contino guerra, 45
todos en su desdicha conjurados,
que se remata y cierra
con la corta ventura de sus hados.

Si esto no fuera, fácil cosa fuera tender por la región del gusto el paso, 50
y reducir cien mil a la memoria,

pintando el monte, el río y la ribera
do amor, el hado, la fortuna y caso rindieron a un pastor toda su gloria.
Mas desta dulce historia 55
el tiempo triunfa, y sólo queda della
una pequeña sombra,
que ahora espanta, asombra
al pensamiento que más piensa en ella:
condición propia de la humana suerte, 60
que el gusto nos convierte
en pocas horas en mortal disgusto,
y nadie habrá que acierte
en muchos años con un firme gusto.

Vuelva y revuelva; en alto suba o baje 65
el vano pensamiento al hondo abismo;
corra en un punto desde Tile a Batro,
qu'él dirá, cuanto más sude y trabaje,
y del término salga de sí mismo,
puesto en la esfera o en el cruel Baratro: 70 ¡oh, una, y tres, y cuatro,
cinco, y seis y más veces venturoso
el simple ganadero,

que con un pobre apero
vive con más contento y más reposo 75
qu'el rico Craso o el avariento Mida, pues con aquella vida

robusta, pastoral, sencilla y sana,
de todo punto olvida
esta mísera, falsa, cortesana! 80

En el rigor del erizado invierno,
al tronco entero de robusta encina,
de Vulcano abrazada, se calienta
y allí en sosiego trata del gobierno
mejor de su ganado, y determina 85
dar de sí al cielo no entricada cuenta.
Y cuando ya se ahuyenta
el encogido, estéril, yerto frío,
y el gran señor de Delo
abrsa el aire, el suelo, 90
en el margen sentado de algún río,
de verdes sauces y álamos cubierto,
con rústico concierto suelta la voz o toca el caramillo,
y a veces se vee cierto 95

las aguas detenerse por oílo.

Poco allí le fatiga el rostro grave
del privado, que muestra en apariencia
mandar allí do no es obedecido, ni el alto exagerar con voz süave 100
del falso adulador, que en poca ausencia
muda opinión, señor, bando y partido;
ni el desdén sacudido
del sutil secretario le fatiga,
ni la altivez honrada 105
de la llave dorada,
ni de los varios príncipes la liga,
ni del manso ganado un punto parte,
porque el furor de Marte
a una y a otra parte suene airado, 110
regido por tal arte
que apenas su secuaz se ve medrado.

Reduce a poco espacio sus pisadas,
del alto monte al apacible llano,
desde la fresca fuente al claro río, 115
sin que, por ver las tierras apartadas,

las movibles campañas de Oceano
are con loco antiguo desvarío.
No le levanta el brío
saber qu'el gran monarca invicto vive 120
bien cerca de su aldea,
y, aunque su bien desea,
poco disgusto en no verle rescibe;
no como el ambicioso entremetido,
que con seso perdido 125
anda tras el favor, tras la privanza,
sin nunca haber teñido
en turca o en mora sangre espada o lanza.

No su semblante o su color se muda
porque mude color, mude semblante, 130
el señor a quien sirve, pues no tiene
señor que fuerce a que con lengua muda
siga, cual Clicie a su dorado amante,
el dulce o amargo gusto que le viene.
No le veréis que pene 135
de temor que un descuido, una nonada,
en el ingrato pecho
del señor el derecho

borre de sus servicios, y sea dada
de breve despedida la sentencia. 140
No muestra en apariencia
otro de lo que encierra el pecho sano;
que la rústica sciencia
no alcanza el falso trato cortesano.

¿Quién tendrá vida tal en menosprecio? 145
¿Quién no dirá que aquélla sola es vida que al sosiego del alma se encamina?

El no tenerla el cortesano en precio hace que su bondad sea conocida
de quien aspira al bien y al mal declina. 150

¡Oh vida, do se afina
en soledad el gusto acompañado!
¡Oh pastoral bajeza,
más alta que la alteza
del cetro más subido y levantado! 155

¡Oh flores olorosas, oh sombríos bosques, oh claros ríos!
¡Quién gozar os pudiera un breve tiempo,
sin que los males míos
turbasen tan honesto pasatiempo! 160

¡Canción, a parte vas do serán luego
conocidas tus faltas y tus sobras!
Mas di, si aliento cobras,
con rostro humilde enderezado a ruego:
«¡Señor, perdón, porque el que acá me envía, 165
en vos y en su deseo se confía!».

-Ésta es, señores, la canción de Lauso -dijo Damón en acabándola-, la cual fue tan celebrada de Lariseo, cuanto bien admitida de los que en aquel tiempo la vieron.

-Con razón lo puedes decir -respondió Darinto-, pues la verdad y artificio suyo es digno de justas alabanzas.

-Estas canciones son las de mi gusto -dijo a este punto el desamorado Lenio-, y no aquellas que a cada paso llegan a mis oídos, llenas de mil simples conceptos amorosos, tan mal dispuestos e intrincados que osaré jurar que hay algunas que, ni las alcanza quien las oye, por discreto que sea, ni las entiende quien las hizo. Pero no menos fatigan otras que se enzarzan en dar alabanzas a Cupido y en exagerar su poder, su valor, sus maravillas y milagros, haciéndole señor del cielo y de la tierra, dándole otros mil atributos de potencia, de mando y señorío. Y lo que más me cansa de los que las hacen es que, cuando hablan de amor, entienden de un no sé quién que ellos llaman Cupido, que la misma significación del nombre nos declara quién es él, que es un apetito sensual y vano, digno de todo vituperio.

Habló el desamorado Lenio, y en fin hubo de parar en decir mal de amor; pero, como todos los más que allí estaban conocían su condición, no repararon mucho en sus razones, si no fue Erastro, que le dijo: -¿Piensas, Lenio, por ventura, que siempre estás hablando con el simple Erastro, que no sabe contradecir tus opiniones ni responder a tus argumentos? Pues quíerote advertir que te será sano el callar por agora, o, a lo menos, tratar de otras cosas que de decir mal de amor, si ya no gustas que la discreción y sciencia de Tirsi y de Damón te alumbren de la ceguedad en que estás, y te muestren a la clara lo que ellos entienden y lo que tú debes entender del amor y de sus cosas.

-¿Qué me podrán ellos decir que yo no sepa? -dijo Lenio-. O ¿qué les podré yo replicar que ellos no ignoren?

-Soberbia es esa, Lenio -respondió Elicio-, y en ella muestras cuán fuera vas del camino de la verdad de amor, y que te riges más por el norte de tu parecer y antojo, que no por el que te debías regir, que es el de la verdad y experiencia.

-Antes por la mucha que yo tengo de sus obras -respondió Lenio-, le soy tan contrario como nuestro y mostraré mientras la vida me durare.

-¿En qué fundas tu razón? -dijo Tirsi.

-¿En qué, pastor? -respondió Lenio-. En que, por los efectos que hace, conozco cuán mala es la causa que los produce.

-¿Cuáles son los efectos de amor que tú tienes por tan malos? -replicó Tirsi.

-Yo te los diré, si con atención me escuchas -dijo Lenio-; pero no querría que mi plática enfadase los oídos de los que están presentes, pudiendo pasar el tiempo en otra conversación de más gusto.

-Ninguna cosa habrá que sea más del nuestro -dijo Darinto-que oír tratar desta materia, especialmente entre personas que tan bien sabrán defender su opinión; y así, por mi parte, si la destos pastores no lo estorba, te ruego, Lenio, que sigas adelante la comenzada plática.

-Eso haré yo de buen grado -respondió Lenio-, porque pienso mostrar claramente en ella cuántas razones me fuerzan a seguir la opinión que sigo y a vituperar cualquiera otra que a la mía se opusiere.

-Comienza, pues, ¡oh Lenio! -dijo Damón-, que no estarás más en ella de cuanto mi compañero Tirsi descubra la suya.

A esta sazón, ya que Lenio se preparaba a decir los vituperios de amor, llegaron a la fuente el venerable Aurelio, padre de Galatea, con algunos pastores, y con él asimesmo venían Galatea y Florisa, con las tres rebozadas pastoras, Rosaura, Teolinda y Leonarda, a las cuales, habiéndolas topado a la entrada de la aldea y sabiendo dellas la junta de pastores que en la Fuente de las Pizarras quedaba, a ruego suyo las hizo volver, fiadas las forasteras pastoras en que, por sus rebozos, no serían de alguno conocidas. Levantáronse todos a rescebir a Aurelio y a las pastoras, las cuales se sentaron con las damas, y Aurelio y los pastores con los demás pastores. Pero, cuando las damas vieron la singular belleza de Galatea, quedaron tan admiradas que no podían apartar los ojos de mirarla. No lo fue menos Galatea de la hermosura dellas, especialmente de la que de mayor edad parecía. Pasó entre ellas algunas palabras de comedimiento; pero todo cesó cuando supieron lo que entre el discreto Tirsi y el desamorado Lenio estaba concertado, de lo que se holgó infinito el venerable Aurelio, porque en extremo deseaba ver aquella junta y oír aquella disputa; y más entonces, donde tendría Lenio quien tan bien le supiese responder. Y así, sin más esperar, sentándose Lenio en un tronco de un desmochado olmo, con voz al principio baja y después sonora, desta manera comenzó a decir:

LENIO

-Ya casi adivino, valerosa y discreta compañía, cómo ya en vuestro entendimiento me vais juzgando por atrevido y temerario, pues con el poco ingenio y menos experiencia que puede prometer la rústica vida en que yo algún tiempo me he criado, quiero tomar contienda, en materia tan ardua como ésta, con el famoso Tirsi, cuya crianza en famosas academias y cuyos bien sabidos estudios no pueden asegurar en mi pretensión sino segura pérdida. Pero confiado que, a las veces, la fuerza del natural ingenio, adornado con algún tanto de experiencia, suele descubrir nuevas sendas con que facilitan las sciencias por largos años sabidas, quiero atreverme hoy a mostrar en público las razones que me han movido a ser tan enemigo de amor, que he merecido por ello alcanzar renombre de desamorado. Y, aunque otra cosa no me moviera a hacer esto sino vuestro mandamiento, no me escusara de hacerla; cuan to más, que no será pequeña la gloria que de aquí he de granjear, aunque pierda la empresa, pues al fin dirá la fama que tuve ánimo para competir con el nombrado Tirsi. Y así, con este presupuesto, sin querer ser favorecido si no es de la razón que tengo, a ella sola invoco y ruego dé tal fuerza a mis palabras y argumentos, que se muestre en ellas y en ellos la que tengo para ser tan enemigo del amor como publico. Es, pues, amor, según he oído decir a mis mayores, un deseo de belleza, y esta definición le dan, entre otras muchas, los que en esta cuestión han llegado más al cabo. Pues, si se me concede que el amor es deseo de belleza, forzosamente se me ha conceder que, cual fuere la belleza que se amare, tal será el amor con que se ama. Y, porque la belleza es en dos maneras, corpórea a incorpórea, el amor que la belleza corporal amare como último fin suyo, este tal amor no puede ser bueno, y éste es el amor de quien yo soy enemigo. Pero, como la belleza corpórea se divide asimesmo en dos partes, que son en cuerpos vivos y en

cuerpos muertos, también puede haber amor de belleza corporal que sea bueno. Muéstrase la una parte de la belleza corporal en cuerpos vivos de varones y de hembras, y ésta consiste en que todas las partes del cuerpo sean de por sí buenas, y que todas juntas hagan un todo perfecto y formen un cuerpo proporcionado de miembros y suavidad de colores. La otra belleza de la parte corporal no viva consiste en pinturas, estatuas, edificios, la cual belleza puede amarse sin que el amor con que se amare se vitupere. La belleza incorpórea se divide también en dos partes, en las virtudes y sciencias del ánima; y el amor que a la virtud se tiene, necesariamente ha de ser bueno, y ni más ni menos el que se tiene a las virtuosas sciencias y agradables estudios. Pues, como sean estas dos suertes de belleza la causa que engendra el amor en nuestros pechos, síguese que en el amar la una a la otra, consista ser el amor bueno o malo. Pero, como la belleza incorpórea se considera con los ojos del entendimiento, limpios y claros, y la belleza corpórea se mire con los ojos corporales, en comparación de los incorpóreos, turbios y ciegos, y, como sean más prestos los ojos del cuerpo a mirar la belleza presente corporal, que agrada, que no los del entendimiento a considerar la ausente incorpórea, que glorifica, síguese que más ordinariamente aman los mortales la caduca y mortal belleza, que los destruye, que no la singular y divina, que los mejora. Pues deste amor o desear la corporal belleza, han nacido, nascen y nascerán en el mundo asolación de ciudades, ruina de estados, destrucción de imperios y muertes de amigos; y, cuando esto generalmente no suceda, ¿qué desdichas mayores, qué tormentos más graves, qué incendios, qué celos, qué penas, qué muertes puede imaginar el humano entendimiento que a las que padece el miserabre amante puedan compararse? Y es la causa desto que, como toda la felicidad del amante consista en gozar la belleza que desea, y esta belleza sea imposible poseerse y gozarse enteramente, aquel no poder llegar al fin que se desea, engendra en él los sos piros, las lágrimas, las quejas y desabrimientos. Pues, que sea verdad que la belleza de quien hablo no se puede gozar perfecta y enteramente, está manifiesto y claro, porque no está en mano del hombre gozar cumplidamente cosa que esté fuera dél y no sea toda suya; porque las estrañas, conosciada cosa es que están siempre debajo del arbitrio de la que llamamos fortuna y caso, y no en poder de nuestro albedrío. Y así, se concluye que, donde hay amor, hay dolor, y quien esto negase negaría asimesmo que el sol es claro y que el fuego abrasa. Mas, porque se venga con más facilidad en conocimiento de la amargura que amor encierra, por las pasiones del ánimo discurriendo se verá clara la verdad que sigo. Son, pues, las pasiones del ánimo, como mejor vosotros sabéis, discretos caballeros y pastores, cuatro generales, y no más: desear demasiado, alegrarse mucho, gran temor de las futuras miserias, gran dolor de las presentes calamidades; las cuales pasiones, por ser como vientos contrarios que la tranquilidad del ánimo perturban, con más propio vocablo, perturbaciones son llamadas. Y destas perturbaciones la primera es propia del amor, pues el amor no es otra cosa que deseo; y así, es el deseo principio y origen de do todas nuestras pasiones proceden, como cualquier arroyo de su fuente; y de aquí viene que todas las veces que el deseo de alguna cosa se enciende en nuestros corazones luego nos mueve a seguirla y a buscarla; y, buscándola y siguiéndola, a mil desordenados fines nos conduce. Este deseo es aquél que incita al hermano a procurar de la amada hermana los abominables abrazos, la madrastra del alnado, y lo que peor es, el mismo padre de la propia hija. Este deseo es el que nuestros pensamientos a dolorosos peligros acarrea: ni aprovecha que le hagamos obstáculo con la razón, que, puesto que nuestro mal claramente conozcamos, no por eso sabemos retirarnos dél. Y no se contenta amor de tenernos a una sola voluntad atentos; antes, como del deseo de las cosas, como ya está dicho, todas las pasiones nascen, así, del primer deseo que nasce en nosotros, otros mil se derivan; y éstos son en los enamorados no menos diversos que infinitos. Y, aunque todas las más de las veces miren a un solo fin, con todo eso, como son diversos los objetos y diversa la fortuna de cada uno de los amadores, sin duda alguna, diversamente se desea. Hay algunos que, por llegar a alcanzar lo que desean, ponen toda su fuerza en una carrera, en la cual ¡oh cuántas y cuán duras cosas se encuentran, cuántas veces se cae, y cuántas agudas espinas atormentan sus pies, y cuántas veces primero se pierde la fuerza y el aliento, que den alcance a lo que procuran! Algunos otros hay que ya de la cosa amada son poseedores, y ninguna otra desean, ni piensan sino en mantenerse en aquel estado; y, tiniendo en esto sólo ocupados sus pensamientos, y en esto sólo todas sus obras y tiempo consumido, en la felicidad son míseros, en la riqueza pobres y en la ventura desventurados. Otros, que ya están fuera de la posesión de sus bienes, procuran tornar a ellos, usando para ello mil ruegos, mil promesas, mil condiciones, infinitas lágrimas, y al cabo, en estas miserias ocupándose, se ponen a términos de perder la vida. Mas no se ven estos tormentos en la entrada de los primeros deseos, porque entonces el engañoso amor nos muestra una senda por do entremos, al parecer ancha y espaciosa, la cual después poco a poco se va cerrando, de manera que para volver ni pasar adelante ningún camino se ofrece. Y así, engañados y atraídos los míseros amantes con una dulce y falsa risa, con un solo volver de ojos, con dos malformadas palabras que en sus pechos una falsa y flaca esperanza engendran, arrójanse luego a caminar tras ella, aguijados del deseo; y después, a poco trecho y a pocos días, hallando la senda de su remedio cerrada y el camino de su gusto impedido, acuden luego a regar su rostro con lágrimas, a turbar el aire con sospiros, a fatigar los oídos con lamentables quejas; y lo peor es que, si acaso con las lágrimas, con los suspiros y con las quejas no puede venir al fin de lo que desea, luego muda estilo y procura alcanzar por malos medios lo que por buenos no puede. De aquí nascen los odios, las iras, las muertes, así de amigos como de enemigos; por esta causa se han visto, y se veen a cada paso, que las tiernas y delicadas mujeres se ponen a hacer cosas tan estrañas y temerarias que aun sólo el imaginarlas pone espanto; por ésta se veen los sanctos y conyugales lechos de roja sangre bañados, ora de la triste mal advertida esposa, ora del incauto y descuidado marido. Por venir al fin deste deseo, es traidor el hermano al hermano, el padre al hijo y el amigo al amigo. Éste rompe enemistades, atropella respectos, traspasa leyes, olvida obligaciones y solicita parientas. Mas, porque claramente se vea cuánta es la miseria de los enamorados, ya se sabe que ningún apetito tiene tanta fuerza en nosotros, ni con tanto ímpetu al objecto propuesto nos lleva, como aquél que de las espuelas de amor es solicitado; y de aquí viene que ninguna alegría o contento pasa tanto del debido término, como aquélla del amante cuando viene a conseguir alguna cosa de las que desea. Y esto se ve porque, ¿qué persona habrá de juicio, si no es el amante, que tenga a summa felicidad un tocar la mano de su amada, una sortijuela suya, un breve amoroso volver de ojos y otras cosas semejantes, de tan poco momento cual las considera un entendimiento desapasionado? Y no por estos gustos tan colmados que, a su parecer, los amantes consiguen, se ha de decir que son felices y bienaventurados, porque no hay ningún contento suyo que no venga acompañado de innumerables disgustos y sinsabores, con que amor se los agua y turba, y nunca llegó gloria amorosa adonde llega y alcanza la pena. Y es tan mala el alegría de los amantes, que los saca fuera de sí mismos, tornándolos descuidados y locos, porque, como ponen todo su intento y fuerzas en mantenerse en aquel gustoso estado que ellos se imaginan, de toda otra cosa se descuidan, de que no poco daño se les sigue, así de hacienda como de honra y vida, pues, a trueco de lo que he dicho, se hacen ellos mismos esclavos de mil congojas y enemigos de sí propios; pues que, cuando sucede que en medio de la carrera de sus gustos les toca el hierro frío de la pesada lanza de los celos, allí se les escurece el cielo, se les turba el aire y todos los elementos se les vuelven contrarios. No tienen entonces de quién esperar contento, pues no se le puede dar el conseguir el fin que desean; allí acude el temor contino, la desesperación ordinaria, las agudas sospechas, los pensamientos varios, la solicitud sin provecho, la falsa risa y el verdadero llanto, con otros mil estraños y terribles accidentes que le consumen y atierran. Todas las ocasiones de la cosa amada les fatigan: si mira, si ríe, si torna, si vuelve, si calla, si habla; y, finalmente, todas las gracias que le movieron a querer bien, son las mismas que atormentan al amante celoso. ¿Y quién no sabe que si la ventura a manos llenas no favorece a los amorosos principios, y con presta diligencia a dulce fin los conduce, cuán costosos le son al amante cualesquier otros medios que el desdichado pone para conseguir su intento? ¿Qué de lágrimas derrama, qué de suspiros esparce, cuántas cartas escribe, cuántas noches no duerme, cuántos y cuán contrarios pensamientos le combaten, cuántos celos le fatigan y cuántos temores le sobresaltan? ¿Hay, por ventura, Tántalo que más fatiga tenga entre las aguas y el manzano puesto, que la que tiene el miserable amante entre el temor y la esperanza colocado? Son los servicios del amante no favorecido los cántaros de las hijas de Dánao, tan sin provecho derramados que jamás llegan a conseguir una mínima parte de su intento. ¿Hay águila que así destruya las entrañas de Ticio, como destruyen y roen los celos las del amante celoso? ¿Hay piedra que tanto cargue las espaldas de Sísifo, como carga el temor continuo los pensamientos de los enamorados? ¿Hay rueda de Ixión que más presto se vuelva y atormente, que las prestas y varias imaginaciones de los temerosos amantes? ¿Hay Minos ni Radamanto que así castiguen y apremien las desdichadas condenadas almas, como castiga y apremia el amor al enamorado pecho que al insufrible mando suyo está sujeto? No hay cruda Megera, ni rabiosa Tesifón, ni vengadora Alecto que así maltraten el ánimo do se encierran, como maltrata esta furia, este deseo, a los sin ventura que le reconocen por señor y se le humillan como vasallos; los cuales, por dar alguna disculpa de las locuras que hacen, dicen, o a lo menos dijeron los antiguos gentiles, que aquel instinto que incita y mueve al enamorado para amar más que a su propia vida la ajena, era un dios a quien pusieron por nombre Cupido, y que así, forzados de su deidad, no podían dejar de seguir y caminar tras lo que él quería. Movióles a decir esto y a dar nombre de dios a este deseo, el ver los efectos sobrenaturales que hace en los enamorados. Sin duda, parece que es sobrenatural cosa estar un amante en un instante mismo temeroso y confiado, arder lejos de su amada y helarse cuando más cerca della, mudo cuando parlero y parlero cuando mudo. Extraña cosa es asimesmo seguir a quien me huye, alabar a quien me vitupera, dar voces a quien no me escucha, servir a una ingrata y esperar en quien jamás promete ni puede dar cosa que buena sea. ¡Oh amarga dulzura, oh venenosa medicina de los amantes no sanos, oh triste alegría, oh flor amorosa que ningún fruto señalas, si no es de tardo arrepentimiento! Éstos son los efectos deste dios imaginado, éstas son sus hazañas y maravillosas obras. Y aun también puede verse en la pintura con que figuraban a este su vano dios cuán vanos ellos andaban: pintábanle niño, desnudo, alado, vendados los ojos, con arco y saetas en las manos, por darnos a entender, entre otras cosas, que, en siendo uno enamorado, se vuelve de la condición de un niño simple y antojadizo, que es ciego en las pretensiones, ligero en los pensamientos, cruel en las obras, desnudo y pobre de las riquezas

del entendimiento. Decían asimesmo que entre las saetas tuyas tenía dos, la una de plomo y la otra de oro, con las cuales diferentes efectos hacía, porque la de plomo engendraba odio en los pechos que tocaba, y la de oro, crecido amor en los que hería, por sólo avisarnos que el oro rico es aquél que hace amar, y el plomo pobre aborrecer. Y, por esta ocasión, no en balde cantan los poetas Atalante vencida de tres hermosas manzanas de oro, y a la bella Dánae preñada de la dorada lluvia, y al piadoso Eneas descender al infierno con el ramo de oro en la mano. En fin, el oro y la dádiva es una de las más fuertes saetas que el amor tiene y con la que más corazones subjeta; bien al revés de la de plomo, metal bajo y menospreciado, como lo es la pobreza, la cual antes engendra odio y aborrecimiento donde llega, que otra benevolencia alguna. Pero si las razones hasta agora por mí dichas no bastan a persuadir la que yo tengo de estar mal con este pérfido amor de quien trato, oí en algunos ejemplos verdaderos y pasados los efectos tuyos, y veréis, como yo veo, que no ve ni tiene ojos de entendimiento el que no alcanza la verdad que sigo. Veamos, pues: ¿quién, sino este amor, es aquel que al justo Loth hizo romper el casto intento y violar a las propias hijas tuyas? Éste es, sin duda, el que hizo que el escogido David fuese adúltero y homicida; y el que forzó al libidinoso Amón a procurar el torpe ayuntamiento de Tamar, su querida hermana; y el que puso la cabeza del fuerte Sansón en las traidoras faldas de Dalida, por do, perdiendo él su fuerza, perdieron los tuyos su amparo, y al cabo, él y otros muchos la vida; éste fue el que movió la lengua de Herodes para prometer a la bailadora niña la cabeza del precursor de la vida; éste hace que se dude de la salvación del más sabio y rico rey de los reyes, y aun de todos los hombres; éste redujo los fuertes brazos del famoso Hércules, acostumbrados a regir la pesada maza, a torcer un pequeñuelo huso y a ejercitarse en mujeriles ejercicios; éste hizo que la furiosa y enamorada Medea esparciese por el aire los tiernos miembros de su pequeño hermano; éste cortó la lengua a Progne, arrastró a Hipólito, infamó a Pasífae, destruyó a Troya, mató a Egisto; éste hizo cesar las comenzadas obras de la nueva Cartago, y que su primera reina pasase su casto pecho con la aguda espada; éste puso en las manos de la nombrada y hermosa Sofonisba el vaso del mortífero veneno que le acabó la vida; éste quitó la tuya al valiente Turno, y el reino a Tarquino, el mando a Marco Antonio, y la vida y la honra a su amiga; éste, en fin, entregó nuestras Españas a la bárbara furia agarena, llamada a la venganza del desordenado amor del miserable Rodrigo. Mas, porque pienso que primero nos cubriría la noche con su sombra, que yo acabase de traeros a la memoria los ejemplos que se ofrecen a la mía de las hazañas que el amor ha hecho y cada día hace en el mundo, no quiero pasar más adelante en ellos, ni aun en la comenzada plática, por dar lugar a que el famoso Tirsi me responda, rogándoos primero, señores, no os enfade oír una canción que días ha tengo hecha en vituperio deste mi enemigo, la cual, si bien me acuerdo, dice desta manera: Sin que me pongan miedo el yelo y fuego,

el arco y flechas del amor tirano,
en su deshonor he de mover mi lengua;
que ¿quién ha de temer a un niño ciego,
de vario antojo y de juicio insano, 5
aunque más amenace daño y mengua?
Mi gusto cresce y el dolor desmengua cuando la voz levanto
al verdadero canto
qu'en vituperio del amor se forma, 10
con tal verdad, con tal manera y forma,
que a todo el mundo su maldad descubre,
y claramente informa
del cierto daño qu'el amor encubre.

Amor es fuego que consume al alma, 15
yelo que yela, flecha que abre el pecho

que de sus mañas vive descuidado;
turbado mar do no se ha visto calma,
ministro de ira, padre del despecho,
enemigo en amigo disfrazado, 20
dador de escaso bien y mal colmado,
afable, lisonjero,
tirano crudo y fiero,
y Circe engañadora que nos muda
en varios monstruos, sin que humana ayuda 25
pueda al pasado ser nuestro volvernos,
aunque ligera acuda
la luz de la razón a socorrernos;

yugo que humilla al más erguido cuello,
blanco a do se encaminan los deseos 30
del ocio blando sin razón nascidos,
red engañosa de sutil cabello
que cubre y prende en torpes actos feos
los que del mundo son en más tenidos,

sabroso mal de todos los sentidos, 35
ponzoña disfrazada
cual píldora dorada,
rayo que adonde toca abrasa y hiende,

airado brazo que a traición ofende,
verdugo del captivo pensamiento 40
y del que se defiende
del dulce halago de su falso intento;

daño que aplace en los principios, cuando
se regala la vista en el sujeto, que, cual el cielo, bello le parece; 45
mas tanto cuanto más pasa mirando,
tanto más pena en público y secreto
el corazón, que todo lo padece.
Mudo hablador, parlero que enmudece,
cuerdo que desatina, 50
pura total ruína
de la más concertada alegre vida,
sombra de bien en males convertida,
vuelo que nos levanta hasta la esfera,
para que en la caída 55
quede vivo el pesar y el gusto muera;

invisible ladrón que nos destruye
y roba lo mejor de nuestra hacienda, llevándonos el alma a cada paso;

ligereza que alcanza al que más huye, 60
enigma que ninguno hay que la entienda,
vida que de continuo está en traspaso,
guerra elegida y que nasce acaso,
tregua que poco dura,
amada desventura, 65
preñez que por jamás a sazón llega,
enfermedad que al ánima se pega,
cobarde que se arroja al mal y atreve,
deudor que siempre niega

la deuda averiguada que nos debe, 70

cercado laberinto do se anida
una fiera crüel que se sustenta
de rendidos humanos corazones,
lazo donde se enlaza nuestra vida,
señor que al mayordomo pide cuenta 75
de las obras, palabras e intenciones;
codicia de mil varias pretensiones,
gusano que fabrica
estancia pobre o rica,
do poco espacio habita, y al fin muere; 80
querer que nunca sabe lo que quiere,

nube que los sentidos escurece,
cuchillo que nos hiere.
Éste es el amor. ¡Seguidle, si os parece!

Con esta canción acabó su razonamiento el desamorado Lenio, y con ella y con él dejó admirados a algunos de los que presentes estaban, especialmente a los caballeros, pareciéndoles que lo que Lenio había dicho de más caudal que de pastoril ingenio parecía; y con gran deseo y atención estaban esperando la respuesta de Tirsi, prometiéndose todos en su imaginación que, sin duda alguna, a la de Lenio haría ventaja, por la que Tirsi le hacía en la edad y en la experiencia y en los más acostumbrados estudios; y asimesmo les aseguraba esto porque deseaban que la opinión desamorada de Lenio no prevaleciese. Bien es verdad que la lastimada Teolinda, la enamorada Leonarda, la bella Rosaura y aun la dama que con Darinto y su compañero venía claramente vieron figurados en el discurso de Lenio mil puntos de los sucesos de sus amores, y esto fue cuando llegó a tratar de lágrimas y suspiros y de cuán caros se compraban los contentos amorosos. Solas la hermosa Galatea y la discreta Florisa iban fuera desta cuenta, porque hasta entonces no se la había tomado amor de sus hermosos y rebeldes pechos; y así, estaban atentas, no más de a escuchar la agudeza con que los dos famosos pastores disputaban, sin que de los efectos de amor que oían viesan alguno en sus libres voluntades. Pero, siendo la de Tirsi reducir a mejor término la opinión del desamorado pastor, sin esperar ser rogado, tiniendo de su boca colgados los ánimos de los circunstantes, puniéndose frontero de Lenio, con suave y levantado tono, desta manera comenzó a decir:

TIRSI

-Si la agudeza de tu buen ingenio, desamorado pastor, no me asegurara que con facilidad puede alcanzar la verdad, de quien tan lejos agora se halla, antes que ponerme en trabajo de contradecir tu opinión, te dejara con ella por castigo de tus sinrazones. Mas, porque me advierten las que en vituperio del amor has dicho los buenos principios que tienes para poder reducirte a mejor propósito, no quiero dejar con mi silencio, a los que nos oyen, escandalizados; al amor, desfavorecido, y a ti, pertinaz y vanaglorioso. Y así, ayudado del amor, a quien llamo, pienso en pocas palabras dar a entender cuán otras son sus obras y efectos de los que tú dél has publicado, hablando sólo del amor que tú entiendes, el cual tú definiste diciendo que era un deseo de belleza, declarando asimesmo qué cosa era belleza, y poco después desmenuzaste todos los efectos que el amor, de quien hablamos, hacía en los enamorados pechos, confirmándolo al cabo con varios y desdichados sucesos por el amor causados. Y, aunque la definición que del amor hiciste sea la más general que se suele dar, todavía no lo es tanto que no se pueda contradecir, porque amor y deseo son dos cosas diferentes: que no todo lo que se ama se desea, ni todo lo que se desea se ama. La razón está clara en todas las cosas que se poseen, que entonces no se podrá decir que se desean, sino que se aman, como el que tiene salud no dirá que desea la salud, sino que la ama, y el que tiene hijos no podrá decir que desea hijos, sino que ama los hijos; ni tampoco las cosas que se desean se pueden decir que se aman, como la muerte de los enemigos, que se desea y no se ama. Y así, que, por esta razón, el amor y deseo vienen a ser diferentes afectos de la voluntad. Verdad es que amor es padre del deseo, y entre otras definiciones que del amor se dan, ésta es una: amor es aquella primera mutación que sentimos hacer en nuestra mente, por el apetito que nos conmueve y nos tira a sí, y nos deleita y aplice; y aquel placer engendra movimiento en el ánimo, el cual movimiento se llama deseo; y, en resolución, deseo es movimiento del apetito acerca de lo que se ama, y un querer de aquello que se posee, y el objeto suyo es el bien; y, como se hallan diversas especies de deseos, y el amor es una especie de deseo que atiende y mira al bien que se llama bello. Pero para más clara definición y diversión del amor, se ha de entender que en tres maneras se divide: en amor honesto, en amor útil y en amor deleitable. Y a estas tres suertes de amor se reducen cuantas maneras de amar y desear pueden caber en nuestra voluntad, porque el amor honesto mira a las cosas del cielo, eternas y divinas; el útil, a las de la tierra, alegres y perecederas, como son las riquezas, mandos y señoríos; el deleitable, a las gustosas y placenteras, como son

las bellezas corporales vivas, que tú, Lenio, dijiste. Y cualquiera suerte destos amores que he dicho no debe ser de ninguna lengua vituperada, porque el amor honesto siempre fue, es y ha de ser limpio, sencillo, puro y divino, y que sólo en Dios para y sosiega; el amor provechoso, por ser, como es, natural, no debe condenarse; ni menos el deleitable, por ser más natural que el provechoso. Que sean naturales estas dos suertes de amor en nosotros la experiencia nos lo muestra claro, porque luego que el atrevido primer padre nuestro pasó el divino mandamiento, y de señor quedó hecho siervo, y de libre esclavo, luego conoció la miseria en que había caído y la pobreza en que estaba; y así, tomó en el momento las hojas de los árboles que le cubriesen, y sudó y trabajó, rompiendo la tierra para sustentarse y vivir con la menos incomodidad que pudiese; y, tras esto, obedeciendo mejor a su Dios en ello que en otra cosa, procuró tener hijos y perpetuar y dilatar en ellos la generación humana; y, así como por su inobediencia entró la muerte en él y por él en todos sus descendientes, así heredamos juntamente todos sus afectos y pasiones, como heredamos su misma naturaleza; y, como él procuró remediar su necesidad y pobreza, también nosotros no podemos dejar de procurar y desear remediar la nuestra. Y de aquí nasce el amor que tenemos a las cosas útiles a la vida humana, y tanto cuanto más alcanzamos dellas, tanto más nos parece que remediamos nuestra falta, y por el mismo consiguiente heredamos el deseo de perpetuarnos en nuestros hijos; y deste deseo se sigue el que tenemos de gozar la belleza viva corporal, como solo y verdadero medio que tales deseos a dichoso fin conduce. Así que, este amor deleitable, solo y sin mezcla de otro accidente, es digno antes de alabanza que de vituperio, y este es el amor que tú, Lenio, tienes por enemigo; y cáusalo que no le entiendes ni conoces, porque nunca le has visto solo y en su misma figura, sino siempre acompañado de deseos perniciosos, lascivos y mal colocados. Y esto no es culpa de amor, que siempre es bueno, sino de los accidentes que se le llegan, como vemos que acaece en algún caudaloso río, el cual tiene su nacimiento de alguna líquida y clara fuente que siempre claras y frescas aguas le va ministrando, y, a poco espacio que de la limpia madre se aleja, sus dulces y cristalinas aguas en amargas y turbias son convertidas, por los muchos y no limpios arroyos que de una y otra parte se le juntan. Así que, este primer movimiento -amor o deseo, como llamarlo quisieres- no puede nacer sino de buen principio; y aun dellos es el conocimiento de la belleza, la cual, conocida por tal, casi parece imposible que de amar se deje. Y tiene la belleza tanta fuerza para mover nuestros ánimos, que ella sola fue parte para que los antiguos filósofos, ciegos y sin lumbre de fe que los encaminase, llevados de la razón natural, y traídos de la belleza que en los estrellados cielos y en la máquina y redondez de la tierra contemplaban, admirados de tanto contento y hermosura, fueron con el entendimiento rastreando, haciendo escala por estas causas segundas, hasta llegar a la primera causa de las causas; y conocieron que había un solo principio sin principio de todas las cosas. Pero lo que más los admiró y levantó la consideración, fue ver la compostura del hombre, tan ordenada, tan perfecta y tan hermosa, que le vinieron a llamar mundo abreviado; y así es verdad, que en todas las obras hechas por el mayordomo de Dios, naturaleza, ninguna es de tanto primor ni que más descubra la grandeza y sabiduría de su Hacedor, porque en la figura y compostura del hombre se cifra y cierra la belleza que en todas las otras partes della se reparte, y de aquí nasce que esta belleza conocida se ama, y como toda ella más se muestre y resplandezca en el rostro, luego como se ve un hermoso rostro, llama y tira la voluntad a amarle. De do se sigue que, como los rostros de las mujeres hagan tanta ventaja en hermosura al de los varones, ellas son las que son de nosotros más queridas, servidas y solicitadas, como a cosa en quien consiste la belleza que naturalmente más a nuestra vista contenta. Pero, viendo el hacedor y criador nuestro que es propria naturaleza del ánima nuestra estar contino en perpetuo movimiento y deseo, por no poder ella parar sino en Dios, como en su proprio centro, quiso, porque no se arrojase a rienda suelta a desear las cosas perecederas y vanas, y esto sin quitarle la libertad del libre albedrío, ponerle encima de sus tres potencias una despierta centinela que la avisase de los peligros que la contrastaban y de los enemigos que la perseguían, la cual fue la razón, que corrige y enfrena nuestros desordenados deseos. Y, viendo asimesmo que la belleza humana había de llevar tras sí nuestros afectos e inclinaciones, ya que no le pareció quitarnos este deseo, a lo menos quiso templarle y corregirle, ordenando el sancto yugo del matrimonio, debajo del cual al varón y a la hembra los más de los gustos y contentos amorosos naturales les son lícitos y debidos. Con estos dos remedios, puestos por la divina mano, se viene a templar la demasía que puede haber en el amor natural, que tú, Lenio, vituperas, el cual amor de sí es tan bueno que si en nosotros faltase, el mundo y nosotros acabaríamos. En este mesmo amor de quien voy hablando están cifradas todas las virtudes, porque el amor es templanza que el amante, conforme la casta voluntad de la cosa amada, la suya tiempla; es fortaleza, porque el enamorado cualquier variedad puede sufrir por amor de quien ama; es justicia, porque con ella a la que bien quiere sirve, forzándole la mesma razón a ello; es prudencia, porque de toda sabiduría está el amor adornado. Mas yo te demando, ¡oh Lenio!, tú que has dicho que el amor es causa de ruina de imperios, destrucción de ciudades, de muertes de amigos, de sacrílegos hechos, inventor de traiciones, transgresor de leyes, digo que te demando que me digas cuál loable cosa hay hoy en el mundo, por buena que sea, que el uso della no pueda en mal ser convertida. Condémnese la filosofía, porque

muchas veces nuestros defectos descubre, y muchos filósofos han sido malos; abrásense las obras de los heroicos poetas, porque con sus sátiras y versos los vicios reprehenden y vituperan; vitupérese la medicina, porque los venenos descubre; llámese inútil la elocuencia, porque algunas veces ha sido tan arrogante que ha puesto en duda la verdad conocida; no se forjen armas, porque los ladrones y los homicidas las usan; no se fabriquen casas, porque puedan caer sobre sus habitantes; prohíbanse la variedad de los manjares, porque suelen ser causa de enfermedad; ninguno procure tener hijos, porque Edipo, instigado de cruelísima furia, mató a su padre, y Oreste hirió el pecho de la madre propia; téngase por malo el fuego, porque suele abrasar las casas y consumir las ciudades; desdéñese el agua, porque con ella se anegó toda la tierra; condémnense, en fin, los elementos, porque pueden ser de algunos perversos perversamente usados; y desta manera cualquier cosa buena puede ser en mala convertida, y proceder della efectos malos, si en las manos de aquéllos son puestas que, como irracionales sin mediocridad, del apetito gobernar se dejan. Aquella antigua Cartago, émula del imperio romano; la belicosa Numancia, la adornada Corinto, la soberbia Tebas, la docta Atenas y la ciudad de Dios, Hierusalém, que fueron vencidas y asoladas: digamos por eso que el amor fue causa de su destrucción y ruina. Así que, debrían los que tienen por costumbre de decir mal del amor, decirlo dellos mismos, porque los dones de amor, si con templanza se usan, son dignos de perpetua alabanza, pues siempre los medios fueron alabados en todas las cosas, como vituperados los extremos; que si abrazamos la virtud más de aquello que basta, el sabio granjeará nombre de loco y el justo de inicuo. Del antiguo Cremona trágico fue opinión que, como el vino mezclado con el agua es bueno, así el amor templado es provechoso, lo que es al revés en el immoderado. La generación de los animales racionales y brutos sería ninguna si el amor no procediese, y, faltando en la tierra, quedaría desierta y vacua. Los antiguos creyeron que el amor era obra de los dioses, dada para conservación y cura de los hombres. Pero, viniendo a lo que tú, Lenio, dijiste de los tristes y estraños efectos que el amor en los enamorados pechos hace, tiniéndolos siempre en continas lágrimas, profundos sospiros, desesperadas imaginaciones, sin concederles jamás una hora de reposo, veamos, por ventura, ¿qué cosa puede desearse en esta vida que el alcanzarla no cueste fatiga y trabajo? Y tanto cuanto más es de valor la cosa, tanto más se ha de padecer y se padece por ella, porque el deseo presupone falta de lo deseado, y hasta conseguirlo es forzosa la inquietud del ánimo nuestro, pues si todos los deseos humanos se pueden pagar y contentarse sin alcanzar de todo punto lo que desean, con que se les dé parte dello, y con todo eso se padece por conseguirla, ¿qué mucho es que, por alcanzar aquello que no puede satisfacer ni contentar al deseo sino con ello mismo, se padezca, se llore, se tema y se espere? El que desea señoríos, mandos, honras y riquezas, ya que ve que no puede subir al último grado que quisiera, como llegue a ponerse en algún buen punto, queda en parte satisfecho, porque la esperanza que le falta de no poder subir a más, le hace parar donde puede y como mejor puede, todo lo cual es contrario en el amor, porque el amor no tiene otra paga ni otra satisfacción sino el mismo amor, y él propio es su propia y verdadera paga. Y por esta razón es imposible que el amante esté contento hasta que a la clara conozca que verdaderamente es amado, certificándole desto las amorosas señales que ellos saben. Y así, estiman en tanto un regalado volver de ojos, una prenda cualquiera que sea de su amada, un no sé qué de risa, de habla, de burlas, que ellos de veras toman, como indicios que le van asegurando la paga que desean, y así, todas las veces que ven señales en contrario destas, esle fuerza al amante lamentarse y afligirse, sin tener medio en sus dolores, pues no le puede tener en sus contentos, cuando la favorable fortuna y el blando amor se los concede. Y, como sea hazaña de tanta dificultad reducir una voluntad ajena a que sea una propia con la mía, y juntar dos diferentes almas en tan disoluble ñudo y estrechez que de las dos sean uno los pensamientos y una todas las obras, no es mucho que, por conseguir tan alta empresa, se padezca más que por otra cosa alguna, pues, después de conseguida, satisface y alegra sobre todas las que en esta vida se desean. Y no todas veces son las lágrimas con razón y causa derramadas, ni esparcidos los sospiros de los enamorados, porque si todas sus lágrimas y sospiros se causaron de ver que no se responde a su voluntad como se debe y con la paga que se requiere, habría de considerar primero adónde levantaron la fantasía, y si la subieron más arriba de lo que su merecimiento alcanza, no es maravilla que, cual nuevos Ícaros, caigan abrasados en el río de las miserias, de las cuales no tendrá la culpa amor, sino su locura. Con todo eso, yo no niego, sino afirmo, que el deseo de alcanzar lo que se ama por fuerza ha de causar pesadumbre, por la razón de la carestía que presupone, como ya otras veces he dicho; pero también digo que el conseguirla sea de grandísimo gusto y contento, como lo es al cansado el reposo y la salud al enfermo. Junto con esto, confieso que si los amantes señalasen, como en el uso antiguo, con piedras blancas y negras sus tristes o dichosos días, sin duda alguna que serían más las infelices; mas, también conozco que la calidad de sola una blanca piedra haría ventaja a la cantidad de otras infinitas negras. Y, por prueba desta verdad, vemos que los enamorados jamás de serlo se arrepienten; antes, si alguno les prometiese librarles de la enfermedad amorosa, como a enemigo le desecharían, porque aun el sufrirla les es suave. Y por esto, ¡oh amadores!, no os impida ningún temor para dejar de ofreceros y dedicaros a amar lo que más os pareciere dificultoso, ni os quejéis ni arrepintáis si a la grandeza vuestra las cosas bajas habéis levantado, que amor iguala lo pequeño a lo sublime, y lo menos a lo más; y con justo acuerdo tiempla las diversas condiciones de los amantes, cuando con puro afecto la gracia suya en sus corazones rescibe. No cedáis a los peligros, porque la gloria será tanta que quite el sentimiento de todo dolor. Y, como a los antiguos capitanes y emperadores, en premio de sus trabajos y fatigas, les eran, según la grandeza de sus victorias, aparejados triunfos, así a los amantes les están guardados muchedumbre de placeres y contentos, y, como a aquéllos el glorioso rescibimiento les hacía olvidar todos los incomodos y disgustos pasados, así al amante de la amada amado. Los espantosos sueños, el dormir no seguro, las veladas noches, los inquietos días, en summa tranquilidad y alegría se convierten. De manera, Lenio, que si por sus efectos tristes les condenas, por los gustosos y alegres les debes de absolver; y a la interpretación que diste de la figura de Cupido, estoy por decir que vas tan engañado en ella, como casi en las demás cosas que contra el amor has dicho. Porque, píntanle niño, ciego, desnudo, con las alas y saetas; no quiere significar otra cosa, sino que el amante ha de ser niño en no tener condición doblada, sino pura y sencilla; ha de ser ciego a todo cualquier otro objeto que se le ofreciere, sino es a aquel a quien ya supo mirar y entregarse; ha de ser desnudo, porque no ha de tener cosa que no sea de la que ama; ha de tener alas de ligereza, para estar prompto a todo lo que por su parte se le quisiere mandar; píntanle con saetas, porque la llaga del enamorado pecho ha de ser profunda y secreta, y que apenas se descubra sino a la misma causa que ha de remedialla. Que el amor hiera con dos saetas, las cuales obran en diferentes maneras, es darnos a entender que en el perfecto amor, no ha de haber medio de querer y no querer en un mismo punto, sino que el amante ha de amar enteramente, sin mezcla de alguna tibieza. En fin, ¡oh Lenio!, este amor es el que si consumió a los troyanos, engrandeció a los griegos; si hizo cesar las obras de Cartago, hizo crescer los edificios de Roma; si quitó el reino a Tarquino, redujo a libertad la república. Y, aunque pudiera traer aquí muchos ejemplos en contrario de los que tú trujiste de los efectos buenos que el amor hace, no me quiero ocupar en ellos, pues de sí son tan notorios; sólo quiero rogarte te dispongas a creer lo que he mostrado, y que tengas paciencia para oír una canción mía, que parece que en competencia de la tuya se hizo; y si por ella y por lo que te he dicho no quisieres reducirte a ser de la parte de amor, y te pareciere que no quedas satisfecho de las verdades que dél he declarado, si el tiempo de agora lo concede, o en otro cualquiera que tú escogieres y señalares, te prometo de satisfacer a todas las réplicas y argumentos que en contrario de los míos decir quisieres. Y, por agora, estéme atento y escucha: CANCIÓN DE TIRSI

Salga del limpio enamorado pecho
la voz sonora, y en süave acento
cante de amor las altas maravillas,
de modo que contento y satisfecho
quede el más libre y suelto pensamiento, 5 sin que las sienta con no más de oíllas.

Tú, dulce amor, que puedes referillas
por mi lengua, si quieres,
tal gracia le concede,
que con la palma quede 10
de gusto y gloria por decir quién eres,
que si me ayudas, como yo confío,
veráse en presto vuelo
subir al cielo tu valor y el mío.

Es el amor principio del bien nuestro, 15
medio por do se alcanza y se granjea
el más dichoso fin que se pretende;
de todas sciencias sin igual maestro;
fuego que, aunque de yelo un pecho sea,
en claras llamas de virtud le enciende; 20
poder que al flaco ayuda, al fuerte ofende;
raíz de adonde nasce
la venturosa planta
que al cielo nos levanta,
con tal fruto que al alma satisface 25
de bondad, de valor, de honesto celo,
de gusto sin segundo,

que alegra al mundo y enamora al cielo;

cortesano, galán, sabio, discreto,
callado, liberal, manso, esforzado; 30
de aguda vista, aunque de ciegos ojos;
guardador verdadero del respecto,
capitán que en la guerra do ha triunfado
sola la honra quiere por despojos;
flor que cresce entre espinas y entre abrojos, 35

que a vida y alma adorna;
del temor enemigo,
de la esperanza amigo;
huésped que más alegra cuando torna;
instrumento de honrosos ricos bienes, 40
por quien se mira y medra
la honrosa yedra en las honradas sienes;

instinto natural que nos conmueve
a levantar los pensamientos, tanto que apenas llega allí la vista humana; 45
escala por do sube, el que se atreve,
a la dulce región del cielo sancto;
sierra en su cumbre deleitosa y llana,

facilidad que lo intricado allana,
norte por quien se guía 50
en este mar insano
el pensamiento sano,
alivio de la triste fantasía,
padrino que no quiere nuestra afrenta;
farol que no se encubre, 55
mas nos descubre el puerto en la tormenta;

pintor que en nuestras ánimas retrata,
con apacibles sombras y colores,
ora mortal, ora inmortal belleza;
sol que todo ñublado desbarata, 60
gusto a quien son sabrosos los dolores;
espejo en quien se ve naturaleza
liberal, que en su punto la franqueza
pone con justo medio;
espíritu de fuego 65
que alumbra al que es más ciego;
del odio y del temor solo remedio;
Argos que nunca puede estar dormido,
por más que a sus orejas
lleguen consejas de algún dios fingido; 70

ejército de armada infantería
que atropella cien mil dificultades,
y siempre queda con victoria y palma;
morada adonde asiste el alegría;
rostro que nunca encubre las verdades, 75
mostrando claro lo que está en el alma;
mar donde la tormenta es dulce calma
con sólo que se espere
tenerla en tiempo alguno;
refrigerio oportuno 80
que cura al desdeñado cuando muere;
en fin, amor es vida, es gloria, es gusto,
almo feliz sosiego.
¡Seguilde luego, qu'el seguirle es justo!

El fin del razonamiento y canción de Tirsi fue principio para confirmar de nuevo en todos la opinión que de discreto tenía, si no fue en el desamorado Lenio, a quien no pareció tan bien su respuesta que le satisficiese al entendimiento y le mudase de su primer propósito. Viose esto claro, porque ya iba dando muestras de querer responder y replicar a Tirsi, si las alabanzas que a los dos daban Darinto y su compañero, y todos los pastores y pastoras presentes, no lo estorbaran, porque, tomando la mano el amigo de Darinto, dijo: -En este punto acabo de conocer cómo la potencia y sabiduría de amor por todas las partes de la tierra se estiende, y que donde más se afina y apura es en los pastorales pechos, como nos lo ha mostrado lo que hemos oído al desamorado Lenio y al discreto Tirsi, cuyas razones y argumentos más parecen de ingenios entre libros y las aulas criados, que no de aquéllos que entre pajizas cabañas son crecidos. Pero no me maravillaría yo tanto desto si fuese de aquella opinión del que dijo que el saber de nuestras almas era acordarse de lo que ya sabían, prosuponiendo que todas se crían enseñadas; mas, cuando veo que debo seguir el otro mejor parecer del que afirmó que nuestra alma era como una tabla rasa, la cual no tenía ninguna cosa pintada, no puedo dejar de admirarme de ver cómo haya sido imposible que en la compañía de las ovejas, en la soledad de los campos, se puedan aprender las sciencias que apenas saben disputarse en las nombradas universidades, si ya no quiero persuadirme a lo que primero dije, que el amor por todo se estiende y a todos se comunica, al caído levanta, al simple avisa y al avisado perfecciona.

-Si conocieras, señor -respondió a esta sazón Elicio-, cómo la crianza del nombrado Tirsi no ha sido entre los árboles y florestas, como tú imaginas, sino en las reales cortes y conocidas escuelas, no te maravillaras de lo que ha dicho, sino de lo que ha dejado de decir. Y, aunque el desamorado Lenio, por su humildad, ha confesado que la rusticidad de su vida pocas prendas de ingenio puede prometer, con todo eso, te aseguro que los más floridos años de su edad gastó, no en el ejercicio de guardar las cabras en los montes, sino en las riberas del claro Tormes, en loables estudios y discretas conversaciones. Así que, si la plática que los dos han tenido de más que de pastores te parece, contémploslos como fueron y no como ahora son. Cuanto más, que hallarás pastores en estas nuestras riberas que no te causarán menos admiración, si los oyes, que los que ahora has oído, porque en ellas apascientan sus ganados los famosos y conocidos Eranio, Siralbo, Filardo, Silvano, Lisardo y los dos Matuntos, padre y hijo, uno en la lira y otro en la poesía sobre todo extremo estremados. Y, para remate de todo, vuelve los ojos y conoce al conocido Damón, que presente tienes, donde puede parar tu deseo, si desea conocer el extremo de discreción y sabiduría.

Responder quería el caballero a Elicio, cuando una de aquellas damas que con él venían dijo a la otra: -Paréceme, señora Nísida, que, pues el sol va ya declinando, que sería bien que nos fuésemos, si habemos de llegar mañana adonde dicen que está nuestro padre.

No hubo bien dicho esto la dama, cuando Darinto y su compañero la miraron, mostrando que les había pesado de que hubiese llamado por su nombre a la otra. Pero, así como Elicio oyó el nombre de Nísida, le dio el alma si era aquella Nísida de quien el ermitaño Silerio tantas cosas había contado, y el mismo pensamiento les vino a Tirsi, Damón y a Erastro; y, por certificarse Elicio de lo que sospechaba, dijo: -Pocos días ha, señor Darinto, que yo y algunos de los que aquí estamos oímos nombrar el nombre de Nísida, como aquella dama agora ha hecho; pero de más lágrimas acompañado y con más sobresaltos referido.

-Por ventura -respondió Darinto-, ¿hay alguna pastora en estas vuestras riberas que se llame Nísida?

-No -respondió Elicio-; pero esta que yo digo en ellas nació y en las apartadas del famoso Sebeto fue criada.

-¿Qué es lo que dices, pastor? -replicó el otro caballero.

-Lo que oyes -respondió Elicio-, y lo que más oirás si me aseguras una sospecha que tengo.

-Dímela -dijo el caballero-, que podría ser se te satisficiese.

A esto replicó Elicio:

-¿A dicha, señor, tu propio nombre es Timbrio?

-No te puedo negar esa verdad -respondió el otro-, porque Timbrio me llamo, el cual nombre quisiera encubrir hasta otra sazón más oportuna; mas la voluntad que tengo de saber por qué sospechaste que así me llamaba me fuerza a que no te encubra nada de lo que de mí saber quisieres.

-Según eso, tampoco me negarás -dijo Elicio-que esta dama que contigo traes se llame Nísida, y aun, por lo que yo puedo conjeturar, la otra se llama Blanca, y es su hermana.

-En todo has acertado -respondió Timbrio-; pero, pues yo no te he negado nada de lo que me has preguntado, no me niegues tú la causa que te ha movido a preguntármelo.

-Ella es tan buena y será tan de tu gusto -replicó Elicio-cual lo verás antes de muchas horas.

Todos los que no sabían lo que el ermitaño Silerio a Elicio, Tirsi, Damón y Erastro había contado, estaban confusos oyendo lo que entre Timbrio y Elicio pasaba; mas a este punto dijo Damón, volviéndose a Elicio: -No entretengas, ¡oh Elicio!, las buenas nuevas que puedes dar a Timbrio.

-Y aun yo -dijo Erastro-no me detendré un punto de ir a dárselas al lastimado Silerio del hallazgo de Timbrio.

-¡Sanctos cielos! ¿Y qué es lo que oigo -dijo Timbrio-, y qué es lo que dices, pastor? ¿Es por ventura ese Silerio que has nombrado el que es mi verdadero amigo, el que es la mitad de mi alma, el que yo deseo ver más que otra cosa que me pueda pedir el deseo? ¡Sácame desta duda luego, así crezcan y multipliquen tus rebaños de manera que te tengan envidia todos los vecinos ganaderos!

-No te fatigues tanto, Timbrio -dijo Damón-, que el Silerio que Erastro dice es el mismo que tú dices, y el que desea saber más de tu vida que sostener y aumentar la suya propia; porque, después que te partiste de Nápoles, según él nos ha contado, ha sentido tanto tu ausencia que la pena della, con la que le causaban otras pérdidas que él nos contó, le ha reducido a términos que en una pequeña ermita que poco menos de una legua está de aquí distante, pasa la más estrecha vida que imaginarse puede, con determinación de esperar allí la muerte, pues de saber el suceso de tu vida no podía ser satisfecho. Esto sabemos cierto Tirsi, Elicio, Erastro y yo, porque él mismo nos ha contado la amistad que contigo tenía, con toda la historia de los casos a entrambos sucedidos hasta que la fortuna por tan estraños accidentes os apartó, para apartarle a él a vivir en tan estraña soledad que te causará admiración cuando le veas.

-Véale yo, y llegue luego el último remate de mis días -dijo Timbrio-; y así, os ruego, famosos pastores, por aquella cortesía que en vuestros pechos mora, que satisfagáis éste mío con decirme adónde está esa ermita adonde Silerio vive.

-Adonde muere, podrás mejor decir -dijo Erastro-; pero de aquí adelante vivirá con las nuevas de tu venida; y, pues tanto su gusto y el tuyo deseas, levántate y vamos, que antes que el sol se ponga, te pondré con Silerio; mas ha de ser con

condición que en el camino nos cuentes todo lo que te ha sucedido después que de Nápoles te partiste, que de todo lo demás, hasta aquel punto, satisfechos están algunos de los presentes.

-Poca paga me pides -respondió Timbrio-para tan gran cosa como me ofreces, porque, no digo yo contarte eso, pero todo aquello que de mí saber quisieres.

Y más, volviéndose a las damas que con él venían, les dijo:

-Pues con tan buena ocasión, querida y señora Nísida, se ha rompido el prosupuesto que traíamos de no decir nuestros propios nombres, con el alegría que requiere la buena nueva que nos han dado, os ruego que no nos detengamos, sino que luego vamos a ver a Silerio, a quien vos y yo debemos las vidas y el contento que poseemos.

-Escusado es, señor Timbrio -respondió Nísida-, que vos me roguéis que haga cosa que tanto deseo y que tan bien me está el hacerla. Vamos en hora buena, que ya cada momento que tardare de verle se me hará un siglo.

Lo mismo dijo la otra dama, que era su hermana Blanca, la misma que Silerio había dicho, y la que más muestras dio de contento. Sólo Darinto, con las nuevas de Silerio, se puso tal, que los labios no movía; antes, con un extraño silencio, se levantó, y mandando a un su criado que le trujese el caballo en que allí había venido, sin despedirse de ninguno, subió en él, y, volviendo las riendas, a paso tirado se desvió de todos. Cuando esto vio Timbrio, subió en otro caballo, y con mucha priesa siguió a Darinto hasta que le alcanzó; y, trabando por las riendas del caballo, le hizo estar quedo, y allí estuvo con él hablando un buen rato, al cabo del cual Timbrio se volvió adonde los pastores estaban, y Darinto siguió su camino, enviando a disculparse con Timbrio del haberse partido sin despedirse dellos. En este tiempo Galatea, Rosaura, Teolinda, Leonarda y Florisa a las hermosas Nísida y Blanca se llegaron; y la discreta Nísida, en breves razones, les contó la amistad tan grande que entre Timbrio y Silerio había, con mucha parte de los sucesos por ellos pasados; pero, con la vuelta de Timbrio, todos quisieron ponerse en camino para la ermita de Silerio; sino que a la misma sazón llegó a la fuente una hermosa pastorcilla de hasta edad de quince años, con su zurrón al hombro y cayado en la mano; la cual, como vio tanta y tan agradable compañía, con lágrimas en los ojos, les dijo: -Si por ventura hay entre vosotros, señores, quien de los extraños efectos y casos de amor tenga alguna noticia, y las lágrimas y suspiros amorosos le suelen enternecer el pecho, acuda quien esto siente a ver si es posible remediar y detener las más amorosas lágrimas y profundos suspiros que jamás de ojos y pechos enamorados salieron. Acudid, pues, pastores, a lo que os digo: veréis cómo, con la experiencia de lo que os muestro, hago verdaderas mis palabras.

Y, en diciendo esto, volvió las espaldas, y todos cuantos allí estaban la

siguieron. Viendo, pues, la pastora que la seguían, con presuroso paso se entró por entre unos árboles que a un lado de la fuente estaban; y no hubo andado mucho cuando, volviéndose a los que tras ella iban, les dijo: -Veis allí, señores, la causa de mis lágrimas; porque aquel pastor que allí parece es un hermano mío, que por aquella pastora ante quien está hincado de hinojos, sin duda alguna, él dejará la vida en manos de su crueldad.

Volvieron todos los ojos a la parte que la pastora señalaba, y vieron que al pie de un verde sauce estaba arrimada una pastora, vestida como cazadora ninfa, con una rica aljaba que del lado le pendía y un encorvado arco en las manos, con sus hermosos y rubios cabellos cogidos con una verde guirnalda. El pastor estaba ante ella de rodillas, con un cordel echado a la garganta y un cuchillo desenvainado en la derecha mano, y con la izquierda tenía asida a la pastora de un blanco cendal que encima de los vestidos traía. Mostraba la pastora ceño en su rostro, y estar disgustada de que el pastor allí por fuerza la detuviese. Mas, cuando ella vio que la estaban mirando, con grande ahínco procuraba desasirse de la mano del lastimado pastor, que con abundancia de lágrimas, tiernas y amorosas palabras, la estaba rogando que siquiera le diese lugar para poderle significar la pena que por ella padecía. Pero la pastora, desdeñosa y airada, se apartó dél, a tiempo que ya todos los pastores llegaban cerca, tanto, que oyeron al enamorado mozo que en tal manera a la pastora hablaba: -¡Oh ingrata y desconocida Gelasia, y con cuán justo título has alcanzado el renombre de cruel que tienes! Vuelve, endurecida, los ojos a mirar al que por mirarte está en el extremo de dolor que imaginarse puede. ¿Por qué huyes de quien te sigue? ¿Por qué no admites a quién te sirve? ¿Y por qué aborreces al que te adora? ¡Oh, sin razón enemiga mía, dura cual levantado risco, airada cual ofendida sierpe, sorda cual muda selva, esquiva como rústica, rústica como fiera, fiera como tigre, tigre que en mis entrañas se ceba! ¿Será posible que mis lágrimas no te ablanden, que mis suspiros no te apiaden y que mis servicios no te muevan? Sí que será posible, pues así lo quiere mi corta y desdichada suerte, y aun será también posible que tú no quieras apretar este lazo que a la garganta tengo, ni atravesar este cuchillo por medio deste corazón que te adora. Vuelve, pastora, vuelve, y acaba la tragedia de mi miserable vida, pues con tanta facilidad puedes añadir este cordel a mi garganta o ensangrentar este cuchillo en mi pecho.

Estas y otras semejantes razones decía el lastimado pastor, acompañadas de tantos sollozos y lágrimas que movía a compasión a todos cuantos le escuchaban. Pero no por esto la cruel y desamorada pastora dejaba de seguir su camino, sin querer aun volver los ojos a mirar al pastor que por ella en tal estado quedaba, de que no poco se admiraron todos los que su airado desdén conocieron; y fue de manera que hasta al desamorado Lenio le pareció mal la crueledad de la pastora. Y así, él, con el anciano Arsindo, se adelantaron a rogarla tuviese por bien de volver a escuchar las quejas del enamorado mozo, aunque nunca tuviese intención de remediarlas. Mas no fue posible mudarla de su propósito; antes, les rogó que no la tuviesen por descomedida en no hacer lo que le mandaban, porque su intención era de ser enemiga mortal del amor y de todos los enamorados, por muchas razones que a ello la movían, y una dellas era haberse desde su niñez dedicado a seguir el ejercicio de la casta Diana; añadiendo a éstas tantas causas para no hacer el ruego de los pastores, que Arsindo tuvo por bien de dejarla y volverse, lo que no hizo el desamorado Lenio, el cual, como vio que la pastora era tan enemiga del amor como parecía, y que tan de todo en todo con la condición desamorada suya se conformaba, determinó de saber quién era y de seguir su compañía por algunos días. Y así, le declaró cómo él era el mayor enemigo que el amor y los enamorados tenían, rogándole que, pues tanto en las opiniones se conformaban, tuviese por bien de no enfadarse con su compañía, que no sería más de lo que ella quisiese.

La pastora se holgó de saber la intención de Lenio, y le concedió que con ella viniese hasta su aldea, que dos leguas de la de Lenio era. Con esto, se despidió Lenio de Arsindo, rogándole que le disculpase con todos sus amigos y les dijese la causa que le había movido a irse con aquella pastora, y sin esperar más, él y Gelasia alargaron el paso, y en poco rato desaparecieron. Cuando Arsindo volvió a decir lo que con la pastora había pasado, halló que todos aquellos pastores habían llegado a consolar al enamorado pastor, y que las dos de las tres rebozadas pastoras, la una estaba desmayada en las faldas de la hermosa Galatea y la otra abrazada con la bella Rosaura, que asimesmo el rostro cubierto tenía. La que con Galatea estaba era Teolinda, y la otra, su hermana Leonarda; las cuales, así como vieron al desesperado pastor que con Gelasia hallaron, un celoso y enamorado desmayo les cubrió el corazón, porque Leonarda creyó que el pastor era su querido Galercio, y Teolinda tuvo por verdad que era su enamorado Artidoro; y, como las dos le vieron tan rendido y perdido por la cruel Gelasia, llególes tan al alma el sentimiento que, sin sentido alguno, la una en las faldas de Galatea, la otra en los brazos de Rosaura, desmayadas cayeron. Pero de allí a poco rato, volviendo en sí Leonarda, a Rosaura dijo: -¡Ay, señora mía, y cómo creo que todos los pasos de mi remedio me tiene tomados la Fortuna, pues la voluntad de Galercio está tan ajena de ser mía, como se puede ver por las palabras que aquel pastor ha dicho a la desamorada Gelasia! Porque te hago saber, señora, que aquél es el que ha robado mi libertad y aun el que ha de dar fin a mis días.

Maravillada quedó Rosaura de lo que Leonarda decía, y más lo fue cuando, habiendo también vuelto en sí Teolinda, ella y Galatea la llamaron; y, juntándose todas con Florisa y Leonarda, Teolinda dijo cómo aquel pastor era el su deseado Artidoro. Pero aún no le hubo bien nombrado, cuando su hermana le respondió que se engañaba, que no era sino Galercio, su hermano.

-¡Ay, traidora Leonarda! -respondió Teolinda-. ¿Y no te basta haberme una vez apartado de mi bien, sino ahora que le hallo quieres decir que es tuyo? Pues desengáñate que en esto no te pienso ser hermana, sino declarada enemiga.

-Sin duda que te engañas, hermana -respondió Leonarda-, y no me maravillo, que en ese mismo error cayeron todos los de nuestra aldea, creyendo que este pastor era Artidoro, hasta que claramente vinieron a entender que no era sino su hermano Galercio, que tanto se parece el uno al otro como nosotras la una a la otra, y aun, si puede haber mayor semejanza, mayor semejanza tienen.

-No lo quiero creer -respondió Teolinda-, porque, aunque nosotras nos parecemos tanto, no tan fácilmente se hallan estos milagros en naturaleza; y así, te hago saber que en tanto que la experiencia no me haga más cierta de la verdad que tus palabras me hacen, yo no pienso dejar de creer que aquel pastor que allí veo es Artidoro; y si alguna cosa me lo pudiera poner en duda, es no pensar que de la condición y firmeza que yo de Artidoro tengo conocida, se puede esperar o temer que tan presto haya hecho mudanza y me olvide.

-Sosegaos, pastoras -dijo entonces Rosaura-, que yo os sacaré presto de la duda en que estáis.

Y, dejándolas a ellas, se fue adonde el pastor estaba dando a aquellos pastores cuenta de la estraña condición de Gelasia y de las infinitas sinrazones que con él usaba. A su lado tenía el pastor la hermosa pastorcilla que decía que era su hermano, a la cual llamó Rosaura, y, apartándose con ella a un cabo, la importunó y rogó le dijese cómo se llamaba su hermano y si tenía otro alguno que le pareciese, a lo cual la pastora respondió que se llamaba Galercio y que tenía otro, llamado Artidoro, que le parecía tanto que apenas se diferenciaban, si no era por alguna señal de los vestidos o por el órgano de la voz, que en algo difería. Preguntóle también qué se había hecho Artidoro. Respondióle la pastora que andaba en unos montes algo de allí apartados, repastando parte del ganado de Grisaldo con otro rebaño de cabras suyas, y que nunca había querido entrar en el aldea ni tener conversación con hombre alguno después que de las riberas de Henares había venido. Y con éstas le dijo otras particularidades, tales que Rosaura quedó satisfecha de que aquel pastor no era Artidoro, sino Galercio, como Leonarda había dicho y aquella pastora decía, de la cual supo el nombre, que se llamaba Maurisa; y, trayéndola consigo adonde Galatea y las otras pastoras estaban, otra vez, en presencia de Teolinda y Leonarda, contó todo lo que de Artidoro y Galercio sabía, con lo que quedó Teolinda sosegada y Leonarda descontenta, viendo cuán descuidadas estaban las mientes de Galercio de pensar en cosas suyas. En las pláticas que las pastoras tenían, acertó que Leonarda llamó por su nombre a la encubierta Rosaura, y oyéndolo Maurisa, dijo: -Si yo no me engaño, señora, por vuestra causa ha sido aquí mi venida y la de mi hermano.

-¿En qué manera? -dijo Rosaura.

-Yo os lo diré si me dais licencia de que a solas os lo diga -respondió la pastora.

-De buena gana -replicó Rosaura.

Y, apartándose con ella, la pastora le dijo:

-Sin duda alguna, hermosa señora, que a vos y a la pastora Galatea mi hermano y yo con un recaudo de nuestro amo Grisaldo venimos.

-Así debe ser -respondió Rosaura.

Y, llamando a Galatea, entrambas escucharon lo que Maurisa de Grisaldo decía, que fue avisarles cómo de allí a dos días vendría con dos amigos suyos a llevarla en casa de su tía, adonde en secreto celebrarían sus bodas, y juntamente con esto dio de parte de Grisaldo a Galatea unas ricas joyas de oro, como en agradecimiento de la voluntad que de hospedar a Rosaura había mostrado. Rosaura y Galatea agradecieron a Maurisa el buen aviso, y en pago dél, la discreta Galatea quería partir con ella el presente que Grisaldo le había enviado, pero nunca Maurisa quiso recibirlo. Allí de nuevo se tornó a informar Galatea de la semejanza extraña que entre Galercio y Artidoro había. Todo el tiempo que Galatea y Rosaura gastaban en hablar a Maurisa, le entretenían Teolinda y Leonarda en mirar a Galercio; porque, cebados los ojos de Teolinda en el rostro de Galercio, que tanto al de Artidoro semejaba, no podía apartarlos de mirar, y, como los de la enamorada Leonarda sabían lo que miraban, también le era imposible a otra parte volverlos.

A esta sazón ya los pastores habían consolado a Galercio, aunque, para el mal que él padecía, cualesquier consejos y consuelos tenía por vanos y escusados, todo lo cual redundaba en daño de Leonarda. Rosaura y Galatea, viendo que los pastores hacia ellas se venían, despidieron a Maurisa, diciéndole que dijese a Grisaldo cómo Rosaura estaría en casa de Galatea. Maurisa se despidió de ellas, y, llamando a su hermano en secreto, le contó lo que con Rosaura y Galatea pasado había; y así, con buen comedimiento, se despidió de ellas y de los pastores, y con su hermana dio la vuelta a su aldea. Pero las enamoradas hermanas Teolinda y Leonarda, que vieron que en irse Galercio se les iba la luz de sus ojos y la vida de su vida, entrambas a dos se llegaron a Galatea y a Rosaura y les rogaron les diesen licencia para seguir a Galercio, dando por excusa Teolinda que Galercio le diría adónde Artidoro estaba, y Leonarda que podría ser que la voluntad de Galercio se trocase, viendo la obligación en que la estaba. Las pastoras se la concedieron, con la condición que antes Galatea a Teolinda había pedido, que era que de todo su bien o su mal la avisase. Tornóselo a prometer Teolinda de nuevo, y de nuevo despidiéndose, siguió el camino que Galercio y Maurisa llevaban. Lo mismo hicieron luego, aunque por diferente parte, Timbrio, Tirsi, Damón, Orompo, Crisio, Marsilo y Orfinio, que a la ermita de Silerio con las hermosas hermanas Nísida y Blanca se encaminaron, habiendo primero ellos y ellas despediéndose del venerable Aurelio, y de Galatea, Rosaura y Florisa, y ansimismo de Elicio y Erastro, que no quisieron dejar de volver con Galatea, ofreciéndose Aurelio que, en llegando a su aldea, iría luego con Elicio y Erastro a buscarlos a la ermita de Silerio, y llevaría algo con que satisfacer la incomodidad que para agasajar tales huéspedes Silerio tendría. Con este prosupuesto, unos por una y otros por otra parte se apartaron, y, echando al despedirse menos al anciano Arsindo, miraron por él y vieron que, sin despedirse de ninguno, iba ya lejos por el mismo camino que Galercio y Maurisa y las rebozadas pastoras llevaban, de que se maravillaron. Y, viendo que ya el sol apresuraba su carrera para entrarse por las puertas de occidente, no quisieron detenerse allí más, por llegar al aldea antes que las sombras de la noche. Viéndose, pues, Elicio y Erastro ante la señora de sus pensamientos, por mostrar en algo lo que encubrir no podían, y por aligerar el cansancio del camino, y aun por cumplir el mandado de Florisa, que les mandó que, en tanto que a la aldea llegaban, algo cantasen, al son de la zampoña de Florisa, desta manera comenzó a cantar Elicio, y a responderle Erastro:

ELICIO ERASTRO

ELICIO

El que quisiere ver la hermosura
mayor que tuvo, o tiene o terná el suelo;
el fuego y el crisol donde se apura
la blanca castidad, el limpio celo;
todo lo que es valor, ser y cordura, 5
y cifrado en la tierra un nuevo cielo,
juntas en uno alteza y cortesía,
venga a mirar a la pastora mía.

ERASTRO

Venga a mirar a la pastora mía
quien quisiere contar de gente en gente 10
que vio otro sol que daba luz al día,
más claro qu'el que sale del oriente.
Podrá decir cómo su fuego enfría

y abrasa al alma que tocar se siente
del vivo rayo de sus ojos bellos, 15
y que no hay más que ver después de vellos.

ELICIO

Y que no hay más que ver después de vellos
sábenlo bien estos cansados ojos,
ojos que, por mi mal, fueron tan bellos,
ocasión principal de mis enojos. 20
Vilos y vi que se abrasaba en ellos mi alma, y que entregaba los despojos
de todas sus potencias a su llama,
que me abrasa y me yela, arroja y llama.

ERASTRO

Que me abrasa y me yela, arroja y llama 25
esta dulce enemiga de mi gloria,
de cuyo ilustre ser puede la fama
hacer estraña y verdadera historia.
Sólo sus ojos, do el amor derrama
toda su gracia y fuerza más notoria, 30

darán materia que levante al cielo
la pluma del más bajo humilde vuelo.

ELICIO

La pluma del más bajo humilde vuelo,

si quiere levantarse hasta la esfera,
cante la cortesía y justo celo 35
desta fénix sin par, sola y primera,
gloria de nuestra edad, honra del suelo,
valor del claro Tajo y su ribera,
cordura sin igual, rara belleza
donde más se estremó naturaleza. 40

ERASTRO

Donde más se estremó naturaleza,
donde ha igualado al pensamiento el arte,
donde juntó el valor y gentileza
que en diversos sujetos se reparte,
y adonde la humildad con la grandeza 45
ocupan solas una mesma parte,
y adonde tiene amor su albergue y nido,
la bella ingrata mi enemiga ha sido.

ELICIO

La bella ingrata mi enemiga ha sido
quien quiso, pudo y supo en un momento 50
tenerme de un sutil cabello asido
el libre vagaroso pensamiento.

Y, aunque al estrecho lazo estoy rendido,
tal gusto y gloria en las prisiones siento,

que estiendo el pie y el cuello a las cadenas, 55
llamando dulces tan amargas penas.

ERASTRO

Llamando dulces tan amargas penas
paso la corta fatigada vida, del alma triste sustentada apenas,
y aun apenas del cuerpo sostenida. 60
Ofrecióle fortuna a manos llenas
a mi breve esperanza fe cumplida: ¿qué gusto, pues, qué gloria o bien se ofrece,
do mengua la esperanza y la fe crece?

ELICIO

Do mengua la esperanza y la fe crece 65
se descubre y parece el alto intento
del firme pensamiento enamorado,
que sólo confiado en amor puro,
vive cierto y seguro de una paga
que al alma satisfaga limpiamente. 70

ERASTRO

El mísero doliente a quien subjeta
la enfermedad y aprieta, se contenta,
cuando más le atormenta el dolor fiero,
con cualquiera ligero breve alivio;

mas, cuando ya más tibio el daño toca, 75

a la salud invoca y busca entera.
Así, desta manera, el tierno pecho
del amador, deshecho en llanto triste,
dice que el bien consiste de su pena
en que la luz serena de los ojos, 80
a quien dio los despojos de su vida,
le mire con fingida o cierta muestra;
mas luego amor le adiestra y le desmanda
y más cosas demanda que primero.

ELICIO

Ya traspone el otero el sol hermoso, 85
Erastro, y a reposo nos convida
la noche denegrida que se acerca.

ERASTRO

Y el aldea está cerca, y yo cansado.

ELICIO

Pongamos, pues, silencio al canto usado.

Bien tomaran por partido los que escuchando a Elicio y a Erastro iban que más el camino se alargara, por gustar más del agradable canto de los enamorados pastores. Pero el cerrar de la noche, y el llegar a la aldea, hizo que dél cesasen, y que Aurelio, Galatea, Rosaura y Florisa en su casa se recogiesen. Elicio y Erastro hicieron lo mismo en las suyas, con intención de irse luego adonde Tirsi y Damón y los demás pastores estaban, que así quedó concertado entre ellos y el padre de Galatea. Sólo esperaban a que la blanca luna desterrase la oscuridad de la noche, y así como ella mostró su hermoso rostro, ellos se fueron a buscar a Aurelio, y todos juntos la vuelta de la ermita se encaminaron, donde les sucedió lo que se verá en el siguiente libro.

FIN DEL CUARTO LIBRO

Quinto libro de Galatea

ERA TANTO el deseo que el enamorado Timbrio y las dos hermosas hermanas Nísida y Blanca llevaban de llegar a la ermita de Silerio, que la ligereza de los pasos, aunque era mucha, no era posible que a la de la voluntad llegase; y, por conocer esto, no quisieron Tirsi y Damón importunar a Timbrio cumpliera la palabra que había dado de contarles en el camino todo lo por él sucedido después que se apartó de Silerio. Pero todavía, llevados del deseo que tenían de saberlo, se lo iban ya a preguntar, si en aquel punto no hiriera en los oídos de todos una voz de un pastor que, un poco apartado del camino, entre unos verdes árboles, cantando estaba, que luego, en el son no muy concertado de la voz y en lo que cantaba, fue de los más que allí venían conocido, principalmente de su amigo Damón, porque era el pastor Lauso el que, al son de un pequeño rabel, unos versos decía; y, por ser el pastor tan conocido y saber ya todos la mudanza que de su libre voluntad había hecho, de común parecer recogieron el paso y se pararon a escuchar lo que Lauso cantaba, que era esto:

LAUSO

¿Quién mi libre pensamiento me le vino a sujetar?
¿Quién pudo en flaco cimiento
sin ventura fabricar
tan altas torres de viento? 5 ¿Quién rindió mi libertad, estando en seguridad
de mi vida satisfecho?
¿Quién abrió y rompió mi pecho,
y robó mi voluntad? 10

¿Dónde está la fantasía
de mi esquivada condición?
¿Dó el alma que ya fue mía,
y dónde mi corazón,
que no está donde solía? 15

Mas, yo todo, ¿dónde estoy,
dónde vengo, o adónde voy?
A dicha, ¿sé yo de mí?
¿Soy, por ventura, el que fui,
o nunca he sido el que soy? 20

Estrecha cuenta me pido,
sin poder averigualla,
pues a tal punto he venido,
que aquello que en mí se halla,
es sombra de lo que he sido. 25
No me entiendo de entenderme,
ni me valgo por valerme,
y en tan ciega confusión,
cierta está mi perdición,
y no pienso de perderme. 30

La fuerza de mi cuidado
y el amor que lo consiente
me tienen en tal estado,
que adoro el tiempo presente,
y lloro por el pasado. 35
Véome en éste morir,

y en el pasado, vivir;
y en éste adoro mi muerte,
y en el pasado, la suerte,
que ya no puede venir. 40

En tan estraña agonía,
el sentido tengo ciego,
pues viendo que amor porfía
y que estoy dentro del fuego, aborrezco el agua fría; 45
que si no es la de mis ojos,
qu'el fuego aumenta y despojos,
en esta amorosa fragua,
no quiero ni busco otro agua ni otro alivio a mis enojos. 50

Todo mi bien comenzara,
todo mi mal feneciera,
si mi ventura ordenara
que de ser mi fe sincera
Silena se asegurara. 55
Sospiros, aseguralda;
ojos míos, enteralda

llorando en esta verdad;
pluma, lengua, voluntad,
en tal razón confirmalda. 60

No pudo ni quiso el presuroso Timbrio aguardar a que más adelante el pastor Lauso con su canto pasase, porque, rogando a los pastores que el camino de la ermita le enseñasen, si ellos quedarse querían, hizo muestras de adelantarse; y así, todos le siguieron, y pasaron tan cerca de donde el enamorado Lauso estaba, que no pudo dejar de sentirlo y de salirles al encuentro, como lo hizo, con cuya compañía todos se holgaron, especialmente Damón, su verdadero amigo, con el cual se acompañó todo el camino que desde allí a la ermita había, razonando en diversos y varios acaecimientos que a los dos habían sucedido después que dejaron de verse, que fue desde el tiempo que el valeroso y nombrado pastor Astraliano había dejado los cisalpinos pastos por ir a reducir aquéllos que del famoso hermano y de la verdadera religión se habían rebelado; y al cabo, vinieron a reducir su razonamiento a tratar de los amores de Lauso, preguntándole ahincadamente Damón que le dijese quién era la pastora que con tanta facilidad la libre voluntad le había rendido. Y, cuando esto no pudo saber de Lauso, le rogó que, a lo menos, le dijese en qué estado se hallaba, si era de temor o de esperanza, si le fatigaba ingratitud o si le atormentaban celos. A todo lo cual le satisfizo bien Lauso, contándole algunas cosas que con su pastora le habían sucedido; y, entre otras, le dijo cómo, hallándose un día celoso y desfavorecido, había llegado a términos de desesperarse o de dar alguna muestra que en daño de su persona y en el del crédito y honra de su pastora redundase; pero que todo se remedió con haberla él hablado, y haberle ella asegurado ser falsa la sospecha que tenía, confirmando todo esto con darle un anillo de su mano, que fue parte para volver a mejor discurso su entendimiento y para solemnizar aquel favor con un soneto, que de algunos que le vieron fue por bueno estimado. Pidió entonces Damón a Lauso que le dijese. Y así, sin poder escusarse, le hubo de decir; que era éste:

LAUSO

¡Rica y dichosa prenda que adornaste
el precioso marfil, la nieve pura!
¡Prenda que de la muerte y sombra oscura
a la nueva luz y vida me tornaste!

El claro cielo de tu bien trocaste 5
con el infierno de mi desventura, porque viviese en dulce paz segura
la esperanza que en mí resuscitaste.

Sabes cuánto me cuestas, dulce prenda,
el alma, y aun no quedo satisfecho, 10
pues menos doy de aquello que rescibo.

Mas, porque el mundo tu valor entienda,
sé tú mi alma, enciértrate en mi pecho,
verán cómo por ti sin alma vivo.

Dijo Lauso el soneto, y Damón le tornó a rogar que, si otra alguna cosa a su pastora había escripto, se la dijese, pues sabía de cuánto gusto le eran a él oír sus versos. A esto respondió Lauso: -Eso será, Damón, por haberme sido tú maestro en ellos, y el deseo que tienes de ver lo que en mí aprovechaste te hace desear oírlos; pero sea lo que fuere, que ninguna cosa de las que yo pudiere te ha de ser negada. Y así, te digo que, en estos mesmos días, cuando andaba celoso y mal seguro, envié estos versos a mi pastora:

LAUSO A SILENA

En tan notoria simpleza, nascida de intento sano,
el amor rige la mano,
y la intención tu belleza.

El amor y tu hermosura, 5
Silena, en esta ocasión,
juzgarán a discreción
lo que tendrás tú a locura.
Él me fuerza y ella mueve
a que te adore y escriba; 10

y como en los dos estriba
mi fe, la mano se atreve.
Y, aunque en esta grave culpa
me amenaza tu rigor,
mi fe, tu hermosura, amor, 15
darán del yerro disculpa.
Pues con un arrimo tal,
puesto que culpa me den,
bien podré decir el bien
que ha nascido de mi mal; 20
el cual bien, según yo siento,
no es otra cosa, Silena,
sino que tenga en la pena
un extraño sufrimiento.
Y no lo encarezco poco 25
este bien de ser sufrido,
que si no lo hubiera sido,
ya el mal me tuviera loco.
Mas mis sentidos, de acuerdo
todos, han dado en decir 30
que, ya que haya de morir,

que muera sufrido y cuerdo.
Pero, bien considerado,
mal podrá tener paciencia
en la amorosa dolencia 35
un celoso y desamado;
que, en el mal de mis enojos,
todo mi bien desconcierta
tener la esperanza muerta
y el enemigo a los ojos. 40
Goces, pastora, mil años

el bien de tu pensamiento, que yo no quiero contento
granjeado con tus daños.
Sigue tu gusto, señora, 45
pues te parece tan bueno,
que yo por el bien ajeno
no pienso llorar agora.
Porque fuera liviandad
entregar mi alma al alma 50
que tiene por gloria y palma

el no tener libertad.
Mas, ¡ay!, que fortuna quiere
y el amor que viene en ello, que no pueda huir el cuello 55
del cuchillo que me hiere.
Conozco claro que voy
tras quien ha de condenarme,
y cuando pienso apartarme,
más quedo y más firme estoy. 60
¿Qué lazos, qué redes tienen, Silena, tus ojos bellos,
que cuanto más huigo dellos,
más me enlazan y detienen?
¡Ay, ojos, de quien recelo 65
que si soy de vos mirado,
es por crecerme el cuidado
y por menguarme el consuelo!
Ser vuestras vistas fingidas
conmigo, es pura verdad, 70
pues pagan mi voluntad
con prendas aborrecidas.

¡Qué recelos, qué temores
persiguen mi pensamiento,
y qué de contrarios siento 75
en mis secretos amores!
Déjame, aguda memoria;
olvídate, no te acuerdes

del bien ajeno, pues pierdes
en ello tu propia gloria. 80
Con tantas firmas afirmas
el amor que está en tu pecho, Silena, que a mi despecho,
siempre mis males confirmas.
¡Oh pérfido amor cruel! 85
¿Cuál ley tuya me condena que dé yo el alma a Silena
y que me niegue un papel?
No más, Silena, que toco
en puntos de tal porfía, 90
qu'el menor dellos podría
dejarme sin vida o loco.
No pase de aquí mi pluma,

pues tú la haces sentir
que no puede reducir 95
tanto mal a breve summa.

En lo que se detuvo Lauso en decir estos versos y en alabar la singular hermosura, discreción, donaire, honestidad y valor de su pastora, a él y a Damón se les aligeró la pesadumbre del camino y se les pasó el tiempo sin ser sentido, hasta que llegaron junto de la ermita de Silerio, en la cual no querían entrar Timbrio, Nísida y Blanca, por no sobresaltarle con su no pensada venida. Mas la suerte lo ordenó de otra manera, porque, habiéndose adelantado Tirsi y Damón a ver lo que Silerio hacía, hallaron la ermita abierta y sin ninguna persona dentro; y, estando confusos, sin saber dónde podría estar Silerio a tales horas, llegó a sus oídos el son de su arpa, por do entendieron que él no debía estar lejos; y, saliendo a buscarle, guiados por el sonido de la arpa, con el resplandor claro de la luna vieron que estaba sentado en el tronco de un olivo, solo y sin otra compañía que la de su arpa, la cual tan dulcemente tocaba que, por gozar de tan suave armonía, no quisieron los pastores llegar luego a hablarle, y más cuando oyeron que con estremada voz estos versos comenzó a cantar:

SILERIO

Ligeras horas del ligero tiempo,
para mí perezosas y cansadas:
si no estáis en mi daño conjuradas,
parézcaos ya que es de acabarme tiempo.

Si agora me acabáis, haréislo a tiempo 5
que están mis desventuras más colmadas;
mirad que menguarán si sois pesadas,
qu'el mal se acaba si da tiempo al tiempo.

No os pido que vengáis dulces, sabrosas,
pues no hallaréis camino, senda o paso 10
de reducirme al ser que ya he perdido.

¡Horas a cualquier otro venturosas,
aquélla dulce del mortal traspaso,
aquélla de mi muerte sola os pido!

Después que los pastores escucharon lo que Silerio cantado había, sin que él los viese, se volvieron a encontrar los demás que allí venían, con intención que Timbrio hiciese lo que agora oiréis: que fue que, habiéndole dicho de la manera que habían hallado a Silerio y en el lugar do quedaba, le rogó a Tirsi que, sin que ninguno dellos se le diese a conocer, se fuesen llegando poco a poco hacia él, ora les viese o no, porque aunque la noche hacía clara, no por eso sería alguno conocido; y que hiciese ansimesmo que Nísida o él algo cantasen; y todo esto hacía por entretener el gusto que de su venida había de rescibir Silerio. Contentóse Timbrio dello, y, diciéndoselo a Nísida, vino en su mesmo parescer. Y así, cuando a Tirsi le pareció que estaban ya tan cerca que de Silerio podían ser oídos, hizo a la bella Nísida que comenzase, la cual, al son del rabel del celoso Orfino, desta manera comenzó a cantar: NÍSIDA

Aunque es el bien que poseo tal que al alma satisface,
le turba en parte y deshace
otro bien que vi y no veo;
que amor y fortuna escasa, 5
enemigos de mi vida,
me dan el bien por medida

y el mal sin término o tasa.
En el amoroso estado,
aunque sobre el merescer, 10
tan solo viene el placer,
cuanto el mal acompañado.
Andan los males unidos,
sin un momento apartarse;
los bienes, por acabarse, 15
en mil partes divididos.
Lo que cuesta, si se alcanza,
del amor algún contento,
declárelo el sufrimiento,
el amor y la esperanza. 20

Mil penas cuesta una gloria;
un contento, mil enojos:
sábenlo bien estos ojos
y mi cansada memoria;
la cual se acuerda contino 25
de quien pudo mejoralla,
y para hallarle no halla
alguna senda o camino.
¡Ay, dulce amigo de aquél que te tuvo por tan suyo 30
cuanto él se tuvo por tuyo
y cuanto yo lo soy dél!
Mejora con tu presencia
nuestra no pensada dicha,
y no la vuelva en desdicha 35
tu tan larga esquiva ausencia.
A duro mal me provoca
la memoria, que me acuerda
que fuiste loco y yo cuerda,
y eres cuerdo y yo estoy loca. 40

Aquel que, por buena suerte,
tú mismo quisiste darme
no ganó tanto en ganarme
cuanto ha perdido en perderte.

Mitad de su alma fuiste, 45
y medio por quien la mía
pudo alcanzar la alegría
que tu ausencia tiene triste.

Si la estremada gracia con que la hermosa Nísida cantaba causó admiración a los que con ella iban, ¿qué causaría en el pecho de Silerio, que, sin faltar punto, notó y escuchó todas las circunstancias de su canto? Y, como tenía tan en el alma la voz de Nísida, apenas llegó a sus oídos el acento suyo, cuando él se comenzó a alborotar, y a suspender y enajenar de sí mismo, elevado en lo que escuchaba. Y, aunque verdaderamente le pareció que era la voz de Nísida aquélla, tenía tan perdida la esperanza de verla, y más en semejante lugar, que en ninguna manera podía asegurar su sospecha. Desta suerte llegaron todos donde él estaba, y, en saludándole, Tirsi le dijo: -Tan aficionados nos dejaste, amigo Silerio, de la condición y conversación tuya, que, atraídos Damón y yo de la experiencia, y toda esta compañía de la fama della, dejando el camino que llevábamos, te hemos venido a buscar a tu ermita, donde, no hallándote, como no te hallamos, quedara sin cumplirse nuestro deseo, si el son de tu arpa y el de tu estimado canto aquí no nos hubiera encaminado.

-Harto mejor fuera, señores -respondió Silerio-, que no me hallárades, pues en mí no hallaréis sino ocasiones que a tristeza os muevan, pues la que yo padezco en el alma, tiene cuidado el tiempo cada día renovarla, no sólo con la memoria del bien pasado, sino con las sombras del presente, que al fin lo serán, pues de mi ventura no se puede esperar otra cosa que bienes fingidos y temores ciertos.

Lástima pusieron las razones de Silerio en todos los que le conocían, principalmente en Timbrio, Nísida y Blanca, que tanto le amaban, y luego quisieran dársele a conocer, si no fuera por no salir de lo que Tirsi les había rogado; el cual hizo que todos sobre la verde yerba se sentasen, y de manera que los rayos de la clara luna hiriesen de espaldas los rostros de Nísida y Blanca, porque Silerio no los conociese. Estando, pues, desta suerte, y después que Damón a Silerio había dicho algunas palabras de consuelo, porque el tiempo no se pasase todo en tratar en cosas de tristeza, y por dar principio a que la de Silerio feneciese, le rogó que su arpa tocase, al son de la cual el mismo Damón cantó este soneto: DAMÓN

Si el áspero furor del mar airado por largo tiempo en su rigor durase,

mal se podría hallar quien entregase
su flaca nave al piélago alterado.

No permanece siempre en un estado 5
el bien ni el mal, que el uno y otro vase;
porque si huyese el bien y el mal quedase,
ya sería el mundo a confusión tornado.

La noche al día, y el calor al frío,
la flor al fruto van en seguimiento, 10
formando de contrarios igual tela.

La sujeción se cambia en señorío,
en placer el pesar, la gloria en viento,
che per tal variar natura è bella.

Acabó Damón de cantar, y luego hizo de señas a Timbrio que lo mismo hiciese; el cual, al propio son de la arpa de Silerio, dio principio a un soneto que en el tiempo del hervor de sus amores había hecho, el cual de Silerio era tan sabido como del mismo Timbrio:

TIMBRIO

Tan bien fundada tengo la esperanza,
que, aunque más sople riguroso viento,
no podrá desdecir de su cimiento:
tal fe, tal suerte y tal valor alcanza.

No pudo acabar Timbrio el comenzado soneto, porque el oír Silerio su voz y el conocerle todo fue uno; y, sin ser parte a otra cosa, se levantó de do sentado estaba y se fue a abrazar del cuello de Timbrio, con muestras de tan extraño contento y sobresalto que, sin hablar palabra, se transpuso y estuvo un rato sin acuerdo, con tanto dolor de los presentes, temerosos de algún mal suceso, que ya condenaban por mala el astucia de Tirsi; pero quien más extremos de dolor hacía era la hermosa Blanca, como aquélla que tiernamente le amaba. Acudió luego Nísida y su hermana a remediar el desmayo de Silerio, el cual, a cabo de poco espacio, volvió en sí diciendo: -¡Oh poderoso cielo! ¿Y es posible que el que tengo presente es mi verdadero amigo Timbrio? ¿Es Timbrio el que oigo? ¿Es Timbrio el que veo? Sí es, si no me burla mi ventura, y mis ojos no me engañan.

-Ni tu ventura te burla, ni tus ojos te engañan, dulce amigo mío -respondió Timbrio-, que yo soy el que sin ti no era, y el que no lo fuera jamás si el cielo no permitiera que te hallara. Cesen ya tus lágrimas, Silerio amigo, si por mí las has derramado, pues ya me tienes presente; que yo atajaré las mías, pues te tengo delante, llamándome el más dichoso de cuantos viven en el mundo, pues mis desventuras y adversidades han traído tal descuento, que goza mi alma de la posesión de Nísida, y mis ojos de tu presencia.

Por estas palabras de Timbrio, entendió Silerio que la que cantado había y la que allí estaba era Nísida; pero certificóse más en ello cuando ella misma le dijo: -¿Qué es esto, Silerio mío? ¿Qué soledad y qué hábito es éste, que tantas muestras dan de tu descontento? ¿Qué falsas sospechas o qué engaños te han conducido a tal extremo, para que Timbrio y yo leuviésemos de dolor toda la vida, ausentes de ti, que nos la diste?

-Engaños fueron, hermosa Nísida -respondió Silerio-; mas, por haber traído tales desengaños, serán celebrados de mi memoria el tiempo que ella me durare.

Lo más deste tiempo tenía Blanca asida una mano de Silerio, mirándole atentamente al rostro, derramando algunas lágrimas que de la alegría y lástima de su corazón daban manifiesto indicio. Largo sería de contar las palabras de amor y contento que entre Silerio, Timbrio, Nísida y Blanca pasaron, que fueron tan tiernas y tales, que todos los pastores que las escuchaban tenían los ojos bañados en lágrimas de alegría. Contó luego Silerio brevemente la ocasión que le había movido a retirarse en aquella ermita, con pensamiento de acabar en ella la vida, pues de la dellos no había podido saber nueva alguna; y todo lo que dijo fue ocasión de avivar más en el pecho de Timbrio el amor y amistad que a Silerio tenía, y en el de Blanca la lástima de su miseria. Y, así como acabó de contar Silerio lo que después que partió de Nápoles le había sucedido; y así, rogó a Timbrio que lo mismo hiciese, porque en extremo lo deseaba, y que no se recelase de los pastores que estaban presentes, que todos ellos, o los más, sabían ya su mucha amistad y parte de sus sucesos. Holgóse Timbrio de hacer lo que Silerio pedía, y más se holgaron los pastores, que ansimesmo lo deseaban; que ya, porque Tirsi se lo había contado, todos sabían los amores de Timbrio y Nísida, y todo aquello que el mismo Tirsi de Silerio había oído. Sentados, pues, todos, como ya he dicho, en la verde yerba, con maravillosa atención estaban esperando lo que Timbrio diría, el cual dijo: -«Después que la Fortuna me fue tan favorable y tan adversa, que me dejó vencer a mi enemigo y me venció con el sobresalto de la falsa nueva de la muerte de Nísida, con el dolor que pensar se puede, en aquel mismo instante me partí para Nápoles, y, confirmándose allí el desdichado suceso de Nísida, por no ver las casas de su padre, donde yo la había visto, y porque las calles, ventanas y otras partes donde yo la solía ver no me renovasen continuamente la memoria de mi bien pasado, sin saber qué camino tomase y sin tener algún discurso mi albedrío, salí de la ciudad, y a cabo de dos días llegué a la fuerte Gaeta, donde hallé una nave que ya quería desplegar las velas al viento para partirse a España. Embarquéme en ella, no más de por huir la odiosa tierra donde dejaba mi cielo; mas, apenas los diligentes marineros zarparon los ferros y descogieron las velas, y al mar algún tanto se alargaron, cuando se levantó una no pensada y súbita borrasca, y una ráfiga de viento imbistió las velas del navío con tanta furia que rompió el árbol del trinquete, y la vela mezana abrió de arriba abajo. Acudieron luego los prestos marineros al remedio, y, con dificultad grandísima, amainaron todas las velas, porque la borrasca crecía, y la mar comenzaba a alterarse, y el cielo daba señales de durable y espantosa fortuna. No fue volver al puerto posible, porque era maestral el viento que soplaba, y con tan grande violencia que fue forzoso poner la vela de trinquete al árbol mayor y amollar -como dicen-en popa, dejándose llevar donde el viento quisiese. Y así, comenzó la nave, llevada de su furia, a correr por el levantado mar con tanta ligereza que, en dos días que duró el maestral, discurrimos por todas las islas de aquel derecho, sin poder en ninguna tomar abrigo, pasando siempre a vista dellas, sin que Estrómbalo nos abrigase, ni Lípar nos acogiese, ni el Cimbalo, Lampadosa ni Pantanalea sirviesen para nuestro remedio; y pasamos tan cerca de Berbería que los recién derribados muros de la Goleta se descubrían y las antiguas ruinas de Cartago se manifestaban. No fue pequeño el miedo de los que en la nave iban, temiendo que, si el viento algo más reforzaba, era forzoso embestir en la enemiga tierra; mas, cuando desto estaban más temerosos, la suerte, que mejor nos la tenía guardada, o el cielo, que escuchó los votos y promesas que allí se hicieron, ordenó que el maestral se cambiase en un mediodía tan reforzado, y que tocaba en la cuarta del jaloque, que en otros dos días nos volvió al mismo puerto de Gaeta, donde habíamos partido, con tanto consuelo de todos que algunos se partieron a cumplir las romerías y promesas que en el peligro pasado habían hecho.

»Estuvo allí la nave otros cuatro días, reparándose de algunas cosas que le faltaban, al cabo de los cuales tornó a seguir su viaje con más sosegado mar y próspero viento, llevando a vista la hermosa ribera de Génova, llena de adornados jardines, blancas casas y relumbrantes capiteles, que, heridos de los rayos del sol, reverberan con tan encendidos rayos que apenas dejan mirarse.

Todas estas cosas que desde la nave se miraban pudieran causar contento, como le causaban a todos los que en la nave iban, sino a mí, que me era ocasión de más pesadumbre. Sólo el descanso que tenía era entretenerme la mentando mis penas, cantándolas o, por mejor decir, llorándolas al son de un laúd de uno de aquellos marineros. Y una noche, me acuerdo -y aun es bien que me acuerde, pues en ella comenzó a amanecer mi día-que, estando sosegado el mar, quietos los vientos, las velas pegadas a los árboles, y los marineros, sin cuidado alguno, por diferentes partes del navío tendidos, y el timonero casi dormido por la bonanza que había y por la que el cielo le aseguraba, en medio deste silencio y en medio de mis imaginaciones, como mis dolores no me dejaban entregar los ojos al sueño, sentado en el castillo de popa, tomé el laúd y comencé a cantar unos versos que habré de repetir agora, porque se advierta de qué extremo de tristeza y cuán sin pensarlo me pasó la suerte al mayor de alegría que imaginar supiera. Era, si no me acuerdo mal, lo que cantaba esto:

TIMBRIO

»Agora que calla el viento
y el sesgo mar está en calma,
no se calle mi tormento:
salga con la voz el alma,
para mayor sentimiento. 5
Que, para contar mis males,
mostrando en parte que son,
por fuerza han de dar señales
el alma y el corazón

de vivas ansias mortales. 10

»Llevóme el amor en vuelo
por uno y otro dolor
hasta ponerme en el cielo,
y agora muerte y amor
me han derribado en el suelo. 15 Amor y muerte ordenaron
una muerte y amor tal,
cual en Nísida causaron,

y de mi bien y su mal
eterna fama ganaron. 20

»Con nueva voz y terrible,
de hoy más, y en son espantoso,
hará la fama creíble
qu'el amor es poderoso
y la muerte es invencible. 25
De su poder satisfecho
quedará el mundo, si advierte
qué hazaña los dos han hecho,
qué vida llevó la muerte,
qué tal tiene amor mi pecho. 30

»Mas creo, pues no he venido
a morir o estar más loco
con el daño que he sufrido,
o que muerte puede poco
o que no tengo sentido. 35
Que si sentido tuviera,
según mis penas crecidas
me persiguen dondequiera,
aunque tuviera mil vidas,
cien mil veces muerto fuera. 40

»Mi victoria tan subida, fue con muerte celebrada
de la más ilustre vida
que en la presente o pasada
edad fue ni es conocida. 45
Della llevé por despojos
dolor en el corazón,
mil lágrimas en los ojos,
en el alma confusión
y en el firme pecho enojos. 50

»¡Oh fiera mano enemiga!

¡Cómo, si allí me acabaras,

te tuviera por amiga,
pues, con matarme, estorbaras
las ansias de mi fatiga! 55
¡Oh!, ¡cuán amargo descuento
trujo la victoria mía,
pues pagaré, según siento,
el gusto solo de un día
con mil siglos de tormento! 60

»¡Tú, mar, que escuchas mi llanto;
tú, cielo, que le ordenaste;
amor, por quien lloro tanto;
muerte, que mi bien llevaste;
acabad ya mi quebranto! 65 ¡Tú, mar, mi cuerpo rescibe;
tú, cielo, acoge mi alma;
tú, amor, con la fama escribe
que muerte llevó la palma
desta vida que no vive! 70

»¡No os descuidéis de ayudarme,
mar, cielo, amor y la muerte!

¡Acabad ya de acabarme,
que será la mejor suerte
que yo espero y podréis darme! 75
Pues si no me anega el mar, y no me recoge el cielo,
y el amor ha de durar,
y de no morir recelo,
no sé en qué habré de parar. 80

»Acuérdome que llegaba a estos últimos versos que he dicho, cuando, sin poder pasar adelante, interrumpido de infinitos suspiros y sollozos que de mi lastimado pecho despedía, aquejado de la memoria de mis desventuras, del puro sentimiento dellas, vine a perder el sentido, con un parasismo tal que me tuvo un buen rato fuera de todo acuerdo; pero ya, después que el amargo accidente hubo pasado, abrí mis cansados ojos y halléme puesta la cabeza en las faldas de una mujer vestida en hábito de peregrina, y a mi lado estaba otra con el mismo traje

adornada, la cual, estando de mis manos asida, la una y la otra tiernamente lloraban. Cuando yo me vi de aquella manera, quedé admirado y confuso, y estaba dudando si era sueño aquello que veía, porque nunca tales mujeres había visto jamás en la nave después que en ella andaba; pero desta confusión me sacó presto la hermosa Nísida, que aquí está, que era la peregrina que allá estaba, diciéndome: “¡Ay Timbrio, verdadero señor y amigo mío! ¿Qué falsas imaginaciones o qué desdichados accidentes han sido parte para poneros donde agora estáis, y para que yo y mi hermana tuviésemos tan poca cuenta con lo que a nuestras honras debíamos, y que, sin mirar en inconveniente alguno, hayamos querido dejar nuestros amados padres y nuestros usados trajes, con intención de buscaros y desengañaros de tan incierta muerte mía que pudiera causar la verdadera vuestra?” Cuando yo tales razones oí, de todo punto acabé de creer que soñaba, y que era alguna visión aquella que delante los ojos tenía, y que la continua imaginación, que de Nísida no se apartaba, era la causa que allí a los ojos viva la representase. Mil preguntas les hice, y a todas ellas enteramente me satisficieron, primero que pudiese sosegar el entendimiento y enterarme que ellas eran Nísida y Blanca. Mas, cuando yo fui conociendo la verdad, el gozo que sentí fue de manera que también me puso en condición de perder la vida, como el dolor pasado había hecho. Allí supe de Nísida cómo el engaño y descuido que tuviste, ¡oh Silerio!, en hacer la señal de la toca fue la causa para que, creyendo algún mal suceso mío, le sucediese el parasismo y desmayo, tal que todos creyeron que era muerta, como yo lo pensé, y tú, Silerio, lo creíste. Díjome también cómo, después de vuelta en sí, supo la verdad de la victoria mía, junto con mi súbita y arrebatada partida, y la ausencia tuya, cuyas nuevas la pusieron en extremo de hacer verdaderas las de su muerte. Pero ya que al último término no la llegaron, hicieron con ella y con su hermana, por industria de una ama suya que con ellas venía, que vistiéndose en hábitos de peregrinas, desconocidamente se saliesen de con sus padres una noche que llegaban junto a Gaeta, a la vuelta que a Nápoles se volvían; y fue a tiempo que la nave donde yo estaba embarcado, después de reparada de la pasada tormenta, estaba ya para partirse. Y, diciendo al capitán que querían pasar en España para ir a Sanctiago de Galicia, se concertaron con él y se embarcaron, con prosupuesto de venir a buscarme a Jerez, do pensaban hallarme o saber de mí nueva alguna, y en todo el tiempo que en la nave estuvieron, que sería cuatro días, no habían salido de un aposento que el capitán en la popa les había dado, hasta que, oyéndome cantar los versos que os he dicho, y conociéndome en la voz y en lo que en ellos decía, salieron al tiempo que os he contado, donde, solemnizando con alegres lágrimas el contento de habernos hallado, estábamos mirando los unos a los otros, sin saber con qué palabras engrandecer nuestra nueva y no pensada alegría, la cual se acrescentara más y llegara al término y punto que agora llega, si de ti, amigo Silerio, allí supiéramos nueva alguna; pero, como no hay placer que venga tan entero que de todo en todo al corazón satisfaga, en el que entonces teníamos, no sólo nos faltó tu presencia, pero aun las nuevas della. La claridad de la noche, el fresco y agradable viento, que en aquel instante comenzó a herir las velas próspera y blandamente, el mar tranquilo y desembarazado cielo, parece que todos juntos, y cada uno por sí, ayudaban a solemnizar la alegría de nuestros corazones.

»Mas la fortuna variable, de cuya condición no se puede prometer firmeza alguna, envidiosa de nuestra ventura, quiso turbarla con la mayor desventura que imaginar se pudiera, si el tiempo y los prósperos sucesos no la hubieran reducido a mejor término. Sucedió, pues, que a la sazón que el viento comenzaba a refrescar, los solícitos marineros izaron más todas las velas, y con general alegría de todos, seguro y próspero viaje se aseguraban. Uno dellos, que a una parte de la proa iba sentado, descubrió, con la claridad de los bajos rayos de la luna, que cuatro bajeles de remo, a larga y tirada boga, con gran celeridad y priesa, hacia la nave se encaminaban, y al momento conoció ser de contrarios, y con grandes voces comenzó a gritar: “¡Arma, arma, que bajeles turquescos se descubren!” Esta voz y súbito alarido puso tanto sobresalto en todos los de la nave que, sin saber darse maña en el cercano peligro, unos a otros se miraban; mas el capitán della, que en semejantes ocasiones algunas veces se había visto, viniéndose a la proa, procuró reconocer qué tamaño de bajeles y cuántos eran, y descubrió dos más que el marinero, y conoció que eran galeotas forzadas, de que no poco temor debió de rescibir; pero, disimulando lo mejor que pudo, mandó luego alistar la artillería y cargar las velas todo lo más que se pudiese la vuelta de los contrarios bajeles, por ver si podría entrarse entre ellos y jugar de todas bandas la artillería. Acudieron luego todos a las armas, y repartidos por sus postas como mejor se pudo, la venida de los enemigos esperaban.

»¡Quién podrá significaros, señores, la pena que yo a esta sazón tenía, viendo con tanta celeridad turbado mi contento y tan cerca de poder perderle, y más cuando vi que Nísida y Blanca se miraban, sin hablarse palabra, confusas del estruendo y vocería que en la nave andaba y viéndome a mí rogarles que en su aposento se encerrasen y rogasen a Dios que de las enemigas manos nos librase! Paso y punto fue éste que desmaya la imaginación cuando dél se acuerda la memoria. Sus descubiertas lágrimas, y la fuerza que yo me hacía por no mostrar las mías, me tenían de tal manera, que casi me olvidaba de lo que debía hacer, o quién era, y a lo que el peligro obligaba. Mas, en fin, las hice retraer a su estancia casi desmayadas, y, cerrándolas por defuera, acudí a ver lo que el capitán ordenaba, el cual, con prudente solicitud, todas las cosas al caso

necesarias estaba proveyendo; y, dando cargo a Darinto -que es aquel caballero que hoy se partió de nosotros-de la guarda del castillo de proa y encomendándome a mí el de popa, él con algunos marineros y pasajeros, por todo el cuerpo de la nave, a una y a otra parte discurría. No tardaron mucho en llegar los enemigos, y tardó hartos menos en calmar el viento, que fue la total causa de la perdición nuestra. No osaron los enemigos llegar a bordo, porque, viendo que el viento calmaba, les pareció mejor aguardar el día para embestirnos. Hiciéronlo así, y, el día venido, aunque ya los habíamos contado, acabamos de ver que eran quince bajeles gruesos los que cercados nos tenían, y entonces se acabó de confirmar en nuestros pechos el temor de perdernos. Con todo eso, no desmayando el valeroso capitán ni alguno de los que con él estaban, esperó a ver lo que los contrarios harían, los cuales, luego como vino la mañana, echaron de su capitana una barquilla al agua, y con un renegado enviaron a decir a nuestro capitán que se rindiese, pues veía ser imposible defenderse de tantos bajeles; y más, que eran todos los mejores de Argel, amenazándole de parte de Arnaut Mamí, su general, que si disparaba alguna pieza el navío, que le había de colgar de una entena en cogiéndole, y añadiendo a éstas otras amenazas. El renegado le persuadió que se rindiese; mas, no quiriéndolo hacer el capitán, respondió al renegado que se alargase de la nave, si no, que le echaría a fondo con la artillería. Oyó Arnaut esta respuesta, y luego, cebando el navío por todas partes, comenzó a jugar desde lejos el artillería con tanta priesa, furia y estruendo que era maravilla. Nuestra nave comenzó a hacer lo mismo, tan venturosamente, que a uno de los bajeles que por la popa la combatían echó a fondo, porque le acertó con una bala junto a la cinta, de modo que, sin ser socorrido, en breve espacio se le sorbió el mar. Viendo esto los turcos, apresuraron el combate, y en cuatro horas nos embistieron cuatro veces, y otras tantas se retiraron, con mucho daño suyo y no con poco nuestro.

»Mas, por no iros cansando contándoos particularmente las cosas sucedidas en este combate, sólo diré que, después de habernos combatido diez y seis horas, y después de haber muerto nuestro capitán y toda la más gente del navío, a cabo de nueve asaltos que nos dieron, al último dellos entraron furiosamente en el navío. Tampoco, aunque quiera, no podré encarecer el dolor que a mi alma llegó cuando vi que las amadas prendas mías, que ahora tengo delante, habían de ser entonces entregadas y venidas a poder de aquellos crueles carniceros. Y así, llevado de la ira que este temor y consideración me causaba, con pecho desarmado me arrojé por medio de las bárbaras espadas, deseoso de morir al rigor de sus filos, antes que ver a mis ojos lo que esperaba. Pero sucedióme al revés mi pensamiento, porque, abrazándose conmigo tres membrudos turcos, y yo forcejando con ellos, de tropel venimos a dar todos en la puerta de la cámara

donde Nísida y Blanca estaban; y con el ímpetu del golpe se rompió y abrió la puerta, que hizo manifiesto el tesoro que allí estaba encerrado, del cual codiciosos los enemigos, el uno dellos asió a Nísida y el otro a Blanca; y yo, que de los dos me vi libre, al otro que me tenía hice dejar la vida a mis pies, y de los dos pensaba hacer lo mismo, si ellos, advertidos del peligro, no dejaran la presa de las damas y con dos grandes heridas no me derribaran en el suelo; lo cual visto por Nísida, arrojándose sobre mi herido cuerpo, con lamentables voces pedía a los dos turcos que la acabasen.

»En este instante, atraído de las voces y lamentos de Blanca y Nísida, acudió a aquella estancia Arnaute, el general de los bajeles, e, informándose de los soldados de lo que pasaba, hizo llevar a Nísida y a Blanca a su galera, y, a ruegos de Nísida, mandó también que a mí me llevasen, pues no estaba aún muerto. Desta manera, sin tener yo sentido alguno, me llevaron a la enemiga galera capitana, donde fui luego curado con alguna diligencia, porque Nísida había dicho al capitán que yo era hombre principal y de gran rescate, con intención que, cebados de la codicia y del dinero que de mí podrían haber, con algo más recato mirasen por la salud mía. Sucedió, pues, que estando curándome las heridas, con el dolor dellas volví en mi acuerdo, y, volviendo los ojos a una parte y a otra, conocí que estaba en poder de mis enemigos y en el bajel contrario; pero ninguna cosa me llegó tan al alma como fue ver en la popa de la galera a Nísida y Blanca, sentadas a los pies del perro general, derramando por sus ojos infinitas lágrimas, indicios del interno dolor que padecían. No el temor de la afrentosa muerte que esperaba cuando tú della, buen amigo Silerio, en Cataluña me libraste; no la falsa nueva de la muerte de Nísida, de mí por verdadera creída; no el dolor de mis mortales heridas ni otra cualquiera aflicción que imaginar pudiera me causó ni causará más sentimiento que el que me vino de ver a Nísida y Blanca en poder de aquel bárbaro descreído, donde a tan cercano y claro peligro estaban puestas sus honras. El dolor deste sentimiento hizo tal operación en mi alma, que torné de nuevo a perder los sentidos y a quitar la esperanza de mi salud y vida al cirujano que me curaba, de tal modo que, creyendo que era muerto, paró en medio de la cura, certificando a todos que ya yo desta vida había pasado. Oídas estas nuevas por las dos desdichadas hermanas, digan ellas lo que sintieron, si se atreven; que yo sólo sé decir que después supe que, levantándose las dos de do estaban, tirando de sus rubios cabellos y arañando sus hermosos rostros, sin que nadie pudiese detenerlas, vinieron adonde yo desmayado estaba, y allí comenzaron a hacer tan lastimero llanto que a los mismos pechos de los crueles bárbaros enternecieron. Con las lágrimas de Nísida que en el rostro me caían, o por las ya frías y enconadas heridas, que gran dolor me causaban, torné a volver de nuevo en mi acuerdo, para acordarme de mi nueva desventura. Pasaré en silencio agora las lastimeras y amorosas palabras que en aquel desdichado punto entre mí y Nísida pasaron, por no entristecer tanto el alegre en que ahora nos hallamos, ni quiero decir por extenso los trances que ella me contó que con el capitán había pasado, el cual, vencido de su hermosura, mil promesas, mil regalos, mil amenazas le hizo porque viniese a condescender con la desordenada voluntad suya; pero, mostrándose ella con él tan esquiva como honrada, y tan honrada como esquiva, pudo todo aquel día y otra noche siguiente defenderse de las pesadas importunaciones del cosario. Mas, como la continua presencia de Nísida iba creciendo en él por puntos el libidinoso deseo, sin duda alguna se pudiera temer, como yo temía, que, dejando los ruegos y usando la fuerza, Nísida perdiera su honra, o la vida, que era lo más cierto que de su bondad se podía esperar.

»Pero, cansada ya la fortuna de habernos puesto en el más bajo estado de miseria, quiso darnos a entender ser verdad lo que de la inestabilidad suya se pregona, por un medio que nos puso en términos de rogar al cielo que en aquella desdichada suerte nos mantuviese, a trueco de no perder la vida sobre las hinchadas ondas del mar airado, el cual, a cabo de dos días que captivos fuimos, y a la sazón que llevábamos el derecho viaje de Berbería, movido de un furioso jaloque, comenzó a hacer montañas de agua y a azotar con tanta furia la cosaria armada que, sin poder los cansados remeros aprovecharse de los remos, afrenillaron y acudieron al usado remedio de la vela del trinquete al árbol, y a dejarse llevar por donde el viento y mar quisiese; y de tal manera creció la tormenta que en menos de media hora esparció y apartó a diferentes partes los bajeles, sin que ninguno pudiese tener cuenta con seguir su capitán; antes, en poco rato divididos todos, como he dicho, vino nuestro bajel a quedar solo y a ser el que más el peligro amenazaba, porque comenzó a hacer tanta agua por las costuras que, por mucho que por todas las cámaras de popa, proa y medianía le agotaban, siempre en la centina llegaba el agua a la rodilla; y añadióse a toda esta desgracia sobrevenir la noche, que en semejantes casos, más que en otros algunos, el medroso temor acrescencia; y vino con tanta escuridad y nueva borrasca que, de todo en todo, todos desesperamos de remedio. No queráis más saber, señores, sino que los mismos turcos rogaban a los cristianos que iban al remo captivos que invocasen y llamasen a sus sanctos y a su Cristo para que de tal desventura los librase; y no fueron tan en vano las plegarias de los míseros cristianos que allí iban, que, movido el alto cielo dellas, dejase sosegar el viento; antes, le creció con tanto ímpetu y furia que al amanecer del día, que sólo pudo conocerse por las horas del reloj de arena por quien se rigen, se halló el mal gobernado bajel en la costa de Cataluña, tan cerca de tierra y tan sin poder apartarse della, que fue forzoso alzar un poco más la vela para que con más furia embistiese en una ancha playa que delante se nos ofrecía: que el amor de la vida les hizo parecer dulce a los turcos la esclavitud que esperaban.

»Apenas hubo la galera embestido en tierra, cuando luego acudió a la playa mucha gente armada, cuyo traje y lengua dio a entender ser catalanes y ser de Cataluña aquella costa, y aun aquel mismo lugar donde, a riesgo de la tuya, amigo Silerio, la vida mía escapaste. ¡Quién pudiera exagerar ahora el gozo de los cristianos, que del insufrible y pesado yugo del amargo captiverio veían libres y desembarazados sus cuellos, y las plegarias y ruegos que los turcos, poco antes libres y señores, hacían a sus mismos esclavos, rogándoles fuesen parte para que de los indignados cristianos maltratados no fuesen, los cuales ya en la playa los esperaban, con deseo de vengarse de la ofensa que estos mismos turcos les habían hecho, saqueándoles su lugar, como tú, Silerio, sabes! Y no les salió vano el temor que tenían, porque, en entrando los del pueblo en la galera, que encallada en la arena estaba, hicieron tan cruel matanza en los cosarios, que muy pocos quedaron con la vida; y si no fuera que les cegó la codicia de robar la galera, todos los turcos en aquel primero ímpetu fueran muertos. Finalmente, los turcos que quedaron y cristianos captivos que allí veníamos, todos fuimos saqueados, y si los vestidos que yo traía no estuvieran sangrentados, creo que aun no me los dejaran. Darinto, que también allí venía, acudió luego a mirar por Nísida y Blanca y a procurar que me sacasen a tierra donde fuese curado.

»Cuando yo salí y reconocí el lugar donde estaba, y consideré el peligro en que en él me había visto, no dejó de darme alguna pesadumbre, causada de temor no fuese conocido y castigado por lo que no debía; y así, rogué a Darinto que, sin poner dilación alguna, procurase que a Barcelona nos fuésemos, diciéndole la causa que me movía a ello; pero no fue posible, porque mis heridas me fatigaban de manera que me forzaron a que allí algunos días estuviese, como estuve, sin ser de más de un cirujano visitado. En este entretanto fue Darinto a Barcelona, donde proveyéndose de lo que menester habíamos, dio la vuelta; y, hallándome mejor y con más fuerza, luego nos pusimos en camino para la ciudad de Toledo, por saber de los parientes de Nísida que sí sabían de sus padres, a quien ya hemos escripto todo el suceso de nuestras vidas, pidiéndole perdón de nuestros pasados yerros. Y todo el contento y dolor destos buenos y malos sucesos, lo ha acrescentado o diminuido la ausencia tuya, Silerio. Mas, pues el cielo agora con tantas ventajas ha dado remedio a nuestras calamidades, no resta otra cosa sino que, dándole las debidas gracias por ello, tú, Silerio amigo, deseches la tristeza pasada con la ocasión de la alegría presente, y procures darla a quien ha muchos días que por tu causa vive sin ella, como lo sabrás cuando más a solas y contigo las comunique. Otras algunas cosas me quedan por decir que me han sucedido en el discurso desta mi peregrinación; pero dejarlas he por agora, por no dar con la prolijidad dellas disgusto a estos pastores, que han sido el instrumento de todo mi placer y gusto.» Éste es, pues, Silerio amigo y amigos pastores, el suceso de mi vida: ved si, por la que he pasado y por la que agora paso, me puedo llamar el más lastimado y venturoso hombre de los que hoy viven.

Con estas últimas palabras dio fin a su cuento el alegre Timbrio, y todos los que presentes estaban se alegraron del felice suceso que sus trabajos habían tenido, pasando el contento de Silerio a todo lo que decir se puede; el cual, tornando de nuevo a abrazar a Timbrio, forzado del deseo de saber quién era la persona que por su causa sin contento vivía, pidiendo licencia a los pastores, se apartó con Timbrio a una parte, donde supo dél que la hermosa Blanca, hermana de Nísida, era la que más que a sí le amaba desde el mismo día y punto que ella supo quién él era y el valor de su persona; y que jamás, por no ir contra aquello que a su honestidad estaba obligada, había querido descubrir este pensamiento sino a su hermana, por cuyo medio esperaba tenerle honrado en el cumplimiento de sus deseos. Díjole asimismo Timbrio cómo aquel caballero Darinto, que con él venía, y de quien él había hecho mención en la plática pasada, conociendo quién era Blanca y llevado de su hermosura, se había enamorado della con tantas veras que la pidió por esposa a su hermana Nísida, la cual le desengañó que Blanca no lo haría en manera alguna, y que, agraviado desto Darinto, creyendo que por el poco valor suyo le desechaban, y por sacarle desta sospecha, le hubo de decir Nísida cómo Blanca tenía ocupados los pensamientos en Silerio; mas, que no por esto Darinto había desmayado ni dejado la empresa, «porque, como supo que de ti, Silerio, no se sabía nueva alguna, imaginó que los servicios que él pensaba hacer a Blanca, y el tiempo, la apartarían de su intención primera; y con este presupuesto jamás nos quiso dejar, hasta que ayer, oyendo a los pastores las ciertas nuevas de tu vida y conociendo el contento que con ellas Blanca había rescibido, y considerando ser imposible que, pareciendo Silerio, pudiese Darinto alcanzar lo que deseaba, sin despedirse de ninguno, se había, con muestras de grandísimo dolor, apartado de todos.» Junto con esto, aconsejó Timbrio a su amigo fuese contento de que Blanca le tuviese, escogiéndola y aceptándola por esposa, pues ya la conocía y no ignoraba su valor y honestidad, encareciéndole el gusto y placer que los dos tendrían viéndose con tales dos hermanas casados. Silerio le respondió que le diese espacio para pensar en aquel hecho, aunque él sabía que al cabo era imposible dejar de hacer lo que él le mandase.

A esta sazón, comenzaba ya la blanca aurora a dar señales de su nueva venida, y las estrellas poco a poco iban escondiendo la claridad suya; y a este mismo punto llegó a los oídos de todos la voz del enamorado Lauso, el cual, como su amigo Damón había sabido que aquella noche la habían de pasar en la ermita de Silerio, quiso venir a hallarse con él y con los demás pastores; y, como todo su gusto y pasatiempo era cantar al son de su rabel los sucesos prósperos o adversos de sus amores, llevado de la condición suya, y convidado de la soledad del camino y de la sabrosa armonía de las aves, que ya comenzaban con su dulce y concertado canto a saludar el venidero día, con baja voz, semejantes versos venía cantando:

LAUSO

Alzo la vista a la más noble parte
que puede imaginar el pensamiento,
donde miro el valor, admiro el arte
que suspende el más alto entendimiento.
Mas, si queréis saber quién fue la parte 5
que puso fiero yugo al cuello esento,
quién me entregó, quién lleva mis despojos,

mis ojos son, Silena, y son tus ojos.

Tus ojos son, de cuya luz serena me viene la que al cielo me encamina: 10
luz de cualquiera escuridad ajena,
segura muestra de la luz divina.
Por ella el fuego, el yugo y la cadena que me consume, carga y desatina, es refrigerio, alivio, es gloria, es palma 15
al alma, y vida que te ha dado el alma.

¡Divinos ojos, bien del alma mía,
término y fin de todo mi deseo;
ojos que serenáis el turbio día,
ojos por quien yo veo si algo veo! 20
En vuestra luz mi pena y mi alegría ha puesto amor; en vos contemplo y leo la dulce, amarga, verdadera historia del cierto infierno, de mi incierta gloria.

En ciega oscuridad andaba cuando 25
vuestra luz me faltaba, ¡oh bellos ojos!;
acá y allá, sin ver el cielo, errando

entre agudas espinas y entre abrojos;
mas luego, en el momento que tocando
fueron al alma mía los manojos 30
de vuestros rayos claros, vi a la clara
la senda de mi bien abierta y clara.

Vi que sois y seréis, ojos serenos,
quien me levanta y puede levantarme
a que entre el corto número de buenos 35
venga como mejor a señalarme.
Esto podréis hacer no siendo ajenos
y con pequeño acuerdo de mirarme, que el gusto del más bien enamorado
consiste en el mirar y ser mirado. 40

Si esto es verdad, Silena, ¿quién ha sido,
es ni será que, con firmeza pura,
cual yo te quiera ni te habrá querido,
por más que amor le ayude y la ventura?
La gloria de tu vista he merecido 45
por mi inviolable fe; mas es locura
pensar que pueda merecerse aquello que apenas puede contemplarse en ello.

El canto y el camino acabó en un mismo punto el enamorado Lauso, el cual de todos los que con Silerio estaban fue amorosamente recibido, acrescentando con su presencia el alegría que todos tenían por el buen suceso que los trabajos de Silerio habían tenido. Y, estándoselos Damón contando, vieron asomar por junto a la ermita al venerable Aurelio, que, con algunos de sus pastores, traía algunos regalos con que regalar y satisfacer a los que allí estaban, como lo había prometido el día antes que dellos se partió. Maravillados quedaron Tirsi y Damón de verle venir sin Elicio y Erastro; y más lo fueron cuando vinieron a entender la causa del haberse quedado. Llegó Aurelio, y su llegada aumentara más el contento de todos, si no dijera, encaminando su razón a Timbrio: -Si te precias, como es razón que te precies, valeroso Timbrio, de ser verdadero amigo del que lo es tuyo, agora es tiempo de mostrarlo, acudiendo a remediar a Darinto, que no lejos de aquí queda tan triste y apasionado, y tan fuera de admitir consuelo alguno en el dolor que padece, que algunos que yo le di no fueron parte para que él los tuviese por tales. Hallámosle Elicio, Erastro y yo, habrá dos horas, en medio de aquel monte que a esta mano derecha se descubre, el caballo arrendado a un pino, y él en el suelo boca abajo tendido, dando tiernos y dolorosos sospiros, y de cuando en cuando decía algunas palabras que a maldecir su ventura se encaminaban; al son lastimero de las cuales, llegamos a él, y con el rayo de la luna, aunque con dificultad, fue de nosotros conocido; e importunado que la causa de su mal nos dijese, díjonosla, y por ella entendimos el poco remedio que tenía. Con todo eso, se han quedado con él Elicio y Erastro, y yo he venido a darte las nuevas del término en que le tienen sus pensamientos; y, pues a ti te son tan manifiestos, procura remediarlos con obras, o acude a consolarlos con palabras.

-Palabras serán todas, buen Aurelio -respondió Timbrio-, las que yo en esto gastaré, si ya él no quiere aprovecharse de la ocasión del desengaño y disponer sus deseos a que el tiempo y la ausencia hagan en él sus acostumbrados efectos. Mas, porque no se piense que no correspondo a lo que a su amistad estoy obligado, enséñame, Aurelio, a qué parte le dejaste, que yo quiero ir luego a verle.

-Yo iré contigo -respondió Aurelio.

Y luego, al momento, se levantaron todos los pastores para acompañar a Timbrio y saber la causa del mal de Darinto, dejando a Silerio con Nísida y Blanca, con tanto contento de los tres que no se acertaban a hablar palabra. En el camino que había desde allí adonde Aurelio a Darinto había dejado, contó Timbrio a los que con él iban la ocasión de la pena de Darinto y el poco remedio que della se podría esperar, pues la hermosa Blanca, por quien él penaba, tenía ocupados sus deseos en su buen amigo Silerio; diciéndoles, asimesmo, que había de procurar con toda su industria y fuerzas que Silerio viniese en lo que Blanca deseaba, suplicándoles que todos fuesen en ayudar a favorecer su intención, porque, en dejando a Darinto, quería que todos a Silerio rogasen diese el sí de rescibir a Blanca por su ligítima esposa. Los pastores se ofrecieron de hacer lo que se les mandaba, y en estas pláticas llegaron adonde creyó Aurelio que Elicio, Darinto y Erastro estarían; pero no hallaron alguno, aunque rodearon y anduvieron gran parte de un pequeño bosque que allí estaba, de que no poco pesar rescibieron todos. Pero, estando en esto, oyeron un tan doloroso suspiro que les puso en confusión y deseo de saber quién le había dado; mas sacóles presto desta duda otro que oyeron no menos triste que el pasado, y, acudiendo todos a aquella parte adonde el suspiro venía, vieron estar no lejos dellos, al pie de un crecido nogal, dos pastores: el uno sentado sobre la yerba verde, y el otro tendido en el suelo y la cabeza puesta sobre las rodillas del otro. Estaba el sentado con la cabeza inclinada, derramando lágrimas y mirando atentamente al que en las rodillas tenía; y, así por esto como por estar el otro con color perdida y rostro desmayado, no pudieron luego conocer quién era; mas, cuando más cerca llegaron, luego conocieron que los pastores eran Elicio y Erastro: Elicio, el desmayado, y Erastro, el lloroso. Grande admiración y tristeza causó en todos los que allí venían la triste semblanza de los dos lastimados pastores, por ser tan amigos suyos y por ignorar la causa que de tal modo los tenía; pero el que más se maravilló fue Aurelio, por ver que tan poco antes los había dejado en compañía de Darinto con muestras de todo placer y contento, como si él no hubiera sido la causa de toda su desdicha. Viendo, pues, Erastro, que los pastores a él se llegaban, estremeció a Elicio, diciéndole: -Vuelve en ti, lastimado pastor; levántate y busca lugar donde puedas a solas llorar tu desventura, que yo pienso hacer lo mismo hasta acabar la vida.

Y, diciendo esto, cogió con las dos manos la cabeza de Elicio, y, quitándola de sus rodillas, la puso en el suelo, sin que el pastor pudiese volver en su acuerdo; y, levantándose Erastro, volvía las espaldas para irse, si Tirsi y Damón y los demás pastores no se lo impidieran. Llegó Damón adonde Elicio estaba, y, tomándole entre los brazos, le hizo volver en sí. Abrió Elicio los ojos, y, porque conoció a todos los que allí estaban, tuvo cuenta con que su lengua, movida y forzada del dolor, no dijese algo que la causa dél manifestase; y, aunque ésta le fue preguntada por todos los pastores, jamás respondió sino que no sabía otra cosa de sí mismo sino que, estando hablando con Erastro, le había tomado un recio desmayo. Lo propio decía Erastro, y a esta causa los pastores dejaron de preguntarle más la causa de su pasión; antes, le rogaron que con ellos a la ermita de Silerio se volviese, y que desde allí le llevarían a la aldea o a su cabaña; mas no fue posible que con él esto se acabase, sino que le dejasen volver a la aldea. Viendo, pues, que ésta era su voluntad, no quisieron contradecírsela; antes, se ofrecieron de ir con él; pero de ninguno quiso compañía, ni la llevara si la porfía de su amigo Damón no le venciera; y así, se hubo de partir con él, dejando concertado Damón con Tirsi que se vieses aquella noche en el aldea o cabaña de Elicio, para dar orden de volverse a la suya. Aurelio y Timbrio preguntaron a Erastro por Darinto, el cual les respondió que, ansí como Aurelio se había apartado dellos, le tomó el desmayo a Elicio, y que entretanto que él le socorría, Darinto se había partido con toda priesa, y que nunca más le habían visto. Viendo, pues, Timbrio y los que con él venían que a Darinto no hallaban, determinaron de volver a la ermita a rogar a Silerio aceptase a la hermosa Blanca por su esposa, y con esta intención se volvieron todos, excepto Erastro, que quiso seguir a su amigo Elicio. Y así, despidiéndose dellos, acompañado de solo su rabel, se apartó por el mismo camino que Elicio había ido, el cual, habiéndose un rato apartado con su amigo Damón de la demás compañía, con lágrimas en los ojos y con muestras de grandísima tristeza, así le comenzó a decir: -Bien sé, discreto Damón, que tienes de los efectos de amor tanta experiencia que no te maravillarás de los que agora pienso contarte, que son tales que, a la cuenta de mi opinión, los estimo y tengo por de los más desastrados que en el amor se hallan.

Damón, que no deseaba otra cosa que saber la causa del desmayo y tristeza suya, le aseguró que ninguna cosa le sería a él nueva, como tocase a los males que el amor suele hacer. Y así, Elicio, con este seguro, y con el mayor que de su amistad tenía, prosiguió diciendo: -Ya sabes, amigo Damón, cómo la buena suerte mía -que este nombre de buena le daré siempre, aunque me cueste la vida el haberla tenido-; digo, pues, que la buena suerte mía quiso, como todo el cielo y todas estas riberas saben, que yo amase, ¿qué digo amase?, que adorase a la sin par Galatea, con tan limpio y verdadero amor cual a su merecimiento se debe; juntamente te confieso, amigo, que, en todo el tiempo que ha que ella tiene noticia de mi cabal deseo, no ha correspondido a él con otras muestras que las generales que suele y debe dar un casto y agradecido pecho; y así, ha algunos años que, sustentada mi esperanza con una honesta correspondencia amorosa, he vivido tan alegre y satisfecho de mis pensamientos, que me juzgaba por el más dichoso pastor que jamás apascentó ganado, contentándome sólo de mirar a Galatea y de ver que, si no me quería, no me aborrecía, y que otro ningún pastor no se podría alabar que aun della fuese mirado; que no era poca satisfacción de mi deseo tener puestos mis pensamientos en tan segura parte que de otros algunos no me recelaba, confirmándome en esta verdad la opinión que conmigo tiene el valor de Galatea, que es tal, que no da lugar a que se le atreva el mismo atrevimiento. Contra este bien que tan a poca costa el amor me daba, contra esta gloria tan sin ofensa de Galatea gozada, contra este gusto tan justamente de mi deseo merecido, se ha dado hoy irrevocable sentencia: que el bien se acabe, que la gloria fenezca, que el gusto se cambie y que, finalmente, se concluya la tragedia de mi dolorosa vida. Porque sabrás, Damón, que esta mañana, viniendo con Aurelio, padre de Galatea, a buscaros a la ermita de Silerio, en el camino me dijo cómo tenía concertado de casar a Galatea con un pastor lusitano que en las riberas del blando Lima gran número de ganado apascienta. Pidióme que le dijese qué me parecía, porque, de la amistad que me tenía y de mi entendimiento, esperaba ser bien aconsejado. Lo que yo le respondí fue que me parecía cosa recia poder acabar con su voluntad privarse de la vista de tan hermosa hija, desterrándola a tan apartadas tierras, y que si lo hacía llevado y cebado de las riquezas del extranjero pastor, que considerase que no carecía él tanto dellas que no tuviese para vivir en su lugar mejor que cuantos en él de ricos presumían, y que ninguno de los mejores de cuantos habitan las riberas de Tajo dejaría de tenerse por venturoso cuando alcanzase a Galatea por esposa. No fueron mal admitidas mis razones del venerable Aurelio; pero, en fin, se resolvió diciendo que el rabadán mayor de todos los aperos se lo mandaba, y él era el que lo había concertado y tratado, y que era imposible deshacerse. Preguntéle con qué semblante Galatea había rescibido las nuevas de su destierro. Díjome que se había conformado con su voluntad, y que disponía la suya a hacer todo lo que él quisiese, como obediente hija. Esto supe de Aurelio, y ésta es, Damón, la causa de mi desmayo, y la que será de mi muerte, pues de ver a Galatea en poder ajeno y ajena de mi vista, no se puede esperar otra cosa que el fin de mis días.

Acabó su razón el enamorado Elicio y comenzaron sus lágrimas, derramadas en tanta abundancia que, enternecido el pecho de su amigo Damón, no pudo dejar de acompañarle en ellas; más, a cabo de poco espacio, comenzó, con las mejores razones que supo, a consolar a Elicio; pero todas sus palabras en ser palabras paraban, sin que ningún otro efecto hiciesen. Todavía quedaron de acuerdo que Elicio a Galatea hablase y supiese della si de su voluntad consintía en el casamiento que su padre le trataba; y que, cuando no fuese con el gusto suyo, se le ofreciese de librarla de aquella fuerza, pues para ello no le faltaría ayuda. Parecióle bien a Elicio lo que Damón decía, y determinó de ir a buscar a Galatea, para declararle su voluntad y saber la que ella en su pecho encerraba. Y así, trocando el camino que de su cabaña llevaban, hacia el aldea se encaminaron; y, llegando a una encrucijada que junto a ella cuatro caminos dividía, por uno dellos vieron venir hasta ocho dispuestos pastores, todos con azagayas en las manos, excepto uno dellos, que a caballo venía sobre una hermosa yegua, vestido con un gabán morado, y los demás a pie, y todos rebozados los rostros con unos pañizuelos. Damón y Elicio se pararon hasta que los pastores pasasen, los cuales, pasando junto a ellos, bajando las cabezas, cortésmente les saludaron, sin que alguno alguna palabra hablase. Maravillados quedaron los dos de ver la estrañeza de los ocho, y estuvieron quedos por ver qué camino seguían; pero luego vieron que el de la aldea tomaban, aunque por otro diferente que por el que ellos iban. Dijo Damón a Elicio que los siguiesen, mas no quiso, diciendo que por aquel camino que él quería seguir, junto a una fuente que no lejos dél estaba, solía estar muchas veces Galatea con algunas pastoras del lugar, y que sería bien ver si la dicha se la ofrescía tan buena que allí la hallasen. Contentóse Damón de lo que Elicio quería; y así, le dijo que guiase por do quisiese. Y sucedióle la suerte como él mismo se había imaginado, porque no anduvieron mucho cuando llegó a sus oídos la zampoña de Florisa, acompañada de la voz de la hermosa Galatea, que, como de los pastores fue oída, quedaron enajenados de sí mismos. Entonces acabó de conocer Damón cuánta verdad decían todos los que las gracias de Galatea alababan, la cual estaba en compañía de Rosaura y Florisa, y de la hermosa y recién casada Silveria, con otras dos pastoras de la misma aldea. Y, puesto que Galatea vio venir a los pastores, no por eso quiso dejar su comenzado canto; antes, pareció dar muestras de que recibía contento en que los pastores la escuchasen, los cuales así lo hicieron con toda la atención posible; y lo que alcanzaron a oír de lo que la pastora cantaba fue lo siguiente:

GALATEA

¿A quién volveré los ojos
en el mal que se apareja,

si, cuanto mi bien se aleja,
se acercan más mis enojos?
A duro mal me condena 5
el dolor que me destierra,
que si me acaba en mi tierra,
¿qué bien me hará en el ajena?
¡Oh justa amarga obediencia, que por cumplirte he de dar 10
el sí que ha de confirmar
de mi muerte la sentencia!
Puesta estoy en tanta mengua,
que por gran bien estimara
que la vida me faltara, 15
o, por lo menos, la lengua.
Breves horas y cansadas
fueron las de mi contento;
eternas las del tormento,
mas confusas y pesadas. 20
Gocé de mi libertad
en mi temprana sazón;

pero ya la subjeción

anda tras mi voluntad.

Ved si es el combate fiero 25

que dan a mi fantasía,

si al cabo de su porfía

he de querer y no quiero.

¡Oh fastidioso gobierno,

que a los respetos humanos 30

tengo de cruzar las manos

y abajar el cuello tierno!

¿Que tengo de despedirme

de ver el Tajo dorado?

¿Que ha de quedar mi ganado, 35

y yo, triste, he de partirme?

¿Que estos árboles sombríos

y estos anchos verdes prados

no serán ya más mirados

de los tristes ojos míos? 40

Severo padre, ¿qué haces?

Mira que es cosa sabida

que a mí me quitas la vida

con lo que a ti satisfaces.

Si mis suspiros no valen 45

a descubrirte mi mengua,

lo que no puede mi lengua

mis ojos te lo señalen.

Ya triste se me figura

el punto de mi partida, 50

la dulce gloria perdida

y la amarga sepultura.

El rostro que no se alegra

del no conocido esposo,

el camino trabajoso, 55

la antigua enfadosa suegra,

y otros mil inconvenientes,

todos para mí contrarios;

los gustos extraordinarios

del esposo y sus parientes. 60

Mas todos estos temores

que me figura mi suerte

se acabarán con la muerte,

que es el fin de los dolores.

No cantó más Galatea, porque las lágrimas que derramaba le impidieron la voz, y aun el contento a todos los que escuchado la habían, porque luego supieron claramente lo que en confuso imaginaban del casamiento de Galatea con el lusitano pastor, y cuán contra su voluntad se hacía; pero a quien más sus lágrimas y suspiros lastimaron fue a Elicio, que diera él por remediarlas su vida, si en ella consistiera el remedio dellas; pero, aprovechándose de su discreción y disimulando el rostro el dolor que el alma sentía, él y Damón se llegaron adonde las pastoras estaban, a las cuales cortésmente saludaron, y con no menos cortesía fueron dellas rescibidos. Preguntó luego Galatea a Damón por su padre, y respondióle que en la ermita de Silerio quedaba, en compañía de Timbrio y Nísida y de todos los otros pastores que a Timbrio acompañaron; y asimesmo le dio cuenta del conocimiento de Silerio y Timbrio y de los amores de Darinto y Blanca, la hermana de Nísida, con todas las particularidades que Timbrio había contado de lo que en el discurso de sus amores le había sucedido, a lo cual Galatea dijo: -Dichoso Timbrio y dichosa Nísida, pues en tanta felicidad han parado los desasosiegos hasta aquí padecidos, con la cual pondréis en olvido los pasados desastres; antes servirán ellos de acrescentar vuestra gloria, pues se suele decir que la memoria de las pasadas calamidades aumenta el contento en las alegrías presentes. Mas, ¡ay del alma desdichada que se vee puesta en términos de acordarse del bien perdido, y con temor del mal que está por venir, sin que vea ni halle remedio ni medio alguno para estorbar la desventura que le está amenazando, pues tanto más fatigan los dolores cuanto más se temen!

-Verdad dices, hermosa Galatea -dijo Damón-, que no hay duda sino que el repentino y no esperado dolor que viene no fatiga tanto, aunque sobresalta, como el que con largo discurso de tiempo amenaza y quita todos los caminos de remediarse. Pero, con todo eso, digo, Galatea, que no da el cielo tan apurados los males que quite de todo en todo el remedio dellos, principalmente cuando nos los deja ver primero, porque parece que entonces quiere dar lugar al discurso de nuestra razón para que se ejercite y ocupe en templar o desviar las venideras desdichas, y muchas veces se contenta de fatigarnos con sólo tener ocupados nuestros ánimos con algún espacioso temor, sin que se venga a la ejecución del mal que se teme; y, cuando a ella se viniese, como no acabe la vida, ninguno, por ningún mal que padezca, debe desesperar del remedio.

-No dudo yo deso -replicó Galatea-, si fuesen tan ligeros los males que se temen o se padecen, que dejasen libre y desembarazado el discurso de nuestro entendimiento; pero bien sabes, Damón, que, cuando el mal es tal que se le puede dar este nombre, lo primero que hace es añublar nuestro sentido y aniquilar las fuerzas de nuestro albedrío, descaeciendo nuestra virtud de manera que apenas puede levantarse aunque más la solicite la esperanza.

-No sé yo, Galatea -respondió Damón-, cómo en tus verdes años puede caber tanta experiencia de los males, si no es que quieres que entendamos que tu mucha discreción se estiende a hablar por sciencia de las cosas; que, por otra manera, ninguna noticia dellas tienes.

-Pluguiera al cielo, discreto Damón -replicó Galatea-, que no pudiera contradecirte lo que dices, pues en ello granjeara dos cosas: quedar en la buena opinión que de mí tienes, y no sentir la pena que me hace hablar con tanta experiencia en ella.

Hasta este punto estuvo callando Elicio; pero, no pudiendo sufrir más ver a Galatea dar muestras del amargo dolor que padecía, le dijo: -Si imaginas, por ventura, sin par Galatea, que la desdicha que te amenaza puede por alguna ser remediada, por lo que debes a la voluntad que para servirte de mí tienes conocida, te ruego me la declares; y si esto no quisieres, por cumplir con lo que a la paternal obediencia debes, dame, a lo menos, licencia para que yo me oponga contra quien quisiere llevarnos destas riberas el tesoro de tu hermosura, que en ellas se ha criado. Y no entiendas, pastora, que presumo yo tanto de mí mismo, que solo me atreva a cumplir con las obras lo que agora por palabras te ofrezco; que, puesto que el amor que te tengo para mayor empresa me da aliento, desconfío de mi ventura; y así, la habré de poner en las manos de la razón y en las de todos los pastores que por estas riberas de Tajo apascientan sus ganados, los cuales no querrán consentir que se les arrebaté y quite delante de sus ojos el sol que los alumbra, y la discreción que los admira, y la belleza que los incita y anima a mil honrosas competencias. Ansí que, hermosa Galatea, en fe de la razón que he dicho y de la que tengo de adorarte, te hago este ofrescimiento, el cual te ha de obligar a que tu voluntad me descubras, para que yo no caiga en error de ir contra ella en cosa alguna; pero, considerando que la bondad y honestidad incomparable tuya te ha de mover a que correspondas antes al querer de tu padre que al tuyo, no quiero, pastora, que me le declares, sino tomar a mi cargo hacer lo que me pareciere, con presupuesto de mirar por tu honra con el cuidado que tú mesma has mirado siempre por ella.

Iba Galatea a responder a Elicio y a agradecerle su buen deseo, mas estorbólo

la repentina llegada de los ocho rebozados pastores que Damón y Elicio habían visto pasar poco antes hacia el aldea. Llegaron todos donde las pastoras estaban, y, sin hablar palabra, los seis dellos, con increíble celeridad, arremetieron a abrazarse con Damón y con Elicio, teniéndolos tan fuertemente apretados que en ninguna manera pudieron desasirse. En este entretanto, los otros dos, que era el uno el que a caballo venía, se fueron adonde Rosaura estaba dando gritos por la fuerza que a Damón y a Elicio se les hacía; pero, sin aprovecharle defensa alguna, uno de los pastores la tomó en brazos y púsola sobre la yegua y en los del que en ella venía, el cual, quitándose el rebozo, se volvió a los pastores y pastoras, diciendo: -No os maravilléis, buenos amigos, de la sinrazón que al parecer aquí se os ha hecho, porque la fuerza de amor y la ingratitud de esta dama han sido causa della; ruégoos me perdonéis, pues no está más en mi mano; y si por estas partes llegare, como creo que presto llegará, el conocido Grisaldo, diréisle cómo Artandro se lleva a Rosaura, porque no pudo sufrir ser burlado della; y que si el amor y esta injuria le movieren a querer vengarse, que ya sabe que Aragón es mi patria y el lugar donde vivo.

Estaba Rosaura desmayada sobre el arzón de la silla, y los demás pastores no querían dejar a Elicio ni a Damón, hasta que Artandro mandó que los dejaran, los cuales, viéndose libres, con valeroso ánimo sacaron sus cuchillos y arremetieron contra los siete pastores, los cuales todos juntos les pusieron las azagayas que traían a los pechos, diciéndoles que se tuviesen, pues veían cuán poco podían ganar en la empresa que tomaban.

-Harto menos podrá ganar Artandro -les respondió Elicio-en haber cometido tal traición.

-No la llames traición -respondió uno de los otros-, porque esta señora ha dado la palabra de ser esposa de Artandro, y agora, por cumplir con la condición mudable de mujer, la ha negado y entregádose a Grisaldo, que es agravio tan manifiesto, y tal, que no pudo ser disimulado de nuestro amo Artandro. Por eso, sosegaos, pastores, y tenednos en mejor opinión que hasta aquí, pues el servir a nuestro amo en tan justa ocasión nos disculpa.

Y, sin decir más, volvieron las espaldas, recelándose todavía de los malos semblantes con que Elicio y Damón quedaron, los cuales estaban con tanto enojo por no poder deshacer aquella fuerza, y por hallarse inhabilitados de vengarse de lo que a ellos se les hacía, que ni sabían qué decirse ni qué hacerse. Pero los extremos que Galatea y Florisa hacían, por ver llevar de aquella manera a Rosaura, eran tales, que movieron a Elicio a poner su vida en manifiesto peligro de perderla, porque, sacando su honda, y haciendo Damón lo mismo, a todo correr fue siguiendo a Artandro, y desde lejos, con mucho ánimo y destreza, comenzaron a tirarles tantas piedras que les hicieron detener y tornarse a poner en defensa. Pero, con todo esto, no dejara de sucederles mal a los dos atrevidos pastores, si Artandro no mandara a los suyos que se adelantaran y los dejaran, como lo hicieron, hasta entrarse por un espeso montezuelo que a un lado del camino estaba, y con la defensa de los árboles hacían poco efecto las hondas y piedras de los enojados pastores. Y, con todo esto, los siguieran, si no vieran que Galatea y Florisa y las otras dos pastoras a más andar hacia donde ellos estaban se venían, y por esto se detuvieron, haciendo fuerza al enojo que los incitaba y a la deseada venganza que pretendían; y, adelantándose a rescebir a Galatea, ella les dijo: -Templad vuestra ira, gallardos pastores, pues a la ventaja de nuestros enemigos no puede igualar vuestra diligencia, aunque ha sido tal, cual nos la ha mostrado el valor de vuestros ánimos.

-El ver el tuyo descontento, Galatea -dijo Elicio-, creí yo que diera tales fuerzas al mío, que no se alabaran aquellos descomedidos pastores de la que nos han hecho; pero en mi ventura cabe no tenerla en cuanto deseo.

-El amoroso que Artandro tiene -dijo Galatea-fue el que le movió a tal descomedimiento; y así, conmigo en parte queda desculpado.

Y luego, punto por punto, les contó la historia de Rosaura, y cómo estaba esperando a Grisaldo para rescebirle por esposo, lo cual podría haber llegado a noticia de Artandro, y que la celosa rabia le hubiese movido a hacer lo que habían visto.

-Si así pasa como dices, discreta Galatea -dijo Damón-, del descuido de Grisaldo, y atrevimiento de Artandro, y mudable condición de Rosaura, temo que han de nacer algunas pesadumbres y diferencias.

-Eso fuera -respondió Galatea-cuando Artandro residiera en Castilla, pero si él se encierra en Aragón, que es su patria, quedarse ha Grisaldo con sólo el deseo de vengarse.

-¿No hay quien le pueda avisar deste agravio? -dijo Elicio.

-Sí -respondió Florisa-; que yo seguro que, antes que la noche llegue, él tenga dél noticia.

-Si eso así fuese -respondió Damón-, podría ser cobrar su prenda antes que a Aragón llegasen; porque un pecho enamorado no suele ser perezoso.

-No creo yo que lo será el de Grisaldo -dijo Florisa-; y, porque no le falte tiempo y ocasión para mostrarlo, suplicote, Galatea, que al aldea nos volvamos, porque yo quiero enviar a avisar a Grisaldo de su desdicha.

-Hágase como lo mandas, amiga -respondió Galatea-, que yo te daré un pastor que lleve la nueva.

Y con esto se querían despedir de Damón y de Elicio, si ellos no porfiaran a querer ir con ellas; y ya que se encaminaban al aldea, a su mano derecha sintieron la zampoña de Erastro, que luego de todos fue conocida, el cual venía en seguimiento de su amigo Elicio. Paráronse a escucharlo, y oyeron que, con muestras de tierno dolor, esto venía cantando:

ERASTRO

Por ásperos caminos voy siguiendo
el fin dudoso de mi fantasía, siempre en cerrada noche oscura y fría
las fuerzas de la vida consumiendo.

Y, aunque morir me veo, no pretendo 5
salir un paso de la estrecha vía;
que en fe de la alta fe sin igual mía,
mayores miedos contrastar entiendo.

Mi fe es la luz que me señala el puerto seguro a mi tormenta, y sola es ella 10
quien promete buen fin a mi viaje,

por más que el medio se me muestre incierto,
por más que el claro rayo de mi estrella
me encubra amor, y el cielo más me ultraje.

Con un profundo suspiro acabó el enamorado canto el lastimado pastor, y, creyendo que ninguno le oía, soltó la voz a semejantes razones: -¡Amor, cuya poderosa fuerza, sin hacer ninguna a mi alma, fue parte para que yo la tuviese de tener tan bien ocupados mis pensamientos! Ya que tanto bien me heciste, no quieras mostrarte agora, haciéndome el mal en que me amenazas, que es más mudable tu condición que la de la variable Fortuna. Mira, señor, cuán obediente he estado a tus leyes, cuán prompto a seguir tus mandamientos, y cuán subjeta he tenido mi voluntad a la tuya. Págame esta obediencia con hacer lo que a ti tanto importa que hagas: no permitas que estas riberas nuestras que den desamparadas de aquella hermosura que la ponía y la daba a sus frescas y menudas yerbas, a sus humildes plantas y levantados árboles; no consientas, señor, que al claro Tajo se le quite la prenda que le enriquece y por quien él tiene más fama que no por las arenas de oro que en su seno cría; no quites a los pastores destos prados la luz de sus ojos, la gloria de sus pensamientos y el honroso estímulo que a mil honrosas y virtuosas empresas les incitaba. Considera bien que, si desta a la ajena tierra consientes que Galatea sea llevada, que te despojas del dominio que en estas riberas tienes, pues por Galatea sola le usas, y si ella falta, ten por averiguado que no serás en todos estos prados conocido, que todos cuantos en ellos habitan te negarán la obediencia y no te acudirán con el usado tributo. Advierte que lo que te suplico es tan conforme y llegado a razón, que irías de todo en todo fuera della si no me lo concedieses. Porque, ¿qué ley ordena, o qué razón consiente que la hermosura que nosotros criamos, la discreción que en estas selvas y aldeas nuestras tuvo principio, el donaire por particular don del cielo a nuestra patria concedido, agora que esperábamos coger el honesto fruto de tantos bienes y riquezas, se haya de llevar a estraños reinos, a ser poseído y tratado de ajenas y no conocidas manos? No, no quiera el cielo piadoso hacernos tan notable daño. ¡Oh verdes prados, que con su vista os alegrábades! ¡Oh flores olorosas, que de sus pies tocadas, de mayor fragancia érades llenas! ¡Oh plantas, oh árboles desta deleitosa selva!, haced todos, en la mejor forma que pudiéredes, aunque a vuestra naturaleza no se conceda, algún género de sentimiento que mueva al cielo a concederme lo que le suplico!

Decía esto derramando tantas lágrimas el enamorado pastor, que no pudo Galatea disimular las suyas, ni menos ninguno de los que con ella iban, haciendo todos un tan notable sentimiento, como si lloraran en las obsequias de su muerte. Llegó a este punto a ellos Erastro, a quien rescibieron con agradable comedimiento, el cual, como vio a Galatea con señales de haberle acompañado en las lágrimas, sin apartar los ojos della, la estuvo atento mirando por un rato, al cabo del cual dijo: -Agora acabo de conocer, Galatea, que ninguno de los humanos se escapa de los golpes de la variable Fortuna, pues tú, de quien yo entendía que, por particular privilegio, habías de estar esenta dellos, veo que con mayor ímpetu te acometen y fatigan, de donde averiguo que ha querido el cielo con un solo golpe lastimar a todos los que te conocen y a todos los que del valor tuyo tienen alguna noticia; pero, con todo eso, tengo esperanza que no se ha de estender tanto su rigor que lleve adelante la comenzada desgracia, viniendo tan en perjuicio de tu contento.

-Antes, por esa misma razón -respondió Galatea-estoy yo menos segura de mi desdicha, pues jamás la tuve en lo que desease; mas, porque no está bien a la honestidad de que me precio que tan a la clara descubra cuán por los cabellos me lleva tras sí la obediencia que a mis padres debo, ruégote, Erastro, que no me des ocasión de renovar mi sentimiento, ni de ti ni de otro alguno se trate cosa que antes de tiempo despierte en mí la memoria del disgusto que temo. Y con esto asimesmo os ruego, pastores, me dejéis adelantar a la aldea, porque, siendo avisado Grisaldo, le quede tiempo para satisfacerse del agravio que Artandro le ha hecho.

Ignorante estaba Erastro del suceso de Artandro, pero la pastora Florisa, en breves razones, se lo contó todo; de que se maravilló Erastro, estimando que no debía de ser poco el valor de Artandro, pues a tan dificultosa empresa se había puesto. Querían ya los pastores hacer lo que Galatea les mandaba, si en aquella sazón no descubrieran toda la compañía de caballeros, pastores y damas que la noche antes en la ermita de Silerio se quedaron, los cuales, en señal de grandísimo contento, a la aldea se venían, trayendo consigo a Silerio con diferente traje y gusto que hasta allí había tenido, porque ya había dejado el de ermitaño, mudándole en el de alegre desposado, como ya lo era de la hermosa Blanca, con igual contento y satisfacción de entrambos y de sus buenos amigos Timbrio y Nísida, que se lo persuadieron, dando con aquel casamiento fin a todas sus miserias, y quietud y reposo a los pensamientos que por Nísida le fatigaban. Y así, con el regocijo que tal suceso les causaba, venían todos dando muestras dél con agradable música y discretas y amorosas canciones, de las cuales cesaron cuando vieron a Galatea y a los demás que con ella estaban, rescibiéndose unos a otros con mucho placer y comedimiento, dándole Galatea a Silerio el parabién de su suceso, y a la hermosa Blanca el de su desposorio; y lo mismo hicieron los pastores Damón, Elicio y Erastro, que en extremo a Silerio estaban aficionados. Luego que cesaron entre ellos los parabienes y cortesías, acordaron de proseguir su camino al aldea; y para entretenerle, rogó Tirsi a Timbrio que acabase el soneto que había comenzado a decir cuando de Silerio fue conocido; y, no escusándose Timbrio de hacerlo, al son de la flauta del celoso Orfinio, con estremada y suave voz, le cantó y acabó; que era éste:

TIMBRIO

Tan bien fundada tengo la esperanza,
que, aunque más sople riguroso viento,
no podrá desdecir de su cimiento:
tal fe, tal fuerza y tal valor alcanza.

Tan lejos voy de consentir mudanza   5
en mi firme amoroso pensamiento,
cuan cerca de acabar en mi tormento

antes la vida que la confianza.

Que si al contraste del amor vacila
el pecho enamorado, no meresce 10
del mismo amor la dulce paz tranquila.

Por esto el mío, que su fe engrandece,
rabie Caribdis o amenace Cila,
al mar se arroja y al amor se ofresce.

Pareció bien el soneto de Timbrio a los pastores, y no menos la gracia con que cantado le había, y fue de manera que le rogaron que otra alguna cosa dijese; mas escusóse con decir a su amigo Silerio respondiese por él en aquella causa, como lo había hecho siempre en otras más peligrosas. No pudo Silerio dejar de hacer lo que su amigo le mandaba; y así, con el gusto de verse en tan felice estado, al son de la mesma flauta de Orfinio, cantó lo que se sigue:

SILERIO

Gracias al cielo doy, pues he escapado
de los peligros deste mar incierto,

y al recogido favorable puerto,
tan sin saber por dónde, he ya llegado.

Recójanse las velas del cuidado, 5
repárese el navío pobre abierto,
cumpla los votos quien con rostro muerto
hizo promesas en el mar airado.

Beso la tierra, reverencio al cielo,
mi suerte abrazo mejorada y buena, 10
llamo dichoso a mi fatal destino,

y a la nueva sin par blanda cadena,
con nuevo intento y amoroso celo,
el lastimado cuello alegre inclino.

Acabó Silerio y rogó a Nísida fuese servida de alegrar aquellos campos con su canto, la cual, mirando a su querido Timbrio, con los ojos le pidió licencia para cumplir lo que Silerio le pedía; y, dándosela él ansimesmo con la vista, ella, sin más esperar, con mucho donaire y gracia, cesando el son de la flauta de Orfinio, al de la zampoña de Orompo, cantó este soneto: NÍSIDA

Voy contra la opinión de aquel que jura que jamás del amor llegó el contento
a do llega el rigor de su tormento,
por más que al bien ayude la ventura.

Yo sé qué es bien, yo sé qué es desventura, 5
y sé de sus efectos claro, y siento que cuanto más destruye el pensamiento
el mal de amor, el bien más lo asegura.

No el verme en brazos de la amarga muerte,
por la mal referida triste nueva, 10
ni a los cosarios bárbaros rendida,

fue dura pena, fue dolor tan fuerte,
que agora no conozca y haga prueba que es más el gusto de mi alegre vida.

Admiradas quedaron Galatea y Florisa de la estremada voz de la hermosa Nísida, la cual, por parecerle que por entonces en cantar Timbrio y los de su parte habían tomado la mano, no quiso que su hermana quedase sin hacerlo; y así, sin importunarle mucho, con no menos gracia que Nísida, haciendo señal a Orfinio que su flauta tocase, al son della, cantó desta manera:

BLANCA

Cual si estuviera en la arenosa Libia,
o en la apartada Citia siempre helada,
tal vez del frío temor me vi asaltada,
y tal del fuego que jamás se entibia.

Mas la esperanza, que el dolor alivia, 5
en uno y otro extremo, disfrazada
tuvo la vida en su poder guardada,
cuándo con fuerzas, cuándo flaca y tibia.

Pasó la furia del invierno helado,
y, aunque el fuego de amor quedó en su punto, 10
llegó la deseada primavera,

donde, en un solo venturoso punto,
gozo del dulce fruto deseado,
con largas pruebas de una fe sincera.

No menos contentó a los pastores la voz y lo que cantó Blanca, que todas las demás que habían oído. Y, ya que ellos querían dar muestras de que no toda la habilidad se encerraba en los cortesanos caballeros, y para esto, casi de un mismo pensamiento movidos, Orompo, Crisio, Orfinio y Marsilo comenzaban a templar sus instrumentos, les forzó a volver las cabezas un ruido que a sus espaldas sintieron, el cual causaba un pastor que con furia iba atravesando por las matas del verde bosque, el cual fue de todos conocido, que era el enamorado Lauso, de que se maravilló Tirsi, porque la noche antes se había despedido dél, diciendo que iba a un negocio que importaba el acabarle acabar su pesar y comenzar su gusto, y que, sin decirle más, con otro pastor su amigo se había partido, y que no sabía qué podía haberle sucedido agora, que con tanta priesa caminaba. Lo que Tirsi dijo movió a Damón a querer llamar a Lauso, y así, le dio voces que viniese; mas, viendo que no las oía y que ya a más andar iba traspuniendo un recuesto, con toda ligereza se adelantó, y desde encima de otro collado le tornó a llamar con mayores voces, las cuales oídas por Lauso, y conociendo quién le llamaba, no pudo dejar de volver, y, en llegando a Damón, le abrazó con señales de extraño contento, y tanto, que admiraron a Damón las muestras que de estar alegre daba; y así, le dijo: -¿Qué es esto, amigo Lauso? ¿Has, por ventura, alcanzado el fin de tus deseos, o hante desde ayer acá correspondido a ellos de manera que halles con facilidad lo que pretendes?

-Mucho mayor es el bien que traigo, Damón, verdadero amigo -respondió Lauso-, pues la causa que a otros suele ser desesperación y muerte, a mí me ha servido de esperanza y vida; y ésta ha sido de un desdén y desengaño, acompañado de un melindroso donaire que en mi pastora he visto, que me ha restituido a mi ser primero. Ya, ya, pastor, no siente mi trabajado cuello el pesado yugo amoroso, ya se han deshecho en mi sentido las encumbradas máquinas de pensamientos que desvanecido me traían, ya tornaré a la perdida conversación de mis amigos, ya me parecerán lo que son las verdes yerbas y olorosas flores destos apacibles campos, ya tendrán treguas mis suspiros, vado mis lágrimas y quietud mis desasosiegos; porque consideres, Damón, si es causa ésta bastante para mostrarme alegre y regocijado.

-Sí es, Lauso -respondió Damón-, pero temo que alegría tan repentinamente nascida no ha de ser duradera, y tengo ya experiencia que todas las libertades que de desdenes son engendradas se deshacen como el humo, y torna luego la enamorada intención con mayor priesa a seguir sus intentos. Así que, amigo Lauso, plega al cielo que sea más firme tu contento de lo que yo imagino, y goces largos tiempos la libertad que pregonas; que no sólo me holgaría por lo que debo a nuestra amistad, sino por ver un no acostumbrado milagro en los deseos amorosos.

-Comoquiera que sea, Damón -respondió Lauso-, yo me siento agora libre y señor de mi voluntad; y, porque se satisfaga la tuya de ser verdad lo que digo, mira qué quieres que haga en prueba dello. ¿Quieres que me ausente? ¿Quieres que no visite más las cabañas donde imaginas que puede estar la causa de mis pasadas penas y presentes alegrías? Cualquiera cosa haré por satisfacerte.

-La importancia está en que tú, Lauso, estés satisfecho -respondió Damón-; y veré yo que lo estás cuando de aquí a seis días te vea en ese mismo propósito. Y por agora no quiero otra cosa de ti sino que dejes el camino que llevabas y te vengas conmigo adonde todos aquellos pastores y damas nos esperan, y que la alegría que traes la solemnices con entretenernos con tu canto mientras que al aldea llegamos.

Fue contento Lauso de hacer lo que Damón le mandaba, y así, volvió con él a tiempo que Tirsi estaba haciendo señas a Damón que se volviese; y, en llegando que él y Lauso llegaron, sin gastar palabras de comedimiento, Lauso dijo: -No vengo, señores, para menos que para fiestas y contentos; por eso, si le rescibiréis de escucharme, suene Marsilo su zampoña, y aparejaos a oír lo que jamás pensé que mi lengua tuviera ocasión de decirlo, ni aun mi pensamiento para imaginarlo.

Todos los pastores respondieron a una que les sería de gran gusto el oírle. Y luego Marsilo, con el deseo que tenía de escucharle, tocó su zampoña, al son de la cual Lauso comenzó a cantar desta manera:

LAUSO

¡Con las rodillas en el suelo hincadas, las manos en humilde modo puestas
y el corazón de un justo celo lleno, te adoro, desdén sancto, en quien cifradas 5
están las causas de las dulces fiestas
que gozo en tiempo sosegado y bueno!
¡Tú del rigor del áspero veneno que el mal de amor encierra
fuiste la cierta y presta medicina;
tú mi total ruína 10
volviste en bien, en sana paz mi guerra,
y así como a mi rico almo tesoro,
no una vez sola, mas cien mil te adoro!

Por ti la luz de mis cansados ojos,
tanto tiempo turbada, y aun perdida, 15

al ser primero ha vuelto que tenía;
por ti torno a gozar de los despojos que de mi voluntad y de mi vida
llevó de amor la antigua tiranía;
por ti la noche de mi error en día 20
de sereno discurso
se ha vuelto, y la razón, que antes estaba
en posesión de esclava,
con sosegado y advertido curso,
siendo agora señora, me conduce 25
do el bien eterno más se muestra y luce.

Mostrásteme, desdén, cuán engañosas,
cuán falsas y fingidas habían sido
las señales de amor que me mostraban,
y que aquellas palabras amorosas, 30
que tanto regalaban el oído
y al alma de sí mesma enajenaban,
en falsedad y en burla se forjaban,
y el regalado y tierno
mirar de aquellos ojos sólo era 35
porque mi primavera

se convirtiese en desabrido invierno,

cuando llegase el claro desengaño;
mas tú, dulce desdén, curaste el daño.

¡Desdén, que sueles ser espuela aguda 40
que hace caminar al pensamiento
tras la amorosa deseada empresa!
En mí tu efecto y condición se muda,
que yo por ti me aparto del intento
tras quien corría con no vista priesa, 45
y, aunque contino el fiero amor no cesa,
mal de mí satisfecho,
tender de nuevo el lazo por cogerme,
y por más ofenderme,
encarar mil saetas a mi pecho, 50
tú, desdén, solo, sólo tú bien puedes
romper sus flechas y rasgar sus redes.

No era mi amor tan flaco, aunque sencillo,
que pudiera un desdén echarle a tierra;
cien mil han sido menester primero: 55
que fue, cual suele, sin poder sufrillo,
venir al suelo el pino que le atierra,
en virtud de otros golpes, el postrero.

Grave desdén, de parecer severo,
en desamor fundado 60
y en poca estimación de ajena suerte:
dulce me ha sido el verte,
el oírte y tocarte, y que gustado
haya sido del alma en coyuntura que derribas y acabas mi locura. 65

Derribas mi locura y das la mano
al ingenio, desdén, que se levante
y sacuda de sí el pesado sueño,
para que con mejor intento sano,
nuevas grandezas, nuevos loores cante 70

de otro, si le halla, agradescido dueño.
Tú has quitado las fuerzas al beleño
con que el amor ingrato
adormecía a mi virtud doliente,
y con la tuya ardiente, 75
soy reducido a nueva vida y trato:
que ahora entiendo que yo soy quien puedo
temer con tasa, y esperar sin miedo.

No cantó más Lauso, aunque bastó lo que cantado había para poner admiración en los presentes; que, como todos sabían que el día antes estaba tan enamorado y tan contento de estarlo, maravillábales verle en tan pequeño espacio de tiempo tan mudado y tan otro del que solía. Y, considerando bien esto, su amigo Tirsi le dijo: -No sé si te dé el parabién, amigo Lauso, del bien en tan breves horas alcanzado, porque temo que no debe de ser tan firme y seguro como tú imaginas; pero todavía me huelgo de que goces, aunque sea pequeño espacio, del gusto que acarrea al alma la libertad alcanzada, pues podría ser que, conociendo ahora en lo que se debe estimar, aunque tornases de nuevo a las rotas cadenas y lazos, hicieses más fuerza para romperlos, atraído de la dulzura y regalo que goza un libre entendimiento y una voluntad desapasionada.

-No tengas temor alguno, discreto Tirsi -respondió Lauso-, que ninguna otra nueva asechanza sea bastante a que yo torne a poner los pies en el cepo amoroso, ni me tengas por tan liviano y antojadizo que no me haya costado ponerme en el estado en que estoy infinitas consideraciones, mil averiguadas sospechas y mil cumplidas promesas hechas al cielo porque a la perdida luz me tornase; y, pues en ella veo ahora cuán poco antes veía, yo procuraré conservarla en el mejor modo que pudiere.

-Ninguno otro será tan bueno -dijo Tirsi- como no volver a mirar lo que atrás dejas, porque perderás, si vuelves, la libertad que tanto te ha costado, y quedarás cual quedó aquel incauto amante, con nuevas ocasiones de perpetuo llanto. Y ten por cierto, Lauso amigo, que no hay tan enamorado pecho en el mundo, a quien los desdenes y arrogancias escusadas no entibien y aun le hagan retirar de sus mal colocados pensamientos; y háceme creer más esta verdad saber yo quién es Silena, aunque tú jamás no me lo has dicho, y saber ansimesmo la mudable condición suya, sus acelerados ímpetus y la llaneza, por no darle otro nombre, de sus deseos; cosas que, a no templarlas y disfrazarlas con la sin igual hermosura de que el cielo la ha dotado, fuera por ellas de todo el mundo aborrescida.

-Verdad dices, Tirsi -respondió Lauso-, porque, sin duda alguna, la singular belleza suya y las apariencias de la incomparable honestidad de que se arrea, son partes para que no sólo sea querida, sino adorada de todos cuantos la miraren; y así, no debe maravillarse alguno que la libre voluntad mía se haya rendido a tan fuertes y poderosos contrarios: sólo es justo que se maraville de cómo me he podido escapar dellos, que, puesto que salgo de sus manos tan maltratado, estragada la voluntad, turbado el entendimiento, descaecida la memoria, todavía me parece que puedo triunfar de la batalla.

No pasaron más adelante en su plática los dos pastores, porque a este punto vieron que, por el mismo camino que ellos iban, venía una hermosa pastora, y poco desviado della un pastor, que luego fue conocido que era el anciano Arsindo, y la pastora era la hermana de Galercio, Maurisa; la cual, como fue conocida de Galatea y de Florisa, entendieron que con algún recaudo de Grisaldo para Rosaura venía; y, adelantándose las dos a rescebir la, Maurisa llegó a abrazar a Galatea, y el anciano Arsindo saludó a todos los pastores y abrazó a su amigo Lauso, el cual estaba con grande deseo de saber lo que Arsindo había hecho después que le dijeron que en seguimiento de Maurisa se había partido; y, viéndole agora volver con ella, luego comenzó a perder con él y con todos el crédito que sus blancas canas le habían adquirido; y aun le acabara de perder, si los que allí venían no supieran tan de experiencia adónde y a cuánto la fuerza del amor se extendía; y así, en los mismos que le culpaban halló la disculpa de su yerro. Y parece que, adivinando Arsindo lo que los pastores dél adivinaban, como en satisfacción y disculpa de su cuidado, les dijo: -Oíd, pastores, uno de los más estraños sucesos amorosos que por largos años en estas nuestra riberas ni en las ajenas se habrá visto. Bien creo que conocéis y conocemos todos al nombrado pastor Lenio, aquel cuya desamorada condición le adquirió renombre de desamorado; aquel que no ha muchos días que, por sólo decir mal de amor, osó tomar competencia con el famoso Tirsi, que está presente; aquel, digo, que jamás supo mover la lengua que para decir mal de amor no fuese; aquel que con tantas veras reprehendía a los que de la amorosa dolencia veía lastimados. Éste, pues, tan declarado enemigo del amor, ha venido a término que tengo por cierto que no tiene el amor quien con más veras le siga, ni aun él tiene vasallo a quien más persiga, porque le ha hecho enamorar de la desamorada Gelasia, aquella cruel pastora que al hermano desta -señalando a Maurisa-, que tanto en la condición se le parece, tuvo el otro día, como vistes, con el cordel a la garganta, para fenecer a manos de su crueldad sus cortos y mal logrados días. Digo, en fin, pastores, que Lenio el desamorado muere por la endurecida Gelasia, y por ella llena el aire de suspiros y la tierra de lágrimas; y lo que hay más malo en esto es que me parece que el amor ha querido vengarse del rebelde corazón de Lenio, rindiéndole a la más dura y esquiva pastora que se ha visto, y conociéndolo él, procura agora en cuanto dice y hace reconciliarse con el amor, y por los mismos términos que antes le vituperaba, ahora le ensalza y honra; y, con todo esto, ni el amor se mueve a favorecerle, ni Gelasia se inclina a remediarle, como lo he visto por los ojos, pues no ha muchas horas que, viniendo yo en compañía desta pastora, le hallamos en la fuente de las Pizarras, tendido en el suelo, cubierto el rostro de un sudor frío y anhelando el pecho con una estraña priesa. Lleguéme a él y conocíle, y con el agua de la fuente le rocié el rostro, con que cobró los perdidos espíritus; y, sentándome junto a él, le pregunté la causa de su dolor, la cual él me dijo sin faltar punto, contándomela con tan tierno sentimiento que le puso en esta pastora, en quien creo que jamás cupo señal de compasión alguna. Encarecióme la crueldad de Gelasia y el amor que la tenía, y la sospecha que en él reinaba de que el amor le había traído a tal estado por vengarse en un solo punto de las muchas ofensas que le había hecho. Consoléle yo lo mejor que supe, y, dejándole libre del pasado parasismo, vengo acompañando a esta pastora, y a buscarte a ti, Lauso, para que si fueres servido, volvamos a nuestras cabañas, pues ha ya diez días que dellas nos partimos, y podrá ser que nuestros ganados sientan el ausencia nuestra más que nosotros la suya.

-No sé si te responda, Arsindo -respondió Lauso-, que creo que más por cumplimiento que por otra cosa me convidas a que a nuestras cabañas nos volvamos, teniendo tanto que hacer en las ajenas, cuanto la ausencia que de mí has hecho estos días lo ha mostrado. Pero, dejando lo más que en esto te pudiera decir para mejor sazón y coyuntura, tórname a decir si es verdad lo que de Lenio dices, porque, si así es, podré yo afirmar que ha hecho amor en estos días de los mayores milagros que en todos los de su vida ha hecho, como son rendir y avasallar el duro corazón de Lenio y poner en libertad el tan sujeto mío.

-Mira lo que dices -dijo entonces Orompo-, amigo Lauso, que si el amor te tenía sujeto, como hasta aquí has significado, ¿cómo el mismo amor ahora te ha puesto en la libertad que publicas?

-Si me quieres entender, Orompo -replicó Lauso-, verás que en nada me contradigo, porque digo, o quiero decir, que el amor que reinaba y reina en el pecho de aquella a quien yo tan en extremo quería, como se encamina a diferente intento que el mío, puesto que todo es amor, el efecto que en mí ha hecho es ponerme en libertad, y a Lenio en servidumbre; y no me hagas, Orompo, que cuente con éstos otros milagros.

Y, diciendo esto, volvió los ojos a mirar al anciano Arsindo, y con ellos dijo lo que con la lengua callaba, porque todos entendieron que el tercero milagro que pudiera contar fuera ver enamoradas las canas de Arsindo de los pocos y verdes años de Maurisa, la cual todo este tiempo estuvo hablando aparte con Galatea y Florisa, diciéndoles cómo otro día sería Grisaldo en el aldea en hábito de pastor, y que allí pensaba desposarse con Rosaura en secreto, porque en público no

podía, a causa que los parientes de Leopersia, con quien su padre tenía concertado de casarle, habían sabido que Grisaldo quería faltar en la prometida palabra, y en ninguna manera querían que tal agravio se les hiciese; pero que, con todo esto, estaba Grisaldo determinado de corresponder antes a lo que a Rosaura debía, que no a la obligación en que a su padre estaba.

-Todo esto que os he dicho, pastoras -prosiguió Maurisa-, mi hermano Galercio me dijo que os lo dijese, el cual a vosotras con este recaudo venía; pero la cruel Gelasia, cuya hermosura lleva siempre tras sí el alma de mi desdichado hermano, fue la causa que él no pudiese venir a deciros lo que he dicho, pues, por seguir a ella, dejó de seguir el camino que traía, fiándose de mí como de hermana. Ya habéis entendido, pastoras, a lo que vengo; decidme dó está Rosaura, para decíselo, o decídselo vosotras, porque la angustia en que mi hermano queda puesto no consiente que un punto más aquí me detenga.

En tanto que la pastora esto decía, estaba Galatea considerando la amarga respuesta que pensaba darle, y las tristes nuevas que habían de llegar a los oídos del desdichado Grisaldo; pero, viendo que no escusaba de darlas y que era peor detenerla, luego le contó todo lo que a Rosaura había sucedido, y cómo Artandro la llevaba, de que quedó maravillada Maurisa; y al instante quisiera dar la vuelta a avisar a Grisaldo, si Galatea no la detuviera, preguntándole qué se habían hecho las dos pastoras que con ella y con Galercio se habían ido, a lo que respondió Maurisa: -Cosas te pudiera contar dellas, Galatea, que te pusieran en mayor admiración que no en la en que a mí me ha puesto el suceso de Rosaura, pero el tiempo no me da lugar a ello; sólo te digo que la que se llamaba Leonarda se ha desposado con mi hermano Artidoro por el más sutil engaño que jamás se ha visto, y Teolinda, la otra, está en término de acabar la vida o de perder el juicio, y sólo la entretiene la vista de Galercio, que, como se parece tanto a la de mi hermano Artidoro, no se aparta un punto de su compañía, cosa que es a Galercio tan pesada y enojosa, cuanto le es dulce y agradable la compañía de la cruel Gelasia. El modo como esto pasó te contaré más despacio, cuando otra vez nos veamos, porque no será razón que por mi tardanza se impida el remedio que Grisaldo puede tener en su desgracia, usando en remediarla la diligencia posible, porque si no ha más que esta mañana que Artandro robó a Rosaura, no se podrá haber alejado tanto destas riberas que quite la esperanza a Grisaldo de cobrarla, y más si yo aguijo los pies, como pienso.

Parecióle bien a Galatea lo que Maurisa decía; y así, no quiso más detenerla; sólo le rogó que fuese servida de tornarla a ver lo más presto que pudiese, para contarle el suceso de Teolinda y lo que haría en el hecho de Rosaura. La pastora se lo prometió, y, sin más detenerse, despidiéndose de los que allí estaban, se volvió a su aldea, dejando a todos satisfechos de su donaire y hermosura; pero quien más sintió su partida fue el anciano Arsindo, el cual, por no dar claras muestras de su deseo, se hubo de quedar tan solo sin Maurisa, cuanto acompañado de sus pensamientos. Quedaron también las pastoras suspensas de lo que de Teolinda habían oído, y en extremo deseaban saber su suceso. Y, estando en esto, oyeron el claro son de una bocina que a su diestra mano sonaba, y, volviendo los ojos a aquella parte, vieron encima de un recuesto algo levantado dos ancianos pastores, que en medio tenían un antiguo sacerdote, que luego conocieron ser el anciano Telesio; y, habiendo uno de los pastores tocado otra vez la bocina, todos tres se bajaron del recuesto y se encaminaron hacia otro que allí junto estaba, donde subidos, de nuevo tornaron a tocarla, a cuyo son de diferentes partes se comenzaron a mover muchos pastores, para venir a ver lo que Telesio quería, porque con aquella señal solía él convocar todos los pastores de aquella ribera cuando quería hacerles algún provechoso razonamiento, o decirles la muerte de algún conocido pastor de aquellos contornos, o para traerles a la memoria el día de alguna solemne fiesta o el de algunas tristes obsequias. Tiniendo, pues, Aurelio, y casi los más pastores que allí venían, conocida la costumbre y condición de Telesio, todos se fueron acercando adonde él estaba, y cuando llegaron, ya se habían juntado. Pero, como Telesio vio venir tantas gentes y conoció cuán principales todos eran, bajando de la cuesta, los fue a recibir con mucho amor y cortesía, y con la misma fue de todos rescibido, y, llegándose Aurelio a Telesio, le dijo: -Cuéntanos, si fueres servido, honrado y venerable Telesio, qué nueva causa te mueve a querer juntar los pastores destos prados. ¿Es, por ventura, de alegres fiestas o de tristes y fúnebres sucesos? ¿O quiéresnos mostrar alguna cosa perteneciente al mejoramiento de nuestras vidas? Dinos, Telesio, lo que tu voluntad ordena, pues sabes que no saldrán las nuestras de todo aquello que la tuya quisiere.

-Págueos el cielo, pastores -respondió Telesio-, la sinceridad de vuestras intenciones, pues tanto se conforman con la de aquel que sólo vuestro bien y provecho pretende. Mas, por satisfacer el deseo que tenéis de saber lo que quiero, quiéroos traer a la memoria la que debéis tener perpetuamente del valor y fama del famoso y aventajado pastor Meliso, cuyas dolorosas obsequias se renuevan y se irán renovando de año en año tal día como mañana, en tanto que en nuestras riberas hubiere pastores y en nuestras almas no faltare el conocimiento de lo que se debe a la bondad y valor de Meliso. A lo menos, de mí os sé decir que, en tanto que la vida me durare, no dejaré de acordaros a su tiempo la obligación en que os tiene puestos la habilidad, cortesía y virtud del sin par Meliso; y así, agora os la acuerdo, y os advierto que mañana es el día en que se ha de renovar el desdichado, donde tanto bien perdimos, como fue perder la agradable presencia del prudente pastor Meliso. Por lo que a la bondad suya debéis, y por lo que a la intención que tengo de serviros estáis obligados, os ruego, pastores, que mañana, al romper del día, os halléis todos en el Valle de los Cipreses, donde está el sepulcro de las honradas cenizas de Meliso, para que allí, con tristes cantos y piadosos sacrificios, procuremos alegerar la pena, si alguna padece, a aquella venturosa alma, que en tanta soledad nos ha dejado.

Y, diciendo esto, con el tierno sentimiento que la memoria de la muerte de Meliso le causaba, sus venerables ojos se llenaron de lágrimas, acompañándole en ellas casi los más de los circunstantes; los cuales, todos de una misma conformidad, se ofrecieron de acudir otro día adonde Telesio les mandaba, y lo mismo hicieron Timbrio y Silerio, Nísida y Blanca, por parecerles que no sería bien dejar de hallarse en ocasión tan piadosa y en junta de tan célebres pastores como allí imaginaron que se juntarían. Con esto se despidieron de Telesio y tornaron a seguir el comenzado camino de la aldea; mas no se habían apartado mucho de aquel lugar, cuando vieron venir hacia ellos al desamorado Lenio, con semblante tan triste y pensativo que puso admiración en todos; y tan transportado en sus imaginaciones venía, que pasó lado con lado de los pastores, sin que los viese; antes, torciendo el camino a la izquierda mano, no hubo andado muchos pasos, cuando se arrojó al pie de un verde sauce, y, dando un recio y profundo suspiro, levantó la mano, y, puniéndola por el collar del pellico, tiró tan recio que le hizo pedazos hasta abajo, y luego se quitó el zurrón del lado, y, sacando dél un pulido rabel, con grande atención y sosiego se le puso a templar, y, a cabo de poco espacio, con lastimada y concertada voz, comenzó a cantar, de manera que forzó a todos los que le habían visto a que se parasen a escucharle hasta el fin de su canto, que fue éste:

LENIO

¡Dulce amor, ya me arrepiento
de mis pasadas porfías;
ya de hoy más confieso y siento
que fue sobre burlerías
levantado su cimiento; 5
ya el rebelde cuello erguido
humilde pongo y rendido
al yugo de tu obediencia;
ya conozco la potencia
de tu valor estendido! 10

Sé que puedes cuanto quieres,
y que quieres lo imposible;
sé que muestras bien quién eres
en tu condición terrible,
en tus penas y placeres; 15

y sé, en fin, que yo soy quien
tuvo siempre a mal tu bien,
tu engaño por desengaño,
tus certezas por engaño,
por caricias tu desdén. 20

Estas cosas, bien sabidas,
han agora descubierto
en mis entrañas rendidas que tú solo eres el puerto do descansan nuestras vidas; 25
tú la implacable tormenta
que al alma más atormenta
vuelves en serena calma;
tú eres gusto y luz del alma,
y manjar que la sustenta. 30

Pues esto juzgo y confieso,
aunque tarde vengo en ello,
tiempla tu rigor y exceso,
amor, y del flaco cuello
aligera un poco el peso. 35
Al ya rendido enemigo,

no se ha de dar el castigo
como a aquél que se defiende;
cuanto más, que aquí se ofende
quien ya quiere ser tu amigo. 40

Salgo de la pertinacia
do me tuvo mi malicia
y el estar en tu desgracia,

y apelo de tu justicia
ante el rostro de tu gracia; 45
que si a mi poco valor
no le quilata en favor
de tu gracia conocida,
presto dejaré la vida
en las manos del dolor. 50

Las de Gelasia me han puesto
en tan estraña agonía,
que si más porfía en esto,
mi dolor y su porfía
sé que acabarán bien presto. 55
¡Oh dura Gelasia, esquiva,
zahareña, dura, altiva!,

¿por qué gustas, di, pastora, que el corazón que te adora
en tantos tormentos viva? 60

Poco fue lo que cantó Lenio, pero lo que lloró fue tanto que allí quedara deshecho en lágrimas, si los pastores no acudieran a consolarle. Mas, como él los vio venir, y conoció entre ellos a Tirsi, sin más detenerse, se levantó y fue a arrojar a sus pies, abrazándole estrechamente las rodillas; y, sin dejar las lágrimas, le dijo: -Ahora puedes, famoso pastor, tomar justa venganza del atrevimiento que tuve de competir contigo, defendiendo la injusta causa que mi ignorancia me proponía. Ahora digo que puedes levantar el brazo y con algún agudo cuchillo traspasar este corazón, donde cupo tan notoria simpleza como era no tener al amor por universal señor del mundo. Pero de una cosa te quiero advertir: que si quieres tomar al justo la venganza de mi yerro, que me dejes con la vida que sostengo, que es tal, que no hay muerte que se le compare.

Había ya Tirsi levantado del suelo al lastimado Lenio, y, teniéndole abrazado, con discretas y amorosas palabras procuraba consolarle, diciéndole: -La mayor culpa que hay en las culpas, Lenio amigo, es el estar pertinaces en ellas, porque es de condición de demonios el nunca arrepentirse de los yerros cometidos, y, asimesmo, una de las principales causas que mueve y fuerza a perdonar las ofensas es ver el ofendido arrepentimiento en el que ofende; y más cuando está el perdonar en manos de quien no hace nada en hacerlo, pues su noble condición le tira y compele a que lo haga, quedando más rico y satisfecho con el perdón que con la venganza, como se ve esto a cada paso en los grandes señores y reyes, que más gloria granjean en perdonar las injurias que en vengarlas. Y, pues tú, Lenio, confiesas el error en que has estado, y conoces agora las poderosas fuerzas del amor, y entiendes dél que es señor universal de nuestros corazones, por este nuevo conocimiento, y por el arrepentimiento que tienes, puedes estar confiado y vivir seguro que el generoso y blando amor te reducirá presto a sosegada y amorosa vida; que si ahora te castiga con darte la penosa que tienes, hácelo porque le conozcas y porque después tengas y estimes en más la alegre que sin duda piensa darte.

A estas razones añadieron otras muchas Elicio y los demás pastores que allí estaban, con las cuales pareció que quedó Lenio algo más consolado. Y luego les contó cómo moría por la cruel pastora Gelasia, exagerándoles la esquiva y desamorada condición suya, y cuán libre y esenta estaba de pensar en ningún efecto amoroso, encareciéndoles también el insufrible tormento que por ella el gentil pastor Galercio padecía; de quien ella hacía tan poco caso, que mil veces le había puesto en términos de desesperarse. Mas, después que por un rato en estas cosas hubieron razonado, tornaron a seguir su camino, llevando consigo a Lenio; y, sin sucederles otra cosa, llegaron al aldea, llevándose consigo Elicio a Tirsi, Damón, Erastro, Lauso y Arsindo. Con Daranio se fueron Crisio, Orfinio, Marsilo y Orompo. Florisa y las otras pastoras se fueron con Galatea y con su padre, Aurelio, quedando primero concertado que otro día, al salir del alba, se juntasen para ir al valle de los Cipreses, como Telesio les había mandado, para celebrar las obsequias de Meliso, en las cuales, como ya está dicho, quisieron hallarse Timbrio, Silerio, Nísida y Blanca, que con el venerable Aurelio aquella noche se fueron.

FIN DEL LIBRO QUINTO

Sexto y último libro de Galatea

APENAS habían los rayos del dorado Febo comenzado a dispuntar por la más baja línea de nuestro horizonte, cuando el anciano y venerable Telesio hizo llegar a los oídos de todos los que en el aldea estaban el lastimero son de su bocina, señal que movió a los que le escucharon a dejar el reposo de los pastorales lechos y acudir a lo que Telesio pedía. Pero los primeros que en esto tomaron la mano fueron Elicio, Aurelio, Daranio y todos los pastores y pastoras que con ellos estaban, no faltando las hermosas Nísida y Blanca y los venturosos Timbrio y Silerio, con otra cantidad de gallardos pastores y bellas pastoras que a ellos se juntaron y al número de treinta llegarían, entre los cuales iban la sin par Galatea, nuevo milagro de hermosura, y la recién desposada Silveria, la cual llevaba consigo a la hermosa y zahareña Belisa, por quien el pastor Marsilo tan amorosas y mortales angustias padecía. Había venido Belisa a visitar a Silveria y darle el parabién del nuevo rescibido estado, y quiso ansimesmo hallarse en tan célebres obsequias como esperaba serían las que tantos y tan famosos pastores celebraban.

Salieron, pues, todos juntos de la aldea, fuera de la cual hallaron a Telesio con otros muchos pastores que le acompañaban, todos vestidos y adornados de manera que bien mostraban que para triste y lamentable negocio habían sido juntados. Ordenó luego Telesio, porque con intenciones más puras y pensamientos más reposados se hiciesen aquel día los solemnes sacrificios, que todos los pastores fuesen juntos por su parte y desviados de las pastoras, y que ellas lo mismo hiciesen, de que los menos quedaron contentos y los más no muy satisfechos, especialmente el apasionado Marsilo, que ya había visto a la desamorada Belisa, con cuya vista quedó tan fuera de sí y tan suspenso, cual lo conocieron bien sus amigos Orompo, Crisio y Orfinio, los cuales, viéndole tal, se llegaron a él, y Orompo le dijo: -Esfuerza, amigo Marsilo, esfuerza y no des ocasión con tu desmayo a que se descubra el poco valor de tu pecho. ¿Qué sabes si el cielo, movido a compasión de tu pena, ha traído a tal tiempo a estas riberas a la pastora Belisa para que las remedie?

-Antes para más acabarme, a lo que yo creo -respondió Marsilo-, habrá ella venido a este lugar, que de mi ventura esto y más se debe temer; pero yo haré, Orompo, lo que mandas, si acaso puede conmigo en este duro trance más la razón que mi sentimiento.

Y con esto volvió algo más en sí Marsilo, y luego los pastores por una parte y

las pastoras por otra, como de Telesio estaba ordenado, se comenzaron a encaminar al Valle de los Cipreses, llevando todos un maravilloso silencio, hasta que, admirado Timbrio de ver la frescura y belleza del claro Tajo, por do caminaba, vuelto a Elicio, que al lado le venía, le dijo: -No poca maravilla me causa, Elicio, la incomparable belleza destas frescas riberas; y no sin razón, porque quien ha visto, como yo, las espaciosas del nombrado Betis y las que visten y adornan al famoso Ebro y al conocido Pisuerga, y en las apartadas tierras ha paseado las del sancto Tíber y las amenas del Po, celebrado por la caída del atrevido mozo, sin dejar de haber rodeado las frescuras del apascible Sebeto, grande ocasión había de ser la que a maravilla me moviese de ver otras algunas.

-No vas tan fuera de camino en lo que dices, según yo creo, discreto Timbrio -respondió Elicio-, que con los ojos no veas la razón que de decirlo tienes; porque, sin duda, puedes creer que la amenidad y frescura de las riberas deste río hace notoria y conocida ventaja a todas las que has nombrado, aunque entrase en ellas las del apartado Janto, y del conocido Anfriso y el enamorado Alfeo; porque tiene y ha hecho cierto la experiencia que, casi por derecha línea, encima de la mayor parte destas riberas se muestra un cielo luciente y claro, que con un largo movimiento y con vivo resplandor, parece que convida a regocijo y gusto al corazón que dél está más ajeno. Y si ello es verdad que las estrellas y el sol se mantienen, como algunos dicen, de las aguas de acá bajo, creo firmemente que las deste río sean en gran parte ocasión de causar la belleza del cielo que le cubre, o creeré que Dios, por la misma razón que dicen que mora en los cielos, en esta parte haga lo más de su habitación. La tierra que lo abraza, vestida de mil verdes ornamentos, parece que hace fiesta y se alegra de poseer en sí un don tan raro y agradable, y el dorado río, como en cambio, en los abrazos della dulcemente entretejiéndose, forma como de industria mil entradas y salidas, que a cualquiera que las mira llenan el alma de placer maravilloso, de donde nasce que, aunque los ojos tornen de nuevo muchas veces a mirarle, no por eso dejan de hallar en él cosas que les causen nuevo placer y nueva maravilla. Vuelve, pues, los ojos, valeroso Timbrio, y mira cuánto adornan sus riberas las muchas aldeas y ricas caserías que por ellas se ven fundadas. Aquí se vee en cualquiera sazón del año andar la risueña primavera con la hermosa Venus en hábito subcinto y amoroso, y Céfiro que la acompaña, con la madre Flora delante, esparciendo a manos llenas varias y odoríferas flores. Y la industria de sus moradores ha hecho tanto, que la naturaleza, encorporada con el arte, es hecha artífice y connatural del arte, y de entrambasados se ha hecho una tercia naturaleza, a la cual no sabré dar nombre. De sus cultivados jardines, con quien los huertos Hespérides y de Alcino pueden callar; de los espesos bosques, de los pacíficos olivos, verdes laureles y acopados mirtos; de sus abundosos pastos, alegres valles y vestidos collados, arroyos y fuentes que en esta ribera se hallan, no se espere que yo diga más, sino que, si en alguna parte de la tierra los Campos Elíseos tienen asiento, es, sin duda, en ésta. ¿Qué diré de la industria de las altas ruedas, con cuyo continuo movimiento sacan las aguas del profundo río y humedecen abundantamente las eras que por largo espacio están apartadas? Añádese a todo esto criarse en estas riberas las más hermosas y discretas pastoras que en la redondez del suelo pueden hallarse, para cuyo testimonio, dejando aparte el que la experiencia nos muestra y lo que tú, Timbrio, ha que estás en ellas y que has visto, bastará traer por ejemplo a aquella pastora que allí ves, ¡oh Timbrio!

Y, diciendo esto, señaló con el cayado a Galatea; y, sin decir más, dejó admirado a Timbrio de ver la discreción y palabras con que había alabado las riberas de Tajo y la hermosura de Galatea. Y, respondiéndole que no se le podía contradecir ninguna cosa de las dichas, en aquellas y en otras entretenían la pesadumbre del camino, hasta que, llegados a vista del Valle de los Cipreses, vieron que dél salían casi otros tantos pastores y pastoras como los que con ellos iban. Juntáronse todos, y con sosegados pasos comenzaron a entrar por el sagrado valle, cuyo sitio era tan extraño y maravilloso que, aun a los mismos que muchas veces le habían visto, causaba nueva admiración y gusto. Levántanse en una parte de la ribera del famoso Tajo, en cuatro diferentes y contrapuestas partes, cuatro verdes y apacibles collados, como por muros y defensores de un hermoso valle que en medio contienen, cuya entrada en él por otros cuatro lugares es concedida, los cuales mismos collados estrechan de modo que vienen a formar cuatro largas y apacibles calles, a quien hacen pared de todos lados altos e infinitos cipreses, puestos por tal orden y concierto que hasta las mismas ramas de los unos y de los otros parece que igualmente van creciendo, y que ninguna se atreve a pasar ni salir un punto más de la otra. Cierran y ocupan el espacio que entre ciprés y ciprés se hace, mil olorosos rosales y suaves jazmines, tan juntos y entretejidos como suelen estar en los vallados de las guardadas viñas las espinosas zarzas y puntosas cambronerías. De trecho en trecho destas apacibles entradas, se ven correr por entre la verde y menuda yerba claros y frescos arroyos de limpias y sabrosas aguas, que en las faldas de los mismos collados tienen su nacimiento. Es el remate y fin destas calles una ancha y redonda plaza, que los recuestos y los cipreses forman, en medio de la cual está puesta una artificiosa fuente de blanco y precioso mármol fabricada, con tanta industria y artificio hecha, que las vistosas del conocido Tíbulo y las soberbias de la antigua Tinacria no le pueden ser comparadas. Con el agua desta maravillosa fuente se humedecen y sustentan las frescas yerbas de la deleitosa plaza; y lo que más hace a este agradable sitio digno de estimación y reverencia es ser privilegiado de las golosas bocas de los simples corderuelos y mansas ovejas, y de otra cualquier suerte de ganado: que sólo sirve de guardador y tesorero de los honrados huesos de algunos famosos pastores que, por general decreto de todos los que quedan vivos en el contorno de aquellas riberas, se determina y ordena ser digno y merescedor de tener sepultura en este famoso valle. Por esto se veían, entre los muchos y diversos árboles que por las espaldas de los cipreses estaban, en el lugar y distancia que había dellos hasta las faldas de los collados, algunas sepulturas, cuál de jaspe y cuál de mármol fabricada, en cuyas blancas piedras se leían los nombres de los que en ellas estaban sepultados. Pero la que más sobre todas resplandecía, y la que más a los ojos de todos se mostraba, era la del famoso pastor Meliso, la cual, apartada de las otras, a un lado de la ancha plaza, de lisas y negras pizarras y de blanco y bien labrado alabastro hecha parecía. Y, en el mismo punto que los ojos de Telesio la miraron, volviendo el rostro a toda aquella agradable compañía, con sosegada voz y lamentables acentos, les dijo: -Veis allí, gallardos pastores, discretas y hermosas pastoras; veis allí, digo, la triste sepultura donde reposan los honrados huesos del nombrado Meliso, honor y gloria de nuestras riberas. Comenzad, pues, a levantar al cielo los humildes corazones, y con puros afectos, abundantes lágrimas y profundos sospiros, entonad los sanctos himnos y devotas oraciones, y rogalde tenga por bien de acoger en su estrellado asiento la bendita alma del cuerpo que allí yace.

Y, en diciendo esto, se llegó a un ciprés de aquéllos, y, cortando algunas ramas, hizo dellas una funesta guirnalda con que coronó sus blancas y veneradas sienes, haciendo señal a los demás que lo mismo hiciesen; de cuyo ejemplo movidos todos, en un momento se coronaron de las tristes ramas, y, guiados de Telesio, llegaron a la sepultura, donde lo primero que Telesio hizo fue inclinar las rodillas y besar la dura piedra del sepulcro. Hicieron todos lo mismo, y algunos hubo que, tiernos con la memoria de Meliso, dejaban regado con lágrimas el blanco mármol que besaban. Hecho esto, mandó Telesio encender el sacro fuego, y en un momento, alrededor de la sepultura, se hicieron muchas, aunque pequeñas, hogueras, en las cuales solas ramas de ciprés se quemaban; y el venerable Telesio, con graves y sosegados pasos, comenzó a rodear la pira y a echar en todos los ardientes fuegos alguna cantidad de sacro y oloroso incienso, diciendo cada vez que lo esparcía alguna breve y devota oración, a rogar por el alma de Meliso encaminada, al fin de la cual levantaba la tremante voz, y todos los circunstantes, con triste y piadoso acento, respondían: «Amén, amén», tres veces; a cuyo lamentable sonido resonaban los cercanos collados y apartados valles, y las ramas de los altos cipreses y de los otros muchos árboles de que el valle estaba lleno, heridas de un manso céfiro que soplabá, hacían y formaban un sordo y tristísimo susurro, casi como en señal de que por su parte ayudaban a la tristeza del funesto sacrificio.

Tres veces rodeó Telesio la sepultura, y tres veces dijo las piadosas plegarias, y otras nueve se escucharon los llorosos acentos del «amén», que los pastores repitían. Acabada esta ceremonia, el anciano Telesio se arrimó a un subido ciprés que a la cabecera de la sepultura de Meliso se levantaba, y con volver el rostro a una y otra parte, hizo que todos los circunstantes estuviesen atentos a lo que decir quería; y luego, levantando la voz todo lo que pudo conceder la antigüedad de sus años, con maravillosa elocuencia comenzó a alabar las virtudes de Meliso, la integridad de su inculpable vida, la alteza de su ingenio, la entereza de su ánimo, la graciosa gravedad de su plática y la excelencia de su poesía; y, sobre todo, la solicitud de su pecho en guardar y cumplir la sancta religión que profesado había, juntando a estas otras tantas y tales virtudes de Meliso, que, aunque el pastor no fuera tan conocido de todos los que a Telesio escuchaban, sólo por lo que él decía, quedaran aficionados a amarle si fuera vivo, y a reverenciarle después de muerto. Concluyó, pues, el viejo su plática diciendo: -Si a do llegaron, famosos pastores, las bondades de Meliso, y adonde llega el deseo que tengo de alabarlas, llegara la bajeza de mi corto entendimiento, y las flacas y pocas fuerzas adquiridas de mis tantos y tan cansados años no me acortaran la voz y el aliento, primero este sol que nos alumbra le viérades bañar una y otra vez en el grande océano, que yo cesara de la comenzada plática; mas, pues esto en mi marchita edad no se permite, suplid vosotros mi falta, y mostraos agradecidos a las frías cenizas de Meliso, celebrándolas en la muerte como os obliga el amor que él os tuvo en la vida. Y, puesto que a todos en general nos toca y cabe parte desta obligación, a quien en particular más obliga es a los famosos Tirsi y Damón, como a tan conocidos amigos y familiares suyos; y así, les ruego, cuan encarecidamente puedo, correspondan a esta deuda supliendo y cantando ellos con más reposada y sonora voz lo que yo he faltado llorando con la trabajosa mía.

No dijo más Telesio, ni aun fuera menester decirlo para que los pastores se moviesen a hacer lo que se les rogaba; porque luego, sin replicar cosa alguna, Tirsi sacó su rabel y hizo señal a Damón que lo mesmo hiciese, a quien acompañaron luego Elicio y Lauso y todos los pastores que allí instrumentos tenían, y a poco espacio formaron una tan triste y agradable música que, aunque regalaba los oídos, movía los corazones a dar señales de tristeza con lágrimas que los ojos derramaban. Juntábase a esto la dulce armonía de los pintados y muchos pajarillos que por los aires cruzaban, y algunos sollozos que las pastoras, ya tiernas y movidas con el razonamiento de Telesio y con lo que los pastores hacían, de cuando en cuando, de sus hermosos pechos arrancaban; y era de suerte que, concordándose el son de la triste música y el de la alegre armonía de los jilguerillos, calandrias y ruiseñores, y el amargo de los profundos gemidos, formaba todo junto un tan extraño y lastimoso concento que no hay lengua que encarecerlo pueda. De allí a poco espacio, cesando los demás instrumentos, solos los cuatro de Tirsi, Damón, Elicio y de Lauso se escucharon, los cuales, llegándose al sepulcro de Meliso, a los cuatro lados del sepulcro, señal por donde todos los presentes entendieron que alguna cosa cantar querían; y así, les prestaron un maravilloso y sosegado silencio; y luego el famoso Tirsi, con levantada, triste y sonora voz, ayudándole Elicio, Damón y Lauso, desta manera comenzó a cantar:

TIRSI

Tal cual es la ocasión de nuestro llanto, no sólo nuestro, más de todo el suelo, pastores, entonad el triste canto.

DAMÓN

El aire rompan, lleguen hasta el cielo los sospiros dolientes, fabricados   5 entre justa piedad y justo duelo.

ELICIO

Serán de tierno humor siempre bañados mis ojos, mientras viva la memoria, Meliso, de tus hechos celebrados.

LAUSO

Meliso, digno de inmortal historia,   10

digno que goces en el cielo sancto

de alegre vida y de perpetua gloria.

TIRSI

Mientras que a las grandezas me levanto de cantar sus hazañas, como pienso, pastores, entonad el triste canto. 15

DAMÓN

Como puedo, Meliso, recompenso
a tu amistad: con lágrimas vertidas, con ruegos píos y sagrado incienso.

ELICIO

Tu muerte tiene en llanto convertidas nuestras dulces pasadas alegrías, 20
y a tierno sentimiento reducidas.

LAUSO

Aquellos claros, venturosos días, donde el mundo gozó de tu presencia, se han vuelto en noches miserables frías.

TIRSI

¡Oh muerte, que con presta violencia 25
tal vida en poca tierra reduciste!
¿A quién no alcanzará tu diligencia?

DAMÓN

Después, ¡oh muerte!, que aquel golpe diste que echó por tierra nuestro fuerte arrimo, de yerba el prado ni de flor se viste. 30

ELICIO

Con la memoria deste mal reprimo el bien, si alguno llega a mi sentido, y con nueva aspereza me lastimo.

LAUSO

¿Cuándo suele cobrarse el bien perdido?
¿Cuándo el mal sin buscarle no se halla? 35
¿Cuándo hay quietud en el mortal ruido?

TIRSI

¿Cuándo de la mortal fiera batalla triunfó la vida, y cuándo contra el tiempo se opuso o fuerte arnés o dura malla?

DAMÓN

Es nuestra vida un sueño, un pasatiempo, 40
un vano encanto que desaparece
cuando más firme pareció en su tiempo.

ELICIO

Día que al medio curso se escuresce, y le sucede noche tenebrosa, envuelta en sombras qu'el temor ofrece. 45

LAUSO

Mas tú, pastor famoso, en venturosa hora pasaste deste mar insano
a la dulce región maravillosa.

TIRSI

Después que en el aprisco veneciano las causas y demandas decidiste 50 del gran pastor del ancho suelo hispano.

DAMÓN

Después también que con valor sufriste el trance de fortuna acelerado que a Italia hizo, y aun a España, triste.

ELICIO

Y después que, en sosiego reposado, 55
con las nueve doncellas solamente

tanto tiempo estuviste retirado.

LAUSO

Sin que las fieras armas del oriente ni la francesa furia inquietase

tu levantada y sosegada mente. 60

TIRSI

Entonces quiso el cielo que llegase la fría mano de la muerte airada,
y en tu vida el bien nuestro arrebatase.

DAMÓN

Quedó tu suerte entonces mejorada,
quedó la nuestra a un triste amargo lloro 65
perpetua, eternamente condenada.

ELICIO

Viose el sacro virgíneo hermoso coro de aquellas moradoras del Parnaso romper llorando sus cabellos de oro.

LAUSO

A lágrimas movió el doliente caso 70
al gran competidor del niño ciego,
que entonces de dar luz se mostró escaso.

TIRSI

No entre las armas y el ardiente fuego los tristes teucros tanto se afligieron con
el engaño del astuto griego, 75
como lloraron, como repitieron

el nombre de Meliso los pastores cuando informados de su muerte fueron.

DAMÓN

No de olorosas variadas flores

adornaron sus frentes, ni cantaron 80
con voz suave algún cantar de amores.
De funesto ciprés se coronaron,
y en triste repetido amargo llanto
lamentables canciones entonaron.

ELICIO

Y así, pues hoy el áspero quebranto 85
y la memoria amarga se renueva,
pastores, entonad el triste canto,
qu'el duro caso que a doler nos lleva es tal, que será pecho de diamante
el que a llorar en él no se conmueva. 90

LAUSO

El firme pecho, el ánimo constante, qu'en las adversidades siempre tuvo este pastor por mil lenguas se cante, como al desdén que de contino hubo en el pecho de Filis indignado 95
cual firme roca contra el mar estuvo.

TIRSI

Repítanse los versos que ha cantado, queden en la memoria de las gentes por muestras de su ingenio levantado.

DAMÓN

Por tierras de las nuestras diferentes, 100
lleve su nombre la parlera fama
con pasos prestos y alas diligentes.

ELICIO

Y de su casta y amorosa llama ejemplo tome el más lascivo pecho
y el que en ardor menos cabal se inflama. 105

LAUSO

¡Venturoso Meliso, que a despecho de mil contrastes fieros de fortuna, vives ahora alegre y satisfecho!

TIRSI

Poco te cansa, poco te importuna esta mortal bajeza que dejaste, 110
llena de más mudanzas que la luna.

DAMÓN

Por firme alteza la humildad trocaste, por bien el mal, la muerte por la vida tan seguro temiste y esperaste.

ELICIO

Desta mortal, al parecer, caída, 115

quien vive bien, al cabo se levanta, cual tú, Meliso, a la región florida, donde por más de una inmortal garganta se despide la voz, que gloria suena, gloria repite, dulce gloria canta; 120

donde la hermosa clara faz serena

se ve, en cuya visión se goza y mira la summa gloria más perfecta y buena.

Mi flaca voz a tu alabanza aspira,

y tanto cuanto más cresce el deseo, 125

tanto, Meliso, el miedo le retira.

Que aquello que contemplo agora, y veo con el entendimiento levantado,

del sacro tuyo sobrehumano arreo,

tiene mi entendimiento acobardado, 130

y sólo paro en levantar las cejas

y en recoger los labios de admirado.

LAUSO

Con tu partida, en triste llanto dejas cuantos con tu presencia se alegraban, y el mal se acerca porque tú te alejas. 135

TIRSI

En tu sabiduría se enseñaban

los rústicos pastores, y en un punto, con nuevo ingenio y discreción quedaban.

Pero llegóse aquel forzoso punto

donde tú te partiste y do quedamos 140

con poco ingenio y corazón difunto.

Esta amarga memoria celebramos

los que en la vida te quisimos tanto, cuanto ahora en la muerte te lloramos.

Por esto, al son de tan confuso llanto, 145

cobrando de continuo nuevo aliento,
pastores, entonad el triste canto.

Lleguen do llega el duro sentimiento las lágrimas vertidas y suspiros,
con quien se aumenta el presuroso viento. 150

Poco os encargo, poco sé pedirlos;

más habéis de sentir que cuanto ahora puede mi atada lengua referiros.

Mas, pues Febo se ausenta, y descolora la tierra, que se cubre en negro manto, 155

hasta que venga la esperada aurora, pastores, cesad ya del triste canto.

Tirsi, que comenzado había la triste y dolorosa elegía, fue el que la puso fin, sin que le pusiesen por un buen espacio a las lágrimas todos los que el lamentable canto escuchado habían. Mas, a esta sazón, el venerable Telesio les dijo: -Pues habemos cumplido en parte, gallardos y comedidos pastores, con la obligación que al venturoso Meliso tenemos, poned por agora silencio a vuestras tiernas lágrimas, y dad algún vado a vuestros dolientes suspiros, pues ni por ellas ni ellos podemos cobrar la pérdida que lloramos; y, puesto que el humano sentimiento no pueda dejar de mostrarle en los adversos acaecimientos, todavía es menester templar la demasía de sus accidentes con la razón que al discreto acompaña; y, aunque las lágrimas y suspiros sean señales del amor que se tiene al que se llora, más provecho consiguen las almas por quien se derraman con los píos sacrificios y devotas oraciones que por ellas se hacen, que si todo el mar océano por los ojos de todo el mundo hecho lágrimas se destilase. Y, por esta razón, y por la que tenemos de dar algún alivio a nuestros cansados cuerpos, será bien que, dejando lo que nos resta de hacer para el venidero día, por agora visitéis vuestros zurroneos y cumpláis con lo que naturaleza os obliga.

Y, en diciendo esto, dio orden como todas las pastoras estuviesen a una parte del valle, junto a la sepultura de Meliso, dejando con ellas seis de los más ancianos pastores que allí había, y los demás, poco desviados dellas, en otra parte se estuvieron. Y luego, con lo que en los zurroneos traían, y con el agua de la clara fuente, satisficieron a la común necesidad de la hambre, acabando a tiempo que ya la noche vestía de una misma color todas las cosas debajo de nuestro horizonte contenidas, y la luciente luna mostraba su rostro hermoso y claro en toda la entereza que tiene cuando más el rubio hermano sus rayos le comunica. Pero, de allí a poco rato, levantándose un alterado viento, se comenzaron a ver algunas negras nubes, que algún tanto la luz de la casta diosa encubrían, haciendo sombras en la tierra, señales por donde algunos pastores que allí estaban, en la rústica astrología maestros, algún venidero turbión y borrasca esperaban. Mas todo paró en no más de quedar la noche parda y serena, y en acomodarse ellos a descansar sobre la fresca yerba, entregando los ojos al dulce y reposado sueño, como lo hicieron todos, si no algunos que repartieron como en centinelas la guarda de las pastoras, y la de algunas antorchas que alrededor de la sepultura de Meliso ardiendo quedaban. Pero, ya que el sosegado silencio se extendió por todo aquel sagrado valle, y ya que el perezoso Morfeo había con el bañado ramo tocado las sienes y párpados de todos los presentes, a tiempo que a la redonda de nuestro polo buena parte las errantes estrellas andado habían, señalando los puntuales cursos de la noche, en aquel instante, de la misma sepultura de Meliso se levantó un grande y maravilloso fuego, tan luciente y claro que en un momento todo el oscuro valle quedó con tanta claridad como si el mismo sol le alumbrara; por la cual improvisa maravilla, los pastores que despiertos junto a la sepultura estaban, cayeron atónitos en el suelo, deslumbrados y ciegos con la luz del transparente fuego, el cual hizo contrario efecto en los demás que durmiendo estaban, porque, heridos de sus rayos, huyó dellos el pesado sueño, y, aunque con dificultad alguna, abrieron los dormidos ojos, y, viendo la estrañeza de la luz que se les mostraba, confusos y admirados quedaron. Y así, cuál en pie, cuál recostado, y cuál sobre las rodillas puesto, cada uno, con admiración y espanto, el claro fuego miraba. Todo lo cual visto por Telesio, adornándose en un punto de las sacras vestiduras, acompañado de Elicio, Tirsi, Damón, Lauso y otros animosos pastores, poco a poco se comenzó a llegar al fuego, con intención de, con algunos lícitos y acomodados exorcismos, procurar deshacer o entender de dó procedía la estraña visión que se les mostraba. Pero, ya que llegaban cerca de las encendidas llamas, vieron que, dividiéndose en dos partes, en medio dellas parecía una tan hermosa y agraciada ninfa, que en mayor admiración les puso que la vista del ardiente fuego. Mostraba estar vestida de una rica y sutil tela de plata, recogida y retirada a la cintura, de modo que la mitad de las piernas se descubrían, adornadas con unos coturnos, o calzado justo, dorados, llenos de infinitos lazos de listones de diferentes colores; sobre la tela de plata traía otra vestidura de verde y delicado cendal, que, llevado a una y a otra parte por un ventecillo que mansamente soplabá, estremadamente parecía; por las espaldas traía esparcidos los más luengos y rubios cabellos que jamás ojos humanos vieron, y sobre ellos una guirnalda sólo de verde laurel compuesta; la mano derecha ocupaba con un alto ramo de amarilla y vencedora palma, y la izquierda con otro de verde y pacífica oliva, con los cuales ornamentos tan hermosa y admirable se mostraba, que a todos los que la miraban tenía colgados de su vista; de tal manera que, desechando de sí el temor primero, con seguros pasos alrededor del fuego se llegaron, persuadiéndose que, de tan hermosa visión, ningún daño podía sucederles. Y estando, como se ha dicho, todos transportados en mirarla, la bella ninfa abrió los brazos a una y a otra parte, y hizo que las apartadas llamas más se apartasen y dividiesen, para dar lugar a que mejor pudiese ser mirada; y luego, levantando el sereno rostro, con gracia y gravedad estraña, a semejantes razones dio principio: -Por los efectos que mi improvisa vista ha causado en vuestros corazones, discreta y agradable compañía, podéis considerar que no en virtud de malignos espíritus ha sido formada esta figura mía que aquí se os representa; porque una de las razones por do se conoce ser una visión buena o mala es por los efectos que hace en el ánimo de quien la mira; porque la buena, aunque cause en él admiración y sobresalto, el tal sobresalto y admiración viene mezclado con un gustoso alboroto, que a poco rato le sosiega y satisface; al revés de lo que causa la visión perversa, la cual sobresalta, descontenta, atemoriza y jamás asegura. Esta verdad os aclarará la experiencia cuando me conozcáis y yo os diga quién soy y la ocasión que me ha movido a venir de mis remotas moradas a visitaros. Y, porque no quiero teneros colgados del deseo que tenéis de saber quién yo sea, sabed, discretos pastores y bellas pastoras, que yo soy una de las nueve doncellas que en las altas y sagradas cumbres de Parnaso tienen su propia y conocida morada. Mi nombre es Calíope; mi oficio y condición es favorecer y ayudar a los divinos espíritus, cuyo loable ejercicio es ocuparse en la maravillosa y jamás como debe alabada sciencia de la poesía. Yo soy la que hice cobrar eterna fama al antiguo ciego natural de Esmirna, por él solamente famosa; la que hará vivir el mantuano Títiro por todos los siglos venideros, hasta que el tiempo se acabe; y la que hace que se tengan en cuenta, desde la pasada hasta la edad presente, los escriptos tan ásperos como discretos del antiquísimo Enio. En fin, soy quien favoreció a Catulo, la que nombró a Horacio, eternizó a Propercio, y soy la que con inmortal fama tiene conservada la memoria del conocido Petrarca, y la que hizo bajar a los oscuros infiernos y subir a los claros cielos al famoso Dante. Soy la que ayudó a tejer al divino Ariosto la variada y hermosa tela que compuso; la que en esta patria vuestra tuvo familiar amistad con el agudo Boscán y con el famoso Garcilaso, con el docto y sabio Castillejo y el artificioso Torres Naharro, con cuyos ingenios, y con los frutos dellos, quedó vuestra patria enriquecida y yo satisfecha. Yo soy la que moví la pluma del celebrado Aldana, y la que no dejó jamás el lado de don Fernando de Acuña, y la que me precio de la estrecha amistad y conversación que siempre tuve con la bendita alma del cuerpo que en esta sepultura yace, cuyas obsequias, por vosotros celebradas, no sólo han alegrado su espíritu, que ya por la región eterna se pasea, sino que a mí me han satisfecho de suerte que, forzada, he venido a agradecer tan loable y piadosa costumbre como es la que entre vosotros se usa; y así, os prometo, con las veras que de mi virtud pueden esperarse, que en pago del beneficio que a las cenizas de mi querido y amado Meliso habéis hecho, de hacer siempre que en vuestras riberas jamás falten pastores que en la alegre sciencia de la poesía a todos los de las otras riberas se aventajen; favoresceré ansimesmo siempre vuestros consejos, y guiaré vuestros entendimientos, de manera que nunca deis torcido voto cuando decretéis quién es merescedor de enterrarse en este sagrado valle; porque no será bien que, de honra tan particular y señalada, y que sólo es merescida de los blancos y canoros cisnes, la vengan a gozar los negros y rontos cuervos. Y así, me parece que será bien daros alguna noticia agora de algunos señalados varones que en esta vuestra España viven, y algunos en las apartadas Indias a ella sujetas; los cuales, si todos o alguno dellos su buena ventura le trujere a acabar el curso de sus días en estas riberas, sin duda alguna le podéis conceder sepultura en este famoso sitio. Junto con esto, os quiero advertir que no entendáis que los primeros que nombrare son dignos de más honra que los postreros, porque en esto no pienso guardar orden alguna: que, puesto que yo alcanzo la diferencia que el uno al otro y los otros a los otros hacen, quiero dejar esta declaración en duda, porque vuestros ingenios en entender la diferencia de los suyos tengan en qué ejercitarse, de los cuales darán testimonio sus obras. Irélos nombrando como se me vinieren a la memoria, sin que ninguno se atribuya a que ha sido favor que yo le he hecho en haberme acordado dél primero que de otro; porque, como digo, a vosotros, discretos pastores, dejo que después les deis el lugar que os pareciere que de justicia se les debe. Y, para que con menos pesadumbre y trabajo a mi larga relación estéis atentos, haréla de suerte que sólo sintáis disgusto por la brevedad della.

Calló diciendo esto la bella ninfa, y luego tomó una arpa que junto a sí tenía, que hasta entonces de ninguno había sido vista; y, en comenzándola a tocar, parece que comenzó a esclarecerse el cielo, y que la luna, con nuevo y no usado resplandor, alumbraba la tierra; los árboles, a despecho de un blando céfiro que soplaba, tuvieron quedas las ramas; y los ojos de todos los que allí estaban no se atrevían a abajar los párpados, porque aquel breve punto que se tardaban en alzarlos, no se privasen de la gloria que en mirar la hermosura de la ninfa gozaban; y aun quisieran todos que todos sus cinco sentidos se convirtieran en el del oír solamente: con tal estrañeza, con tal dulzura, con tanta suavidad tocaba la arpa la bella musa; la cual, después de haber tañido un poco, con la más sonora voz que imaginarse puede, en semejantes versos dio principio: CANTO DE CALÍOPE

Al dulce son de mi templada lira, prestad, pastores, el oído atento:
oiréis cómo en mi voz y en él respira de mis hermanas el sagrado aliento.
Veréis cómo os suspende, y os admira, 5

y colma vuestras almas de contento, cuando os dé relación, aquí en el suelo, de los ingenios que ya son del cielo.

Pienso cantar de aquellos solamente a quien la Parca el hilo aún no ha cortado, 10

de aquéllos que son dignos justamente d'en tal lugar tenerle señalado, donde, a pesar del tiempo diligente, por el laudable oficio acostumbrado vuestro, vivan mil siglos sus renombres, 15
sus claras obras, sus famosos nombres.

Y el que con justo título meresce gozar de alta y honrosa preeminencia, un don ALONSO es, en quien floresce del sacro Apolo la divina sciencia; 20
y en quien con alta lumbré resplandece de Marte el brío y sin igual potencia, DE LEIVA tiene el sobrenombre ilustre, que a Italia ha dado, y aun a España, lustre.

Otro del mismo nombre, que de Arauco 25
cantó las guerras y el valor de España, el cual los reinos donde habita Glauco pasó y sintió la embravescida saña.

No fue su voz, no fue su acento rauco, que uno y otro fue de gracia estraña, 30
y tal, que ERCILLA, en este hermoso asiento meresce eterno y sacro monumento.

Del famoso don JUAN DE SILVA os digo que toda gloria y todo honor
meresce, así por serle Febo tan amigo, 35
como por el valor que en él floresce.

Serán desto sus obras buen testigo, en las cuales su ingenio resplandece con claridad que al ignorante alumbra y al sabio agudo a veces le deslumbra. 40

Crezca el número rico desta cuenta
aquel con quien la tiene tal el cielo, que con febeo aliento le sustenta, y con valor de Marte acá en el suelo.
A Homero iguala si a escribir intenta, 45
y a tanto llega de su pluma el vuelo, cuanto es verdad que a todos es notorio el alto ingenio de don DIEGO OSORIO.

Por cuantas vías la parlera fama
puede loar un caballero ilustre, 50
por tantas su valor claro derrama,

dando sus hechos a su nombre lustre.

Su vivo ingenio, su virtud, inflama más de una lengua, a que de lustre en lustre, sin que cursos de tiempos las espanten, 55
de don FRANCISCO DE MENDOZA canten.

¡Feliz don DIEGO DE SARMIENTO, ilustre, y Carvajal, famoso, producido de nuestro coro y de Hipocrene lustre, mozo en la edad, anciano en el sentido, 60
de siglo en siglo irá, de lustre en lustre, a pesar de las aguas del olvido, tu nombre, con tus obras excelentes, de lengua en lengua y de gente en gentes!

Quiéroos mostrar por cosa soberana, 65
en tierna edad, maduro entendimiento, destreza y gallardía sobrehumana, cortesía, valor, comedimiento,
y quien puede mostrar en la toscana como en su propia lengua aquel talento 70 que mostró el que cantó la casa d'Este: un don GUTIERRE CARVAJAL es éste.

Tú, don LUIS DE VARGAS, en quien veo maduro ingenio en verdes pocos
días, procura de alcanzar aquel trofeo 75
que te prometen las hermanas mías;
mas tan cerca estás dél, que, a lo que creo, ya triunfas, pues procuras por mil
vías virtuosas y sabias que tu fama
resplandezca con viva y clara llama. 80

Del claro Tajo la ribera hermosa
adornan mil espíritus divinos, que hacen nuestra edad más venturosa que aquélla de los griegos y latinos.
Dellos pienso decir sola una cosa: 85 que son de vuestro valle y honra dignos tanto cuanto sus obras nos lo muestran, que al camino del cielo nos adiestran.

Dos famosos doctores, presidentes
en las sciencias de Apolo, se me ofrescen, 90

que no más que en la edad son diferentes, y en el trato e ingenio se parecen.
Admíranlos ausentes y presentes,

y entre unos y otros tanto resplandecen con su saber altísimo y profundo, 95 que presto han de admirar a todo el mundo.

Y el nombre que me viene más a mano, destos dos que a loar aquí me atrevo, es del doctor famoso CAMPUZANO,
a quien podéis llamar segundo Febo. 100

El alto ingenio suyo, el sobrehumano discurso nos descubre un mundo nuevo, de tan mejores Indias y excelencias, cuanto mejor qu'el oro son las sciencias.

Es el doctor SUÁREZ, que DE SOSA 105
el sobrenombre tiene, el que se sigue, que de una y otra lengua artificiosa lo más cendrado y lo mejor consigue.

Cualquiera que en la fuente milagrosa, cual él la mitigó, la sed mitigue, 110
no tendrá que envidiar al docto griego, ni a aquél que nos cantó el troyano fuego.

Del doctor VACA, si decir pudiera

lo que yo siento dél, sin duda creo que cuantos aquí estáis os suspendiera: 115 tal es su sciencia, su virtud y arreo.

Yo he sido en ensalzarle la primera del sacro coro, y soy la que deseo eternizar su nombre en cuanto al suelo diere su luz el gran señor de Delo. 120

Si la fama os trujere a los oídos de algún famoso ingenio maravillas, conceptos bien dispuestos y subidos, y sciencias que os asombren en oíllas, cosas que paran sólo en los sentidos 125
y la lengua no puede referillas, el dar salida a todo dubio y traza, sabed que es el licenciado DAZA.

Del maestro GARAY las dulces obras
me incitan sobre todos a alabarle; 130
tú, Fama, que al ligero tiempo sobras, ten por heroica empresa el celebrarle.
Verás cómo en él más fama cobras,
Fama, que está la tuya en ensalzarle, que hablando desta fama, en verdadera 135
has de trocar la fama de parlera.

Aquel ingenio que al mayor humano se deja atrás, y aspira al que es divino, y, dejando a una parte el castellano, sigue el heroico verso del latino; 140

el nuevo Homero, el nuevo mantuano, es el maestro CÓRDOBA, que es digno de celebrarse en la dichosa España, y en cuanto el sol alumbra y el mar baña.

De ti, el doctor FRANCISCO DÍAZ, puedo 145

asegurar a estos mis pastores
que con seguro corazón y ledó,
pueden aventajarse en tus loores.

Y si en ellos yo agora corta quedo, debiéndose a tu ingenio los mayores, 150 es porque el tiempo es breve y no me atrevo a poderte pagar lo que te debo.

LUJÁN, que con la toga merescida

honras el propio y el ajeno suelo, y con tu dulce musa conocida 155 subes tu fama hasta el más alto cielo, yo te daré después de muerto vida, haciendo que, en ligero y presto vuelo, la fama de tu ingenio único, solo, vaya del nuestro hasta el contrario polo. 160

El alto ingenio y su valor declara

un licenciado tan amigo vuestro

cuanto ya sabéis que es JUAN DE VERGARA, honra del siglo venturoso nuestro.

Por la senda qu'él sigue, abierta y clara, 165

yo mesma el paso y el ingenio adiestro, y adonde él llega, de llegar me pago, y en su ingenio y virtud me satisfago.

Otros quiero nombrar, porque se estime y tenga en precio mi atrevido canto, 170

el cual hará que ahora más le anime y llegue allí donde el deseo levanto.

Y es este que me fuerza y que me oprime a decir sólo dél, y cantar cuanto canto de los ingenios más cabales, 175

el licenciado ALONSO DE MORALES.

Por la difícil cumbre va subiendo

al templo de la Fama, y se adelanta, un generoso mozo, el cual, rompiendo por la dificultad que más espanta, 180

tan presto ha de llegar allá, que entiendo que en profecía ya la fama canta
del lauro que le tiene aparejado
al licenciado HERNANDO MALDONADO.

La sabia frente del laurel honroso 185
adornada veréis de aquél que ha sido en todas sciencias y artes tan famoso que es ya por todo el orbe conocido.
Edad dorada, siglo venturoso,
que gozar de tal hombre has merescido: 190
¿cuál siglo, cuál edad ahora te llega, si en ti está MARCO ANTONIO DE LA VEGA?

Un DIEGO se me viene a la memoria, que DE MENDOZA es cierto que se llama, digno que sólo dél se hiciera
historia 195

tal que llegara allí donde su fama.
Su sciencia y su virtud, que es tan notoria, que ya por todo el orbe se derrama, admira a los ausentes y presentes
de las remotas y cercanas gentes. 200

Un conocido el alto Febo tiene;
¿qué digo un conocido?, un verdadero amigo, con quien sólo se entretiene, que es de toda sciencia tesoro.
Y es éste que de industria se detiene 205
a no comunicar su bien entero, DIEGO DURÁN, en quien contino dura
y durará el valor, ser y cordura.

¿Quién pensáis que es aquél que en voz sonora sus ansias canta regaladamente, 210
aquél en cuyo pecho Febo mora,
el docto Orfeo y Aríón prudente?
Aquel que de los reinos del aurora
hasta los apartados de occidente es conocido, amado y estimado 215
por el famoso LÓPEZ MALDONADO.

¿Quién pudiera loaros, mis pastores, un pastor vuestro amado y conocido, pastor mejor de cuantos son mejores, que de Fílida tiene el apellido? 220

La habilidad, la sciencia, los primores, el raro ingenio y el valor subido
de LUIS DE MONTALVO, le aseguran
gloria y honor mientras los cielos duran.

El sacro Ibero, de dorado acanto, 225
de siempre verde yedra y blanca oliva su frente adorne, y en alegre canto su gloria y fama para siempre viva, pues su antiguo valor ensalza tanto que al fértil Nilo de su nombre priva 230
de PEDRO DE LIÑÁN la sutil pluma,
de todo el bien de Apolo cifra y suma.

De ALONSO DE VALDÉS me está incitando el raro y alto ingenio a que dél
cante, y que os vaya, pastores, declarando 235 que a los más raros pasa, y va adelante.
Halo mostrado ya, y lo va mostrando en el fácil estilo y elegante con que descubre el lastimado pecho y alaba el mal qu'el fiero amor l'ha
hecho. 240

Admíreos un ingenio en quien se encierra todo cuanto pedir puede el deseo, ingenio que, aunque vive acá en la tierra, del alto cielo es su caudal y arreo.
Ora trate de paz, ora de guerra, 245
todo cuanto yo miro, escucho y leo del celebrado PEDRO DE PADILLA, me causa nuevo gusto y maravilla.

Tú, famoso GASPAR ALFONSO, ordenas, según aspiras a inmortal subida, 250
que yo no pueda celebrarte apenas,
si te he de dar loor a tu medida.
Las plantas fertilísimas amenas que nuestro celebrado monte anida, todas ofrescen ricas laureolas 255
para ceñir y honrar tus sienes solas.

De CRISTÓBAL DE MESA os digo cierto que puede honrar vuestro sagrado valle; no sólo en vida, más después de muerto podéis con justo título alaballe.
260

De sus heroicos versos el concierto, su grave y alto estilo, pueden dalle alto y

honroso nombre, aunque callara la fama dél, y yo no me acordara.

Pues sabéis cuánto adorna y enriquece 265
vuestras riberas PEDRO DE RIBERA, dalde el honor, pastores, que meresce, que yo seré en honrarle la primera.
Su dulce musa, su virtud, ofresce
un sujeto cabal donde pudiera 270
la fama y cien mil famas ocuparse,
y en solos sus loores estremarse.

Tú, que de Luso el sin igual tesoro trujiste en nueva forma a la ribera del fértil
río, a quien el lecho de oro 275
tan famoso le hace adonde quiera,
con el debido aplauso y el decoro
debido a ti, BENITO DE CALDERA,

y a tu ingenio sin par, prometo honrarte y de lauro y de yedra coronarte. 280

De aquel que la cristiana poesía tan en su punto ha puesto en tanta gloria, haga la fama y la memoria mía famosa para siempre su memoria.
De donde nasce adonde muere el día, 285
la sciencia sea y la bondad notoria del gran FRANCISCO DE GUZMÁN, qu'el arte de Febo sabe, así como el de Marte.

Del capitán SALCEDO está bien claro que llega su divino entendimiento 290
al punto más subido, agudo y raro
que puede imaginar el pensamiento.
Si le comparo, a él mesmo le comparo, que no hay comparación que llegue a cuento de tamaño valor, que la medida 295
ha de mostrar ser falta o ser torcida.

Por la curiosidad y entendimiento de TOMÁS DE GRACIÁN, dadme licencia que yo le escoja en este valle asiento igual a su virtud, valor y sciencia, 300 el cual, si llega a su merescimiento, será de tanto grado y preeminencia, que, a lo que creo, pocos se le igualen: tanto su ingenio y sus virtudes valen.

Agora, hermanas bellas, de improviso, 305

BAPTISTA DE VIVAR quiere alabaros
con tanta discreción, gala y aviso, que podáis, siendo musas, admiraros.
No cantará desdenes de Narciso, que a Eco solitaria cuestan caros, 310
sino cuidados suyos que han nascido entre alegre esperanza y triste olvido.

Un nuevo espanto, un nuevo asombro y miedo me acude y sobresalta en este punto, sólo por ver que quiero y que no puedo 315
subir de honor al más subido punto
al grave BALTASAR, que DE TOLEDO el sobrenombre tiene, aunque barrunto que de su docta pluma el alto vuelo le ha de subir hasta el impíreo cielo. 320

Muestra en un ingenio la experiencia que en años verdes y en edad temprana hace su habitación así la sciencia, como en la edad madura, antigua y cana.
No entraré con alguno en competencia 325 que contradiga una verdad tan llana, y más si acaso a sus oídos llega que lo digo por vos, LOPE DE VEGA.

De pacífica oliva coronado,
ante mi entendimiento se presenta 330
agora el sacro Betis, indignado,
y de mi inadvertencia se lamenta.
Pide que en el discurso comenzado,
de los raros ingenios os dé cuenta
que en sus riberas moran, y yo ahora 335
harélo con la voz muy más sonora.

Mas, ¿qué haré, que en los primeros pasos que doy descubro mil estrañas cosas, otros mil nuevos Pindos y Parnasos, otros coros de hermanas más hermosas, 340

con que mis altos bríos quedan lasos, y más cuando, por causas milagrosas, oigo cualquier sonido servir de eco, cuando se nombra el nombre de PACHECO?

Pacheco es éste, con quien tiene Febo 345
y las hermanas tan discretas mías
nueva amistad, discreto trato y nuevo desde sus tiernos y pequeños días.
Yo desde entonces hasta agora llevo por tan estrañas desusadas vías 350

su ingenio y sus escriptos, que han llegado al título de honor más encumbrado.

En punto estoy donde, por más que diga en alabanza del divino HERRERA, será de poco fruto mi fatiga, 355

aunque le suba hasta la cuarta esfera.

Mas, si soy sospechosa por amiga,

sus obras y su fama verdadera

dirán que en sciencias es HERNANDO solo del Gange al Nilo, y de uno al
otro polo. 360

De otro FERNANDO quiero daros cuenta, que DE CANGAS se nombra, en quien se admira el suelo, y por quien vive y se sustenta la sciencia en quien al sacro lauro aspira.

Si al alto cielo algún ingenio intenta 365

de levantar y de poner la mira,

póngala en éste sólo, y dará al punto en el más ingenioso y alto punto.

De don CRISTÓBAL, cuyo sobrenombre

es de VILLARROEL, tened creído 370

que bien meresce que jamás su nombre toque las aguas negras del olvido.

Su ingenio admire, su valor asombre, y el ingenio y valor sea conocido

por el mayor extremo que descubre 375

en cuanto mira el sol o el suelo encubre.

Los ríos de elocuencia que del pecho del grave antiguo Cicerón manaron;

los que al pueblo de Atenas satisfecho tuvieron y a Demóstenes honraron;

380

los ingenios qu'el tiempo ha ya deshecho, que tanto en los pasados se estimaron, humíllense a la sciencia alta y divina del maestro FRANCISCO DE MEDINA.

Puedes, famoso Betis, dignamente 385

al Mincio, al Arno, al Tibre aventajarte, y alzar contento la sagrada frente

y en nuevos anchos senos dilatarte, pues quiso el cielo, que en tu bien consiste, tal gloria, tal honor, tal fama darte, 390

cual te la adquiere a tus riberas bellas BALTASAR DEL ALCÁZAR, que está en ellas.

Otro veréis en quien veréis cifrada del sacro Apolo la más rara sciencia, que en otros mil sujetos derramada, 395

hace en todos de sí grave apariencia.
Mas, en este sujeto mejorada, asiste en tantos grados de excelencia, que bien puede MOSQUERA, el licenciado, ser como el mismo Apolo celebrado. 400

No se desdeña aquel varón prudente, que de ciencias adorna y enriquece su limpio pecho, de mirar la fuente que en nuestro monte en sabias aguas cresce;
antes, en la sin par clara corriente 405
tanto la sed mitiga, que floresce por ello el claro nombre acá en la tierra del gran doctor DOMINGO DE BECERRA.

Del famoso ESPINEL cosas diría que exceden al humano entendimiento, 410
de aquellas ciencias que en su pecho cría el divino de Febo sacro aliento;
mas, pues no puede de la lengua mía decir lo menos de lo más que siento, no diga más sino que al cielo aspira, 415
ora tome la pluma, ora la lira.

Si queréis ver en una igual balanza al rubio Febo y colorado Marte, procurad de mirar al gran CARRANZA, de quien el uno y otro no se parte.
420
En él veréis, amigas, pluma y lanza con tanta discreción, destreza y arte, que la destreza, en partes dividida, la tiene a ciencia y arte reducida.

De LÁZARO LUIS IRANZO, lira 425
templada había de ser más que la mía, a cuyo son cantase el bien que inspira en él el cielo, y el valor que cría.
Por las sendas de Marte y Febo aspira a subir do la humana fantasía 430
apenas llega; y él, sin duda alguna, llegará contra el hado y la fortuna.

BALTASAR DE ESCOBAR, que agora adorna del Tíber las riberas tan famosas,
y con su larga ausencia desadorna 435
las del sagrado Betis espaciosas;
fértil ingenio, si por dicha torna
al patrio amado suelo, a sus honrosas y juveniles sienes les ofrezco
el lauro y el honor que yo merezco. 440

¿Qué título, qué honor, qué palma o lauro se le debe a JUAN SANZ, que DE ZUMETA se nombra, si del Indo al Rojo Mauro cual su musa no hay otra tan perfecta?

Su fama aquí de nuevo le restauro 445
con deciros, pastores, cuán acepta será de Apolo cualquier honra y lustre que a Zumeta hagáis que más le lustre.

Dad a JUAN DE LAS CUEVAS el debido lugar, cuando se ofrezca en este asiento, 450
pastores, pues lo tiene merecido
su dulce musa y raro entendimiento.
Sé que sus obras del eterno olvido, a despecho y pesar del violento
curso del tiempo, librarán su nombre, 455
quedando con un claro alto renombre.

Pastores, si le viéredes, honraldo
al famoso varón que os diré ahora
y en graves dulces versos celebraldo, como a quien tanto en ellos se mejora.
460
El sobrenombre tiene DE VIVALDO;
de ADAM el nombre, el cual ilustra y dora con su florido ingenio y excelente la venturosa nuestra edad presente.

Cual suele estar de variadas flores 465
adorno y rico el más florido mayo, tal de mil varias sciencias y primores está el ingenio de don JUAN AGUAYO.
Y, aunque más me detenga en sus loores, sólo sabré deciros que me ensayo 470
ahora, y que otra vez os diré cosas tales que las tengáis por milagrosas.

De JUAN GUTIÉRREZ RUFO el claro nombre quiero que viva en la inmortal memoria, y que al sabio y al simple admire, asombre 475
la heroica que compuso ilustre historia.
Déle el sagrado Betis el renombre que su estilo meresce; denle gloria los que pueden y saben; déle el cielo igual
la fama a su encumbrado vuelo. 480

En don LUIS DE GÓNGORA os ofrezco
un vivo raro ingenio sin segundo;
con sus obras me alegro y enriquezco no sólo yo, mas todo el ancho mundo.
Y si, por lo que os quiero, algo merezco, 485
haced que su saber alto y profundo
en vuestras alabanzas siempre viva
contra el ligero tiempo y muerte esquivia.

490 Ciña el verde laurel, la verde yedra, y aun la robusta encina, aquella frente
de GONZALO CERVANTES SAAVEDRA, pues la deben ceñir tan justamente.
Por él la sciencia más de Apolo medra; en él Marte nos muestra el brío ardiente de su furor, con tal razón medido 495 que por él es amado y es temido.

Tú, que de Celidón, con dulce plectro heciste resonar el nombre y fama,
cuyo admirable y bien limado metro
a lauro y triunfo te convida y llama, 500
rescibe el mando, la corona y cetro, GONZALO GÓMEZ, désta que te ama, en señal que meresce tu persona
el justo señorío de Helicon.

Tú, Dauro, de oro conocido río, 505
cual bien agora puedes señalarte, y con nueva corriente y nuevo brío
al apartado Idaspe aventajarte,
pues GONZALO MATEO DE BERRÍO
tanto procura con su ingenio honrarte, 510
que ya tu nombre la parlera fama,
por él, por todo el mundo le derrama.

Tejed de verde lauro una corona, pastores, para honrar la digna frente del licenciado SOTO BARAHONA, 515
varón insigne, sabio y elocuente.
En él el licor sancto de Helicon, si se perdiera en la sagrada fuente, se pudiera hallar, ¡oh extraño caso!, como en las altas cumbres del Parnaso. 520

De la región antártica podría
eternizar ingenios soberanos,
que si riquezas hoy sustenta y cría, también entendimientos sobrehumanos.
Mostrarlo puedo en muchos este día, 525

y en dos os quiero dar llenas las manos: uno, de Nueva España y nuevo Apolo; del Perú, el otro, un sol único y solo.

FRANCISCO, el uno, DE TERRAZAS, tiene el nombre acá y allá tan
conocido, 530

cuya vena caudal nueva Hipocrene
ha dado al patrio venturoso nido.

La misma gloria al otro igual le viene, pues su divino ingenio ha producido en Arequipa eterna primavera, 535

que éste es DIEGO MARTÍNEZ DE RIBERA.

Aquí, debajo de felice estrella,
un resplandor salió tan señalado,
que de su lumbré la menor centella
nombre de oriente al occidente ha dado. 540

Cuando esta luz nació, nació con ella todo el valor, nació ALONSO PICADO; nació mi hermano y el de Palas junto, que ambas vimos en él vivo transumpto.

Pues si he de dar la gloria a ti debida, 545

gran ALONSO DE ESTRADA, hoy eres digno que no se cante así tan de corrida

tu ser y entendimiento peregrino.

Contigo está la tierra enriquecida que al Betis mil tesoros da contino, 550

y aun no da el cambio igual: que no hay tal paga que a tan dichosa deuda satisfaga.

Por prenda rara desta tierra ilustre, claro don JUAN, te nos ha dado el cielo,
DE ÁVALOS gloria, Y DE RIBERA lustre, 555

honra del propio y del ajeno suelo.

Dichosa España, do por más de un lustre muestra serán tus obras y modelo
de cuanto puede dar naturaleza

de ingenio claro y singular nobleza. 560

El que en la dulce patria está contento, las puras aguas de Limar gozando, la famosa ribera, el fresco viento
con sus divinos versos alegrando, venga, y veréis por summa deste cuento, 565
su heroico brío y discreción mirando, que es SANCHO DE RIBERA, en toda parte Febo primero, y sin segundo Marte.

Este mesmo famoso insigne valle
un tiempo al Betis usurpar solía 570
un nuevo Homero, a quien podemos dalle la corona de ingenio y gallardía.
Las Gracias le cortaron a su talle, y el cielo en todas lo mejor le envía; éste, ya
en vuestro Tajo conocido, 575
PEDRO DE MONTESDOCA es su apellido.

En todo cuanto pedirá el deseo, un DIEGO ilustre DE AGUILAR admira, un águila real que en vuelo veo alzarse a do llegar ninguno aspira. 580
Su pluma entre cien mil gana trofeo, que, ante ella, la más alta se retira; su
estilo y su valor tan celebrado
Guánuco lo dirá, pues lo ha gozado.

Un GONZALO FERNÁNDEZ se me ofresce, 585 gran capitán del escuadrón de Apolo, que hoy DE SOTOMAYOR
ensoberbece
el nombre, con su nombre heroico y solo.
En verso admira, y en saber floresce en cuanto mira el uno y otro polo; 590
y si en la pluma en tanto grado agrada, no menos es famoso por la espada.

De un ENRIQUE GARCÉS, que al piruano reino enriquece, pues con dulce rima, con sutil, ingeniosa y fácil mano, 595
a la más ardua empresa en él dio cima, pues en dulce español al gran toscano nuevo lenguaje ha dado y nueva estima, ¿quién será tal que la mayor le quite, aunque el mesmo Petrarca resucite? 600

Un RODRIGO FERNÁNDEZ DE PINEDA,
cuya vena inmortal, cuya excelente
y rara habilidad gran parte hereda del licor sacro de la equina fuente, pues cuanto quiere dél no se le veda, 605

pues de tal gloria goza en occidente, tenga también aquí tan larga parte, cual la merescen hoy su ingenio y parte.

Y tú, que al patrio Betis has tenido lleno de envidia, y con razón quejoso 610 de que otro cielo y otra tierra han sido testigos de tu canto numeroso, alégrate, que el nombre esclarecido tuyo, JUAN DE MESTANZA, generoso, sin segundo será por todo el suelo 615
mientras diere su luz el cuarto cielo.

Toda la suavidad que en dulce vena
se puede ver, veréis en uno solo, que al son sabroso de su musa enfrena la furia al mar, el curso al dios Eolo.
620

El nombre déste es BALTASAR DE ORENA, cuya fama del uno al otro polo
corre ligera, y del oriente a ocaso, por honra verdadera de Parnaso.

Pues de una fértil y preciosa planta, 625
de allá traspuesta en el mayor collado que en toda la Tesalia se levanta,

planta que ya dichoso fruto ha dado, callaré yo lo que la fama canta
del ilustre don PEDRO DE ALVARADO, 630
ilustre, pero ya no menos claro,
por su divino ingenio, al mundo raro.

Tú, que con nueva musa extraordinaria, CAIRASCO, cantas del amor el ánimo
y aquella condición del vulgo varia 635
donde se opone al fuerte el pusilánimo; si a este sitio de la Gran Canaria vinieres, con ardor vivo y magnánimo mis pastores ofrecen a tus méritos
mil lauros, mil loores beneméritos. 640

¿Quién es, ¡oh anciano Tormes!, el que niega que no puedes al Nilo aventajarte,
si puede sólo el licenciado VEGA
más que Títiro al Mincio celebrarte?
Bien sé, DAMIÁN, que vuestro ingenio llega 645 do alcanza deste honor la mayor parte, pues sé, por muchos años de experiencia, vuestra tan sin igual virtud y sciencia.

Aunque el ingenio y la elegancia vuestra, FRANCISCO SÁNCHEZ, se me concediera, 650

por torpe me juzgara y poco diestra, si a querer alabaros me pusiera.

Lengua del cielo única y maestra

tiene de ser la que por la carrera

de vuestras alabanzas se dilate, 655 que hacerlo humana lengua es disparate.

Las raras cosas y en estilo nuevas que un espíritu muestran levantado, en cien mil ingeniosas, arduas pruebas, por sabio conocido y estimado, 660

hacen que don FRANCISCO DE LAS CUEVAS

por mí sea dignamente celebrado,

en tanto que la fama pregonera

no detuviere su veloz carrera.

Quisiera rematar mi dulce canto 665

en tal sazón, pastores, con loaros

un ingenio que al mundo pone espanto y que pudiera en éstasis robaros.

En él cifro y recojo todo cuanto

he mostrado hasta aquí y he de mostraros: 670

FRAY LUIS DE LEÓN es el que digo,

a quien yo reverencio, adoro y sigo.

¿Qué modos, qué caminos o qué vías

de alabar buscaré para qu'el nombre viva mil siglos de aquel gran MATÍAS 675 que DE ZÚÑIGA tiene el sobrenombre?

A él se den las alabanzas mías, que, aunque yo soy divina y él es hombre, por ser su ingenio, como lo es, divino, de mayor honra y alabanza es digno. 680

Volved el presuroso pensamiento

a las riberas de Pisuerga bellas:

veréis que aumentan este rico cuento claros ingenios con quien se honran ellas.

Ellas no sólo, sino el firmamento, 685

do lucen las claríficas estrellas,

honrarse puede bien cuando consigo
tenga allá los varones que aquí digo.

Vos, DAMASIO DE FRÍAS, podéis solo

loaros a vos mismo, pues no puede 690
hacer, aunque os alabe el mismo Apolo, que en tan justo loor corto no quede.
Vos sois el cierto y el seguro polo por quien se guía aquel que le sucede en el mar de las sciencias buen pasaje, 695
propicio viento y puerto en su viaje.

ANDRÉS SANZ DE PORTILLO, tú me envía aquel aliento con que Febo
mueve

tu sabia pluma y alta fantasía,
porque te dé el loor que se te debe. 700
Que no podrá la ruda lengua mía, por más caminos que aquí tienta y pruebe, hallar alguno así cual le deseo para loar lo que en ti siento y veo.

Felicísimo ingenio, que te encumbras 705 sobre el que más Apolo ha levantado, y con tus claros rayos nos alumbras y sacas del camino más errado;
y, aunque ahora con ella me deslumbras y tienes a mi ingenio alborotado, 710

yo te doy sobre muchos palma y gloria, pues a mí me la has dado, doctor SORIA.

Si vuestras obras son tan estimadas, famoso CANTORAL, en toda parte, serán mis alabanzas escusadas, 715
si en nuevo modo no os alabo, y arte.
Con las palabras más calificadas, con cuanto ingenio el cielo en mí reparte, os admiro y alabo aquí callando,
y llevo do llegar no puedo hablando. 720

Tú, HIERÓNIMO VACA Y DE QUIÑONES, si tanto me he tardado en celebrarte, mi pasado descuido es bien perdones, con la enmienda que ofrezco de mi parte.
De hoy más en claras voces y pregones, 725
en la cubierta y descubierta parte

del ancho mundo, haré con clara llama lucir tu nombre y estender tu fama.

Tu verde y rico margen, no d'enebro, ni de ciprés funesto enriquecido, 730

claro, abundoso y conocido Ebro,
sino de lauro y mirto florecido,
ahora como puedo le celebro, celebrando aquel bien qu'han concedido el cielo a tus riberas, pues en ellas 735 moran ingenios claros más que estrellas.

Serán testigo desto dos hermanos,
dos luceros, dos soles de poesía,
a quien el cielo con abiertas manos dio cuanto ingenio y arte dar podía. 740
Edad temprana, pensamientos canos,
maduro trato, humilde fantasía,
labran eterna y digna laureola
a LUPERCIO LEONARDO DE ARGENSOLA.

Con sancta envidia y competencia sancta 745
parece qu'el menor hermano aspira
a igualar al mayor, pues se adelanta y sube do no llega humana mira.
Por esto escribe y mil sucesos canta con tan suave y acordada lira, 750 que este BARTOLOMÉ menor meresce

lo que al mayor, Lupercio, se le ofresce.

Si el buen principio y medio da esperanza que el fin ha de ser raro y excelente,
en cualquier caso ya mi ingenio alcanza 755
qu'el tuyo has de encumbrar, COSME PARIENTE.
Y así, puedes, con cierta confianza, prometer a tu sabia honrosa frente
la corona que tiene merescida
tu claro ingenio, tu inculpable vida. 760

En soledad, del cielo acompañado, vives, ¡oh gran MORILLO!, y allí muestras que nunca dejan tu cristiano lado otras musas más sanctas y más diestras.
De mis hermanas fuiste alimentado, 765
y ahora, en pago dello, nos adiestras y enseñas a cantar divinas cosas, gratas al cielo, al suelo provechosas.

Turia, tú que otra vez con voz sonora cantaste de tus hijos la excelencia, 770 si gustas de escuchar la mía ahora, formada no en envidia o competencia, oirás cuánto tu fama se mejora
con los que yo diré, cuya presencia, valor, virtud, ingenio, te enriquecen 775
y sobre el Indo y Gange te engrandecen.

¡Oh tú, don JUAN COLOMA, en cuyo seno tanta gracia del cielo se ha encerrado, que a la envidia pusiste en duro freno y en la fama mil lenguas has criado, 780
con que del gentil Tajo al fértil Reno tu nombre y tu valor va levantado!
Tú, conde de Elda, en todo tan dichoso, haces el Turia más qu'el Po famoso.

Aquel en cuyo pecho abunda y llueve 785
siempre una fuente que es por él divina, y a quien el coro de sus lumbres nueve como a señor con gran razón se inclina, a quien único nombre se le debe de la etíope hasta la gente austrina, 790
don LUIS GARCERÁN es sin segundo, maestre de Montesa y bien del mundo.

Meresce bien en este insigne valle
lugar ilustre, asiento conocido, aquel a quien la fama quiere dalle 795
el nombre que su ingenio ha merecido.
Tenga cuidado el cielo de loalle, pues es del cielo su valor crecido: el cielo alabe lo que yo no puedo
del sabio don ALONSO REBOLLEDO. 800

Alzas, doctor FALCÓN, tan alto el vuelo, que al águila caudal atrás te dejas, pues te remontas con tu ingenio al cielo y deste valle mísero te alejas.
Por esto temo y con razón recelo 805 que, aunque te alabe, formarás mil quejas de mí, porque en tu loa noche y día no se ocupa la voz y lengua mía.

Si tuviera, cual tiene la Fortuna,
la dulce poesía varia rueda, 810
ligera y más movable que la luna, que ni estuvo, ni está, ni estará queda, en ella, sin hacer mudanza alguna,

pusiera sólo a MICER ARTIEDA,
y el más alto lugar siempre ocupara, 815
por sciencias, por ingenio y virtud rara.

Todas cuantas bien dadas alabanzas diste a raros ingenios, ¡oh GIL POLO!, tú las mereces solo y las alcanzas, tú
las alcanzas y mereces solo. 820

Ten ciertas y seguras esperanzas que en este valle un nuevo mauseolo te harán estos pastores, do guardadas tus cenizas serán y celebradas.

CRISTÓBAL DE VIRUÉS, pues se adelanta 825
tu sciencia y tu valor tan a tus años, tú mismo aquel ingenio y virtud canta con que huyes del mundo los engaños.

Tierna, dichosa y bien nascida planta, yo haré que en propios reinos y en
estraños 830

el fruto de tu ingenio levantado
se conozca, se admire y sea estimado.

Si conforme al ingenio que nos muestra SILVESTRE DE ESPINOSA, así se hubiera de loar, otra voz más viva y diestra, 835
más tiempo y más caudal menester fuera.

Mas, pues la mía a su intención adiestra, yo le daré por paga verdadera, con el bien que del dios de Delo tiene, el mayor de las aguas de Hipocrene.
840

Entre éstos, como Apolo, venir veo, hermoseando al mundo con su vista,
al discreto galán GARCÍA ROMEO,
dignísimo de estar en esta lista.

Si la hija del húmido Peneo, 845
de quien ha sido Ovidio coronista,
en campos de Tesalia le hallara,
en él y no en laurel se transformara.

Rompe el silencio y sancto encerramiento, traspasa el aire, al cielo se levanta
850 de fray PEDRO DE HUETE aquel acento de su divina musa, heroica y sancta.
Del alto suyo raro entendimiento

cantó la fama, ha de cantar y canta, llevando, para dar al mundo espanto, 855 sus obras por testigos de su canto.

Tiempo es ya de llegar al fin postrero, dando principio a la mayor hazaña que jamás emprendí, la cual espero que ha de mover al blando Apolo a saña, 860 pues, con ingenio rústico y grosero, a dos soles que alumbran vuestra España -
no sólo a España, mas al mundo todo-pienso loar, aunque me falte el modo.

De Febo la sagrada honrosa sciencia, 865
la cortesana discreción madura,
los bien gastados años, la experiencia, que mil sanos consejos asegura;
la agudeza de ingenio, el advertencia en apuntar y en descubrir la escura 870
dificultad y duda que se ofrece,
en estos soles dos sólo floresce.

En ellos un epílogo, pastores,
del largo canto mío ahora hago,

y a ellos enderezo los loores 875 cuantos habéis oído, y no los pago: que todos los ingenios son deudores a estos de quien yo me satisfago;
satisfácese dellos todo el suelo,
y aun los admira, porque son del cielo. 880

Estos quiero que den fin a mi canto, y a nueva admiración comienzo;
y si pensáis que en esto me adelanto, cuando os diga quién son, veréis que os venzo.

Por ellos hasta el cielo me levanto, 885
y sin ellos me corro y me avergüenzo: tal es LAÍNEZ, tal es FIGUEROA, dignos de eterna y de incesable loa.

No había aún bien acabado la hermosa ninfa los últimos acentos de su sabroso canto, cuando, tornándose a juntar las llamas, que divididas estaban, la cerraron en medio, y luego, poco a poco consumiéndose, en breve espacio desapareció el ardiente fuego y la discreta musa delante de los ojos de todos, a tiempo que ya la clara aurora comenzaba a descubrir sus frescas y rosadas mejillas por el espacioso cielo, dando alegres muestras del venidero día. Y luego el venerable Telesio, puniéndose encima de la sepultura de Meliso, y rodeado de toda la

agradable compañía que allí estaba, prestándole todos una agradable atención y estraño silencio, desta manera comenzó a decirles: -Lo que esta pasada noche en este mismo lugar y por vuestros mismos ojos habéis visto, discretos y gallardos pastores y hermosas pastoras, os habrá dado a entender cuán acepta es al cielo la loable costumbre que tenemos de hacer estos anales sacrificios y honrosas obsequias por las felices almas de los cuerpos que por decreto vuestro en este famoso valle tener sepultura merescieron. Dígoos esto, amigos míos, porque de aquí adelante con más fervor y diligencia acudáis a poner en efecto tan sancta y famosa obra, pues ya veis de cuán raros y altos espíritus nos ha dado noticia la bella Calíope, que todos son dignos, no sólo de las vuestras, pero de todas las posibles alabanzas. Y no penséis que es pequeño el gusto que he rescibido en saber por tan verdadera relación cuán grande es el número de los divinos ingenios que en nuestra España hoy viven, porque siempre ha estado y está en opinión de todas las naciones extranjeras que no son muchos, sino pocos, los espíritus que en la sciencia de la poesía en ella muestran que le tienen levantado, siendo tan al revés como se parece, pues cada uno de los que la ninfa ha nombrado al más agudo extranjero se aventaja, y darían claras muestras dello, si en esta nuestra España se estimase en tanto la poesía como en otras provincias se estima. Y así, por esta causa, los insignes y claros ingenios que en ella se aventajan, con la poca estimación que dellos los príncipes y el vulgo hacen, con solos sus entendimientos comunican sus altos y estraños conceptos, sin osar publicarlos al mundo; y tengo para mí que el cielo debe de ordenarlo desta manera, porque no meresce el mundo ni el mal considerado siglo nuestro gozar de manjares al alma tan gustosos. Mas, porque me parece, pastores, que el poco sueño desta pasada noche y las largas ceremonias nuestras os tendrán algún tanto fatigados y deseosos de reposo, será bien que, haciendo lo poco que nos falta para cumplir nuestro intento, cada uno se vuelva a su cabaña o al aldea, llevando en la memoria lo que la musa nos deja encomendado.

Y, en diciendo esto, se abajó de la sepultura; y, tornándose a coronar de nuevas y funestas ramas, tornó a rodear la pira tres veces, siguiéndole todos y acompañándole en algunas devotas oraciones que decía. Esto acabado, teniéndole todos en medio, volvió el grave rostro a una y otra parte, y, bajando la cabeza y mostrando agradescido semblante y amorosos ojos, se despidió de toda la compañía, la cual, yéndose quién por una y quién por otra parte de las cuatro salidas que aquel sitio tenía, en poco espacio se deshizo y dividió toda, quedando solos los del aldea de Aurelio, y con ellos Timbrio, Silerio, Nísida y Blanca, con los famosos pastores Elicio, Tirsi, Damón, Lauso, Erastro, Daranio, Arsindo y los cuatro lastimados Orompo, Marsilo, Crisio y Orfinio, con las pastoras Galatea, Florisa, Silveria y su amiga Belisa, por quien Marsilo moría. Juntos, pues, todos estos, el venerable Aurelio les dijo que sería bien partirse luego de aquel lugar, para llegar a tiempo de pasar la siesta en el Arro yo de las Palmas, pues tan acomodado sitio era para ello. A todos pareció bien lo que Aurelio decía; y luego, con reposados pasos, hacia donde él dijo se encaminaron. Mas, como la hermosa vista de la pastora Belisa no dejase reposar los espíritus de Marsilo, quisiera él, si pudiera y le fuera lícito, llegarse a ella y decirle la sinrazón que con él usaba; mas, por no perder el decoro que a la honestidad de Belisa se debía, estábase el triste más mudo de lo que había menester su deseo. Los mismos efectos y accidentes hacía amor en las almas de los enamorados Elicio y Erastro, que cada cual por sí quisiera decir a Galatea lo que ya ella bien sabía. A esta sazón, dijo Aurelio: -No me parece bien, pastores, que os mostréis tan avaros que no queráis corresponder y pagar lo que debéis a las calandrias y ruiseñoles y a los otros pintados pajarillos que por entre estos árboles con su no aprendida y maravillosa armonía os van entretiniendo y regocijando. Tocad vuestros instrumentos y levantad vuestras sonoras voces, y mostraldes que el arte y destreza vuestra en la música a la natural suya se aventaja; y con tal entretenimiento sentiremos menos la pesadumbre del camino y los rayos del sol, que ya parece que van amenazando el rigor con que esta siesta han de herir la tierra.

Poco fue menester para ser Aurelio obedecido, porque luego Erastro tocó su zampoña y Arsindo su rabel, al son de los cuales instrumentos, dando todos la mano a Elicio, él comenzó a cantar desta manera:

ELICIO

Por lo imposible peleo,
y si quiero retirarme,
ni paso ni senda veo;
que hasta vencer o acabarme,
tras sí me lleva el deseo. 5
Y, aunque sé que aquí es forzoso
antes morir que vencer,
cuando estoy más peligroso,
entonces vengo a tener
mayor fe en lo más dudoso. 10

El cielo que me condena

a no esperar buena andanza,
me da siempre a mano llena,
sin las sombras de esperanza,
mil certidumbres de pena. 15
Mas mi pecho valeroso,
que se abrasa y se resuelve
en vivo fuego amoroso,
en contracambio, le vuelve
mayor fe en lo más dudoso. 20

Inconstancia, firme duda,
falsa fe, cierto temor,
voluntad de amor desnuda, nunca turban el amor
que de firme no se muda. 25
Vuele el tiempo presuroso,
suceda ausencia o desdén,
crezca el mal, mengüe el reposo,
que yo tendré por mi bien
mayor fe en lo más dudoso. 30

¿No es conocida locura
y notable desvarío
querer yo lo que ventura
me niega, y el hado mío
y la suerte no asegura? 35
De todo estoy temeroso;
no hay gusto que me entretenga,
y en trance tan peligroso,
me hace el amor que tenga
mayor fe en lo más dudoso. 40

Alcanzo de mi dolor
que está en tal término puesto,
que llega donde el amor;
y el imaginar en esto,
tiempla en parte su rigor. 45
De pobre y menesteroso,
doy a la imaginación

alivio tan congojoso,
porque tenga el corazón
mayor fe en lo más dudoso. 50

Y más agora, que vienen
de golpe todos los males;
y para que más me penen,
aunque todos son mortales,
en la vida me entretienen. 55
Mas, en fin, si un fin hermoso
nuestra vida en honra sube,
el mío me hará famoso,
porque en muerte y vida tuve
mayor fe en lo más dudoso. 60

Parecióle a Marsilo que lo que Elicio había cantado tan a su propósito hacía, que quiso seguirle en el mismo concepto; y así, sin esperar que otro le tomase la mano, al son de los mismos instrumentos, desta manera comenzó a cantar:

MARSILO

¡Cuán fácil cosa es llevarse
el viento las esperanzas
que pudieron fabricarse
de las vanas confianzas
que suelen imaginarse! 5
Todo concluye y fenece:
las esperanzas de amor,
los medios qu'el tiempo ofresce;
mas en el buen amador
sola la fe permanece. 10

Ella en mí tal fuerza alcanza,
que, a pesar de aquel desdén,
lleno de desconfianza,
siempre me asegura un bien
que sustenta la esperanza. 15

Y, aunqu'el amor desfallece
en el blanco, airado pecho que tanto mis males cresce,
en el mío, a su despecho,
sola la fe permanece. 20

Sabes, amor, tú, que cobras
tributo de mi fe cierta,
y tanto en cobrarle sobras,
que mi fe nunca fue muerta,
pues se aviva con mis obras. 25
Y sabes bien que descrece
toda mi gloria y contento
cuanto más tu furia cresce,
y que en mi alma de asiento
sola la fe permanece. 30

Pero si es cosa notoria,
y no hay poner duda en ella,
que la fe no entra en la gloria,
yo, que no estaré sin ella,
¿qué triunfo espero o victoria? 35
Mi sentido desvanece

con el mal que se figura;
todo el bien desaparece;
y entre tanta desventura,
sola la fe permanece. 40

Con un profundo suspiro dio fin a su canto el lastimado Marsilo; y luego Erastro, dando su zampoña, sin más detenerse, desta manera comenzó a cantar:

ERASTRO

En el mal que me lastima
y en el bien de mi dolor,

es mi fe de tanta estima
que ni huye del temor,
ni a la esperanza se arrima. 5
No la turba o desconcierta
ver que está mi pena cierta
en su difícil subida,
ni que consumen la vida
fe viva, esperanza muerta. 10

Milagro es éste en mi mal;
mas eslo porque mi bien,

si viene, venga a ser tal,
que, entre mil bienes, le den
la palma por principal. 15
La fama, con lengua experta,
dé al mundo noticia cierta
qu'el firme amor se mantiene
en mi pecho, adonde tiene
fe viva, esperanza muerta. 20

Vuestro desdén riguroso
y mi humilde merescer,
me tienen tan temeroso
que, ya que os supe querer,
ni puedo hablaros, ni oso. 25
Veo de contino abierta
a mi desdicha la puerta,
y que acabo poco a poco,
porque con vos valen poco
fe viva, esperanza muerta. 30

No llega a mi fantasía
un tan loco desvaneó,
como es pensar que podría

el menor bien que deseo
alcanzar por la fe mía. 35
Podéis, pastora, estar cierta

qu'el alma rendida acierta
a amaros cual merecéis,
pues siempre en ella hallaréis
fe viva, esperanza muerta. 40

Calló Erastro; y luego, el ausente Crisio, al son de los mismos instrumentos, desta suerte comenzó a cantar:

CRISIO

Si a las veces desespera
del bien la firme afición,
quien desmaya en la carrera
de la amorosa pasión, ¿qué fruto o qué premio espera? 5
Yo no sé quien se asegura
gloria, gustos y ventura
por un ímpetu amoroso,
si en él y en el más dichoso
no es fe la fe que no dura. 10

En mil trances ya sabidos
se han visto, y en los de amores,
los soberbios y atrevidos,
al principio vencedores,
y a la fin quedar vencidos. 15
Sabe el que tiene cordura
que en la firmeza se apura
el triunfo de la batalla,
y sabe que, aunque se halla,
no es fe la fe que no dura. 20

En el que quisiere amar
no más de por su contento,
es imposible durar
en su vano pensamiento
la fe que se ha de guardar. 25

Si en la mayor desventura
mi fe tan firme y segura
como en el bien no estuviera,
yo mismo della dijera:
no es fe la fe que no dura. 30

El ímpetu y ligereza

de un nuevo amador insano,
los llantos y la tristeza,
son nubes que en el verano
se deshacen con presteza. 35
No es amor el que le apura,
sino apetito y locura,
pues cuando quiere, no quiere:
no es amante el que no muere,
no es fe la fe que no dura. 40

A todos pareció bien la orden que los pastores en sus canciones guardaban, y con deseo atendían a que Tirsi o Damón comenzasen; mas presto se le cumplió Damón, pues, en acabando Crisio, al son de su mesmo rabel, cantó desta manera:
DAMÓN

Amarili, ingrata y bella, ¿quién os podrá enternecer,
si os vienen a endurescer
las ansias de mi querella
y la fe de mi querer? 5 ¡Bien sabéis, pastora, vos

que en el amor que mantengo
a tan alto extremo vengo
que, después de la de Dios,
sola es fe la fe que os tengo! 10

Y, puesto que subo tanto
en amar cosa mortal,
tal bien encierra mi mal,
que al alma por él levanto

a su patria natural. 15
Por esto conozco y sé
que tal es mi amor, tan luengo como muero y me entretengo,
y que, si en amor hay fe,
sola es fe la fe que os tengo. 20

Los muchos años gastados
en amorosos servicios,
del alma los sacrificios,
de mi fe y de mis cuidados
dan manifiestos indicios. 25
Por esto no os pediré
remedio al mal que sostengo;

y si a pedírosle vengo,
es, Amarili, porque
sola es fe la fe que os tengo. 30

En el mar de mi tormenta
jamás he visto bonanza,
y aquella alegre esperanza
con quien la fe se sustenta, de la mía no se alcanza. 35
Del amor y de fortuna
me quejo; mas no me vengo,
pues por ellas a tal vengo
que, sin esperanza alguna,
sola es fe la fe que os tengo. 40

El canto de Damón acabó de confirmar en Timbrio y en Silerio la buena opinión que del raro ingenio de los pastores que allí estaban habían concebido; y más cuando, a persuasión de Tirsi y de Elicio, el ya libre y desdeñoso Lauso, al son de la flauta de Arsindo, soltó la voz en semejantes versos:

LAUSO

Rompió el desdén tus cadenas,
falso amor, y a mi memoria
el mismo ha vuelto la gloria de la ausencia de tus penas.
Llame mi fe quien quisiere 5
antojadiza, y no firme,
y en su opinión me confirme
como más le pareciere.
Diga que presto olvidé,
y que de un sutil cabello, 10
que un soplo pudo rompello, colgada estaba mi fe.
Digan que fueron fingidos
mis llantos y mis suspiros,
y que del Amor los tiros 15
no pasaron mis vestidos.
Que no el ser llamado vano
y mudable me atormenta,
a trueco de ver esenta
mi cerviz del yugo insano. 20

Sé yo bien quién es Silena
y su condición estraña,
y que asegura y engaña
su apacible faz serena.
A su estraña gravedad 25
y a sus bajos bellos ojos,
no es mucho dar los despojos
de cualquiera voluntad.
Esto en la vista primera;
mas, después de conocida, 30
por no verla, dar la vida,
y más, si más se pudiera.
Silena del cielo y mía,
muchas veces la llamaba
porque tan hermosa estaba 35
que del cielo parecía;
Mas ahora, sin recelo,
mejor la podré llamar

serena falsa del mar,
que no Silena del cielo. 40

Con los ojos, con la pluma,
con las veras y los juegos,
de amantes vanos y ciegos
prende innumerable suma.
Siempre es primero el postrero; 45
mas el más enamorado
al cabo es tan maltratado
cuanto querido primero.
¡Oh cuánto más se estimara
de Silena la hermosura, 50
si el proceder y cordura
a su belleza igualara!
No le falta discreción;
mas empléala tan mal,
que le sirve de dogal 55
que ahoga su presunción.
Y no hablo de corrido,
pues sería apasionado,
pero hablo de engañado
y sin razón ofendido. 60
Ni me ciega la pasión,

ni el deseo de su mengua:
que siempre siguió mi lengua
los términos de razón.
Sus muchos antojos varios, 65
su mudable pensamiento,
le vuelven cada momento
los amigos en contrarios.
Y pues hay por tantos modos
enemigos de Silena, 70
o ella no es toda buena,
o son ellos malos todos.

Acabó Lauso su canto; y, aunque él creyó que ninguno le entendía, por ignorar el disfrazado nombre de Silena, más de tres de los que allí iban la conocieron, y aun se maravillaron que la modestia de Lauso a ofender alguno se estendiese: principalmente a la disfrazada pastora, de quien tan enamorado le habían visto. Pero en la opinión de Damón, su amigo, quedó bien disculpado, porque conocía el término de Silena y sabía el que con Lauso había usado, y de lo que no dijo se maravillaba. Acabó, como se ha dicho, Lauso; y, como Galatea estaba informada del extremo de la voz de Nísida, quiso, por obligarla, cantar ella primero; y por esto, antes que otro pastor comenzase, haciendo señal a Arsindo que en tañer su flauta procediese, al son della, con su estremada voz, cantó desta manera:

GALATEA

Tanto cuanto el amor convida y llama al alma con sus gustos de apariencia, tanto
más huye su mortal dolencia
quien sabe el nombre que le da la fama.

Y el pecho opuesto a su amorosa llama, 5
armado de una honesta resistencia,
poco puede empecerle su inclemencia, poco su fuego y su rigor le inflama.

Segura está, quien nunca fue querida ni supo querer bien, de aquella lengua
10 que en su deshonor se adelgaza y lima; mas si el querer y el no querer da mengua, ¿en qué ejercicios pasará la vida
la que más que al vivir la honra estima?

Bien se echó de ver en el canto de Galatea que respondía al malicioso de Lauso, y que no estaba mal con las voluntades libres, sino con las lenguas maliciosas y los ánimos dañados, que, en no alcanzando lo que quieren, con vierten el amor que un tiempo mostraron en un odio malicioso y detestable, como ella en Lauso imaginaba; pero quizá saliera deste engaño, si la buena condición de Lauso conociera y la mala de Silena no ignorara. Luego que Galatea acabó de cantar, con corteses palabras rogó a Nísida que lo mismo hiciese; la cual, como era tan comedida como hermosa, sin hacerse de rogar, al son de la zampoña de Florisa, cantó desta suerte: NÍSIDA

Bien puse yo valor a la defensa del duro encuentro y amoroso asalto; bien levanté mi presumpción en alto contra el rigor de la notoria ofensa.

Mas fue tan reforzada y tan intensa 5

la batería, y mi poder tan falto, que sin cogerme amor de sobresalto, me dio a entender su potestad inmensa.

Valor, honestidad, recogimiento, recato, ocupación, esquivo pecho, 10
amor con poco premio lo conquista.

Ansí que, para huir el vencimiento, consejos jamás fueron de provecho:
desta verdad testigo soy de vista.

Cuando Nísida acabó de cantar y acabó de admirar a Galatea y a los que escuchado la habían, estaban ya bien cerca del lugar adonde tenían determinado de pasar la siesta; pero en aquel poco espacio le tuvo Belisa para cumplirlo que Silveria le rogó, que fue que algo cantase; la cual, acompañándola el son de la flauta de Arsindo, cantó lo que se sigue:

BELISA

Libre voluntad esenta,
atended a la razón
que nuestro crédito aumenta;

dejad la vana afición,
engendradora de afrenta; 5
que cuando el alma se encarga
de alguna amorosa carga,
a su gusto es cualquier cosa
compusición venenosa
con jugo de adelfa amarga. 10

Por la mayor cantidad
de la riqueza subida
en valor y en calidad,
no es bien dada ni vendida
la preciosa libertad. 15 ¿Pues, quién se pondrá a perdella
por una simple querella
de un amador porfiado,
si cuanto bien hay criado
no se compara con ella? 20

Si es insufrible dolor
tener en prisión esquivada
el cuerpo libre de amor,
tener el alma captiva

¿no será pena mayor? 25
Sí será, y aun de tal suerte,
que remedio a mal tan fuerte
no se halla en la paciencia,
en años, valor o sciencia,
porque sólo está en la muerte. 30

Vaya, pues, mi sano intento
lejos deste desvarío;
huiga tan falso contento;
rija mi libre albedrío
a su modo el pensamiento; 35
mi tierna cerviz esenta
no permita ni consienta
sobre sí el yugo amoroso,
por quien se turba el reposo
y la libertad se ausenta. 40

Al alma del lastimado Marsilo llegaron los libres versos de la pastora, por la poca esperanza que sus palabras prometían de ser mejoradas sus obras; pero, como era tan firme la fe con que la amaba, no pudieron las notorias muestras de libertad que había oído hacer que él no quedase tan sin ella como hasta entonces estaba. Acabóse en esto el camino de llegar al Arroyo de las Palmas, y, aunque

no llevaran intención de pasar allí la siesta, en llegando a él y en viendo la comodidad del hermoso sitio, él mismo a no pasar adelante les forzara. Llegados, pues, a él, luego el venerable Aurelio ordenó que todos se sentasen junto al claro y espejado arroyo, que por entre la menuda yerba corría, cuyo nacimiento era al pie de una altísima y antigua palma, que por no haber en todas las riberas de Tajo sino aquélla y otra que junto a ella estaba, aquel lugar y arroyo el de las Palmas era llamado. Y, después de sentados, con más voluntad y llaneza que de costosos manjares, de los pastores de Aurelio fueron servidos, satisfaciendo la sed con las claras y frescas aguas que el limpio arroyo les ofrescía; y, en acabando la breve y sabrosa comida, algunos de los pastores se dividieron y apartaron a buscar algún apartado y sombrío lugar donde restaurar pudiesen las no dormidas horas de la pasada noche; y sólo se quedaron solos los de la compañía y aldea de Aurelio, con Timbrio, Silerio, Nísida y Blanca, Tirsi y Damón, a quien les pareció ser mejor gustar de la buena conversación que allí se esperaba, que de cualquier otro gusto que el sueño ofrecerles podía. Adivinada, pues, y casi conocida esta su intención de Aurelio, les dijo: -Bien será, señores, que los que aquí estamos, ya que entregarnos al dulce sueño no habemos querido, que este tiempo que le hurtamos no dejemos de aprovecharle en cosa que más de nuestro gusto sea; y la que a mí me parece que no podrá dejar de dárnosle, es que cada cual, como mejor supiere, muestre aquí la agudeza de su ingenio, proponiendo alguna pregunta o enigma, a quien esté obligado a responder el compañero que a su lado estuviere; pues con este ejercicio se granjearán dos cosas: la una, pasar con menos enfado las horas que aquí estuviéremos; la otra, no cansar tanto nuestros oídos con oír siempre lamentaciones de amor y endechas enamoradas.

Conformáronse todos luego con la voluntad de Aurelio; y, sin mudarse del lugar do estaban, el primero que comenzó a preguntar fue el mismo Aurelio, diciendo desta manera:

AURELIO

¿Cuál es aquel poderoso que desde oriente a occidente es conocido y famoso?
A veces, fuerte y valiente:
otras, flaco y temeroso; 5
quita y pone la salud,

muestra y cubre la virtud
en muchos más de una vez, es más fuerte en la vejez
que en la alegre juventud. 10

Múdase en quien no se muda

por estraña preeminencia,
hace temblar al que suda,
y a la más rara elocuencia
suele tornar torpe y muda; 15
con diferentes medidas,
anchas, cortas y estendidas,
mide su ser y su nombre,
y suele tomar renombre
de mil tierras conocidas. 20

Sin armas vence al armado,
y es forzoso que le venza,
y aquél que más le ha tratado,
mostrando tener vergüenza,
es el más desvergonzado. 25
Y es cosa de maravilla
que en el campo y en la villa,
a capitán de tal prueba
cualquier hombre se le atreva, aunque pierda en la rencilla. 30

Tocó la respuesta desta pregunta al anciano Arsindo, que junto a Aurelio estaba; y, habiendo un poco considerado lo que significar podía, al fin le dijo: - Paréceme, Aurelio, que la edad nuestra nos fuerza a andar más enamorados de lo que significa tu pregunta que no de la más gallarda pastora que se nos pueda ofrecer, porque si no me engaño, el poderoso y conocido que dices es el vino, y en él cuadran todos los atributos que le has dado.

-Verdad dices, Arsindo -respondió Aurelio-, y estoy para decir que me pesa de haber propuesto pregunta que con tanta facilidad haya sido declarada; mas di tú la tuya, que al lado tienes quien te la sabrá desatar, por más añudada que venga.

-Que me place -dijo Arsindo.

Luego propuso la siguiente:

ARSINDO

¿Quién es quien pierde el color
donde se suele avivar,
y luego torna a cobrar
otro más vivo y mejor?
Es pardo en su nascimiento, 5
y después negro atezado,
y al cabo tan colorado,
que su vista da contento.

No guarda fueros ni leyes,
tiene amistad con las llamas, 10
visita a tiempos las camas
de señores y de reyes.
Muerto, se llama varón,
y vivo, hembra se nombra;
tiene el aspecto de sombra; 15
de fuego, la condición.

Era Damón el que al lado de Arsindo estaba, el cual, apenas había acabado Arsindo su pregunta, cuando le dijo: -Paréceme, Arsindo, que no es tan oscura tu demanda como lo que significa, porque si mal no estoy en ella, el carbón es por quien dices que muerto se llama varón y encendido y vivo brasa, que es nombre de hembra, y todas las demás partes le convienen en todo como ésta; y si quedas con la misma pena que Aurelio, por la facilidad con que tu pregunta ha sido entendida, yo os quiero tener compañía en ella, pues Tirsi, a quien toca responderme, nos hará iguales.

Y luego dijo la suya:

DAMÓN

¿Cuál es la dama polida,

aseada y bien compuesta,
temerosa y atrevida,
vergonzosa y deshonesto,
y gustosa y desabrida? 5
Si son muchas -porque asombre-, mudan de mujer el nombre
en varón; y es cierta ley que va con ellas el rey
y las lleva cualquier hombre. 10

-Bien es, amigo Damón -dijo luego Tirsi-, que salga verdadera tu porfía, y que quedes con la pena de Aurelio y Arsindo, si alguna tienen, porque te hago saber que sé que lo que encubre tu pregunta es la carta y el pliego de cartas.
Concedió Damón lo que Tirsi dijo, y luego Tirsi propuso desta manera:

TIRSI

¿Quién es la que es toda ojos
de la cabeza a los pies,

y a veces, sin su interés,
causa amorosos enojos?
También suele aplacar riñas, 5
y no le va ni le viene,
y, aunque tantos ojos tiene,
se descubren pocas niñas.
Tiene nombre de un dolor
que se tiene por mortal, 10
hace bien y hace mal,
enciende y tiembla el amor.

En confusión puso a Elicio la pregunta de Tirsi, porque a él tocaba responder a ella, y casi estuvo por darse, como dicen, por vencido; pero, a cabo de poco, vino a decir que era la celosía; y, concediéndolo Tirsi, luego Elicio preguntó lo

siguiente:

ELICIO

Es muy oscura y es clara;
tiene mil contrariedades:
encúbrenos las verdades,
y al cabo nos las declara.
Nasce, a veces, de donaire, 5

otras, de altas fantasías,
y suele engendrar porfías
aunque trate cosas de aire.
Sabe su nombre cualquiera,
hasta los niños pequeños; 10
son muchas y tiene dueños
de diferente manera.
No hay vieja que no se abrace
con una destas señoras;
son de gusto algunas horas: 15
cuál cansa, cuál satisface.
Sabios hay que se desvelan
por sacarles los sentidos,
y algunos quedan corridos
cuanto más sobre ello velan. 20
Cuál es nescia, cuál curiosa,
cuál fácil, cuál intricada,
pero sea o no sea nada,
decidme qué es cosa y cosa.

No podía Timbrio atinar con lo que significaba la pregunta de Elicio, y casi comenzó a correrse de ver que más que otro alguno se tardaba en la respuesta, mas ni aun por eso venía en el sentido della; y tanto se detuvo, que Galatea, que estaba después de Nísida, dijo: -Si vale a romper la orden que está dada, y puede responder el que primero supiere, yo por mí digo que sé lo que significa la propuesta enigma, y estoy por declararla, si el señor Timbrio me da licencia.

-Por cierto, hermosa Galatea -respondió Timbrio-, que conozco yo que, así como a mí me falta, os sobra a vos ingenio para aclarar mayores dificultades; pero, con todo eso, quiero que tengáis paciencia hasta que Elicio la torne a decir, y si desta vez no la acertare, confirmarse ha con más veras la opinión que de mi ingenio y del vuestro tengo.

Tornó Elicio a decir su pregunta, y luego Timbrio declaró lo que era, diciendo: -Con lo mismo que yo pensé que tu demanda, Elicio, se escurecía, con eso mismo me parece que se declara, pues el último verso dice que te digan qué es cosa y cosa, y así yo te respondo a lo que me dices, y digo que tu pregunta es el «qué es cosa y cosa»; y no te maravilles haberme tardado en la respuesta, porque más me maravillara yo de mi ingenio si más presto respondiera, el cual mostrará quién es en el poco artificio de mi pregunta, que es ésta:

TIMBRIO

¿Quién es el que, a su pesar,
mete sus pies por los ojos,
y sin causarles enojos,
les hace luego cantar?
El sacarlos es de gusto, 5
aunque, a veces, quien los saca,
no sólo su mal no aplaca,
mas cobra mayor disgusto.

A Nísida tocaba responder a la pregunta de Timbrio, mas no fue posible que la adivinasen ella ni Galatea, que se le seguían. Y, viendo Orompo que las pastoras se fatigaban en pensar lo que significaba, les dijo: -No os canséis, señoras, ni fatiguéis vuestros entendimientos en la declaración desta enigma, porque podría ser que ninguna de vosotras en toda su vida hubiese visto la figura que la pregunta encubre; y así, no es mucho que no deis en ella; que si de otra suerte fuera, bien seguros estábamos de vuestros entendimientos, que en menos espacio, otras más dificultosas hubiéradades declarado. Y por esto, con vuestra licencia, quiero yo responder a Timbrio y decirle que su demanda significa un hombre con grillos, pues cuando saca los pies de aquellos ojos que él dice, o es para ser libre, o para llevarle al suplicio. Porque veáis, pastoras, si tenía yo razón de imaginar que quizá ninguna de vosotras había visto en toda su vida cárceles ni prisiones.

-Yo por mí sé decir -dijo Galatea-que jamás he visto aprisionado alguno.

Lo mismo dijeron Nísida y Blanca; y luego Nísida propuso su pregunta en esta forma: NÍSIDA

Muerde el fuego, y el bocado es daño y bien del mordido;

no pierde sangre el herido,
aunque se ve acuchillado;
mas, si es profunda la herida, 5
y de mano que no acierte,
causa al herido la muerte,
y en tal muerte está su vida.

Poco se tardó Galatea en responder a Nísida, porque luego le dijo: -Bien sé que no me engaño, hermosa Nísida, si digo que a ninguna cosa se puede mejor atribuir tu enigma que a las tijeras de despabilar y a la vela o cirio que despabilan. Y si esto es verdad, como lo es, y quedas satisfecha de mi respuesta, escucha ahora la mía, que no con menos facilidad espero que será declarada de tu hermana, que yo he hecho la tuya.

Y luego la dijo; que fue ésta:

GALATEA

Tres hijos que de una madre
nascieron con ser perfecto,
y de un hermano era nieto
el uno, y el otro padre;

y estos tres tan sin clemencia 5
a su madre maltrataban
que mil puñadas la daban,
mostrando en ello su sciencia.

Considerando estaba Blanca lo que podía significar la enigma de Galatea, cuando vieron atravesar corriendo, por junto al lugar donde estaban, dos gallardos pastores, mostrando en la furia con que corrían que alguna cosa de importancia les forzaba a mover los pasos con tanta ligereza; y luego, en el mismo instante, oyeron unas dolorosas voces, como de personas que socorro pedían. Y con este sobresalto se levantaron todos, y siguieron el tino donde las voces sonaban; y, a pocos pasos, salieron de aquel deleitoso sitio y dieron sobre la ribera del fresco Tajo, que por allí cerca mansamente corría; y, apenas vieron el río, cuando se les ofreció a la vista la más estraña cosa que imaginar pudieran, porque vieron dos pastoras, al parecer de gentil donaire, que tenían a un pastor asido de las faldas del pellico con toda la fuerza a ellas posible porque el triste no se ahogase, porque tenía ya el medio cuerpo en el río y la cabeza debajo del agua, forcejando con los pies por desasirse de las pastoras, que su desesperado intento estorbaban, las cuales ya casi querían soltarle, no pudiendo vencer al tesón de su porfía con las débiles fuerzas suyas. Mas, en esto, llegaron los dos pastores que corriendo habían venido, y, asiendo al desesperado, le sacaron del agua a tiempo que ya todos los demás llegaban, espantándose del estraño espectáculo, y más lo fueron cuando conocieron que el pastor que quería ahogarse era Galercio, el hermano de Artidoro, y las pastoras eran Maurisa, su hermana, y la hermosa Teolinda; las cuales, como vieron a Galatea y a Florisa, con lágrimas en los ojos corrió Teolinda a abrazar a Galatea, diciendo: -¡Ay, Galatea, dulce amiga y señora mía, cómo ha cumplido esta desdichada la palabra que te dio de volver a verte y a decirte las nuevas de su contento!

-De que le tengas, Teolinda -respondió Galatea-, holgaré yo tanto cuanto te lo asegura la voluntad que de mí para servirte tienes conocida; mas parésceme que no acreditan tus ojos tus palabras, ni aun ellas me satisfacen de modo que imagine buen suceso de tus deseos.

En tanto que Galatea con Teolinda esto pasaba, Elicio y Arsindo, con los otros pastores, habían desnudado a Galercio; y, al desceñirle el pellico, que con todo el vestido mojado estaba, se le cayó un papel del seno, el cual alzó Tirsi, y abriéndole, vio que eran versos, y por no poderlos leer, por estar mojados, encima de una alta rama le puso al rayo del sol para que se enjugase. Pusieron a Galercio un gabán de Arsindo, y el desdichado mozo estaba como atónito y embelesado, sin hablar palabra alguna, aunque Elicio le preguntaba qué era la causa que a tan estraño término le había conducido; mas por él respondió su hermana Maurisa, diciendo: -Alzad los ojos, pastores, y veréis quién es la ocasión que al desgraciado de mi hermano en tan estraños y desesperados puntos ha puesto.

Por lo que Maurisa dijo, alzaron los pastores los ojos, y vieron encima de una pendiente roca que sobre el río caía una gallarda y dispuesta pastora, sentada sobre la misma peña, mirando con risueño semblante todo lo que los pastores hacían, la cual fue luego de todos conocida por la cruel Gelasia.

-Aquella desamorada, aquella desconocida -siguió Maurisa-, es, señores, la enemiga mortal deste desventurado hermano mío, el cual, como ya todas estas riberas saben y vosotras no ignoráis, la ama, la quiere y la adora; y, en cambio de los continuos servicios que siempre le ha hecho y de las lágrimas que por ella ha derramado, esta mañana, con el más esquivo y desamorado desdén que jamás en la crueldad pudiera hallarse, le mandó que de su presencia se partiese y que ahora ni nunca jamás a ella tornase. Y quiso tan de veras mi hermano obedecerla, que procuraba quitarse la vida, por escusar la ocasión de nunca traspasar su mandamiento; y si, por dicha, estos pastores tan presto no llegaran, llegado fuera ya el fin de mi alegría y el de los días de mi lastimado hermano.

En admiración puso lo que Maurisa dijo a todos los que la escucharon, y más admirados quedaron cuando vieron que la cruel Gelasia, sin moverse del lugar donde estaba, y sin hacer cuenta de toda aquella compañía, que los ojos en ella tenía puestos, con un extraño donaire y desdeñoso brío, sacó un pequeño rabel de su zurrón, y, parándosele a templar muy despacio, a cabo de poco rato, con voz en extremo buena, comenzó a cantar desta manera:

GELASIA

¿Quién dejará del verde prado umbroso las frescas yerbas y las frescas fuentes?

¿Quién de seguir con pasos diligentes la suelta liebre o jabalí cerdoso?

¿Quién, con el son amigo y sonoro, 5
no detendrá las aves inocentes?

¿Quién, en las horas de la siesta ardientes, no buscará en las selvas el reposo, por seguir los incendios, los temores, los celos, iras, rabias, muertes, penas 10
del falso amor, que tanto aflige al mundo?

Del campo son y han sido mis amores; rosas son y jazmines mis cadenas;
libre nascí, y en libertad me fundo.

Cantando estaba Gelasia, y en el movimiento y ademán de su rostro, la desamorada condición suya descubría. Mas, apenas hubo llegado al último verso de su canto, cuando se levantó con una estraña ligereza, y, como si de alguna cosa espantable huyera, así comenzó a correr por la peña abajo, dejando a los pastores admirados de su condición y confusos de su corrida. Mas luego vieron qué era la causa della con ver al enamorado Lenio, que con tirante paso, por la misma peña subía, con intención de llegar adonde Gelasia estaba; pero no quiso ella aguardarle, por no faltar de corresponder en un solo punto a la crueldad de su propósito. Llegó el cansado Lenio a lo alto de la peña cuando ya Gelasia estaba al pie della, y, viendo que no detenía el paso, sino que con más presteza por la espaciosa campaña le tendía, con fatigado aliento y laso espíritu, se sentó en el mismo lugar donde Gelasia había estado, y allí comenzó con desesperadas razones a maldecir su ventura y la hora en que alzó la vista a mirar a la cruel pastora Gelasia; y en aquel mismo instante, como arrepentido de lo que decía, tornaba a bendecir sus ojos y a tener por dichosa y buena la ocasión que en tales términos le tenía. Y luego, incitado y movido de un furioso accidente, arrojó lejos de sí el cayado, y, desnudándose el pellico, le entregó a las aguas del claro Tajo, que junto al pie de la peña corría, lo cual visto por los pastores que mirándole estaban, sin duda creyeron que la fuerza de la enamorada pasión le sacaba de juicio; y así, Elicio y Erastro comenzaron a subir la peña para estorbarle que no hiciese algún otro desatino que le costase más caro. Y, puesto que Lenio los vio subir, no hizo otro movimiento alguno si no fue sacar de su zurrón su rabel, y con un nuevo y estraño reposo se tornó asentar; y, vuelto el rostro hacia donde su pastora huía, con voz suave y de lágrimas acompañada, comenzó a cantar desta suerte:

LENIO

¿Quién te impele, crüel? ¿Quién te desvía?
¿Quién te retira del amado intento?
¿Quién en tus pies veloces alas cría, con que corres ligera más qu'el viento?
¿Por qué tienes en poco la fe mía, 5
y desprecias el alto pensamiento?
¿Por qué huyes de mí? ¿Por qué me dejas?
¡Oh, más dura que mármol a mis quejas!

¿Soy, por ventura, de tan bajo estado que no merezca ver tus ojos bellos? 10
¿Soy pobre? ¿Soy avaro? ¿Hasme hallado en falsedad desde que supe vellos?
La condición primera no he mudado.

¿No pende del menor de tus cabellos mi alma? Pues ¿por qué de mí te alejas?
15
¡Oh, más dura que mármol a mis quejas!

Tome escarmiento tu altivez sobrada de ver mi libre voluntad rendida, mira mi antigua presunción trocada y en amoroso intento convertida. 20 Mira que contra amor no puede nada
la más esenta descuidada vida.
Detén el paso ya: ¿por qué le aquejas?
¡Oh, más dura que mármol a mis quejas!

Vime cual tú te ves, y ahora veo 25
que como fui jamás espero verme:
tal me tiene la fuerza del deseo;
tal quiero, que se estrema en no quererme.
Tú has ganado la palma, tú el trofeo de que amor pueda en su prisión tenerme;
30
tú me rendiste: ¿y tú de mí te quejas?
¡Oh, más dura que mármol a mis quejas!

En tanto que el lastimado pastor sus dolorosas quejas entonaba, estaban los demás pastores reprehendiendo a Galercio su mal propósito, afeándole el dañado intento que había mostrado. Mas el desesperado mozo a ninguna cosa respondía, de que no poco Maurisa se fatigaba, creyendo que, en dejándole solo, había de poner en ejecución su mal pensamiento. En este medio, Galatea y Florisa, apartándose con Teolinda, le preguntaron qué era la causa de su tornada y si por ventura había sabido ya de su Artidoro; a lo cual ella respondió llorando: -«No sé qué os diga, amigas y señoras mías, sino que el cielo quiso que yo hallase a Artidoro para que enteramente le perdiese; porque habréis de saber que aquella mal considerada y traidora hermana mía, que fue el principio de mi desventura, aquella misma ha sido la ocasión del fin y remate de mi contento; porque, sabiendo ella, así como llegamos con Galercio y Maurisa a su aldea, que Artidoro estaba en una montaña no lejos de allí con su ganado, sin decirme nada, se partió a buscarle. Hallóle, y, fingiendo ser yo -que para sólo este daño ordenó el cielo que nos pareciésemos-, con poca dificultad le dio a entender que la pastora que en nuestra aldea le había desdeñado era una su hermana que en extremo le parecía. En fin, le contó por suyos todos los pasos que yo por él he dado, y los extremos de dolor que he padecido; y, como las entrañas del pastor estaban tan tiernas y enamoradas, con harto menos que la traidora le dijera fuera dél creída, como la creyó, tan en mi perjuicio que, sin aguardar que la Fortuna mezclase en su gusto algún nuevo impedimento, luego en el mismo instante dio la mano a Leonarda de ser un legítimo esposo, creyendo que se la daba a Teolinda. Veis aquí, pastoras, en qué ha parado el fruto de mis lágrimas y suspiros; veis aquí ya arrancada de raíz toda mi esperanza; y lo que más siento es que haya sido por la mano que a sustentarla estaba más obligada. Leonarda goza de Artidoro por el medio del falso engaño que os he contado, y, puesto que ya él lo sabe, aunque debe de haber sentido la burla, hala disimulado, como discreto.

»Llegaron luego al aldea las nuevas de su casamiento, y con ellas las del fin de mi alegría. Súpose también el artificio de mi hermana, la cual dio por disculpa ver que Galercio, a quien tanto ella amaba, por la pastora Gelasia se perdía, y que así le pareció más fácil reducir a su voluntad la enamorada de Artidoro que no la desesperada de Galercio; y que, pues los dos eran uno solo en cuanto a la apariencia y gentileza, que ella se tenía por dichosa y bien afortunada con la compañía de Artidoro. Con esto se disculpa, como he dicho, la enemiga de mi gloria. Y así, yo, por no verla gozar de la que de derecho se me debía, dejé el aldea y la presencia de Artidoro, y, acompañada de las más tristes imaginaciones que imaginar se pueden, venía a daros las nuevas de mi desdicha en compañía de Maurisa, que ansimesmo viene con intención de contaros lo que Grisaldo ha hecho después que supo el hurto de Rosaura. Y esta mañana, al salir del sol, topamos con Galercio, el cual, con tiernas y enamoradas razones, estaba persuadiendo a Gelasia que bien le quisiese; mas ella, con el más estraño desdén y esquivaza que decir se puede, le mandó que se le quitase delante y que no fuese osado de jamás hallarla, y el desdichado pastor, apretado de tan recio mandamiento y de tan estraña crueldad, quiso cumplirle, haciendo lo que habéis visto. Todo esto es lo que por mí ha pasado, amigas mías, después que de vuestra presencia me partí.» Ved ahora si tengo más que llorar que antes, y si se ha augmentado la ocasión para que vosotras os ocupéis en consolarme, si acaso mi mal recibiese consuelo.

No dijo más Teolinda, porque la infinidad de lágrimas que le vinieron a los ojos, y los suspiros que del alma arrancaba, impidieron el oficio a la lengua; y, aunque las de Galatea y Florisa quisieron mostrarse expertas y elocuentes en consolarla, fue de poco efecto su trabajo. Y en el tiempo que entre las pastoras estas razones pasaban, se acabó de enjugar el papel que Tirsi a Galercio del seno sacado había, y deseoso de leerle, le tomó, y vio que desta manera decía:

GALERCIO A GELASIA

¡Ángel de humana figura,
furia con rostro de dama,
fría y encendida llama
donde mi alma se apura!
Escucha las sinrazones, 5
de tu desamor causadas,
de mi alma trasladadas
en estos tristes renglones.
No escribo por ablandarte,
pues con tu dureza estraña 10
no valen ruegos ni maña,
ni servicios tienen parte.
Escríbote porque veas
la sinrazón que me haces,
y cuán mal que satisfaces 15
al valor de que te arreas.
Que alabes la libertad
es muy justo, y razón tienes;

mas mira que la mantienes
sólo con la crueldad; 20
y no es justo lo que ordenas:
querer, sin ser ofendida,
sustentar tu libre vida
con tantas muertes ajenas.
No imagines que es deshonra 25
que te quieran todos bien, ni que está en usar desdén
depositada tu honra.
Antes, templando el rigor
de los agravios que haces, 30
con poco amor satisfaces
y cobras nombre mejor.
Tu crueldad me da a entender
que las sierras te engendraron,

o que los montes formaron 35
tu duro, indomable ser;
que en ellos es tu recreo,
y en los páramos y valles,
do no es posible que halles

quien te enamore el deseo. 40
En una fresca espesura
una vez te vi sentada,
y dije: «Estatua es formada
aquélla de piedra dura».
Y, aunque el moverte después 45
contradijo a mi opinión,
«en fin, en la condición
-dije-, más que estatua es».
¡Y ojalá que estatua fueras
de piedra, que yo esperara 50
qu'el cielo por mí cambiara
tu ser, y en mujer volvieras!
Que Pigmaleón no fue
tanto a la suya rendido,
como yo te soy y he sido, 55
pastora, y siempre seré.
Con razón, y de derecho,
del mal y bien me das pago:
pena por el mal que hago,

gloria por el bien que he hecho. 60
En el modo que me tratas
tal verdad es conocida:
con la vista me das vida,
con la condición me matas.
Dese pecho que se atreve 65
a esquivar de Amor los tiros,
el fuego de mis suspiros
deshaga un poco la nieve.
Concédase al llanto mío,
y al nunca admitir descanso, 70
que vuelva agradable y manso

un solo punto tu brío.
Bien sé que habrás de decir
que me alargo, y yo lo creo;
pero acorta tú el deseo, 75
y acortaré yo el pedir.
Mas, según lo que me das
en cuantas demandas toco,
a ti te importa muy poco
que pida menos o más. 80

Si de tu estraña dureza
pudiera reprehenderte,
y aquella señal ponerte
que muestra nuestra flaqueza,
dijera, viendo tu ser, 85
y no así como se enseña:
«Acuérdate que eres peña,
y en peña te has de volver».
Mas seas peña o acero, duro mármol o diamante, 90
de un acero soy amante,
a una peña adoro y quiero.
Si eres ángel disfrazado,
o furia, que todo es cierto,
por tal ángel vivo muerto, 95
y por tal furia penado.

Mejor le parecieron a Tirsi los versos de Galercio que la condición de Gelasia; y, quiriéndoselos mostrar a Elicio, vio tan mudado de color y de semblante que una imagen de muerto parecía. Llegóse a él, y cuando le quiso preguntar si algún dolor le fatigaba, no fue menester esperar su respuesta para entender la causa de su pena, porque luego oyó publicar entre todos los que allí estaban cómo los dos pastores que a Galercio socorrieron eran amigos del pastor lusitano con quien el venerable Aurelio tenía concertado de casar a Galatea, los cuales venían a decirle cómo de allí a tres días el venturoso pastor vendría a su aldea a concluir el felicísimo desposorio, y luego vio Tirsi que estas nuevas más nuevos y estraños accidentes de los causados habían de causar en el alma de Elicio.

Pero, con todo esto, se llegó a él y le dijo: -Ahora es menester, buen amigo, que te sepas valer de la discreción que tienes, pues en el peligro mayor se muestran los corazones valerosos; y asegúrote que no sé quién a mí me asegura que ha de tener mejor fin este negocio de lo que tú piensas. Disimula y calla, que si la voluntad de Galatea no gusta de corresponder de todo en todo a la de su padre, tú satisfacerás la tuya, aprovechándote de las nuestras, y aun de todo el favor que te puedan ofrescer cuantos pastores hay en las riberas deste río y en las del manso Henares, el cual favor yo te ofrezco, que bien imagino que el deseo que todos han conocido que yo tengo de servirles, les obligará a hacer que no salga en vano lo que aquí te prometo.

Suspenso quedó Elicio viendo el gallardo y verdadero ofrescimiento de Tirsi, y no supo ni pudo responderle más que abrazarle estrechamente y decirle: -El cielo te pague, discreto Tirsi, el consuelo que me has dado, con el cual, y con la voluntad de Galatea, que, a lo que creo, no discrepará de la nuestra, sin duda entiendo que tan notorio agravio como el que se hace a todas estas riberas en desterrar dellas la rara hermosura de Galatea, no pase adelante.

Y, tornándole a abrazar, tornó a su rostro la color perdida. Pero no tornó al de Galatea, a quien fue oír la embajada de los pastores como si oyera la sentencia de su muerte. Todo lo notaba Elicio y no lo podía disimular Erastro, ni menos la discreta Florisa, ni aun fue gustosa la nueva a ninguno de cuantos allí estaban. A esta sazón, ya el sol declinaba a su acostumbrada carrera, y, así por esto como por ver que el enamorado Lenio había seguido a Gelasia, y que allí no quedaba otra cosa que hacer, trayendo a Galercio y a Maurisa consigo, toda aquella compañía movió los pasos hacia el aldea, y, al llegar junto a ella, Elicio y Erastro se quedaron en sus cabañas, y con ellos Tirsi, Damón, Orompo, Crisio, Marsilo, Arsindo y Orfinio se quedaron, con otros algunos pastores; y de todos ellos, con corteses palabras y ofrescimientos, se despidieron los venturosos Timbrio, Silerio, Nísida y Blanca, diciéndoles que otro día se pensaban partir a la ciudad de Toledo, donde había de ser el fin de su viaje; y, abrazando a todos los que con Elicio quedaban, se fueron con Aurelio, con el cual iban Florisa, Teolinda y Maurisa, y la triste Galatea, tan congojada y pensativa que, con toda su discreción, no podía dejar de dar muestras de estraño descontento. Con Daranio se fueron su esposa Silveria y la hermosa Belisa. Cerró en esto la noche y parecióle a Elicio que con ella se le cerraban todos los caminos de su gusto; y si no fuera por agasajar con buen semblante a los huéspedes que tenía aquella noche en su cabaña, él la pasara tan mala que desesperara de ver el día. La misma pena pasaba el mísero Erastro, aunque con más alivio, porque sin tener respecto a nadie, con altas voces y lastimeras palabras maldecía su ventura y la acelerada determinación de Aurelio.

Estando en esto, ya que los pastores habían satisfecho a la hambre con algunos rústicos manjares, y algunos dellos entregádose en los brazos del reposado sueño, llegó a la cabaña de Elicio la hermosa Maurisa; y, hallando a Elicio a la puerta de su cabaña, le apartó y le dio un papel, diciéndole que era de Galatea, y que le leyese luego, que, pues ella a tal hora le traía, entendiese que era de importancia lo que en él debía de venir. Admirado el pastor de la venida de Maurisa, y más de ver en sus manos papel de su pastora, no pudo sosegar un punto hasta leerle. Y, entrándose en su cabaña, a la luz de una raja de teoso pino, le leyó, y vio que así decía:

GALATEA A ELICIO

En la apresurada determinación de mi padre está la que yo he tomado de escribirte, y en la fuerza que me hace la que a mí mesma me he hecho hasta llegar a este punto. Bien sabes en el que estoy, y sé yo bien que quisiera verme en otro mejor, para pagarte algo de lo mucho que conozco que te debo; mas, si el cielo quiere que yo quede con esta deuda, quéjate dél, y no de la voluntad mía. La de mi padre quisiera mudar, si fuera posible, pero veo que no lo es; y así, no lo intento. Si algún remedio por allá imaginas, como en él no intervengan ruegos, ponle en efecto, con el miramiento que a tu crédito debes y a mi honra estás obligado. El que me dan por esposo, y el que me ha de dar sepultura, viene pasado mañana: poco tiempo te queda para aconsejarte, aunque a mí me quedará harto para arrepentirme. No digo más, sino que Maurisa es fiel y yo desdichada.

En estraña confusión pusieron a Elicio las razones de la carta de Galatea, pareciéndole cosa nueva, así el escribirle, pues hasta entonces jamás lo había hecho, como el mandarle buscar remedio a la sinrazón que se le hacía; mas, pasando por todas estas cosas, sólo paró en imaginar cómo cumpliría lo que le era mandado, aunque en ello aventurase mil vidas si tantas tuviera. Y, no ofreciéndosele otro algún remedio sino el que de sus amigos esperaba, confiado en ellos, se atrevió a responder a Galatea con una carta que dio a Maurisa, la cual desta manera decía:

ELICIO A GALATEA

Si las fuerzas de mi poder llegaran al deseo que tengo de serviros, hermosa Galatea, ni la que vuestro padre os hace, ni las mayores del mundo, fueran parte para ofenderos; pero, comoquiera que ello sea, vos veréis ahora, si la sinrazón pasa adelante, cómo yo no me quedo atrás en hacer vuestro mandamiento por la vía mejor que el caso pidiere. Asegúeos esto la fe que de mí tenéis conocida, y haced buen rostro a la fortuna presente, confiada en la bonanza venidera; que el cielo, que os ha movido a acordaros de mí y a escribirme, me dará valor para mostrar que en algo merezco la merced que me habéis hecho; que, como sea obedeceros, ni recelo ni temor serán parte para que yo no ponga en efecto lo que a vuestro gusto conviene y al mío tanto importa. No más, pues lo más que en esto ha de haber sabréis de Maurisa, a quien yo he dado cuenta dello; y si vuestro parecer con el mío no se conforma, sea yo avisado, porque el tiempo no se pase, y con él la sazón de nuestra ventura, la cual os dé el cielo como puede y como vuestro valor meresce.

Dada esta carta a Maurisa, como está dicho, le dijo asimesmo cómo él pensaba juntar todos los más pastores que pudiese, y que todos juntos irían a hablar al padre de Galatea, pidiéndole por merced señalada fuese servido de no desterrar de aquellos prados la sin par hermosura suya; y, cuando esto no bastase, pensaba poner tales inconvenientes y miedos al lusitano pastor, que él mismo dijese no ser contento de lo concertado; y, cuando los ruegos y astucias no fuesen de provecho alguno, determinaba usar la fuerza y con ella ponerla en su libertad; y esto con el miramiento de su crédito que se podía esperar de quien tanto la amaba. Con esta resolución se fue Maurisa, y esta mesma tomaron luego todos los pastores que con Elicio estaban, a quien él dio cuenta de sus pensamientos y pidió favor y consejo en tan árduo caso. Luego Tirsi y Damón se ofrescieron de ser aquéllos que al padre de Galatea hablarían. Lauso, Arsindo y Erastro, con los cuatro amigos, Orompo, Marsilo, Crisio y Orfinio, prometieron de buscar y juntar para el día siguiente sus amigos, y poner en obra con ellos cualquiera cosa que por Elicio les fuese mandada.

En tratar lo que más al caso convenía y en tomar este apuntamiento, se pasó lo más de aquella noche, y, la mañana venida, todos los pastores se partieron a cumplir lo que prometido habían, si no fueron Tirsi y Damón, que con Elicio se quedaron. Y aquél mismo día tornó a venir Maurisa a decir a Elicio cómo Galatea estaba determinada de seguir en todo su parecer. Despidióla Elicio con nuevas promesas y confianzas, y con alegre semblante y estraño alborozo estaba esperando el siguiente día, por ver la buena o mala salida que la fortuna daba a su hecho. Llegó en esto la noche, y, recogándose con Damón y Tirsi a su cabaña, casi todo el tiempo della pasaron en tantear y advertir las dificultades que en aquel negocio podían suceder, si acaso no movían a Aurelio las razones que Tirsi pensaba decirle. Mas Elicio, por dar lugar a los pastores que reposasen, se salió de su cabaña y se subió en una verde cuesta que frontero de ella se levantaba; y allí, con el aparejo de la soledad, revolvía en su memoria todo lo que por Galatea había padecido y lo que temía padecer si el cielo a sus intentos no favorecía. Y, sin salir desta imaginación, al son de un blando céfiro que mansamente soplaba, con voz suave y baja, comenzó a cantar desta manera:

ELICIO

Si deste herviente mar y golfo insano, donde tanto amenaza la tormenta, libro la vida de tan dura afrenta
y toco el suelo venturoso y sano,

al aire alzadas una y otra mano, 5
con alma humilde y voluntad contenta, haré que amor conozca, el cielo sienta, qu'el bien les agradezco soberano.

Llamaré venturosos mis suspiros,
mis lágrimas tendré por agradables, 10
por refrigerio el fuego en que me quemo.

Diré que son de Amor los recios tiros dulces al alma, al cuerpo saludables, y que en su bien no hay medio, sino extremo.

Cuando Elicio acabó su canto, comenzaba a descubrirse por las orientales puertas la fresca aurora con sus hermosas y variadas mejillas, alegrando el suelo, aljofarando las yerbas y pintando los prados, cuya deseada venida comenzaron luego a saludar las parleras aves con mil suertes de concertadas cantilenas. Levantóse en esto Elicio, y tendió los ojos por la espaciosa campaña; descubrió no lejos dos escuadras de pastores, los cuales, según le pareció, hacia su cabaña se encaminaban, como era la verdad, porque luego conoció que eran sus amigos Arsindo y Lauso, con otros que consigo traían, y los otros, Orompo, Marsilo, Crisio y Orfinio, con todos los más amigos que juntar pudieron. Conocidos, pues, de Elicio, bajó de la cuesta para ir a recibirlos; y, cuando ellos llegaron junto de la cabaña, ya estaban fuera della Tirsi y Damón, que a buscar a Elicio iban. Llegaron en esto todos los pastores, y con alegre semblante unos a otros se rescibieron. Y luego Lauso, volviéndose a Elicio, le dijo: -En la compañía que traemos puedes ver, amigo Elicio, si comenzamos a dar muestras de querer cumplir la palabra que te dimos. Todos los que aquí vees vienen con deseo de servirte, aunque en ello aventuren las vidas; lo que falta es que tú no la hagas en lo que más conviniere.

Elicio, con las mejores razones que supo, agradeció a Lauso y a los demás la merced que le hacían, y luego les contó todo lo que con Tirsi y Damón estaba concertado de hacerse para salir bien con aquella empresa. Parecióles bien a los pastores lo que Elicio decía; y así, sin más detenerse, hacia el aldea se encaminaron, yendo delante Tirsi y Damón, siguiéndoles todos los demás, que hasta veinte pastores serían, los más gallardos y bien dispuestos que en todas las riberas de Tajo hallarse pudieran, y todos llevaban intención de que, si las razones de Tirsi no movían a que Aurelio la hiciese en lo que le pedían, de usar en su lugar la fuerza y no consentir que Galatea al forastero pastor se entregase, de que iba tan contento Erastro, como si el buen suceso de aquella demanda en sólo su contento de redundar hubiera; porque, a trueco de no ver a Galatea ausente y descontenta, tenía por bien empleado que Elicio la alcanzase, como lo imaginaba, pues tanto Galatea le había de quedar obligada.

El fin deste amoroso cuento y historia, con los sucesos de Galercio, Lenio y Gelasia, Arsindo y Maurisa, Grisaldo, Artandro y Rosaura, Marsilo y Belisa, con otras cosas sucedidas a los pastores hasta aquí nombrados, en la segunda parte desta historia se prometen, la cual, si con apacibles voluntades esta primera viere rescibida, tendrá atrevimiento de salir con brevedad a ser vista y juzgada de los ojos y entendimiento de las gentes.

FIN

EL INGENIOSO HIDALGO DON QUIJOTE DE LA MANCHA

ÍNDICE

Prólogo
Capítulo primero
Capítulo II
Capítulo III
Capítulo IV
Capítulo V
Capítulo VI
Capítulo VII
Capítulo VIII
Capítulo IX
Capítulo X
Capítulo XI
Capítulo XII
Capítulo XIII
Capítulo XIV
Capítulo XV
Capítulo XVI
Capítulo XVII
Capítulo XVIII
Capítulo XIX
Capítulo XX
Capítulo XXI
Capítulo XXII
Capítulo XXIII
Capítulo XXIV
Capítulo XXV
Capítulo XXVI
Capítulo XXVII
Capítulo XXVIII
Capítulo XXIX
Capítulo XXX
Capítulo XXXI
Capítulo XXXII
Capítulo XXXIII

Capítulo XXXIV
Capítulo XXXV
Capítulo XXXVI
Capítulo XXXVII
Capítulo XXXVIII
Capítulo XXXIX
Capítulo XL
Capítulo XLI
Capítulo XLII
Capítulo XLIII
Capítulo XLIV
Capítulo XLV
Capítulo XLVI
Capítulo XLVII
Capítulo XLVIII
Capítulo XLIX
Capítulo L
Capítulo LI
Capítulo LII

Tasa

Yo, Juan Gallo de Andrada, escribano de Cámara del Rey nuestro señor, de los que residen en su Consejo, certifico y doy fe que, habiendo visto por los señores dél un libro intitulado El ingenioso hidalgo de la Mancha, compuesto por Miguel de Cervantes Saavedra, tasaron cada pliego del dicho libro a tres maravedís y medio; el cual tiene ochenta y tres pliegos, que al dicho precio monta el dicho libro docientos y noventa maravedís y medio, en que se ha de vender en papel; y dieron licencia para que a este precio se pueda vender, y mandaron que esta tasa se ponga al principio del dicho libro, y no se pueda vender sin ella. Y para que dello conste, di la presente en Valladolid, a veinte días del mes de diciembre de mil y seiscientos y cuatro años.

Juan Gallo de Andrada.

Testimonio de las erratas

Este libro no tiene cosa digna que no corresponda a su original; en testimonio de lo haber correcto, di esta FEE. En el Colegio de la Madre de Dios de los Teólogos de la Universidad de Alcalá, en primero de diciembre de 1604 años.

El licenciado Francisco Murcia de la Llana.

El rey

Por cuanto por parte de vos, Miguel de Cervantes, nos fue fecha relación que habíades compuesto un libro intitulado El ingenioso hidalgo de la Mancha, el cual os había costado mucho trabajo y era muy útil y provechoso, nos pedistes y suplicastes os mandásemos dar licencia y facultad para le poder imprimir, y privilegio por el tiempo que fuésemos servidos, o como la nuestra merced fuese; lo cual visto por los del nuestro Consejo, por cuanto en el dicho libro se hicieron las diligencias que la premática últimamente por nos fecha sobre la impresión de los libros dispone, fue acordado que debíamos mandar dar esta nuestra cédula para vos, en la dicha razón; y nos tuvimoslo por bien. Por la cual, por os hacer bien y merced, os damos licencia y facultad para que vos, o la persona que vuestro poder hubiere, y no otra alguna, podáis imprimir el dicho libro, intitulado El ingenioso hidalgo de la Mancha, que desuso se hace mención, en todos estos nuestros reinos de Castilla, por tiempo y espacio de diez años, que corran y se cuenten desde el dicho día de la data desta nuestra cédula; so pena que la persona o personas que, sin tener vuestro poder, lo imprimiere o vendiere, o hiciere imprimir o vender, por el mesmo caso pierda la impresión que hiciere, con los moldes y aparejos della; y más, incurra en pena de cincuenta mil maravedís cada vez que lo contrario hiciere. La cual dicha pena sea la tercia parte para la persona que lo acusare, y la otra tercia parte para nuestra Cámara, y la otra tercia parte para el juez que lo sentenciare. Con tanto que todas las veces que hubiéredes de hacer imprimir el dicho libro, durante el tiempo de los dichos diez años, le traigáis al nuestro Consejo, juntamente con el original que en él fue visto, que va rubricado cada plana y firmado al fin dél de Juan Gallo de Andrada, nuestro escribano de Cámara, de los que en él residen, para saber si la dicha impresión está conforme el original; o traigáis fe en pública forma de cómo por corretor nombrado por nuestro mandado, se vio y corrigió la dicha impresión por el original, y se imprimió conforme a él, y quedan impresas las erratas por él apuntadas, para cada un libro de los que así fueren impresos, para que se tase el precio que por cada volumen hubiéredes de haber. Y mandamos al impresor que así imprimiere el dicho libro, no imprima el principio ni el primer pliego dél, ni entregue más de un solo libro con el original al autor, o persona a cuya costa lo imprimiere, ni otro alguno, para efeto de la dicha corrección y tasa, hasta que antes y primero el dicho libro esté corregido y tasado por los del nuestro Consejo; y, estando hecho, y no de otra manera, pueda imprimir el dicho principio y primer pliego, y sucesivamente ponga esta nuestra cédula y la aprobación, tasa y erratas, so pena de caer e incurrir en las penas contenidas en las leyes y premáticas destos nuestros reinos. Y mandamos a los del nuestro Consejo, y a otras cualesquier justicias dellos, guarden y cumplan esta nuestra cédula y lo en ella contenido. Fecha en Valladolid, a veinte y seis días del mes de setiembre de mil y seiscientos y cuatro años.

YO, EL REY.

Por mandado del rey nuestro señor: Juan de Amezqueta.

Al duque de Béjar,
marqués de Gibraleón, conde de Benalcázar y Bañares, vizconde de La Puebla de Alcocer, señor de las villas de Capilla, Curiel y Burguillos

En fe del buen acogimiento y honra que hace Vuestra Excelencia a toda suerte de libros, como príncipe tan inclinado a favorecer las buenas artes, mayormente las que por su nobleza no se abaten al servicio y granjerías del vulgo, he determinado de sacar a luz al Ingenioso hidalgo don Quijote de la Mancha, al abrigo del clarísimo nombre de Vuestra Excelencia, a quien, con el acatamiento que debo a tanta grandeza, suplico le reciba agradablemente en su protección, para que a su sombra, aunque desnudo de aquel precioso ornamento de elegancia y erudición de que suelen andar vestidas las obras que se componen en las casas de los hombres que saben, ose parecer seguramente en el juicio de algunos que, contiéndose en los límites de su ignorancia, suelen condenar con más rigor y menos justicia los trabajos ajenos; que, poniendo los ojos la prudencia de Vuestra Excelencia en mi buen deseo, fío que no desdeñará la cortedad de tan humilde servicio.

Miguel de Cervantes Saavedra.

Prólogo

Desocupado lector: sin juramento me podrás creer que quisiera que este libro, como hijo del entendimiento, fuera el más hermoso, el más gallardo y más discreto que pudiera imaginarse. Pero no he podido yo contravenir al orden de naturaleza; que en ella cada cosa engendra su semejante. Y así, ¿qué podrá engendrar el estéril y mal cultivado ingenio mío, sino la historia de un hijo seco, avellanado, antojadizo y lleno de pensamientos varios y nunca imaginados de otro alguno, bien como quien se engendró en una cárcel, donde toda incomodidad tiene su asiento y donde todo triste ruido hace su habitación? El sosiego, el lugar apacible, la amenidad de los campos, la serenidad de los cielos, el murmurar de las fuentes, la quietud del espíritu son grande parte para que las musas más estériles se muestren fecundas y ofrezcan partos al mundo que le colmen de maravilla y de contento. Acontece tener un padre un hijo feo y sin gracia alguna, y el amor que le tiene le pone una venda en los ojos para que no vea sus faltas, antes las juzga por discreciones y lindezas y las cuenta a sus amigos por agudezas y donaires. Pero yo, que, aunque parezco padre, soy padraastro de Don Quijote, no quiero irme con la corriente del uso, ni suplicarte, casi con las lágrimas en los ojos, como otros hacen, lector carísimo, que perdones o disimules las faltas que en este mi hijo vieres; y ni eres su pariente ni su amigo, y tienes tu alma en tu cuerpo y tu libre albedrío como el más pintado, y estás en tu casa, donde eres señor della, como el rey de sus alcabalas, y sabes lo que comúnmente se dice: que debajo de mi manto, al rey mato. Todo lo cual te esenta y hace libre de todo respecto y obligación; y así, puedes decir de la historia todo aquello que te pareciere, sin temor que te calunien por el mal ni te premien por el bien que dijeres della.

Sólo quisiera dártela monda y desnuda, sin el ornato de prólogo, ni de la innumerabilidad y catálogo de los acostumbrados sonetos, epigramas y elogios que al principio de los libros suelen ponerse. Porque te sé decir que, aunque me costó algún trabajo componerla, ninguno tuve por mayor que hacer esta prefación que vas leyendo. Muchas veces tomé la pluma para escribille y muchas la dejé, por no saber lo que escribiría; y, estando una suspenso, con el papel delante, la pluma en la oreja, el codo en el bufete y la mano en la mejilla, pensando lo que diría, entró a deshora un amigo mío, gracioso y bien entendido, el cual, viéndome tan imaginativo, me preguntó la causa; y, no encubriéndosela yo, le dije que pensaba en el prólogo que había de hacer a la historia de don Quijote, y que me tenía de suerte que ni quería hacerle, ni menos sacar a luz las hazañas de tan noble caballero.

-Porque, ¿cómo queréis vos que no me tenga confuso el qué dirá el antiguo legislador que llaman vulgo cuando vea que, al cabo de tantos años como ha que duermo en el silencio del olvido, salgo ahora, con todos mis años auestas, con una leyenda seca como un esparto, ajena de invención, menguada de estilo, pobre de concetos y falta de toda erudición y doctrina; sin acotaciones en las márgenes y sin anotaciones en el fin del libro, como veo que están otros libros, aunque sean fabulosos y profanos, tan llenos de sentencias de Aristóteles, de Platón y de toda la caterva de filósofos, que admiran a los leyentes y tienen a sus autores por hombres leídos, eruditos y elocuentes? Pues ¿qué, cuando citan la Divina Escritura? No dirán sino que son unos santos Tomases y otros doctores de la Iglesia; guardando en esto un decoro tan ingenioso, que en un renglón han pintado un enamorado distraído y en otro hacen un sermoncico cristiano, que es un contento y un regalo oírle o leelle. De todo esto ha de carecer mi libro, porque ni tengo qué acotar en el margen, ni qué anotar en el fin, ni menos sé qué autores sigo en él, para ponerlos al principio, como hacen todos, por las letras del A B C, comenzando en Aristóteles y acabando en Xenofonte y en Zoílo o Zeuxis, aunque fue maldiciente el uno y pintor el otro. También ha de carecer mi libro de sonetos al principio, a lo menos de sonetos cuyos autores sean duques, marqueses, condes, obispos, damas o poetas celebérrimos; aunque, si yo los pidiese a dos o tres oficiales amigos, yo sé que me los darían, y tales, que no les igualasen los de aquellos que tienen más nombre en nuestra España. En fin, señor y amigo mío -proseguí-, yo determino que el señor don Quijote se quede sepultado en sus archivos en la Mancha, hasta que el cielo depare quien le adorne de tantas cosas como le faltan; porque yo me hallo incapaz de remediarlas, por mi insuficiencia y pocas letras, y porque naturalmente soy poltrón y perezoso de andarme buscando autores que digan lo que yo me sé decir sin ellos. De aquí nace la suspensión y elevamiento, amigo, en que me hallastes; bastante causa para ponerme en ella la que de mí habéis oído.

Oyendo lo cual mi amigo, dándose una palmada en la frente y disparando en una carga de risa, me dijo: -Por Dios, hermano, que agora me acabo de desengañar de un engaño en que he estado todo el mucho tiempo que ha que os conozco, en el cual siempre os he tenido por discreto y prudente en todas vuestras acciones. Pero agora veo que estáis tan lejos de serlo como lo está el cielo de la tierra. ¿Cómo que es posible que cosas de tan poco momento y tan fáciles de remediar puedan tener fuerzas de suspender y absortar un ingenio tan maduro como el vuestro, y tan hecho a romper y atropellar por otras dificultades mayores? A la fe, esto no nace de falta de habilidad, sino de sobra de pereza y penuria de discurso. ¿Queréis ver si es verdad lo que digo? Pues estadme atento y veréis cómo, en un abrir y cerrar de ojos, confundo todas vuestras dificultades y remedio todas las faltas que decís que os suspenden y acobardan para dejar de sacar a la luz del mundo la historia de vuestro famoso don Quijote, luz y espejo de toda la caballería andante.

-Decid -le repliqué yo, oyendo lo que me decía-: ¿de qué modo pensáis llenar el vacío de mi temor y reducir a claridad el caos de mi confusión?

A lo cual él dijo:

-Lo primero en que reparáis de los sonetos, epigramas o elogios que os faltan para el principio, y que sean de personajes graves y de título, se puede remediar en que vos mismo toméis algún trabajo en hacerlos, y después los podéis bautizar y poner el nombre que quisiéredes, ahijándolos al Preste Juan de las Indias o al Emperador de Trapisonda, de quien yo sé que hay noticia que fueron famosos poetas; y cuando no lo hayan sido y hubiere algunos pedantes y bachilleres que por detrás os muerdan y murmuren desta verdad, no se os dé dos maravedís; porque, ya que os averigüen la mentira, no os han de cortar la mano con que lo escribistes.

»En lo de citar en las márgenes los libros y autores de donde sacáredes las sentencias y dichos que pusiéredes en vuestra historia, no hay más sino hacer, de manera que venga a pelo, algunas sentencias o latines que vos sepáis de memoria, o, a lo menos, que os cuesten poco trabajo el buscalles; como será poner, tratando de libertad y cautiverio: Non bene pro toto libertas venditur auro.

Y luego, en el margen, citar a Horacio o a quien lo dijo. Si tratáredes del poder de la muerte, acudir luego con:

Pallida mors aequo pulsat pede pauperum tabernas, regumque turres.

Si de la amistad y amor que Dios manda que se tenga al enemigo, entraros luego al punto por la Escritura Divina, que lo podéis hacer con tantico de curiosidad, y decir las palabras, por lo menos, del mismo Dios: Ego autem dico vobis: diligite inimicos vestros. Si tratáredes de malos pensamientos, acudir con el Evangelio: De corde exeunt cogitationes malae. Si de la inestabilidad de los amigos, ahí está Catón, que os dará su dístico: Donec eris felix, multos numerabis amicos, tempora si fuerint nubila, solus eris.

Y con estos latinicos y otros tales os tendrán siquiera por gramático, que el serlo no es de poca honra y provecho el día de hoy.

»En lo que toca el poner anotaciones al fin del libro, seguramente lo podéis hacer desta manera: si nombráis algún gigante en vuestro libro, hacelde que sea el gigante Golías, y con sólo esto, que os costará casi nada, tenéis una grande anotación, pues podéis poner: “El gigante Golías, o Goliath, fue un filisteo a quien el pastor David mató de una gran pedrada en el valle de Terebinto, según se cuenta en el Libro de los Reyes, en el capítulo que vos halláredes que se escribe”. Tras esto, para mostraros hombre erudito en letras humanas y cosmógrafo, haced de modo como en vuestra historia se nombre el río Tajo, y veréis luego con otra famosa anotación, poniendo: “El río Tajo fue así dicho por un rey de las Españas; tiene su nacimiento en tal lugar y muere en el mar océano, besando los muros de la famosa ciudad de Lisboa; y es opinión que tiene las arenas de oro, etc.”. Si tratáredes de ladrones, yo os diré la historia de Caco, que la sé de coro; si de mujeres ramera, ahí está el obispo de Mondoñedo, que os prestará a Lamia, Laida y Flora, cuya anotación os dará gran crédito; si de crueles, Ovidio os entregará a Medea; si de encantadores y hechiceras, Homero tiene a Calipso, y Virgilio a Circe; si de capitanes valerosos, el mesmo Julio César os prestará a sí mismo en sus Comentarios, y Plutarco os dará mil Alejandro. Si tratáredes de amores, con dos onzas que sepáis de la lengua toscana, toparáis con León Hebreo, que os hincha las medidas. Y si no queréis andaros por tierras extrañas, en vuestra casa tenéis a Fonseca, Del amor de Dios, donde se cifra todo lo que vos y el más ingenioso acertare a desear en tal materia. En resolución, no hay más sino que vos procuréis nombrar estos nombres, o tocar estas historias en la vuestra, que aquí he dicho, y dejadme a mí el cargo de poner las anotaciones y acotaciones; que yo os voto a tal de llenaros las márgenes y de gastar cuatro pliegos en el fin del libro.

»Vengamos ahora a la citación de los autores que los otros libros tienen, que en el vuestro os faltan. El remedio que esto tiene es muy fácil, porque no habéis de hacer otra cosa que buscar un libro que los acote todos, desde la A hasta la Z, como vos decís. Pues ese mismo abecedario pondréis vos en vuestro libro; que, puesto que a la clara se vea la mentira, por la poca necesidad que vos teníades de aprovecharos dellos, no importa nada; y quizá alguno habrá tan simple, que crea que de todos os habéis aprovechado en la simple y sencilla historia vuestra; y, cuando no sirva de otra cosa, por lo menos servirá aquel largo catálogo de autores a dar de improviso autoridad al libro. Y más, que no habrá quien se ponga a averiguar si los seguistes o no los seguistes, no yéndole nada en ello. Cuanto más que, si bien caigo en la cuenta, este vuestro libro no tiene necesidad de ninguna cosa de aquellas que vos decís que le falta, porque todo él es una invectiva contra los libros de caballerías, de quien nunca se acordó Aristóteles, ni dijo nada San Basilio, ni alcanzó Cicerón; ni caen debajo de la cuenta de sus fabulosos disparates las puntualidades de la verdad, ni las observaciones de la astrología; ni le son de importancia las medidas geométricas, ni la confutación de los argumentos de quien se sirve la retórica; ni tiene para qué predicar a ninguno, mezclando lo humano con lo divino, que es un género de mezcla de quien no se ha de vestir ningún cristiano entendimiento. Sólo tiene que aprovecharse de la imitación en lo que fuere escribiendo; que, cuanto ella fuere más perfecta, tanto mejor será lo que se escribiere. Y, pues esta vuestra escritura no mira a más que a deshacer la autoridad y cabida que en el mundo y en el vulgo tienen los libros de caballerías, no hay para qué andéis mendigando sentencias de filósofos, consejos de la Divina Escritura, fábulas de poetas, oraciones de retóricos, milagros de santos, sino procurar que a la llana, con palabras significantes, honestas y bien colocadas, salga vuestra oración y período sonoro y festivo; pintando, en todo lo que alcanzáredes y fuere posible, vuestra intención, dando a entender vuestros conceptos sin intricarlos y escurecerlos. Procurad también que, leyendo vuestra historia, el melancólico se mueva a risa, el risueño la acreciente, el simple no se enfade, el discreto se admire de la invención, el grave no la desprecie, ni el prudente deje de alabarla. En efecto, llevad la mira puesta a derribar la máquina mal fundada destos caballerescos libros, aborrecidos de tantos y alabados de muchos más; que si esto alcanzádes, no habríades alcanzado poco.

Con silencio grande estuve escuchando lo que mi amigo me decía, y de tal manera se imprimieron en mí sus razones que, sin ponerlas en disputa, las aprobé por buenas y de ellas mismas quise hacer este prólogo; en el cual verás, lector suave, la discreción de mi amigo, la buena ventura mía en hallar en tiempo tan necesitado tal consejero, y el alivio tuyo en hallar tan sincera y tan sin revueltas la historia del famoso don Quijote de la Mancha, de quien hay opinión, por todos los habitantes del distrito del campo de Montiel, que fue el más casto enamorado y el más valiente caballero que de muchos años a esta parte se vio en aquellos contornos. Yo no quiero encarecerte el servicio que te hago en darte a conocer tan noble y tan honrado caballero, pero quiero que me agradezcas el conocimiento que tendrás del famoso Sancho Panza, su escudero, en quien, a mi parecer, te doy cifradas todas las gracias escuderiles que en la caterva de los libros vanos de caballerías están esparcidas.

Y con esto, Dios te dé salud y a mí no olvide.

Vale

Al libro de don Quijote de la Mancha, Urganda la desconocida Si de llegarte a los bue-, libro, fueres con letu-,

no te dirá el boquirru—
que no pones bien los de-.
Mas si el pan no se te cue- 5
por ir a manos de idio-,
verás de manos a bo-,
aun no dar una en el cla-,
si bien se comen las ma—
por mostrar que son curio-. 10

Y, pues la espiriencia ense—
que el que a buen árbol se arri—buena sombra le cobi-,
en Béjar tu buena estre—
un árbol real te ofre- 15
que da príncipes por fru-,
en el cual floreció un duque es nuevo Alejandro Ma-:
llega a su sombra, que a osa—
favorece la fortu-. 20

De un noble hidalgo manche—
contarás las aventu-,
a quien ociosas letu-,
trastornaron la cabe-:
damas, armas, caballe-, 25
le provocaron de mo-,
que, cual Orlando furio-,
templado a lo enamora-,

alcanzó a fuerza de bra—
a Dulcinea del Tobo-. 30

No indiscretos hieroglíestampes en el escu-,
que, cuando es todo figu-,
con ruines puntos se envi-.
Si en la dirección te humi-, 35
no dirá, mofante, algu-:
«¡Qué don Álvaro de Lu-, qué Aníbal el de Carta-,

qué rey Francisco en Espa—
se queja de la Fortu-!» 40

Pues al cielo no le plu—
que salieses tan ladi—
como el negro Juan Lati-, hablar latines rehú-.
No me despuntes de agu-, 45
ni me alegues con filó-,
porque, torciendo la bo-,
dirá el que entiende la le-,
no un palmo de las ore-:
«¿Para qué conmigo flo-?» 50

No te metas en dibu-,
ni en saber vidas aje-,
que, en lo que no va ni vie-,
pasar de largo es cordu-,
que suelen en caperu- 55
darles a los que grace-;
mas tú quémate las cesólo en cobrar buena fa-;
que el que imprime neceda—
dalas a censo perpe-. 60

Advierte que es desati-,

siendo de vidrio el teja-,
tomar piedras en las ma—
para tirar al veci-.
Deja que el hombre de jui-, 65
en las obras que compo-, se vaya con pies de plo-;
que el que saca a luz pape—
para entretener donce—
escribe a tontas y a lo-. 70

Amadís de Gaula a don Quijote de la Mancha

Soneto

Tú, que imitaste la llorosa vida que tuve, ausente y desdeñado sobre
el gran ribazo de la Peña Pobre,
de alegre a penitencia reducida;

tú, a quien los ojos dieron la bebida 5
de abundante licor, aunque salobre,
y alzándote la plata, estaño y cobre,
te dio la tierra en tierra la comida,

vive seguro de que eternamente,
en tanto, al menos, que en la cuarta esfera, 10
sus caballos aguije el rubio Apolo,

tendrás claro renombre de valiente;
tu patria será en todas la primera;
tu sabio autor, al mundo único y solo.

Don Belianís de Grecia a don Quijote de la Mancha

Soneto

Rompí, corté, abollé, y dije y hice
más que en el orbe caballero andante;
fui diestro, fui valiente, fui arrogante;
mil agravios vengué, cien mil deshice.

Hazañas di a la Fama que eternice; 5
fui comedido y regalado amante;
fue enano para mí todo gigante,
y al duelo en cualquier punto satisface.

Tuve a mis pies postrada la Fortuna,
y trajo del copete mi cordura 10
a la calva Ocasión al estricote.

Más, aunque sobre el cuerno de la luna
siempre se vio encumbrada mi ventura,
tus proezas envidio, ¡oh gran Quijote!

La señora Oriana a Dulcinea del Toboso

Soneto

¡Oh, quién tuviera, hermosa Dulcinea, por más comodidad y más reposo,
a Miraflores puesto en el Toboso,
y trocara sus Londres con tu aldea!

¡Oh, quién de tus deseos y librea 5
alma y cuerpo adornara, y del famoso
caballero que hiciste venturoso
mirara alguna desigual pelea!

¡Oh, quién tan castamente se escapara
del señor Amadís como tú hiciste 10
del comedido hidalgo don Quijote!

Que así envidiada fuera, y no envidiara,
y fuera alegre el tiempo que fue triste,
y gozara los gustos sin escote.

Gandalín, escudero de Amadís de Gaula, a Sancho Panza, escudero de don Quijote

Soneto

Salve, varón famoso, a quien Fortuna,
cuando en el trato escuderil te puso,
tan blanda y cuerdamente lo dispuso,
que lo pasaste sin desgracia alguna.

Ya la azada o la hoz poco repugna 5

al andante ejercicio; ya está en uso
la llaneza escudera, con que acuso
al soberbio que intenta hollar la luna.

Envidia a tu jumento y a tu nombre,
y a tus alforjas igualmente invidia, 10
que mostraron tu cuerda providencia.

Salve otra vez, ¡oh Sancho!, tan buen hombre, que a solo tú nuestro español Ovidio
con buzcorona te hace reverencia.

Del Donoso, poeta entreverado, a Sancho Panza y Rocinante Soy Sancho Panza, escude—
del manchego don Quijo-.
Puse pies en polvoro-,
por vivir a lo discre-;

que el tácito Villadie- 5
toda su razón de esta—
cifró en una retira-,
según siente Celesti-, libro, en mi opinión, divi—
si encubriera más lo huma-. 10

A Rocinante

Soy Rocinante, el famo-, bisnieto del gran Babie-.
Por pecados de flaque-,
fui a poder de un don Quijo-.
Parejas corrí a lo flo-; 15
mas, por uña de caba-,
no se me escapó ceba-;
que esto saqué a Lazari—
cuando, para hurtar el vi—
al ciego, le di la pa-. 20

Orlando furioso a don Quijote de la Mancha

Soneto

Si no eres par, tampoco le has tenido:
que par pudieras ser entre mil pares;
ni puede haberle donde tú te hallares,
invito vencedor, jamás vencido.

Orlando soy, Quijote, que, perdido 5
por Angélica, vi remotos mares, ofreciendo a la Fama en sus altares
aquel valor que respetó el olvido.

No puedo ser tu igual; que este decoro
se debe a tus proezas y a tu fama, 10
puesto que, como yo, perdiste el seso.

Mas serlo has mío, si al soberbio moro
y cita fiero domas, que hoy nos llama iguales en amor con mal suceso.

El Caballero del Febo a don Quijote de la Mancha

Soneto

A vuestra espada no igualó la mía, Febo español, curioso cortesano,
ni a la alta gloria de valor mi mano,
que rayo fue do nace y muere el día.

Imperios desprecié; la monarquía 5
que me ofreció el Oriente rojo en vano
dejé, por ver el rostro soberano
de Claridiana, aurora hermosa mía.

Améla por milagro único y raro,

y, ausente en su desgracia, el propio infierno 10
temió mi brazo, que domó su rabia.

Mas vos, godo Quijote, ilustre y claro,
por Dulcinea sois al mundo eterno,
y ella, por vos, famosa, honesta y sabia.

De Solisdán a don Quijote de la Mancha

Soneto

Maguer, señor Quijote, que sandeces
vos tengan el cerbelo derrumbado,

nunca seréis de alguno reprochado
por home de obras viles y soeces.

Serán vuestas fazañas los joeques, 5
pues tuertos desfaciendo habéis andado,
siendo vegadas mil apaleado
por follones cautivos y raheces.

Y si la vuesa linda Dulcinea desaguisado contra vos comete, 10
ni a vuestas cuitas muestra buen talante,

en tal desmán, vuesto conorte sea
que Sancho Panza fue mal alcagüete, necio él, dura ella, y vos no amante.

Diálogo entre Babieca y Rocinante

Soneto

B.

¿Cómo estáis, Rocinante, tan delgado?

R.

Porque nunca se come y se trabaja.

B.

Pues ¿qué es de la cebada y de la paja?

R.

No me deja mi amo ni un bocado.

B.

Andá, señor, que estáis muy mal criado, 5
pues vuestra lengua de asno al amo ultraja.

R.

Asno se es de la cuna a la mortaja.
¿Queréislo ver? Miraldo enamorado.

B.

¿Es necedad amar?

R.

No es gran prudencia.

B.

Metafísico estáis.

R.

Es que no como. 10

B.

Quejaos del escudero.

R.

No es bastante.

¿Cómo me he de quejar en mi dolencia,
si el amo y escudero o mayordomo son tan rocines como Rocinante?

Capítulo primero

Que trata de la condición y ejercicio del famoso hidalgo don Quijote de la Mancha

EN UN LUGAR de la Mancha, de cuyo nombre no quiero acordarme, no ha mucho tiempo que vivía un hidalgo de los de lanza en astillero, adarga antigua, rocín flaco y galgo corredor. Una olla de algo más vaca que carnero, salpicón las más noches, duelos y quebrantos los sábados, lantejas los viernes, algún palomino de añadidura los domingos, consumían las tres partes de su hacienda. El resto della concluían sayo de velarte, calzas de velludo para las fiestas, con sus pantuflos de lo mismo, y los días de entresemana se honraba con su vellorí de lo más fino. Tenía en su casa una ama que pasaba de los cuarenta, y una sobrina que no llegaba a los veinte, y un mozo de campo y plaza, que así ensillaba el rocín como tomaba la podadera. Frisaba la edad de nuestro hidalgo con los cincuenta años; era de complexión recia, seco de carnes, enjuto de rostro, gran madrugador y amigo de la caza. Quieren decir que tenía el sobrenombre de Quijada o Quesada, que en esto hay alguna diferencia en los autores que deste caso escriben; aunque, por conjeturas verosímiles, se deja entender que se llamaba Quejana. Pero esto importa poco a nuestro cuento: basta que en la narración dél no se salga un punto de la verdad.

Es, pues, de saber que este sobredicho hidalgo, los ratos que estaba ocioso, que eran los más del año, se daba a leer libros de caballerías, con tanta afición y gusto, que olvidó casi de todo punto el ejercicio de la caza y aun la administración de su hacienda. Y llegó a tanto su curiosidad y desatino en esto, que vendió muchas hanegas de tierra de sembradura para comprar libros de caballerías en que leer, y así, llevó a su casa todos cuantos pudo haber dellos; y de todos, ningunos le parecían tan bien como los que compuso el famoso Feliciano de Silva, porque la claridad de su prosa y aquellas entricadas razones suyas le parecían de perlas, y más cuando llegaba a leer aquellos requiebros y cartas de desafíos, donde en muchas partes hallaba escrito: La razón de la sinrazón que a mi razón se hace, de tal manera mi razón enflaquece, que con razón me quejo de la vuestra fermosura. Y también cuando leía: ... los altos cielos que de vuestra divinidad divinamente con las estrellas os fortifican y os hacen merecedora del merecimiento que merece la vuestra grandeza.

Con estas razones perdía el pobre caballero el juicio, y desvelábase por entenderlas y desentrañarles el sentido, que no se lo sacara ni las entendiera el mismo Aristóteles, si resucitara para sólo ello. No estaba muy bien con las heridas que don Belianís daba y recebía, porque se imaginaba que, por grandes maestros que le hubiesen curado, no dejaría de tener el rostro y todo el cuerpo lleno de cicatrices y señales. Pero, con todo, alababa en su autor aquel acabar su libro con la promesa de aquella inacabable aventura, y muchas veces le vino deseo de tomar la pluma y dalle fin al pie de la letra, como allí se promete; y sin duda alguna lo hiciera, y aun saliera con ello, si otros mayores y continuos pensamientos no se lo estorbaran. Tuvo muchas veces competencia con el cura de su lugar -que era hombre docto, graduado en Sigüenza-, sobre cuál había sido mejor caballero: Palmerín de Inglaterra o Amadís de Gaula; mas maese Nicolás, barbero del mismo pueblo, decía que ninguno llegaba al Caballero del Febo, y que si alguno se le podía comparar, era don Galaor, hermano de Amadís de Gaula, porque tenía muy acomodada condición para todo; que no era caballero melindroso, ni tan llorón como su hermano, y que en lo de la valentía no le iba en zaga.

En resolución, él se enfrascó tanto en su letura, que se le pasaban las noches leyendo de claro en claro, y los días de turbio en turbio; y así, del poco dormir y del mucho leer, se le secó el cerebro, de manera que vino a perder el juicio. Llenósele la fantasía de todo aquello que leía en los libros, así de encantamientos como de pendencias, batallas, desafíos, heridas, requiebros, amores, tormentas y disparates imposibles; y asentósele de tal modo en la imaginación que era verdad toda aquella máquina de aquellas sonadas sonadas invenciones que leía, que para él no había otra historia más cierta en el mundo. Decía él que el Cid Ruy Díaz había sido muy buen caballero, pero que no tenía que ver con el Caballero de la Ardiente Espada, que de sólo un revés había partido por medio dos fieros y descomunales gigantes. Mejor estaba con Bernardo del Carpio, porque en Roncesvalles había muerto a Roldán, el encantado, valiéndose de la industria de Hércules, cuando ahogó a Anteo, el hijo de la Tierra, entre los brazos. Decía mucho bien del gigante Morgante, porque, con ser de aquella generación gigantea, que todos son soberbios y descomedidos, él solo era afable y bien criado. Pero, sobre todos, estaba bien con Reinaldos de Montalbán, y más cuando le veía salir de su castillo y robar cuantos topaba, y cuando en allende robó aquel ídolo de Mahoma que era todo de oro, según dice su historia. Diera él, por dar una mano de coces al traidor de Galalón, al ama que tenía y aun a su sobrina de añadidura.

En efeto, rematado ya su juicio, vino a dar en el más extraño pensamiento que jamás dio loco en el mundo; y fue que le pareció conveniente y necesario, así para el aumento de su honra como para el servicio de su república, hacerse caballero andante, y irse por todo el mundo con sus armas y caballo a buscar las aventuras y a ejercitarse en todo aquello que él había leído que los caballeros andantes se ejercitaban, deshaciendo todo género de agravio, y poniéndose en ocasiones y peligros donde, acabándolos, cobrase eterno nombre y fama. Imaginábase el pobre ya coronado por el valor de su brazo, por lo menos, del imperio de Trapisonda; y así, con estos tan agradables pensamientos, llevado del extraño gusto que en ellos sentía, se dio prisa a poner en efecto lo que deseaba.

Y lo primero que hizo fue limpiar unas armas que habían sido de sus bisabuelos, que, tomadas de orín y llenas de moho, luengos siglos había que estaban puestas y olvidadas en un rincón. Limpiólas y aderezólas lo mejor que pudo, pero vio que tenían una gran falta, y era que no tenían celada de encaje, sino morrión simple; mas a esto suplió su industria, porque de cartones hizo un modo de media celada, que, encajada con el morrión, hacían una apariencia de celada entera. Es verdad que para probar si era fuerte y podía estar al riesgo de una cuchillada, sacó su espada y le dio dos golpes, y con el primero y en un punto deshizo lo que había hecho en una semana; y no dejó de parecerle mal la facilidad con que la había hecho pedazos, y, por asegurarse deste peligro, la tornó a hacer de nuevo, poniéndole unas barras de hierro por de dentro, de tal manera que él quedó satisfecho de su fortaleza; y, sin querer hacer nueva experiencia della, la diputó y tuvo por celada finísima de encaje.

Fue luego a ver su rocín, y, aunque tenía más cuartos que un real y más tachas que el caballo de Gonela, que tantum pellis et ossa fuit, le pareció que ni el Bucéfalo de Alejandro ni Babieca el del Cid con él se igualaban. Cuatro días se le pasaron en imaginar qué nombre le pondría; porque, según se decía él a sí mismo, no era razón que caballo de caballero tan famoso, y tan bueno él por sí, estuviese sin nombre conocido; y ansí, procuraba acomodársele de manera que declarase quién había sido, antes que fuese de caballero andante, y lo que era entonces; pues estaba muy puesto en razón que, mudando su señor estado, mudase él también el nombre, y le cobrase famoso y de estruendo, como convenía a la nueva orden y al nuevo ejercicio que ya profesaba. Y así, después de muchos nombres que formó, borró y quitó, añadió, deshizo y tornó a hacer en su memoria e imaginación, al fin le vino a llamar Rocinante: nombre, a su parecer, alto, sonoro y significativo de lo que había sido cuando fue rocín, antes de lo que ahora era, que era antes y primero de todos los rocines del mundo.

Puesto nombre, y tan a su gusto, a su caballo, quiso ponérsele a sí mismo, y en este pensamiento duró otros ocho días, y al cabo se vino a llamar don Quijote; de donde -como queda dicho-tomaron ocasión los autores desta tan verdadera historia que, sin duda, se debía de llamar Quijada, y no Quesada, como otros quisieron decir. Pero, acordándose que el valeroso Amadís no sólo se había contentado con llamarse Amadís a secas, sino que añadió el nombre de su reino y patria, por Hepila famosa, y se llamó Amadís de Gaula, así quiso, como buen caballero, añadir al suyo el nombre de la suya y llamarse don Quijote de la Mancha, con que, a su parecer, declaraba muy al vivo su linaje y patria, y la honraba con tomar el sobrenombre della.

Limpias, pues, sus armas, hecho del morrión celada, puesto nombre a su rocín y confirmándose a sí mismo, se dio a entender que no le faltaba otra cosa sino buscar una dama de quien enamorarse; porque el caballero andante sin amores era árbol sin hojas y sin fruto y cuerpo sin alma. Decíase él:

-Si yo, por malos de mis pecados, o por mi buena suerte, me encuentro por ahí con algún gigante, como de ordinario les acontece a los caballeros andantes, y le derribo de un encuentro, o le parto por mitad del cuerpo, o, finalmente, le venzo y le rindo, ¿no será bien tener a quien enviarle presentado y que entre y se hinque de rodillas ante mi dulce señora, y diga con voz humilde y rendido: «Yo, señora, soy el gigante Caraculiambro, señor de la ínsula Malindrania, a quien venció en singular batalla el jamás como se debe alabado caballero don Quijote de la Mancha, el cual me mandó que me presentase ante vuestra merced, para que la vuestra grandeza disponga de mí a su talante?». ».

¡Oh, cómo se holgó nuestro buen caballero cuando hubo hecho este discurso, y más cuando halló a quien dar nombre de su dama! Y fue, a lo que se cree, que en un lugar cerca del suyo había una moza labradora de muy buen parecer, de quien él un tiempo anduvo enamorado, aunque, según se entiende, ella jamás lo supo, ni le dio cata dello. Llamábase Aldonza Lorenzo, y a ésta le pareció ser bien darle título de señora de sus pensamientos; y, buscándole nombre que no desdijese mucho del suyo, y que tirase y se encaminase al de princesa y gran señora, vino a llamarla Dulcinea del Toboso, porque era natural del Toboso; nombre, a su parecer, músico y peregrino y significativo, como todos los demás que a él y a sus cosas había puesto.

Capítulo II

Que trata de la primera salida que de su tierra hizo el ingenioso don Quijote

HECHAS, pues, estas prevenciones, no quiso aguardar más tiempo a poner en efecto su pensamiento, apretándole a ello la falta que él pensaba que hacía en el mundo su tardanza, según eran los agravios que pensaba deshacer, tuertos que enderezar, sinrazones que emendar, y abusos que mejorar y deudas que satisfacer. Y así, sin dar parte a persona alguna de su intención, y sin que nadie le viese, una mañana, antes del día, que era uno de los calurosos del mes de julio, se armó de todas sus armas, subió sobre Rocinante, puesta su mal compuesta celada, embrazó su adarga, tomó su lanza y, por la puerta falsa de un corral, salió al campo con grandísimo contento y alborozo de ver con cuánta facilidad había dado principio a su buen deseo. Mas, apenas se vio en el campo, cuando le asaltó un pensamiento terrible, y tal, que por poco le hiciera dejar la comenzada empresa; y fue que le vino a la memoria que no era armado caballero y que, conforme a ley de caballería, ni podía ni debía tomar armas con ningún caballero; y, puesto que lo fuera, había de llevar armas blancas, como novel caballero, sin empresa en el escudo, hasta que por su esfuerzo la ganase. Estos pensamientos le hicieron titubear en su propósito; mas, pudiendo más su locura que otra razón alguna, propuso de hacerse armar caballero del primero que topase, a imitación de otros muchos que así lo hicieron, según él había leído en los libros que tal le tenían. En lo de las armas blancas, pensaba limpiarlas de manera, en teniendo lugar, que lo fuesen más que un armiño; y con esto se quietó y prosiguió su camino, sin llevar otro que aquel que su caballo quería, creyendo que en aquello consistía la fuerza de las aventuras.

Yendo, pues, caminando nuestro flamante aventurero, iba hablando consigo mismo y diciendo:

-¿Quién duda sino que en los venideros tiempos, cuando salga a luz la verdadera historia de mis famosos hechos, que el sabio que los escribiere no ponga, cuando llegue a contar esta mi primera salida tan de mañana, desta manera?: «Apenas había el rubicundo Apolo tendido por la faz de la ancha y espaciosa tierra las doradas hebras de sus hermosos cabellos, y apenas los pequeños y pintados pajarillos con sus arpadas lenguas habían saludado con dulce y meliflua armonía la venida de la rosada aurora, que, dejando la blanda cama del celoso marido, por las puertas y balcones del manchego horizonte a los mortales se mostraba, cuando el famoso caballero don Quijote de la Mancha, dejando las ociosas plumas, subió sobre su famoso caballo Rocinante y comenzó a caminar por el antiguo y conocido campo de Montiel».

Y era la verdad que por él caminaba. Y añadió diciendo:

-Dichosa edad, y siglo dichoso aquel adonde saldrán a luz las famosas hazañas mías, dignas de entallarse en bronces, esculpirse en mármoles y pintarse en tablas para memoria en lo futuro. ¡Oh tú, sabio encantador, quienquiera que seas, a quien ha de tocar el ser coronista desta peregrina historia, ruégote que no te olvides de mi buen Rocinante, compañero eterno mío en todos mis caminos y carreras!

Luego volvía diciendo, como si verdaderamente fuera enamorado:

-¡Oh princesa Dulcinea, señora deste cautivo corazón!, mucho agravio me habedes fecho en despedirme y reprocharme con el riguroso afincamiento de mandarme no parecer ante la vuestra ferrosura. Plégaos, señora, de membraros deste vuestro sujeto corazón, que tantas cuitas por vuestro amor padece.

Con éstos iba ensartando otros disparates, todos al modo de los que sus libros le habían enseñado, imitando en cuanto podía su lenguaje. Con esto, caminaba tan despacio, y el sol entraba tan apriesa y con tanto ardor, que fuera bastante a derretirle los sesos, si algunos tuviera.

Casi todo aquel día caminó sin acontecerle cosa que de contar fuese, de lo cual se desesperaba, porque quisiera topar luego luego con quien hacer experiencia del valor de su fuerte brazo. Autores hay que dicen que la primera aventura que le avino fue la del Puerto Lápice; otros dicen que la de los molinos de viento; pero, lo que yo he podido averiguar en este caso, y lo que he hallado escrito en los Anales de la Mancha, es que él anduvo todo aquel día y, al anochecer, su rocín y él se hallaron cansados y muertos de hambre; y que, mirando a todas partes por ver si descubriría algún castillo o alguna majada de pastores donde recogerse y adonde pudiese remediar su mucha hambre y necesidad, vio, no lejos del camino por donde iba, una venta, que fue como si viera una estrella que, no a los portales, sino a los alcázares de su redención le encaminaba. Diose priesa a caminar y llegó a ella a tiempo que anochecía.

Estaban acaso a la puerta dos mujeres mozas, destas que llaman del partido, las cuales iban a Sevilla con unos arrieros que en la venta aquella noche acertaron a hacer jornada; y, como a nuestro aventurero todo cuanto pensaba, veía o imaginaba le parecía ser hecho y pasar al modo de lo que había leído, luego que vio la venta, se le representó que era un castillo con sus cuatro torres y chapiteles de luciente plata, sin faltarle su puente levadiza y honda cava, con todos aquellos adherentes que semejantes castillos se pintan. Fuese llegando a la venta, que a él le parecía castillo, y a poco trecho della detuvo las riendas a

Rocinante, esperando que algún enano se pusiese entre las almenas a dar señal con alguna trompeta de que llegaba caballero al castillo. Pero, como vio que se tardaban y que Rocinante se daba prisa por llegar a la caballeriza, se llegó a la puerta de la venta, y vio a las dos distraídas mozas que allí estaban, que a él le parecieron dos hermosas doncellas o dos graciosas damas que delante de la puerta del castillo se estaban solazando. En esto, sucedió acaso que un porquero que andaba recogiendo de unos rastros una manada de puercos -que, sin perdón, así se llaman-tocó un cuerno, a cuya señal ellos se recogen, y al instante se le representó a don Quijote lo que deseaba, que era que algún enano hacía señal de su venida; y así, con estraño contento, llegó a la venta y a las damas, las cuales, como vieron venir un hombre de aquella suerte, armado y con lanza y adarga, llenas de miedo, se iban a entrar en la venta; pero don Quijote, coligiendo por su huida su miedo, alzándose la visera de papelón y descubriendo su seco y polvoroso rostro, con gentil talante y voz reposada, les dijo:

-No fuyan las vuestras mercedes ni teman desaguisado alguno; ca a la orden de caballería que profeso non toca ni atañe facerle a ninguno, cuanto más a tan altas doncellas como vuestras presencias demuestran.

Mirábanle las mozas y andaban con los ojos buscándole el rostro, que la mala visera le encubría; mas, como se oyeron llamar doncellas, cosa tan fuera de su profesión, no pudieron tener la risa, y fue de manera que don Quijote vino a correrse y a decirles:

-Bien parece la misura en las fermosas, y es mucha sandez además la risa que de leve causa procede; pero no vos lo digo porque os acuitedes ni mostredes mal talante; que el mío non es de ál que de serviros.

El lenguaje, no entendido de las señoras, y el mal talle de nuestro caballero acrecentaba en ellas la risa y en él el enojo; y pasara muy adelante si a aquel punto no saliera el ventero, hombre que, por ser muy gordo, era muy pacífico, el cual, viendo aquella figura contrahecha, armada de armas tan desiguales como eran la brida, lanza, adarga y coselete, no estuvo en nada en acompañar a las doncellas en las muestras de su contento. Mas, en efeto, temiendo la máquina de tantos pertrechos, determinó de hablarle comedidamente; y así, le dijo:

-Si vuestra merced, señor caballero, busca posada, amén del lecho (porque en esta venta no hay ninguno), todo lo demás se hallará en ella en mucha abundancia.

Viendo don Quijote la humildad del alcaide de la fortaleza, que tal le pareció a él el ventero y la venta, respondió:

-Para mí, señor castellano, cualquiera cosa basta, porque

mis arreos son las armas,
mi descanso el pelear, etc.

Pensó el huésped que el haberle llamado castellano había sido por haberle parecido de los sanos de Castilla, aunque él era andaluz y de los de la playa de Sanlúcar, no menos ladrón que Caco, ni menos maleante que estudiantado paje; y así, le respondió:

-Según eso, las camas de vuestra merced serán duras peñas, y su dormir, siempre velar; y siendo así, bien se puede apearse, con seguridad de hallar en esta choza ocasión y ocasiones para no dormir en todo un año, cuanto más en una noche.

Y, diciendo esto, fue a tener el estribo a don Quijote, el cual se apeó con mucha dificultad y trabajo, como aquel que en todo aquel día no se había desayunado.

Dijo luego al huésped que le tuviese mucho cuidado de su caballo, porque era la mejor pieza que comía pan en el mundo. Miróle el ventero, y no le pareció tan bueno como don Quijote decía, ni aun la mitad; y, acomodándole en la caballeriza, volvió a ver lo que su huésped mandaba, al cual estaban desarmando las doncellas, que ya se habían reconciliado con él; las cuales, aunque le habían quitado el peto y el espaldar, jamás supieron ni pudieron desencajarle la gola, ni quitalle la contrahecha celada, que traía atada con unas cintas verdes, y era menester cortarlas, por no poderse quitar los nudos; mas él no lo quiso consentir en ninguna manera, y así, se quedó toda aquella noche con la celada puesta, que era la más graciosa y estraña figura que se pudiera pensar; y, al desarmarle, como él se imaginaba que aquellas traídas y llevadas que le desarmaban eran algunas principales señoras y damas de aquel castillo, les dijo con mucho donaire:

-Nunca fuera caballero
de damas tan bien servido
como fuera don Quijote
cuando de su aldea vino:
doncellas curaban dél;
princesas, del su rocino,

o Rocinante, que éste es el nombre, señoras mías, de mi caballo, y don Quijote de la Mancha el mío; que, puesto que no quisiera descubrirme fasta que las fazañas fechas en vuestro servicio y pro me descubrieran, la fuerza de acomodar al propósito presente este romance viejo de Lanzarote ha sido causa que sepáis mi nombre antes de toda sazón; pero, tiempo vendrá en que las vuestras señorías me manden y yo obedezca, y el valor de mi brazo descubra el deseo que tengo de serviros.

Las mozas, que no estaban hechas a oír semejantes retóricas, no respondían palabra; sólo le preguntaron si quería comer alguna cosa.

-Cualquiera yantaría yo -respondió don Quijote-, porque, a lo que entiendo, me haría mucho al caso.

A dicha, acertó a ser viernes aquel día, y no había en toda la venta sino unas raciones de un pescado que en Castilla llaman abadejo, y en Andalucía bacallao, y en otras partes curadillo, y en otras truchuela. Preguntáronle si por ventura comería su merced truchuela, que no había otro pescado que dalle a comer.

-Como haya muchas truchuelas -respondió don Quijote-, podrán servir de una trucha, porque eso se me da que me den ocho reales en sencillos que en una pieza de a ocho. Cuanto más, que podría ser que fuesen estas truchuelas como la ternera, que es mejor que la vaca, y el cabrito que el cabrón. Pero, sea lo que fuere, venga luego, que el trabajo y peso de las armas no se puede llevar sin el gobierno de las tripas.

Pusiéronle la mesa a la puerta de la venta, por el fresco, y trújole el huésped una porción del mal remojado y peor cocido bacallao, y un pan tan negro y mugriento como sus armas; pero era materia de grande risa verle comer, porque, como tenía puesta la celada y alzada la visera, no podía poner nada en la boca con sus manos si otro no se lo daba y ponía; y así, una de aquellas señoras servía deste menester. Mas, al darle de beber, no fue posible, ni lo fuera si el ventero no horadara una caña, y, puesto el un cabo en la boca, por el otro le iba echando el vino; y todo esto lo recibía en paciencia, a trueco de no romper las cintas de la celada.

Estando en esto, llegó acaso a la venta un castrador de puercos; y, así como llegó, sonó su silbato de cañas cuatro o cinco veces, con lo cual acabó de confirmar don Quijote que estaba en algún famoso castillo, y que le servían con música, y que el abadejo eran truchas; el pan, candeal; y las rameras, damas; y el ventero, castellano del castillo, y con esto daba por bien empleada su determinación y salida. Mas lo que más le fatigaba era el no verse armado caballero, por parecerle que no se podría poner legítimamente en aventura alguna sin recibir la orden de caballería.

Capítulo III

Donde se cuenta la graciosa manera que tuvo don Quijote en armarse caballero

Y ASÍ, fatigado deste pensamiento, abrevió su venteril y limitada cena; la cual acabada, llamó al ventero y, encerrándose con él en la caballeriza, se hincó de rodillas ante él, diciéndole:

-No me levantaré jamás de donde estoy, valeroso caballero, fasta que la vuestra cortesía me otorgue un don que pedirle quiero, el cual redundará en alabanza vuestra y en pro del género humano.

El ventero, que vio a su huésped a sus pies y oyó semejantes razones, estaba confuso mirándole, sin saber qué hacerse ni decirle, y porfiaba con él que se levantase, y jamás quiso, hasta que le hubo de decir que él le otorgaba el don que le pedía.

-No esperaba yo menos de la gran magnificencia vuestra, señor mío -respondió don Quijote-; y así, os digo que el don que os he pedido, y de vuestra liberalidad me ha sido otorgado, es que mañana en aquel día me habéis de armar caballero, y esta noche en la capilla deste vuestro castillo velaré las armas; y mañana, como tengo dicho, se cumplirá lo que tanto deseo, para poder, como se debe, ir por todas las cuatro partes del mundo buscando las aventuras, en pro de los menesterosos, como está a cargo de la caballería y de los caballeros andantes, como yo soy, cuyo deseo a semejantes fazañas es inclinado.

El ventero, que, como está dicho, era un poco socarrón y ya tenía algunos barruntos de la falta de juicio de su huésped, acabó de creerlo cuando acabó de oírle semejantes razones, y, por tener qué reír aquella noche, determinó de seguirle el humor; y así, le dijo que andaba muy acertado en lo que deseaba y pedía, y que tal prosupuesto era propio y natural de los caballeros tan principales como él parecía y como su gallarda presencia mostraba; y que él, ansimesmo, en los años de su mocedad, se había dado a aquel honroso ejercicio, andando por diversas partes del mundo buscando sus aventuras, sin que hubiese dejado los Percheles de Málaga, Islas de Riarán, Compás de Sevilla, Azoguejo de Segovia, la Olivera de Valencia, Rondilla de Granada, Playa de Sanlúcar, Potro de Córdoba y las Ventillas de Toledo y otras diversas partes, donde había ejercitado la ligereza de sus pies, sutileza de sus manos, haciendo muchos tuertos, recuestando muchas viudas, deshaciendo algunas doncellas y engañando a algunos pupilos y, finalmente, dándose a conocer por cuantas audiencias y tribunales hay casi en toda España; y que, a lo último, se había venido a recoger a aquel su castillo, donde vivía con su hacienda y con las ajenas, recogiendo en él a todos los caballeros andantes, de cualquiera calidad y condición que fuesen, sólo por la mucha afición que les tenía y porque partiesen con él de sus haberes, en pago de su buen deseo.

Díjole también que en aquel su castillo no había capilla alguna donde poder velar las armas, porque estaba derribada para hacerla de nuevo; pero que, en caso de necesidad, él sabía que se podían velar dondequiera, y que aquella noche las podría velar en un patio del castillo; que a la mañana, siendo Dios servido, se harían las debidas ceremonias, de manera que él quedase armado caballero, y tan caballero que no pudiese ser más en el mundo.

Preguntóle si traía dineros; respondió don Quijote que no traía blanca, porque él nunca había leído en las historias de los caballeros andantes que ninguno los hubiese traído. A esto dijo el ventero que se engañaba; que, puesto caso que en las historias no se escribía, por haberles parecido a los autores dellas que no era menester escribir una cosa tan clara y tan necesaria de traerse como eran dineros y camisas limpias, no por eso se había de creer que no los trujeron; y así, tuviese por cierto y averiguado que todos los caballeros andantes, de que tantos libros están llenos y atestados, llevaban bien herradas las bolsas, por lo que pudiese sucederles; y que asimismo llevaban camisas y una arqueta pequeña llena de ungüentos para curar las heridas que recibían, porque no todas veces en los campos y desiertos donde se combatían y salían heridos había quien los curase, si ya no era que tenían algún sabio encantador por amigo, que luego los socorría, trayendo por el aire, en alguna nube, alguna doncella o enano con alguna redoma de agua de tal virtud que, en gustando alguna gota della, luego al punto quedaban sanos de sus llagas y heridas, como si mal alguno hubiesen tenido. Mas que, en tanto que esto no hubiese, tuvieron los pasados caballeros por cosa acertada que sus escuderos fuesen proveídos de dineros y de otras cosas necesarias, como eran hilas y ungüentos para curarse; y, cuando sucedía que los tales caballeros no tenían escuderos, que eran pocas y raras veces, ellos mismos lo llevaban todo en unas alforjas muy sutiles, que casi no se parecían, a las ancas del caballo, como que era otra cosa de más importancia; porque, no siendo por ocasión semejante, esto de llevar alforjas no fue muy admitido entre los caballeros andantes; y por esto le daba por consejo, pues aún se lo podía mandar como a su ahijado, que tan presto lo había de ser, que no caminase de allí adelante sin dineros y sin las prevenciones referidas, y que vería cuán bien se hallaba con ellas cuando menos se pensase.

Prometióle don Quijote de hacer lo que se le aconsejaba con toda puntualidad; y así, se dio luego orden como velase las armas en un corral grande que a un lado de la venta estaba; y, recogiénolas don Quijote todas, las puso sobre una pila que junto a un pozo estaba y, embrazando su adarga, asió de su lanza y con gentil continente se comenzó a pasear delante de la pila; y cuando comenzó el paseo comenzaba a cerrar la noche.

Contó el ventero a todos cuantos estaban en la venta la locura de su huésped, la vela de las armas y la armazón de caballería que esperaba. Admiráronse de tan extraño género de locura y fuéronse a mirar desde lejos, y vieron que, con sosegado ademán, unas veces se paseaba; otras, arrimado a su lanza, ponía los ojos en las armas, sin quitarlos por un buen espacio dellas. Acabó de cerrar la noche, pero con tanta claridad de la luna, que podía competir con el que se la prestaba, de manera que cuanto el novel caballero hacía era bien visto de todos. Antojósele en esto a uno de los arrieros que estaban en la venta ir a dar agua a su recua, y fue menester quitar las armas de don Quijote, que estaban sobre la pila; el cual, viéndole llegar, en voz alta le dijo:

-¡Oh tú, quienquiera que seas, atrevido caballero, que llegas a tocar las armas del más valeroso andante que jamás se ciñó espada!, mira lo que haces y no las toques, si no quieres dejar la vida en pago de tu atrevimiento.

No se curó el arriero destas razones (y fuera mejor que se curara, porque fuera curarse en salud); antes, trabando de las correas, las arrojó gran trecho de sí. Lo cual visto por don Quijote, alzó los ojos al cielo y, puesto el pensamiento -a lo que pareció-en su señora Dulcinea, dijo:

-Acorredme, señora mía, en esta primera afrenta que a este vuestro avasallado pecho se le ofrece; no me desfallezca en este primero trance vuestro favor y amparo.

Y, diciendo estas y otras semejantes razones, soltando la adarga, alzó la lanza a dos manos y dio con ella tan gran golpe al arriero en la cabeza, que le derribó en el suelo, tan maltrecho que, si segundara con otro, no tuviera necesidad de maestro que le curara. Hecho esto, recogió sus armas y tornó a pasearse con el mismo reposo que primero. Desde allí a poco, sin saberse lo que había pasado (porque aún estaba aturdido el arriero), llegó otro con la misma intención de dar agua a sus mulos; y, llegando a quitar las armas para desembarazar la pila, sin hablar don Quijote palabra y sin pedir favor a nadie, soltó otra vez la adarga y alzó otra vez la lanza y, sin hacerla pedazos, hizo más de tres la cabeza del segundo arriero, porque se la abrió por cuatro. Al ruido acudió toda la gente de la venta, y entre ellos el ventero. Viendo esto don Quijote, embrazó su adarga y, puesta mano a su espada, dijo:

-¡Oh señora de la fermosura, esfuerzo y vigor del debilitado corazón mío! Ahora es tiempo que vuelvas los ojos de tu grandeza a este tu cautivo caballero, que tamaña aventura está atendiendo.

Con esto cobró, a su parecer, tanto ánimo, que si le acometieran todos los arrieros del mundo, no volviera el pie atrás. Los compañeros de los heridos, que tales los vieron, comenzaron desde lejos a llover piedras sobre don Quijote, el cual, lo mejor que podía, se reparaba con su adarga, y no se osaba apartar de la pila por no desamparar las armas. El ventero daba voces que le dejaran, porque ya les había dicho como era loco, y que por loco se libraría, aunque los matase a todos. También don Quijote las daba, mayores, llamándolos de alevosos y traidores, y que el señor del castillo era un follón y mal nacido caballero, pues de tal manera consentía que se tratasen los andantes caballeros; y que si él hubiera recibido la orden de caballería, que él le diera a entender su alevosía:

-Pero de vosotros, soez y baja canalla, no hago caso alguno: tirad, llegad, venid y ofendedme en cuanto pudiéredes, que vosotros veréis el pago que lleváis de vuestra sandez y demasía.

Decía esto con tanto brío y denuedo, que infundió un terrible temor en los que le acometían; y, así por esto como por las persuaciones del ventero, le dejaron de tirar, y él dejó retirar a los heridos y tornó a la vela de sus armas con la misma quietud y sosiego que primero.

No le parecieron bien al ventero las burlas de su huésped, y determinó abreviar y darle la negra orden de caballería luego, antes que otra desgracia sucediese. Y así, llegándose a él, se disculpó de la insolencia que aquella gente baja con él había usado, sin que él supiese cosa alguna; pero que bien castigados quedaban de su atrevimiento. Díjole cómo ya le había dicho que en aquel castillo no había capilla, y para lo que restaba de hacer tampoco era necesaria; que todo el toque de quedar armado caballero consistía en la pescozada y en el espaldarazo, según él tenía noticia del ceremonial de la orden, y que aquello en mitad de un campo se podía hacer, y que ya había cumplido con lo que tocaba al velar de las armas, que con solas dos horas de vela se cumplía, cuanto más, que él había estado más de cuatro. Todo se lo creyó don Quijote, y dijo que él estaba allí pronto para obedecerle, y que concluyese con la mayor brevedad que pudiese; porque si fuese otra vez acometido y se viese armado caballero, no pensaba dejar persona viva en el castillo, eceto aquellas que él le mandase, a quien por su respeto dejaría.

Advertido y medroso desto el castellano, trujo luego un libro donde asentaba la paja y cebada que daba a los arrieros, y con un cabo de vela que le traía un muchacho, y con las dos ya dichas doncellas, se vino adonde don Quijote estaba, al cual mandó hincar de rodillas; y, leyendo en su manual, como que decía alguna devota oración, en mitad de la leyenda alzó la mano y dióle sobre el cuello un buen golpe, y tras él, con su misma espada, un gentil espaldarazo, siempre murmurando entre dientes, como que rezaba. Hecho esto, mandó a una de aquellas damas que le ciñese la espada, la cual lo hizo con mucha desenvoltura y discreción, porque no fue menester poca para no reventar de risa a cada punto de las ceremonias; pero las proezas que ya habían visto del novel caballero les tenía la risa a raya. Al ceñirle la espada, dijo la buena señora:

-Dios haga a vuestra merced muy venturoso caballero y le dé ventura en lides.

Don Quijote le preguntó cómo se llamaba, porque él supiese de allí adelante a quién quedaba obligado por la merced recebida; porque pensaba darle alguna parte de la honra que alcanzase por el valor de su brazo. Ella respondió con mucha humildad que se llamaba la Tolosa, y que era hija de un remendón natural de Toledo que vivía a las tendillas de Sancho Bienaya, y que dondequiera que ella estuviese le serviría y le tendría por señor. Don Quijote le replicó que, por su amor, le hiciese merced que de allí adelante se pusiese don y se llamase doña Tolosa. Ella se lo prometió, y la otra le calzó la espuela, con la cual le pasó casi el mismo coloquio que con la de la espada: preguntóle su nombre, y dijo que se llamaba la Molinera, y que era hija de un honrado molinero de Antequera; a la cual también rogó don Quijote que se pusiese don y se llamase doña Molinera, ofreciéndole nuevos servicios y mercedes.

Hechas, pues, de galope y aprisa las hasta allí nunca vistas ceremonias, no vio la hora don Quijote de verse a caballo y salir buscando las aventuras; y, ensillando luego a Rocinante, subió en él y, abrazando a su huésped, le dijo cosas tan estrañas, agradeciéndole la merced de haberle armado caballero, que no es posible acertar a referirlas. El ventero, por verle ya fuera de la venta, con no menos retóricas, aunque con más breves palabras, respondió a las suyas y, sin pedirle la costa de la posada, le dejó ir a la buen hora.

Capítulo IV

De lo que le sucedió a nuestro caballero cuando salió de la venta

LA DEL ALBA sería cuando don Quijote salió de la venta, tan contento, tan gallardo, tan alborozado por verse ya armado caballero, que el gozo le reventaba por las cinchas del caballo. Mas, viniéndole a la memoria los consejos de su huésped cerca de las prevenciones tan necesarias que había de llevar consigo, especial la de los dineros y camisas, determinó volver a su casa y acomodarse de todo, y de un escudero, haciendo cuenta de recibir a un labrador vecino suyo, que era pobre y con hijos, pero muy a propósito para el oficio escuderil de la caballería. Con este pensamiento guió a Rocinante hacia su aldea, el cual, casi conociendo la querencia, con tanta gana comenzó a caminar, que parecía que no ponía los pies en el suelo.

No había andado mucho, cuando le pareció que a su diestra mano, de la espesura de un bosque que allí estaba, salían unas voces delicadas, como de persona que se quejaba; y apenas las hubo oído, cuando dijo:

-Gracias doy al cielo por la merced que me hace, pues tan presto me pone ocasiones delante donde yo pueda cumplir con lo que debo a mi profesión, y donde pueda coger el fruto de mis buenos deseos. Estas voces, sin duda, son de algún menesteroso o menesterosa que ha menester mi favor y ayuda.

Y, volviendo las riendas, encaminó a Rocinante hacia donde le pareció que las voces salían. Y, a pocos pasos que entró por el bosque, vio atada una yegua a una encina, y atado en otra a un muchacho, desnudo de medio cuerpo arriba, hasta de edad de quince años, que era el que las voces daba; y no sin causa, porque le estaba dando con una pretina muchos azotes un labrador de buen talle, y cada azote le acompañaba con una reprehensión y consejo. Porque decía:

-La lengua queda y los ojos listos.

Y el muchacho respondía:

-No lo haré otra vez, señor mío; por la pasión de Dios, que no lo haré otra vez; y yo prometo de tener de aquí adelante más cuidado con el hato.

Y, viendo don Quijote lo que pasaba, con voz airada dijo:

-Descortés caballero, mal parece tomaros con quien defender no se puede; subid sobre vuestro caballo y tomad vuestra lanza -que también tenía una lanza arrimada a la encina adonde estaba arrendada la yegua-, que yo os haré conocer ser de cobardes lo que estáis haciendo.

El labrador, que vio sobre sí aquella figura llena de armas blandiendo la lanza sobre su rostro, túvose por muerto, y con buenas palabras respondió:

-Señor caballero, este muchacho que estoy castigando es un mi criado, que me sirve de guardar una manada de ovejas que tengo en estos contornos, el cual es tan descuidado, que cada día me falta una; y, porque castigo su descuido, o bellaquería, dice que lo hago de miserable, por no pagalle la soldada que le debo, y en Dios y en mi ánima que miente.

-¿«Miente», delante de mí, ruin villano? -dijo don Quijote-. Por el sol que nos alumbra, que estoy por pasaros de parte a parte con esta lanza. Pagadle luego sin más réplica; si no, por el Dios que nos rige, que os concluya y aniquile en este punto. Desatadlo luego.

El labrador bajó la cabeza y, sin responder palabra, desató a su criado, al cual preguntó don Quijote que cuánto le debía su amo. Él dijo que nueve meses, a siete reales cada mes. Hizo la cuenta don Quijote y halló que montaban setenta y tres reales, y díjole al labrador que al momento los desembolsase, si no quería morir por ello. Respondió el medroso villano que para el paso en que estaba y juramento que había hecho -y aún no había jurado nada-, que no eran tantos, porque se le habían de descontar y recibir en cuenta tres pares de zapatos que le había dado y un real de dos sangrías que le habían hecho estando enfermo.

-Bien está todo eso -replicó don Quijote-, pero quédense los zapatos y las sangrías por los azotes que sin culpa le habéis dado; que si él rompió el cuero de los zapatos que vos pagastes, vos le habéis rotpido el de su cuerpo; y si le sacó el barbero sangre estando enfermo, vos en sanidad se la habéis sacado; así que, por esta parte, no os debe nada.

-El daño está, señor caballero, en que no tengo aquí dineros: véngase Andrés conmigo a mi casa, que yo se los pagaré un real sobre otro.

-¿Irme yo con él? -dijo el muchacho-. Mas ¡mal año! No, señor, ni por pienso; porque, en viéndose solo, me desuelle como a un San Bartolomé.

-No hará tal -replicó don Quijote-: basta que yo se lo mande para que me tenga respeto; y con que él me lo jure por la ley de caballería que ha recibido, le dejaré ir libre y aseguraré la paga.

-Mire vuestra merced, señor, lo que dice -dijo el muchacho-, que este mi amo no es caballero ni ha recibido orden de caballería alguna; que es Juan Haldudo el rico, el vecino del Quintanar.

-Importa poco eso -respondió don Quijote-, que Haldudos puede haber caballeros; cuanto más, que cada uno es hijo de sus obras.

-Así es verdad -dijo Andrés-; pero este mi amo, ¿de qué obras es hijo, pues me niega mi soldada y mi sudor y trabajo?

-No niego, hermano Andrés -respondió el labrador-; y hacedme placer de veníros conmigo, que yo juro por todas las órdenes que de caballerías hay en el mundo de pagaros, como tengo dicho, un real sobre otro, y aun sahumados.

-Del sahumero os hago gracia -dijo don Quijote-; dadse los en reales, que con eso me contento; y mirad que lo cumpláis como lo habéis jurado; si no, por el mismo juramento os juro de volver a buscaros y a castigaros, y que os tengo de hallar, aunque os escondáis más que una lagartija. Y si queréis saber quién os manda esto, para quedar con más veras obligado a cumplirlo, sabed que yo soy el valeroso don Quijote de la Mancha, el desfacedor de agravios y sinrazones; y a Dios quedad, y no se os parta de las mientes lo prometido y jurado, so pena de la pena pronunciada.

Y, en diciendo esto, picó a su Rocinante, y en breve espacio se apartó dellos. Siguióle el labrador con los ojos, y cuando vio que había traspuesto del bosque y que ya no parecía, volvióse a su criado Andrés y díjole:

-Venid acá, hijo mío, que os quiero pagar lo que os debo, como aquel deshacedor de agravios me dejó mandado.

-Eso juro yo -dijo Andrés-; y ¡cómo que andará vuestra merced acertado en cumplir el mandamiento de aquel buen caballero, que mil años viva; que, según es de valeroso y de buen juez, vive Roque, que si no me paga, que vuelva y ejecute lo que dijo!

-También lo juro yo -dijo el labrador-; pero, por lo mucho que os quiero, quiero acrecentar la deuda por acrecentar la paga.

Y, asiéndole del brazo, le tornó a atar a la encina, donde le dio tantos azotes que le dejó por muerto.

-Llamad, señor Andrés, ahora -decía el labrador-al desfacedor de agravios, veréis cómo no desface aquéste; aunque creo que no está acabado de hacer, porque me viene gana de desollaros vivo como vos temíades.

Pero, al fin, le desató y le dio licencia que fuese a buscar su juez, para que ejecutase la pronunciada sentencia. Andrés se partió algo mohíno, jurando de ir a buscar al valeroso don Quijote de la Mancha y contalle punto por punto lo que había pasado, y que se lo había de pagar con las setenas. Pero, con todo esto, él se partió llorando y su amo se quedó riendo.

Y desta manera deshizo el agravio el valeroso don Quijote; el cual, contentísimo de lo sucedido, pareciéndole que había dado felicísimo y alto principio a sus caballerías, con gran satisfacción de sí mismo iba caminando hacia su aldea, diciendo a media voz:

-Bien te puedes llamar dichosa sobre cuantas hoy viven en la tierra, ¡oh sobre las bellas bella Dulcinea del Toboso!, pues te cupo en suerte tener sujeto y rendido a toda tu voluntad e talante a un tan valiente y tan nombrado caballero como lo es y será don Quijote de la Mancha, el cual, como todo el mundo sabe, ayer rescibió la orden de caballería, y hoy ha desfecho el mayor tuerto y agravio que formó la sinrazón y cometió la crueldad: hoy quitó el látigo de la mano a aquel despiadado enemigo que tan sin ocasión vapulaba a aquel delicado infante.

En esto, llegó a un camino que en cuatro se dividía, y luego se le vino a la imaginación las encrucejadas donde los caballeros andantes se ponían a pensar cuál camino de aquéllos tomarían y, por imitarlos, estuvo un rato quedo; y, al cabo de haberlo muy bien pensado, soltó la rienda a Rocinante, dejando a la voluntad del rocín la suya, el cual siguió su primer intento, que fue el irse camino de su caballeriza.

Y, habiendo andado como dos millas, descubrió don Quijote un grande tropel de gente, que, como después se supo, eran unos mercaderes toledanos que iban a comprar seda a Murcia. Eran seis, y venían con sus quitasoles, con otros cuatro criados a caballo y tres mozos de mulas a pie. Apenas los divisó don Quijote, cuando se imaginó ser cosa de nueva aventura; y, por imitar en todo cuanto a él le parecía posible los pasos que había leído en sus libros, le pareció venir allí de molde uno que pensaba hacer. Y así, con gentil continente y denuedo, se afirmó bien en los estribos, apretó la lanza, llegó la adarga al pecho y, puesto en la mitad del camino, estuvo esperando que aquellos caballeros andantes llegasen, que ya él por tales los tenía y juzgaba; y, cuando llegaron a trecho que se pudieron ver y oír, levantó don Quijote la voz y con ademán arrogante dijo:

-Todo el mundo se tenga, si todo el mundo no confiesa que no hay en el mundo todo doncella más hermosa que la emperatriz de la Mancha, la sin par Dulcinea del Toboso.

Paráronse los mercaderes al son destas razones, y a ver la estraña figura del que las decía; y, por la figura y por las razones, luego echaron de ver la locura de su dueño; mas quisieron ver despacio en qué paraba aquella confesión que se les pedía, y uno dellos, que era un poco burlón y muy mucho discreto, le dijo:

-Señor caballero, nosotros no conocemos quién sea esa buena señora que decís; mostrádnosla: que si ella fuere de tanta hermosura como significáis, de buena gana y sin apremio alguno confesaremos la verdad que por parte vuestra nos es pedida.

-Si os la mostrara -replicó don Quijote-, ¿qué hiciérades vosotros en confesar una verdad tan notoria? La importancia está en que sin verla lo habéis de creer, confesar, afirmar, jurar y defender; donde no, conmigo sois en batalla, gente descomunal y soberbia. Que, ahora vengáis uno a uno, como pide la orden de caballería, ora todos juntos, como es costumbre y mala usanza de los de vuestra ralea, aquí os aguardo y espero, confiado en la razón que de mi parte tengo.

-Señor caballero -replicó el mercader-, suplico a vuestra merced, en nombre de todos estos príncipes que aquí estamos, que, porque no encarguemos nuestras

conciencias confesando una cosa por nosotros jamás vista ni oída, y más siendo tan en perjuicio de las emperatrices y reinas del Alcarria y Estremadura, que vuestra merced sea servido de mostrarnos algún retrato de esa señora, aunque sea tamaño como un grano de trigo; que por el hilo se sacará el ovillo, y quedaremos con esto satisfechos y seguros, y vuestra merced quedará contento y pagado; y aun creo que estamos ya tan de su parte que, aunque su retrato nos muestre que es tuerta de un ojo y que del otro le mana bermellón y piedra azufre, con todo eso, por complacer a vuestra merced, diremos en su favor todo lo que quisiere.

-No le mana, canalla infame -respondió don Quijote, encendido en cólera-; no le mana, digo, eso que decís, sino ámbar y algalia entre algodones; y no es tuerta ni corcovada, sino más derecha que un huso de Guadarrama. Pero vosotros pagaréis la grande blasfemia que habéis dicho contra tamaña beldad como es la de mi señora.

Y, en diciendo esto, arremetió con la lanza baja contra el que lo había dicho, con tanta furia y enojo que, si la buena suerte no hiciera que en la mitad del camino tropezara y cayera Rocinante, lo pasara mal el atrevido mercader. Cayó Rocinante, y fue rodando su amo una buena pieza por el campo; y, queriéndose levantar, jamás pudo: tal embarazo le causaban la lanza, adarga, espuelas y celada, con el peso de las antiguas armas. Y, entretanto que pugnaba por levantarse y no podía, estaba diciendo:

-¡Non fuyáis, gente cobarde; gente cautiva, atended!; que no por culpa mía, sino de mi caballo, estoy aquí tendido.

Un mozo de mulas de los que allí venían, que no debía de ser muy bien intencionado, oyendo decir al pobre caído tantas arrogancias, no lo pudo sufrir sin darle la respuesta en las costillas. Y, llegándose a él, tomó la lanza y, después de haberla hecho pedazos, con uno dellos comenzó a dar a nuestro don Quijote tantos palos que, a despecho y pesar de sus armas, le molió como cibera. Dábanle voces sus amos que no le diese tanto y que le dejase, pero estaba ya el mozo picado y no quiso dejar el juego hasta envidar todo el resto de su cólera; y, acudiendo por los demás trozos de la lanza, los acabó de deshacer sobre el miserable caído, que, con toda aquella tempestad de palos que sobre él vía, no cerraba la boca, amenazando al cielo y a la tierra, y a los malandrines, que tal le parecían.

Cansóse el mozo, y los mercaderes siguieron su camino, llevando qué contar en todo él del pobre apaleado. El cual, después que se vio solo, tornó a probar si podía levantarse; pero si no lo pudo hacer cuando sano y bueno, ¿cómo lo haría molido y casi deshecho? Y aún se tenía por dichoso, pareciéndole que aquélla era propia desgracia de caballeros andantes, y toda la atribuía a la falta de su caballo; y no era posible levantarse, según tenía brumado todo el cuerpo.

Capítulo V

Donde se prosigue la narración de la desgracia de nuestro caballero

VIENDO, pues, que, en efeto, no podía menearse, acordó de acogerse a su ordinario remedio, que era pensar en algún paso de sus libros; y trújole su locura a la memoria aquel de Valdovinos y del marqués de Mantua, cuando Carloto le dejó herido en la montiña, historia sabida de los niños, no ignorada de los mozos, celebrada y aun creída de los viejos; y, con todo esto, no más verdadera que los milagros de Mahoma. Ésta, pues, le pareció a él que le venía de molde para el paso en que se hallaba; y así, con muestras de grande sentimiento, se comenzó a volcar por la tierra y a decir con debilitado aliento lo mismo que dicen decía el herido caballero del bosque:

-¿Donde estás, señora mía,
que no te duele mi mal?
O no lo sabes, señora,
o eres falsa y desleal.

Y, desta manera, fue prosiguiendo el romance hasta aquellos versos que dicen:

-¡Oh noble marqués de Mantua,
mi tío y señor carnal!

Y quiso la suerte que, cuando llegó a este verso, acertó a pasar por allí un labrador de su mismo lugar y vecino suyo, que venía de llevar una carga de trigo al molino; el cual, viendo aquel hombre allí tendido, se llegó a él y le preguntó que quién era y qué mal sentía que tan tristemente se quejaba. Don Quijote creyó, sin duda, que aquél era el marqués de Mantua, su tío; y así, no le respondió otra cosa si no fue proseguir en su romance, donde le daba cuenta de su desgracia y de los amores del hijo del Emperante con su esposa, todo de la misma manera que el romance lo canta.

El labrador estaba admirado oyendo aquellos disparates; y, quitándole la visera, que ya estaba hecha pedazos de los palos, le limpió el rostro, que le tenía cubierto de polvo; y apenas le hubo limpiado, cuando le conoció y le dijo:

-Señor Quijana -que así se debía de llamar cuando él tenía juicio y no había pasado de hidalgo sosegado a caballero andante-, ¿quién ha puesto a vuestra merced desta suerte?

Pero él seguía con su romance a cuanto le preguntaba. Viendo esto el buen hombre, lo mejor que pudo le quitó el peto y espaldas, para ver si tenía alguna herida; pero no vio sangre ni señal alguna. Procuró levantarle del suelo, y no con poco trabajo le subió sobre su jumento, por parecer caballería más sosegada. Recogió las armas, hasta las astillas de la lanza, y liólas sobre Rocinante, al cual tomó de la rienda, y del cabestro al asno, y se encaminó hacia su pueblo, bien pensativo de oír los disparates que don Quijote decía; y no menos iba don Quijote, que, de puro molido y quebrantado, no se podía tener sobre el borrico, y de cuando en cuando daba unos suspiros que los ponía en el cielo; de modo que de nuevo obligó a que el labrador le preguntase le dijese qué mal sentía; y no parece sino que el diablo le traía a la memoria los cuentos acomodados a sus sucesos, porque, en aquel punto, olvidándose de Valdovinos, se acordó del moro Abindarráez, cuando el alcaide de Antequera, Rodrigo de Narváez, le prendió y llevó cautivo a su alcaidía. De suerte que, cuando el labrador le volvió a preguntar que cómo estaba y qué sentía, le respondió las mismas palabras y razones que el cautivo Abencerraje respondía a Rodrigo de Narváez, del mismo modo que él había leído la historia en La Diana, de Jorge de Montemayor, donde se escribe; aprovechándose della tan a propósito, que el labrador se iba dando al diablo de oír tanta máquina de necedades; por donde conoció que su vecino estaba loco, y dábale prisa a llegar al pueblo, por escusar el enfado que don Quijote le causaba con su larga arenga. Al cabo de lo cual, dijo:

-Sepa vuestra merced, señor don Rodrigo de Narváez, que esta hermosa Jarifa que he dicho es ahora la linda Dulcinea del Toboso, por quien yo he hecho, hago y haré los más famosos hechos de caballerías que se han visto, vean ni verán en el mundo.

A esto respondió el labrador:

-Mire vuestra merced, señor, pecador de mí, que yo no soy don Rodrigo de Narváez, ni el marqués de Mantua, sino Pedro Alonso, su vecino; ni vuestra merced es Valdovinos, ni Abindarráez, sino el honrado hidalgo del señor Quijana.

-Yo sé quien soy -respondió don Quijote-; y sé que puedo ser no sólo los que he dicho, sino todos los Doce Pares de Francia, y aun todos los Nueve de la Fama, pues a todas las hazañas que ellos todos juntos y cada uno por sí hicieron, se aventajarán las mías.

En estas pláticas y en otras semejantes, llegaron al lugar a la hora que anoecía, pero el labrador aguardó a que fuese algo más noche, porque no viesen al molido hidalgo tan mal caballero. Llegada, pues, la hora que le pareció, entró en el pueblo, y en la casa de don Quijote, la cual halló toda alborotada; y estaban en ella el cura y el barbero del lugar, que eran grandes amigos de don Quijote, que estaba diciéndoles su ama a voces:

-¿Qué le parece a vuestra merced, señor licenciado Pero Pérez -que así se llamaba el cura-, de la desgracia de mi señor? Tres días ha que no parecen él, ni el rocín, ni la adarga, ni la lanza ni las armas. ¡Desventurada de mí!, que me doy a entender, y así es ello la verdad como nací para morir, que estos malditos libros de caballerías que él tiene y suele leer tan de ordinario le han vuelto el juicio; que ahora me acuerdo haberle oído decir muchas veces, hablando entre sí, que quería hacerse caballero andante e irse a buscar las aventuras por esos mundos. Encomendados sean a Satanás y a Barrabás tales libros, que así han echado a perder el más delicado entendimiento que había en toda la Mancha.

La sobrina decía lo mismo, y aun decía más:

-Sepa, señor maese Nicolás -que éste era el nombre del barbero-, que muchas veces le aconteció a mi señor tío estarse leyendo en estos desalmados libros de desventuras dos días con sus noches, al cabo de los cuales, arrojaba el libro de las manos, y ponía mano a la espada y andaba a cuchilladas con las paredes; y cuando estaba muy cansado, decía que había muerto a cuatro gigantes como cuatro torres, y el sudor que sudaba del cansancio decía que era sangre de las heridas que había recibido en la batalla; y bebíase luego un gran jarro de agua fría, y quedaba sano y sosegado, diciendo que aquella agua era una preciosísima bebida que le había traído el sabio Esquife, un grande encantador y amigo suyo. Mas yo me tengo la culpa de todo, que no avisé a vuestras mercedes de los disparates de mi señor tío, para que lo remediaran antes de llegar a lo que ha llegado, y quemaran todos estos descomulgados libros, que tiene muchos, que bien merecen ser abrasados, como si fuesen de herejes.

-Esto digo yo también -dijo el cura-, y a fee que no se pase el día de mañana sin que dellos no se haga acto público y sean condenados al fuego, porque no den ocasión a quien los leyere de hacer lo que mi buen amigo debe de haber hecho.

Todo esto estaban oyendo el labrador y don Quijote, con que acabó de entender el labrador la enfermedad de su vecino; y así, comenzó a decir a voces:

-Abran vuestras mercedes al señor Valdovinos y al señor marqués de Mantua, que viene malferido, y al señor moro Abindarráez, que trae cautivo el valeroso Rodrigo de Narváez, alcaide de Antequera.

A estas voces salieron todos y, como conocieron los unos a su amigo, las otras a su amo y tío, que aún no se había apeado del jumento, porque no podía, corrieron a abrazarle. Él dijo:

-Ténganse todos, que vengo malferido por la culpa de mi caballo. Llévenme a mi lecho y llámese, si fuere posible, a la sabia Urganda, que cure y cate de mis heridas.

-¡Mirá, en hora maza -dijo a este punto el ama-, si me decía a mí bien mi corazón del pie que cojeaba mi señor! Suba vuestra merced en buen hora, que, sin que venga esa Hurgada, le sabremos aquí curar. ¡Malditos, digo, sean otra vez y otras ciento estos libros de caballerías, que tal han parado a vuestra merced!

Lleváronle luego a la cama y, catándole las heridas, no le hallaron ninguna; y él dijo que todo era molimiento, por haber dado una gran caída con Rocinante, su caballo, combatiéndose con diez jayanes, los más desaforados y atrevidos que se pudieran fallar en gran parte de la tierra.

-¡Ta, ta! -dijo el cura-. ¿Jayanes hay en la danza? Para mi santiguada, que yo los queme mañana antes que llegue la noche.

Hiciéronle a don Quijote mil preguntas, y a ninguna quiso responder otra cosa sino que le diesen de comer y le dejasen dormir, que era lo que más le importaba. Hízose así, y el cura se informó muy a la larga del labrador del modo que había hallado a don Quijote. Él se lo contó todo, con los disparates que al hallarle y al traerle había dicho; que fue poner más deseo en el licenciado de hacer lo que otro día hizo, que fue llamar a su amigo el barbero maese Nicolás, con el cual se vino a casa de don Quijote.

Capítulo VI

Del donoso y grande escrutinio que el cura y el barbero hicieron en la librería de nuestro ingenioso hidalgo

EL CUAL aún todavía dormía. Pidió las llaves, a la sobrina, del aposento donde estaban los libros, autores del daño, y ella se las dio de muy buena gana. Entraron dentro todos, y la ama con ellos, y hallaron más de cien cuerpos de libros grandes, muy bien encuadernados, y otros pequeños; y, así como el ama los vio, volvióse a salir del aposento con gran prisa, y tornó luego con una escudilla de agua bendita y un hisopo, y dijo:

-Tome vuestra merced, señor licenciado: rocíe este aposento, no esté aquí algún encantador de los muchos que tienen estos libros, y nos encanten, en pena de las que les queremos dar echándolos del mundo.

Causó risa al licenciado la simplicidad del ama, y mandó al barbero que le fuese dando de aquellos libros uno a uno, para ver de qué trataban, pues podía ser hallar algunos que no mereciesen castigo de fuego.

-No -dijo la sobrina-, no hay para qué perdonar a ninguno, porque todos han sido los dañadores; mejor será arrojarlos por las ventanas al patio, y hacer un rintero dellos y pegarles fuego; y si no, llevarlos al corral, y allí se hará la hoguera, y no ofenderá el humo.

Lo mismo dijo el ama: tal era la gana que las dos tenían de la muerte de aquellos inocentes; mas el cura no vino en ello sin primero leer siquiera los títulos. Y el primero que maese Nicolás le dio en las manos fue Los cuatro de Amadís de Gaula, y dijo el cura:

-Parece cosa de misterio ésta; porque, según he oído decir, este libro fue el primero de caballerías que se imprimió en España, y todos los demás han tomado principio y origen deste; y así, me parece que, como a dogmatizador de una secta tan mala, le debemos, sin excusa alguna, condenar al fuego.

-No, señor -dijo el barbero-, que también he oído decir que es el mejor de todos los libros que de este género se han compuesto; y así, como a único en su arte, se debe perdonar.

-Así es verdad -dijo el cura-, y por esa razón se le otorga la vida por ahora. Veamos esotro que está junto a él.

-Es -dijo el barbero- las Sergas de Esplandián, hijo legítimo de Amadís de Gaula.

-Pues, en verdad -dijo el cura-que no le ha de valer al hijo la bondad del padre. Tomad, señora ama: abrid esa ventana y echadle al corral, y dé principio al montón de la hoguera que se ha de hacer.

Hízolo así el ama con mucho contento, y el bueno de Esplandián fue volando al corral, esperando con toda paciencia el fuego que le amenazaba.

-Adelante -dijo el cura.

-Este que viene -dijo el barbero-es Amadís de Grecia; y aun todos los deste lado, a lo que creo, son del mismo linaje de Amadís.

-Pues vayan todos al corral -dijo el cura-; que, a trueco de quemar a la reina Pintiquiniestra, y al pastor Darinel, y a sus églogas, y a las endiabladas y revueltas razones de su autor, quemaré con ellos al padre que me engendró, si anduviera en figura de caballero andante.

-De ese parecer soy yo -dijo el barbero.

-Y aun yo -añadió la sobrina.

-Pues así es -dijo el ama-, vengan, y al corral con ellos.

Diéronselos, que eran muchos, y ella ahorró la escalera y dio con ellos por la ventana abajo.

-¿Quién es ese tonel? -dijo el cura.

-Éste es -respondió el barbero- Don Olivante de Laura.

-El autor de ese libro -dijo el cura-fue el mismo que compuso a Jardín de flores; y en verdad que no sepa determinar cuál de los dos libros es más verdadero o, por decir mejor, menos mentiroso; sólo sé decir que éste irá al corral por disparatado y arrogante.

-Éste que se sigue es Florimorte de Hircania -dijo el barbero.

-¿Ahí está el señor Florimorte? -replicó el cura-. Pues a fe que ha de parar presto en el corral, a pesar de su extraño nacimiento y sonadas aventuras; que no da lugar a otra cosa la dureza y sequedad de su estilo. Al corral con él y con esotro, señora ama.

-Que me place, señor mío -respondía ella; y con mucha alegría ejecutaba lo que le era mandado.

-Éste es El Caballero Platir -dijo el barbero.

-Antiguo libro es ése -dijo el cura-, y no hallo en él cosa que merezca venia. Acompañe a los demás sin réplica.

Y así fue hecho. Abrióse otro libro y vieron que tenía por título El Caballero de la Cruz.

-Por nombre tan santo como este libro tiene, se podía perdonar su ignorancia; mas también se suele decir: «tras la cruz está el diablo»; vaya al fuego.

Tomando el barbero otro libro, dijo:

-Éste es Espejo de caballerías.

-Ya conozco a su merced -dijo el cura-. Ahí anda el señor Reinaldos de Montalbán con sus amigos y compañeros, más ladrones que Caco, y los doce Pares, con el verdadero historiador Turpín; y en verdad que estoy por condenarlos no más que a destierro perpetuo, siquiera porque tienen parte de la invención del famoso Mateo Boyardo, de donde también tejió su tela el cristiano poeta Ludovico Ariosto; al cual, si aquí le hallo, y que habla en otra lengua que la suya, no le guardaré respeto alguno; pero si habla en su idioma, le pondré sobre mi cabeza.

-Pues yo le tengo en italiano -dijo el barbero-, mas no le entiendo.

-Ni aun fuera bien que vos le entendiéades -respondió el cura-, y aquí le perdonáramos al señor capitán que no le hubiera traído a España y hecho castellano; que le quitó mucho de su natural valor, y lo mesmo harán todos aquellos que los libros de verso quisieren volver en otra lengua: que, por mucho cuidado que pongan y habilidad que muestren, jamás llegarán al punto que ellos tienen en su primer nacimiento. Digo, en efeto, que este libro, y todos los que se hallaren que tratan destas cosas de Francia, se echen y depositen en un pozo seco, hasta que con más acuerdo se vea lo que se ha de hacer dellos, ecetuando a un Bernardo del Carpio que anda por ahí y a otro llamado Roncesvalles; que éstos, en llegando a mis manos, han de estar en las del ama, y dellas en las del fuego, sin remisión alguna.

Todo lo confirmó el barbero, y lo tuvo por bien y por cosa muy acertada, por entender que era el cura tan buen cristiano y tan amigo de la verdad, que no diría otra cosa por todas las del mundo. Y, abriendo otro libro, vio que era Palmerín de Oliva, y junto a él estaba otro que se llamaba Palmerín de Inglaterra; lo cual visto por el licenciado, dijo:

-Esa oliva se haga luego rajas y se queme, que aun no queden della las cenizas; y esa palma de Inglaterra se guarde y se conserve como a cosa única, y se haga para ello otra caja como la que halló Alejandro en los despojos de Darío, que la diputó para guardar en ella las obras del poeta Homero. Este libro, señor compadre, tiene autoridad por dos cosas: la una, porque él por sí es muy bueno, y la otra, porque es fama que le compuso un discreto rey de Portugal. Todas las aventuras del castillo de Miraguarda son bonísimas y de grande artificio; las razones, cortesanas y claras, que guardan y miran el decoro del que habla con mucha propiedad y entendimiento. Digo, pues, salvo vuestro buen parecer, señor maese Nicolás, que éste y Amadís de Gaula queden libres del fuego, y todos los demás, sin hacer más cala y cata, perezcan.

-No, señor compadre -replicó el barbero-; que éste que aquí tengo es el afamado Don Belianís.

-Pues ése -replicó el cura-, con la segunda, tercera y cuarta parte, tienen necesidad de un poco de ruibarbo para purgar la demasiada cólera suya, y es menester quitarles todo aquello del castillo de la Fama y otras impertinencias de más importancia, para lo cual se les da término ultramarino, y como se enmendaren, así se usará con ellos de misericordia o de justicia; y en tanto, tenedlos vos, compadre, en vuestra casa, mas no los dejéis leer a ninguno.

-Que me place -respondió el barbero.

Y, sin querer cansarse más en leer libros de caballerías, mandó al ama que tomase todos los grandes y diese con ellos en el corral. No se dijo a tonta ni a sorda, sino a quien tenía más gana de quemallos que de echar una tela, por grande y delgada que fuera; y, asiendo casi ocho de una vez, los arrojó por la ventana. Por tomar muchos juntos, se le cayó uno a los pies del barbero, que le tomó gana de ver de quién era, y vio que decía: Historia del famoso caballero Tirante el Blanco.

-¡Válame Dios! -dijo el cura, dando una gran voz-. ¡Que aquí esté Tirante el Blanco! Dádmele acá, compadre; que hago cuenta que he hallado en él un tesoro de contento y una mina de pasatiempos. Aquí está don Quirieleisón de Montalbán, valeroso caballero, y su hermano Tomás de Montalbán, y el caballero Fonseca, con la batalla que el valiente de Tirante hizo con el alano, y las agudezas de la doncella Placerdemivida, con los amores y embustes de la viuda Reposada, y la señora Emperatriz, enamorada de Hipólito, su escudero. Dígoos verdad, señor compadre, que, por su estilo, es éste el mejor libro del mundo: aquí comen los caballeros, y duermen, y mueren en sus camas, y hacen testamento antes de su muerte, con estas cosas de que todos los demás libros deste género carecen. Con todo eso, os digo que merecía el que le compuso, pues no hizo tantas necesidades de industria, que le echaran a galeras por todos los días de su vida. Llévadle a casa y leedle, y veréis que es verdad cuanto dél os he dicho.

-Así será -respondió el barbero-; pero, ¿qué haremos destos pequeños libros que quedan?

-Éstos -dijo el cura-no deben de ser de caballerías, sino de poesía.

Y abriendo uno, vio que era La Diana, de Jorge de Montemayor, y dijo, creyendo que todos los demás eran del mismo género:

-Éstos no merecen ser quemados, como los demás, porque no hacen ni harán el daño que los de caballerías han hecho; que son libros de entendimiento, sin perjuicio de tercero.

-¡Ay señor! -dijo la sobrina-, bien los puede vuestra merced mandar quemar, como a los demás, porque no sería mucho que, habiendo sanado mi señor tío de la enfermedad caballeresca, leyendo éstos, se le antojase de hacerse pastor y andarse por los bosques y prados cantando y tañendo; y, lo que sería peor, hacerse poeta; que, según dicen, es enfermedad incurable y pegadiza.

-Verdad dice esta doncella -dijo el cura-, y será bien quitarle a nuestro amigo este tropiezo y ocasión delante. Y, pues comenzamos por La Diana de Montemayor, soy de parecer que no se queme, sino que se le quite todo aquello que trata de la sabia Felicia y de la agua encantada, y casi todos los versos mayores, y quédesele en hora buena la prosa, y la honra de ser primero en semejantes libros.

-Éste que se sigue -dijo el barbero-es La Diana llamada segunda del Salmantino; y éste, otro que tiene el mismo nombre, cuyo autor es Gil Polo.

-Pues la del Salmantino -respondió el cura-, acompañe y acreciente el número de los condenados al corral, y la de Gil Polo se guarde como si fuera del mismo Apolo; y pase adelante, señor compadre, y démonos prisa, que se va haciendo tarde.

-Este libro es -dijo el barbero, abriendo otro- Los diez libros de Fortuna de Amor, compuestos por Antonio de Lofraso, poeta sardo.

-Por las órdenes que recibí -dijo el cura-, que, desde que Apolo fue Apolo, y las musas musas, y los poetas poetas, tan gracioso ni tan disparatado libro como ése no se ha compuesto, y que, por su camino, es el mejor y el más único de cuantos deste género han salido a la luz del mundo; y el que no le ha leído puede hacer cuenta que no ha leído jamás cosa de gusto. Dádmele acá, compadre, que precio más haberle hallado que si me dieran una sotana de raja de Florencia.

Púsole aparte con grandísimo gusto, y el barbero prosiguió diciendo:

-Estos que se siguen son El Pastor de Iberia, Ninfas de Henares y Desengaños de celos.

-Pues no hay más que hacer -dijo el cura-, sino entregarlos al brazo seglar del ama; y no se me pregunte el porqué, que sería nunca acabar.

-Este que viene es El Pastor de Fílida.

-No es ése pastor -dijo el cura-, sino muy discreto cortesano; guárdese como joya preciosa.

-Este grande que aquí viene se intitula -dijo el barbero- Tesoro de varias poesías.

-Como ellas no fueran tantas -dijo el cura-, fueran más estimadas; menester es que este libro se escarde y limpie de algunas bajezas que entre sus grandezas tiene. Guárdese, porque su autor es amigo mío, y por respeto de otras más heroicas y levantadas obras que ha escrito.

-Éste es -siguió el barbero- El Cancionero de López Maldonado.

-También el autor de ese libro -replicó el cura-es grande amigo mío, y sus versos en su boca admiran a quien los oye; y tal es la suavidad de la voz con que los canta, que encanta. Algo largo es en las églogas, pero nunca lo bueno fue mucho: guárdese con los escogidos. Pero, ¿qué libro es ese que está junto a él?

-La Galatea, de Miguel de Cervantes -dijo el barbero.

-Muchos años ha que es grande amigo mío ese Cervantes, y sé que es más versado en desdichas que en versos. Su libro tiene algo de buena invención; propone algo, y no concluye nada: es menester esperar la segunda parte que promete; quizá con la emienda alcanzará del todo la misericordia que ahora se le niega; y, entre tanto que esto se ve, tenedle recluso en vuestra posada, señor compadre.

-Que me place -respondió el barbero-. Y aquí vienen tres, todos juntos: La Araucana, de don Alonso de Ercilla; La Austríada, de Juan Rufo, jurado de Córdoba, y El Monserrato, de Cristóbal de Virués, poeta valenciano.

-Todos esos tres libros -dijo el cura-son los mejores que, en verso heroico, en lengua castellana están escritos, y pueden competir con los más famosos de Italia: guárdense como las más ricas prendas de poesía que tiene España.

Cansóse el cura de ver más libros; y así, a carga cerrada, quiso que todos los demás se quemasen; pero ya tenía abierto uno el barbero, que se llamaba Las lágrimas de Angélica.

-Lloráralas yo -dijo el cura en oyendo el nombre-si tal libro hubiera mandado quemar; porque su autor fue uno de los famosos poetas del mundo, no sólo de España, y fue felicísimo en la traducción de algunas fábulas de Ovidio.

Capítulo VII

De la segunda salida de nuestro buen caballero don Quijote de la Mancha

ESTANDO en esto, comenzó a dar voces don Quijote, diciendo:

-¡Aquí, aquí, valerosos caballeros; aquí es menester mostrar la fuerza de vuestros valerosos brazos, que los cortesanos llevan lo mejor del torneo!

Por acudir a este ruido y estruendo, no se pasó adelante con el escrutinio de los demás libros que quedaban; y así, se cree que fueron al fuego, sin ser vistos ni oídos, La Carolea y León de España, con Los Hechos del Emperador, compuestos por don Luis de Ávila, que, sin duda, debían de estar entre los que quedaban; y quizá, si el cura los viera, no pasaran por tan rigurosa sentencia.

Cuando llegaron a don Quijote, ya él estaba levantado de la cama, y proseguía en sus voces y en sus desatinos, dando cuchilladas y reveses a todas partes, estando tan despierto como si nunca hubiera dormido. Abrazáronse con él, y por fuerza le volvieron al lecho; y, después que hubo sosegado un poco, volviéndose a hablar con el cura, le dijo:

-Por cierto, señor arzobispo Turpín, que es gran mengua de los que nos llamamos doce Pares dejar, tan sin más ni más, llevar la vitoria deste torneo a los caballeros cortesanos, habiendo nosotros los aventureros ganado el prez en los tres días antecedentes.

-Calle vuestra merced, señor compadre -dijo el cura-, que Dios será servido que la suerte se mude, y que lo que hoy se pierde se gane mañana; y atienda vuestra merced a su salud por agora, que me parece que debe de estar demasiadamente cansado, si ya no es que está malferido.

-Ferido no -dijo don Quijote-, pero molido y quebrantado, no hay duda en ello; porque aquel bastardo de don Roldán me ha molido a palos con el tronco de una encina, y todo de envidia, porque ve que yo solo soy el opuesto de sus valentías. Mas no me llamaría yo Reinaldos de Montalbán si, en levantándome deste lecho, no me lo pagare, a pesar de todos sus encantamentos; y, por agora, tráiganme de yantar, que sé que es lo que más me hará al caso, y quédese lo del vengarme a mi cargo.

Hiciéronlo ansí: diéronle de comer, y quedóse otra vez dormido, y ellos, admirados de su locura.

Aquella noche quemó y abrasó el ama cuantos libros había en el corral y en toda la casa, y tales debieron de arder que merecían guardarse en perpetuos archivos; mas no lo permitió su suerte y la pereza del escrutiñador; y así, se cumplió el refrán en ellos de que pagan a las veces justos por pecadores.

Uno de los remedios que el cura y el barbero dieron, por entonces, para el mal de su amigo, fue que le murasen y tapiasen el aposento de los libros, porque cuando se levantase no los hallase -quizá quitando la causa, cesaría el efeto-, y que dijese que un encantador se los había llevado, y el aposento y todo; y así fue hecho con mucha presteza.

De allí a dos días se levantó don Quijote, y lo primero que hizo fue ir a ver sus libros; y, como no hallaba el aposento donde le había dejado, andaba de una en otra parte buscándole. Llegaba adonde solía tener la puerta, y tentábala con las manos, y volvía y revolvía los ojos por todo, sin decir palabra; pero, al cabo de una buena pieza, preguntó a su ama que hacia qué parte estaba el aposento de sus libros. El ama, que ya estaba bien advertida de lo que había de responder, le dijo:

-¿Qué aposento, o qué nada, busca vuestra merced? Ya no hay aposento ni libros en esta casa, porque todo se lo llevó el mismo diablo.

-No era diablo -replicó la sobrina-, sino un encantador que vino sobre una nube una noche, después del día que vuestra merced de aquí se partió, y, apeándose de una sierpe en que venía caballero, entró en el aposento, y no sé lo que se hizo dentro, que a cabo de poca pieza salió volando por el tejado, y dejó la casa llena de humo; y, cuando acordamos a mirar lo que dejaba hecho, no vimos libro ni aposento alguno; sólo se nos acuerda muy bien a mí y al ama que, al tiempo del partirse aquel mal viejo, dijo en altas voces que, por enemistad secreta que tenía al dueño de aquellos libros y aposento, dejaba hecho el daño en aquella casa que después se vería. Dijo también que se llamaba el sabio Muñatón.

-Frestón diría -dijo don Quijote.

-No sé -respondió el ama-si se llamaba Frestón o Fritón; sólo sé que acabó en tón su nombre.

-Así es -dijo don Quijote-; que ése es un sabio encantador, grande enemigo mío, que me tiene ojeriza, porque sabe por sus artes y letras que tengo de venir, andando los tiempos, a pelear en singular batalla con un caballero a quien él favorece, y le tengo de vencer, sin que él lo pueda estorbar, y por esto procura hacerme todos los sinsabores que puede; y mándole yo que mal podrá él contradecir ni evitar lo que por el cielo está ordenado.

-¿Quién duda de eso? -dijo la sobrina-. Pero ¿quién le mete a vuestra merced, señor tío, en esas pendencias? ¿No será mejor estarse pacífico en su casa y no irse por el mundo a buscar pan de trastrigo, sin considerar que muchos van por lana y vuelven tresquilados?

-¡Oh sobrina mía -respondió don Quijote-, y cuán mal que estás en la cuenta! Primero que a mí me tresquilen, tendré peladas y quitadas las barbas a cuantos imaginaren tocarme en la punta de un solo cabello.

No quisieron las dos replicarle más, porque vieron que se le encendía la cólera.

Es, pues, el caso que él estuvo quince días en casa muy sosegado, sin dar muestras de querer segundar sus primeros devaneos, en los cuales días pasó graciosísimos cuentos con sus dos compadres el cura y el barbero, sobre que él decía que la cosa de que más necesidad tenía el mundo era de caballeros andantes y de que en él se resucitase la caballería andantesca. El cura algunas veces le contradecía y otras concedía, porque si no guardaba este artificio, no había poder averiguarse con él.

En este tiempo, solicitó don Quijote a un labrador vecino suyo, hombre de bien -si es que este título se puede dar al que es pobre-, pero de muy poca sal en la mollera. En resolución, tanto le dijo, tanto le persuadió y prometió, que el pobre villano se determinó de salirse con él y servirle de escudero. Decíale, entre otras cosas, don Quijote que se dispusiese a ir con él de buena gana, porque tal vez le podía suceder aventura que ganase, en quítame allá esas pajas, alguna ínsula, y le dejase a él por gobernador della. Con estas promesas y otras tales, Sancho Panza, que así se llamaba el labrador, dejó su mujer y hijos y asentó por escudero de su vecino.

Dio luego don Quijote orden en buscar dineros; y, vendiendo una cosa y empeñando otra, y malbaratándolas todas, llegó una razonable cantidad. Acomodóse asimesmo de una rodela, que pidió prestada a un su amigo, y, pertrechando su rota celada lo mejor que pudo, avisó a su escudero Sancho del día y la hora que pensaba ponerse en camino, para que él se acomodase de lo que viese que más le era menester. Sobre todo le encargó que llevase alforjas; e dijo que sí llevaría, y que ansimesmo pensaba llevar un asno que tenía muy bueno, porque él no estaba duecho a andar mucho a pie. En lo del asno reparó un poco don Quijote, imaginando si se le acordaba si algún caballero andante había traído escudero caballero asnalmente, pero nunca le vino alguno a la memoria; mas, con todo esto, determinó que le llevase, con presupuesto de acomodarle de más honrada caballería en habiendo ocasión para ello, quitándole el caballo al primer descortés caballero que topase. Proveyóse de camisas y de las demás cosas que él pudo, conforme al consejo que el ventero le había dado; todo lo cual hecho y cumplido, sin despedirse Panza de sus hijos y mujer, ni don Quijote de su ama y sobrina, una noche se salieron del lugar sin que persona los viese; en la cual caminaron tanto, que al amanecer se tuvieron por seguros de que no los hallarían aunque los buscasen.

Iba Sancho Panza sobre su jumento como un patriarca, con sus alforjas y su bota, y con mucho deseo de verse ya gobernador de la ínsula que su amo le había prometido. Acertó don Quijote a tomar la misma derrota y camino que el que él había tomado en su primer viaje, que fue por el campo de Montiel, por el cual caminaba con menos pesadumbre que la vez pasada, porque, por ser la hora de la mañana y herirles a soslayo los rayos del sol, no les fatigaban. Dijo en esto Sancho Panza a su amo:

-Mire vuestra merced, señor caballero andante, que no se le olvide lo que de la ínsula me tiene prometido; que yo la sabré gobernar, por grande que sea.

A lo cual le respondió don Quijote:

-Has de saber, amigo Sancho Panza, que fue costumbre muy usada de los caballeros andantes antiguos hacer gobernadores a sus escuderos de las ínsulas o reinos que ganaban, y yo tengo determinado de que por mí no falte tan agradecida usanza; antes, pienso aventajarme en ella: porque ellos algunas veces, y quizá las más, esperaban a que sus escuderos fuesen viejos; y, ya después de hartos de servir y de llevar malos días y peores noches, les daban algún título de conde, o, por lo mucho, de marqués, de algún valle o provincia de poco más a menos; pero, si tú vives y yo vivo, bien podría ser que antes de seis días ganase yo tal reino que tuviese otros a él adherentes, que viniesen de molde para coronarte por rey de uno dellos. Y no lo tengas a mucho, que cosas y casos acontecen a los tales caballeros, por modos tan nunca vistos ni pensados, que con facilidad te podría dar aún más de lo que te prometo.

-De esa manera -respondió Sancho Panza-, si yo fuese rey por algún milagro de los que vuestra merced dice, por lo menos, Juana Gutiérrez, mi oísló, vendría a ser reina, y mis hijos infantiles.

-Pues ¿quién lo duda? -respondió don Quijote.

-Yo lo dudo -replicó Sancho Panza-; porque tengo para mí que, aunque lloviese Dios reinos sobre la tierra, ninguno asentaría bien sobre la cabeza de Mari Gutiérrez. Sepa, señor, que no vale dos maravedís para reina; condesa le caerá mejor, y aun Dios y ayuda.

-Encomiéndalo tú a Dios, Sancho -respondió don Quijote-, que Él dará lo que más le convenga, pero no apoques tu ánimo tanto, que te vengas a contentar con menos que con ser adelantado.

-No lo haré, señor mío -respondió Sancho-; y más teniendo tan principal amo en vuestra merced, que me sabrá dar todo aquello que me esté bien y yo pueda llevar.

Capítulo VIII

Del buen suceso que el valeroso don Quijote tuvo en la espantable y jamás imaginada aventura de los molinos de viento, con otros sucesos dignos de felice recordación

EN ESTO, descubrieron treinta o cuarenta molinos de viento que hay en aquel campo; y, así como don Quijote los vio, dijo a su escudero:

-La ventura va guiando nuestras cosas mejor de lo que acertáramos a desear, porque ves allí, amigo Sancho Panza, donde se descubren treinta, o pocos más, desaforados gigantes, con quien pienso hacer batalla y quitarles a todos las vidas, con cuyos despojos comenzaremos a enriquecer; que ésta es buena guerra, y es gran servicio de Dios quitar tan mala simiente de sobre la faz de la tierra.

-¿Qué gigantes? -dijo Sancho Panza.

-Aquellos que allí ves -respondió su amo-de los brazos largos, que los suelen tener algunos de casi dos leguas.

-Mire vuestra merced -respondió Sancho-que aquellos que allí se parecen no son gigantes, sino molinos de viento, y lo que en ellos parecen brazos son las aspas, que, volteadas del viento, hacen andar la piedra del molino.

-Bien parece -respondió don Quijote-que no estás cursado en esto de las aventuras: ellos son gigantes; y si tienes miedo, quítate de ahí, y ponte en oración en el espacio que yo voy a entrar con ellos en fiera y desigual batalla.

Y, diciendo esto, dio de espuelas a su caballo Rocinante, sin atender a las voces que su escudero Sancho le daba, advirtiéndole que, sin duda alguna, eran molinos de viento, y no gigantes, aquellos que iba a acometer. Pero él iba tan puesto en que eran gigantes, que ni oía las voces de su escudero Sancho ni echaba de ver, aunque estaba ya bien cerca, lo que eran; antes, iba diciendo en voces altas:

-Non fuyades, cobardes y viles criaturas, que un solo caballero es el que os acomete.

Levantóse en esto un poco de viento y las grandes aspas comenzaron a moverse, lo cual visto por don Quijote, dijo:

-Pues, aunque mováis más brazos que los del gigante Briareo, me lo habéis de pagar.

Y, en diciendo esto y encomendándose de todo corazón a su señora Dulcinea, pidiéndole que en tal trance le socorriese, bien cubierto de su rodela, con la lanza en el ristre, arremetió a todo el galope de Rocinante y embistió con el primero molino que estaba delante; y, dándole una lanzada en el aspa, la volvió el viento con tanta furia que hizo la lanza pedazos, llevándose tras sí al caballo y al caballero, que fue rodando muy maltrecho por el campo. Acudió Sancho Panza a socorrerle, a todo el correr de su asno, y cuando llegó halló que no se podía menear: tal fue el golpe que dio con él Rocinante.

-¡Válame Dios! -dijo Sancho-. ¿No le dije yo a vuestra merced que mirase bien lo que hacía, que no eran sino molinos de viento, y no lo podía ignorar sino quien llevase otros tales en la cabeza?

-Calla, amigo Sancho -respondió don Quijote-, que las cosas de la guerra, más que otras, están sujetas a continua mudanza; cuanto más, que yo pienso, y es así verdad, que aquel sabio Frestón que me robó el aposento y los libros ha vuelto estos gigantes en molinos por quitarme la gloria de su vencimiento: tal es la enemistad que me tiene; mas, al cabo al cabo, han de poder poco sus malas artes contra la bondad de mi espada.

-Dios lo haga como puede -respondió Sancho Panza.

Y, ayudándole a levantar, tornó a subir sobre Rocinante, que medio despaldado estaba. Y, hablando en la pasada aventura, siguieron el camino del Puerto Lápice, porque allí decía don Quijote que no era posible dejar de hallarse muchas y diversas aventuras, por ser lugar muy pasajero; sino que iba muy pesaroso por haberle faltado la lanza; y, diciéndoselo a su escudero, le dijo:

-Yo me acuerdo haber leído que un caballero español, llamado Diego Pérez de Vargas, habiéndosele en una batalla roto la espada, desgajó de una encina un pesado ramo o tronco, y con él hizo tales cosas aquel día, y machacó tantos moros, que le quedó por sobrenombre Machuca, y así él como sus descendientes se llamaron, desde aquel día en adelante, Vargas y Machuca. Hete dicho esto, porque de la primera encina o roble que se me depare pienso desgajar otro tronco tal y tan bueno como aquél, que me imagino y pienso hacer con él tales hazañas, que tú te tengas por bien afortunado de haber merecido venir a velas y a ser testigo de cosas que apenas podrán ser creídas.

-A la mano de Dios -dijo Sancho-; yo lo creo todo así como vuestra merced lo dice; pero enderécese un poco, que parece que va de medio lado, y debe de ser del molimiento de la caída.

-Así es la verdad -respondió don Quijote-; y si no me quejo del dolor, es porque no es dado a los caballeros andantes quejarse de herida alguna, aunque se le salgan las tripas por ella.

-Si eso es así, no tengo yo qué replicar -respondió Sancho-, pero sabe Dios si yo me holgara que vuestra merced se quejara cuando alguna cosa le doliera. De mí sé decir que me he de quejar del más pequeño dolor que tenga, si ya no se entiende también con los escuderos de los caballeros andantes eso del no quejarse.

No se dejó de reír don Quijote de la simplicidad de su escudero; y así, le declaró que podía muy bien quejarse, como y cuando quisiese, sin gana o con ella; que hasta entonces no había leído cosa en contrario en la orden de caballería. Díjole Sancho que mirase que era hora de comer. Respondióle su amo que por entonces no le hacía menester; que comiese él cuando se le antojase. Con esta licencia, se acomodó Sancho lo mejor que pudo sobre su jumento y, sacando de las alforjas lo que en ellas había puesto, iba caminando y comiendo detrás de su amo muy de su espacio, y de cuando en cuando empinaba la bota, con tanto gusto, que le pudiera envidiar el más regalado bodegonero de Málaga. Y, en tanto que él iba de aquella manera menudeando tragos, no se le acordaba de ninguna promesa que su amo le hubiese hecho, ni tenía por ningún trabajo, sino por mucho descanso, andar buscando las aventuras, por peligrosas que fuesen.

En resolución, aquella noche la pasaron entre unos árboles, y del uno dellos desgajó don Quijote un ramo seco que casi le podía servir de lanza, y puso en él el hierro que quitó de la que se le había quebrado. Toda aquella noche no durmió don Quijote, pensando en su señora Dulcinea, por acomodarse a lo que había leído en sus libros, cuando los caballeros pasaban sin dormir muchas noches en las florestas y despoblados, entretenidos con las memorias de sus señoras. No la pasó así Sancho Panza, que, como tenía el estómago lleno, y no de agua de chicoria, de un sueño se la llevó toda; y no fueran parte para despertarle, si su amo no lo llamara, los rayos del sol, que le daban en el rostro, ni el canto de las aves, que, muchas y muy regocijadamente, la venida del nuevo día saludaban. Al levantarse dio un tiento a la bota, y hallóla algo más flaca que la noche antes; y afligiósele el corazón, por parecerle que no llevaban camino de remediar tan presto su falta. No quiso desayunarse don Quijote, porque, como está dicho, dio en sustentarse de sabrosas memorias. Tornaron a su comenzado camino del Puerto Lápice, y a obra de las tres del día le descubrieron.

-Aquí -dijo, en viéndole, don Quijote-podemos, hermano Sancho Panza, meter las manos hasta los codos en esto que llaman aventuras. Mas advierte que, aunque me veas en los mayores peligros del mundo, no has de poner mano a tu espada para defenderme, si ya no vieres que los que me ofenden es canalla y gente baja, que en tal caso bien puedes ayudarme; pero si fueren caballeros, en ninguna manera te es lícito ni concedido por las leyes de caballería que me ayudes, hasta que seas armado caballero.

-Por cierto, señor -respondió Sancho-, que vuestra merced sea muy bien obedecido en esto; y más, que yo de mí me soy pacífico y enemigo de meterme en ruidos ni pendencias. Bien es verdad que, en lo que tocara a defender mi persona, no tendré mucha cuenta con esas leyes, pues las divinas y humanas permiten que cada uno se defienda de quien quisiere agraviarle.

-No digo yo menos -respondió don Quijote-; pero, en esto de ayudarme contra caballeros, has de tener a raya tus naturales ímpetus.

-Digo que así lo haré -respondió Sancho-, y que guardaré ese precepto tan bien como el día del domingo.

Estando en estas razones, asomaron por el camino dos frailes de la orden de San Benito, caballeros sobre dos dromedarios: que no eran más pequeñas dos mulas en que venían. Traían sus antojos de camino y sus quitasoles. Detrás dellos venía un coche, con cuatro o cinco de a caballo que le acompañaban y dos mozos de mulas a pie. Venía en el coche, como después se supo, una señora vizcaína, que iba a Sevilla, donde estaba su marido, que pasaba a las Indias con un muy honroso cargo. No venían los frailes con ella, aunque iban el mismo camino; mas, apenas los divisó don Quijote, cuando dijo a su escudero:

-O yo me engaño, o ésta ha de ser la más famosa aventura que se haya visto; porque aquellos bultos negros que allí parecen deben de ser, y son sin duda, algunos encantadores que llevan hurtada alguna princesa en aquel coche, y es menester deshacer este tuerto a todo mi poderío.

-Peor será esto que los molinos de viento -dijo Sancho-. Mire, señor, que aquéllos son frailes de San Benito, y el coche debe de ser de alguna gente pasajera. Mire que digo que mire bien lo que hace, no sea el diablo que le engañe.

-Ya te he dicho, Sancho -respondió don Quijote-, que sabes poco de achaque de aventuras; lo que yo digo es verdad, y ahora lo verás.

Y, diciendo esto, se adelantó y se puso en la mitad del camino por donde los frailes venían y, en llegando tan cerca que a él le pareció que le podrían oír lo que dijese, en alta voz dijo:

-Gente endiablada y descomunal, dejad luego al punto las altas princesas que en ese coche lleváis forzadas; si no, aparejaos a recibir presta muerte, por justo castigo de vuestras malas obras.

Detuvieron los frailes las riendas, y quedaron admirados, así de la figura de don Quijote como de sus razones, a las cuales respondieron:

-Señor caballero, nosotros no somos endiablados ni descomunales, sino dos religiosos de San Benito que vamos nuestro camino, y no sabemos si en este coche vienen, o no, ningunas forzadas princesas.

-Para conmigo no hay palabras blandas, que ya yo os conozco, fementida canalla -dijo don Quijote.

Y, sin esperar más respuesta, picó a Rocinante y, la lanza baja, arremetió contra el primero fraile, con tanta furia y desnudo que, si el fraile no se dejara caer de la mula, él le hiciera venir al suelo mal de su grado, y aun malferido, si no cayera muerto. El segundo religioso, que vio del modo que trataban a su compañero, puso piernas al castillo de su buena mula, y comenzó a correr por aquella campaña, más ligero que el mismo viento.

Sancho Panza, que vio en el suelo al fraile, apeándose ligeramente de su asno, arremetió a él y le comenzó a quitar los hábitos. Llegaron en esto dos mozos de los frailes y preguntáronle que por qué le desnudaba. Respondióles Sancho que aquello le tocaba a él legítimamente, como despojos de la batalla que su señor don Quijote había ganado. Los mozos, que no sabían de burlas, ni entendían aquello de despojos ni batallas, viendo que ya don Quijote estaba desviado de allí, hablando con las que en el coche venían, arremetieron con Sancho y dieron con él en el suelo; y, sin dejarle pelo en las barbas, le molieron a coces y le dejaron tendido en el suelo sin aliento ni sentido. Y, sin detenerse un punto, tornó a subir el fraile, todo temeroso y acobardado y sin color en el rostro; y, cuando se vio a caballo, picó tras su compañero, que un buen espacio de allí le estaba aguardando, y esperando en qué paraba aquel sobresalto; y, sin querer aguardar el fin de todo aquel comenzado suceso, siguieron su camino, haciéndose más cruces que si llevaran al diablo a las espaldas.

Don Quijote estaba, como se ha dicho, hablando con la señora del coche, diciéndole:

-La vuestra fermosura, señora mía, puede facer de su persona lo que más le viniere en talante, porque ya la soberbia de vuestros robadores yace por el suelo, derribada por este mi fuerte brazo; y, porque no penéis por saber el nombre de vuestro libertador, sabed que yo me llamo don Quijote de la Mancha, caballero andante y aventurero, y cautivo de la sin par y hermosa doña Dulcinea del Toboso; y, en pago del beneficio que de mí habéis recibido, no quiero otra cosa sino que volváis al Toboso, y que de mi parte os presentéis ante esta señora y le digáis lo que por vuestra libertad he fecho.

Todo esto que don Quijote decía escuchaba un escudero de los que el coche acompañaban, que era vizcaíno; el cual, viendo que no quería dejar pasar el coche adelante, sino que decía que luego había de dar la vuelta al Toboso, se fue para don Quijote y, asiéndole de la lanza, le dijo, en mala lengua castellana y peor vizcaína, desta manera:

-Anda, caballero que mal andes; por el Dios que crióme, que, si no dejas coche, así te matas como estás ahí vizcaíno.

Entendióle muy bien don Quijote, y con mucho sosiego le respondió:

-Si fueras caballero, como no lo eres, ya yo hubiera castigado tu sandez y atrevimiento, cautiva criatura.

A lo cual replicó el vizcaíno:

-¿Yo no caballero? Juro a Dios tan mientes como cristiano. Si lanza arrojas y espada sacas, ¡el agua cuán presto verás que al gato llevas! Vizcaíno por tierra, hidalgo por mar, hidalgo por el diablo; y mientes que mira si otra dices cosa.

-¡Ahora lo veredes, dijo Agrajes! -respondió don Quijote.

Y, arrojando la lanza en el suelo, sacó su espada y embrazó su rodela, y arremetió al vizcaíno con determinación de quitarle la vida. El vizcaíno, que así le vio venir, aunque quisiera apearse de la mula, que, por ser de las malas de alquiler, no había que fiar en ella, no pudo hacer otra cosa sino sacar su espada; pero avínole bien que se halló junto al coche, de donde pudo tomar una almohada que le sirvió de escudo, y luego se fueron el uno para el otro, como si fueran dos mortales enemigos. La demás gente quisiera ponerlos en paz, mas no pudo, porque decía el vizcaíno en sus mal trabadas razones que si no le dejaban acabar su batalla, que él mismo había de matar a su ama y a toda la gente que se lo estorbase. La señora del coche, admirada y temerosa de lo que veía, hizo al cochero que se desviase de allí algún poco, y desde lejos se puso a mirar la rigurosa contienda, en el discurso de la cual dio el vizcaíno una gran cuchillada a don Quijote encima de un hombro, por encima de la rodela, que, a dársela sin defensa, le abriera hasta la cintura. Don Quijote, que sintió la pesadumbre de aquel desaforado golpe, dio una gran voz, diciendo:

-¡Oh señora de mi alma, Dulcinea, flor de la fermosura, socorred a este vuestro caballero, que, por satisfacer a la vuestra mucha bondad, en este riguroso trance se halla!

El decir esto, y el apretar la espada, y el cubrirse bien de su rodela, y el arremeter al vizcaíno, todo fue en un tiempo, llevando determinación de aventurarlo todo a la de un golpe solo.

El vizcaíno, que así le vio venir contra él, bien entendió por su desnudo su coraje, y determinó de hacer lo mismo que don Quijote; y así, le aguardó bien cubierto de su almohada, sin poder rodear la mula a una ni a otra parte; que ya, de puro cansada y no hecha a semejantes niñerías, no podía dar un paso.

Venía, pues, como se ha dicho, don Quijote contra el cauto vizcaíno, con la espada en alto, con determinación de abrirle por medio, y el vizcaíno le aguardaba ansimesmo levantada la espada y aforrado con su almohada, y todos los circunstantes estaban temerosos y colgados de lo que había de suceder de aquellos tamaños golpes con que se amenazaban; y la señora del coche y las demás criadas suyas estaban haciendo mil votos y ofrecimientos a todas las imágenes y casas de devoción de España, porque Dios librase a su escudero y a ellas de aquel tan grande peligro en que se hallaban.

Pero está el daño de todo esto que en este punto y término deja pendiente el autor desta historia esta batalla, disculpándose que no halló más escrito destas hazañas de don Quijote de las que deja referidas. Bien es verdad que el segundo autor desta obra no quiso creer que tan curiosa historia estuviese entregada a las leyes del olvido, ni que hubiesen sido tan poco curiosos los ingenios de la Mancha que no tuviesen en sus archivos o en sus escritorios algunos papeles que deste famoso caballero tratasen; y así, con esta imaginación, no se desesperó de hallar el fin desta apacible historia, el cual, siéndole el cielo favorable, le halló del modo que se contará en la segunda parte.

Segunda parte del ingenioso hidalgo don Quijote de la Mancha

Capítulo IX

Donde se concluye y da fin a la estupenda batalla que el gallardo vizcaíno y el valiente manchego tuvieron

DEJAMOS en la primera parte desta historia al valeroso vizcaíno y al famoso don Quijote con las espadas altas y desnudas, en guisa de descargar dos furibundos fendientes, tales que, si en lleno se acertaban, por lo menos se dividirían y fenderían de arriba abajo y abrirían como una granada; y que en aquel punto tan dudoso paró y quedó destroncada tan sabrosa historia, sin que nos diese noticia su autor dónde se podría hallar lo que della faltaba.

Causóme esto mucha pesadumbre, porque el gusto de haber leído tan poco se volvía en disgusto, de pensar el mal camino que se ofrecía para hallar lo mucho que, a mi parecer, faltaba de tan sabroso cuento. Parecióme cosa imposible y fuera de toda buena costumbre que a tan buen caballero le hubiese faltado algún sabio que tomara a cargo el escrebir sus nunca vistas hazañas, cosa que no faltó a ninguno de los caballeros andantes,

de los que dicen las gentes
que van a sus aventuras,

porque cada uno dellos tenía uno o dos sabios, como de molde, que no solamente escribían sus hechos, sino que pintaban sus más mínimos pensamientos y niñerías, por más escondidas que fuesen; y no había de ser tan desdichado tan buen caballero, que le faltase a él lo que sobró a Platir y a otros semejantes. Y así, no podía inclinarme a creer que tan gallarda historia hubiese quedado manca y estropeada; y echaba la culpa a la malignidad del tiempo, devorador y consumidor de todas las cosas, el cual, o la tenía oculta o consumida.

Por otra parte, me parecía que, pues entre sus libros se habían hallado tan modernos como Desengaño de celos y Ninfas y pastores de Henares, que también su historia debía de ser moderna; y que, ya que no estuviese escrita, estaría en la memoria de la gente de su aldea y de las a ella circunvecinas. Esta imaginación me traía confuso y deseoso de saber, real y verdaderamente, toda la vida y milagros de nuestro famoso español don Quijote de la Mancha, luz y espejo de la caballería manchega, y el primero que en nuestra edad y en estos tan calamitosos tiempos se puso al trabajo y ejercicio de las andantes armas, y al desfacer agravios, socorrer viudas, amparar doncellas, de aquellas que andaban con sus azotes y palafrenes, y con toda su virginidad a cuestras, de monte en monte y de valle en valle; que, si no era que algún follón, o algún villano de hacha y capellina, o algún descomunal gigante las forzaba, doncella hubo en los pasados tiempos que, al cabo de ochenta años, que en todos ellos no durmió un día debajo de tejado, y se fue tan entera a la sepultura como la madre que la había parido. Digo, pues, que, por estos y otros muchos respetos, es digno nuestro gallardo Quijote de continuas y memorables alabanzas; y aun a mí no se me deben negar, por el trabajo y diligencia que puse en buscar el fin desta agradable historia; aunque bien sé que si el cielo, el caso y la fortuna no me ayudan, el mundo quedará falto y sin el pasatiempo y gusto que bien casi dos horas podrá tener el que con atención la leyere. Pasó, pues, el hallarla en esta manera:

Estando yo un día en el Alcaná de Toledo, llegó un muchacho a vender unos cartapacios y papeles viejos a un sedero; y, como yo soy aficionado a leer, aunque sean los papeles rotos de las calles, llevado desta mi natural inclinación, tomé un cartapacio de los que el muchacho vendía, y vile con caracteres que conocí ser arábigos. Y, puesto que, aunque los conocía, no los sabía leer, anduve mirando si parecía por allí algún morisco aljamiado que los leyese; y no fue muy dificultoso hallar intérprete semejante, pues, aunque le buscara de otra mejor y más antigua lengua, le hallara. En fin, la suerte me deparó uno, que, diciéndole mi deseo y poniéndole el libro en las manos, le abrió por medio y, leyendo un poco en él, se comenzó a reír.

Preguntéle yo que de qué se reía, y respondiome que de una cosa que tenía aquel libro escrita en el margen por anotación. Díjele que me la dijese; y él, sin dejar la risa, dijo:

-Está, como he dicho, aquí en el margen escrito esto: «Esta Dulcinea del Toboso, tantas veces en esta historia referida, dicen que tuvo la mejor mano para salar puercos que otra mujer de toda la Mancha».

Cuando yo oí decir «Dulcinea del Toboso», quedé atónito y suspenso, porque luego se me representó que aquellos cartapacios contenían la historia de don Quijote. Con esta imaginación, le di priesa que leyese el principio y, haciéndolo así, volviendo de improviso el arábigo en castellano, dijo que decía: Historia de don Quijote de la Mancha, escrita por Cide Hamete Benengeli, historiador arábigo. Mucha discreción fue menester para disimular el contento que recibí cuando llegué a mis oídos el título del libro; y, salteándosele al sedero, compré al muchacho todos los papeles y cartapacios por medio real; que, si él tuviera discreción y supiera lo que yo los deseaba, bien se pudiera prometer y llevar más de seis reales de la compra. Apartéme luego con el morisco por el claustro de la iglesia mayor, y roguéle me volviese aquellos cartapacios, todos los que trataban de don Quijote, en lengua castellana, sin quitarles ni añadirles nada, ofreciéndole la paga que él quisiese. Contentóse con dos arrobas de pasas y dos fanegas de trigo, y prometió de traducirlos bien y fielmente y con mucha brevedad. Pero yo, por facilitar más el negocio y por no dejar de la mano tan buen hallazgo, le truje a mi casa, donde en poco más de mes y medio la tradujo toda, del mismo modo que aquí se refiere.

Estaba en el primero cartapacio, pintada muy al natural, la batalla de don Quijote con el vizcaíno, puestos en la misma postura que la historia cuenta, levantadas las espadas, el uno cubierto de su rodela, el otro de la almohada, y la mula del vizcaíno tan al vivo, que estaba mostrando ser de alquiler a tiro de ballesta. Tenía a los pies escrito el vizcaíno un título que decía: Don Sancho de Azpetia, que, sin duda, debía de ser su nombre, y a los pies de Rocinante estaba otro que decía: Don Quijote. Estaba Rocinante maravillosamente pintado, tan largo y tendido, tan atenuado y flaco, con tanto espinazo, tan hético confirmado, que mostraba bien al descubierto con cuánta advertencia y propiedad se le había puesto el nombre de Rocinante. Junto a él estaba Sancho Panza, que tenía del cabestro a su asno, a los pies del cual estaba otro rétulo que decía: Sancho Zancas, y debía de ser que tenía, a lo que mostraba la pintura, la barriga grande, el talle corto y las zancas largas; y por esto se le debió de poner nombre de Panza y de Zancas, que con estos dos sobrenombres le llama algunas veces la historia. Otras algunas menudencias había que advertir, pero todas son de poca importancia y que no hacen al caso a la verdadera relación de la historia; que ninguna es mala como sea verdadera.

Si a ésta se le puede poner alguna objeción cerca de su verdad, no podrá ser otra sino haber sido su autor árabe, siendo muy propio de los de aquella nación ser mentirosos; aunque, por ser tan nuestros enemigos, antes se puede entender haber quedado falto en ella que demasiado. Y ansí me parece a mí, pues, cuando pudiera y debiera estender la pluma en las alabanzas de tan buen caballero, parece que de industria las pasa en silencio: cosa mal hecha y peor pensada, habiendo y debiendo ser los historiadores puntuales, verdaderos y no nada apasionados, y que ni el interés ni el miedo, el rancor ni la afición, no les hagan torcer del camino de la verdad, cuya madre es la historia, émula del tiempo, depósito de las acciones, testigo de lo pasado, ejemplo y aviso de lo presente, advertencia de lo por venir. En ésta sé que se hallará todo lo que se acertare a desear en la más apacible; y si algo bueno en ella faltare, para mí tengo que fue por culpa del galgo de su autor, antes que por falta del sujeto. En fin, su segunda parte, siguiendo la traducción, comenzaba desta manera:

Puestas y levantadas en alto las cortadoras espadas de los dos valerosos y enojados combatientes, no parecía sino que estaban amenazando al cielo, a la tierra y al abismo: tal era el desnudo y continente que tenían. Y el primero que fue a descargar el golpe fue el colérico vizcaíno, el cual fue dado con tanta fuerza y tanta furia que, a no volvérselo la espada en el camino, aquel solo golpe fuera bastante para dar fin a su rigurosa contienda y a todas las aventuras de nuestro caballero; mas la buena suerte, que para mayores cosas le tenía guardado, torció la espada de su contrario, de modo que, aunque le acertó en el hombro izquierdo, no le hizo otro daño que desarmarle todo aquel lado, llevándole de camino gran parte de la celada, con la mitad de la oreja; que todo ello con espantosa ruina vino al suelo, dejándole muy maltrecho.

¡Válame Dios, y quién será aquel que buenamente pueda contar ahora la rabia que entró en el corazón de nuestro manchego, viéndose parar de aquella manera! No se diga más, sino que fue de manera que se alzó de nuevo en los estribos y, apretando más la espada en las dos manos, con tal furia descargó sobre el vizcaíno, acertándole de lleno sobre la almohada y sobre la cabeza, que, sin ser parte tan buena defensa, como si cayera sobre él una montaña, comenzó a echar sangre por las narices, y por la boca y por los oídos, y a dar muestras de caer de la mula abajo, de donde cayera, sin duda, si no se abrazara con el cuello; pero, con todo eso, sacó los pies de los estribos y luego soltó los brazos; y la mula, espantada del terrible golpe, dio a correr por el campo, y a pocos corcovos dio con su dueño en tierra.

Estábaselo con mucho sosiego mirando don Quijote y, como lo vio caer, saltó de su caballo y con mucha ligereza se llegó a él y, poniéndole la punta de la espada en los ojos, le dijo que se rindiese; si no, que le cortaría la cabeza. Estaba el vizcaíno tan turbado que no podía responder palabra, y él lo pasara mal, según estaba ciego don Quijote, si las señoras del coche, que hasta entonces con gran desmayo habían mirado la pendencia, no fueran adonde estaba y le pidieran con mucho encarecimiento les hiciese tan gran merced y favor de perdonar la vida a aquel su escudero. A lo cual don Quijote respondió, con mucho entono y gravedad:

-Por cierto, hermosas señoras, yo soy muy contento de hacer lo que me pedís; mas ha de ser con una condición y concierto, y es que este caballero me ha de prometer de ir al lugar del Toboso y presentarse de mi parte ante la sin par doña Dulcinea, para que ella haga dél lo que más fuere de su voluntad.

La temerosa y desconsolada señora, sin entrar en cuenta de lo que don Quijote pedía, y sin preguntar quién Dulcinea fuese, le prometió que el escudero haría todo aquello que de su parte le fuese mandado.

-Pues en fe de esa palabra, yo no le haré más daño, puesto que me lo tenía bien merecido.

Capítulo X

De lo que más le avino a don Quijote con el vizcaíno, y del peligro en que se vio con una turba de yangüeses

YA EN ESTE tiempo se había levantado Sancho Panza, algo maltratado de los mozos de los frailes, y había estado atento a la batalla de su señor don Quijote, y rogaba a Dios en su corazón fuese servido de darle vitoria y que en ella ganase alguna ínsula de donde le hiciese gobernador, como se lo había prometido. Viendo, pues, ya acabada la pendencia, y que su amo volvía a subir sobre Rocinante, llegó a tenerle el estribo; y antes que subiese se hincó de rodillas delante dél, y, asiéndole de la mano, se la besó y le dijo:

-Sea vuestra merced servido, señor don Quijote mío, de darme el gobierno de la ínsula que en esta rigurosa pendencia se ha ganado; que, por grande que sea, yo me siento con fuerzas de saberla gobernar tal y tan bien como otro que haya gobernado ínsulas en el mundo.

A lo cual respondió don Quijote:

-Advertid, hermano Sancho, que esta aventura y las a ésta semejantes no son aventuras de ínsulas, sino de encrucijadas, en las cuales no se gana otra cosa que sacar rota la cabeza o una oreja menos. Tened paciencia, que aventuras se ofrecerán donde no solamente os pueda hacer gobernador, sino más adelante.

Agradecióselo mucho Sancho, y, besándole otra vez la mano y la falda de la loriga, le ayudó a subir sobre Rocinante; y él subió sobre su asno y comenzó a seguir a su señor, que, a paso tirado, sin despedirse ni hablar más con las del coche, se entró por un bosque que allí junto estaba. Seguía Sancho a todo el trote de su jumento, pero caminaba tanto Rocinante que, viéndose quedar atrás, le fue forzoso dar voces a su amo que se aguardase. Hízolo así don Quijote, teniendo las riendas a Rocinante hasta que llegase su cansado escudero, el cual, en llegando, le dijo:

-Paréceme, señor, que sería acertado irnos a retraer a alguna iglesia; que, según quedó maltrecho aquel con quien os combatistes, no será mucho que den noticia del caso a la Santa Hermandad y nos prendan; y a fe que si lo hacen, que primero que salgamos de la cárcel que nos ha de sudar el hopo.

-Calla -dijo don Quijote-. Y ¿dónde has visto tú, o leído jamás, que caballero andante haya sido puesto ante la justicia, por más homicidios que hubiese cometido?

-Yo no sé nada de omecillos -respondió Sancho-, ni en mi vida le caté a ninguno; sólo sé que la Santa Hermandad tiene que ver con los que pelean en el campo, y en esotro no me entremeto.

-Pues no tengas pena, amigo -respondió don Quijote-, que yo te sacaré de las manos de los caldeos, cuanto más de las de la Hermandad. Pero dime, por tu vida: ¿has visto más valeroso caballero que yo en todo lo descubierto de la tierra? ¿Has leído en historias otro que tenga ni haya tenido más brío en acometer, más aliento en el perseverar, más destreza en el herir, ni más maña en el derribar?

-La verdad sea -respondió Sancho-que yo no he leído ninguna historia jamás, porque ni sé leer ni escribir; mas lo que osaré apostar es que más atrevido amo que vuestra merced yo no le he servido en todos los días de mi vida, y quiera Dios que estos atrevimientos no se paguen donde tengo dicho. Lo que le ruego a vuestra merced es que se cure, que le va mucha sangre de esa oreja; que aquí traigo hilas y un poco de ungüento blanco en las alforjas.

-Todo eso fuera bien escusado -respondió don Quijote-si a mí se me acordara de hacer una redoma del bálsamo de Fierabrás, que con sola una gota se ahorraran tiempo y medicinas.

-¿Qué redoma y qué bálsamo es ése? -dijo Sancho Panza.

-Es un bálsamo -respondió don Quijote-de quien tengo la receta en la memoria, con el cual no hay que tener temor a la muerte, ni hay pensar morir de ferida alguna. Y así, cuando yo le haga y te le dé, no tienes más que hacer sino que, cuando vieres que en alguna batalla me han partido por medio del cuerpo (como muchas veces suele acontecer), bonitamente la parte del cuerpo que hubiere caído en el suelo, y con mucha sotileza, antes que la sangre se yele, la pondrás sobre la otra mitad que quedare en la silla, advirtiéndole de encajallo igualmente y al justo; luego me darás a beber solos dos tragos del bálsamo que he dicho, y verásme quedar más sano que una manzana.

-Si eso hay -dijo Panza-, yo renuncio desde aquí el gobierno de la prometida ínsula, y no quiero otra cosa, en pago de mis muchos y buenos servicios, sino que vuestra merced me dé la receta de ese estremado licor; que para mí tengo que valdrá la onza adondequiera más de a dos reales, y no he menester yo más para pasar esta vida honrada y descansadamente. Pero es de saber agora si tiene mucha costa el hacelle.

-Con menos de tres reales se pueden hacer tres azumbres -respondió don Quijote.

-¡Pecador de mí! -replicó Sancho-. Pues ¿a qué aguarda vuestra merced a hacelle y a enseñármelo?

-Calla, amigo -respondió don Quijote-, que mayores secretos pienso enseñarte

y mayores mercedes hacerte; y, por agora, curémonos, que la oreja me duele más de lo que yo quisiera.

Sacó Sancho de las alforjas hilas y ungüento. Mas, cuando don Quijote llegó a ver rota su celada, pensó perder el juicio, y, puesta la mano en la espada y alzando los ojos al cielo, dijo:

-Yo hago juramento al Criador de todas las cosas y a los santos cuatro Evangelios, donde más largamente están escritos, de hacer la vida que hizo el grande marqués de Mantua cuando juró de vengar la muerte de su sobrino Valdovinos, que fue de no comer pan a manteles, ni con su mujer folgar, y otras cosas que, aunque dellas no me acuerdo, las doy aquí por expresadas, hasta tomar entera venganza del que tal desaguizado me fizo.

Oyendo esto Sancho, le dijo:

-Advierta vuestra merced, señor don Quijote, que si el caballero cumplió lo que se le dejó ordenado de irse a presentar ante mi señora Dulcinea del Toboso, ya habrá cumplido con lo que debía, y no merece otra pena si no comete nuevo delito.

-Has hablado y apuntado muy bien -respondió don Quijote-; y así, anulo el juramento en cuanto lo que toca a tomar dél nueva venganza; pero hágole y confírmole de nuevo de hacer la vida que he dicho, hasta tanto que quite por fuerza otra celada tal y tan buena como ésta a algún caballero. Y no pienses, Sancho, que así a humo de pajas hago esto, que bien tengo a quien imitar en ello; que esto mesmo pasó, al pie de la letra, sobre el yelmo de Mambrino, que tan caro le costó a Sacripante.

-Que dé al diablo vuestra merced tales juramentos, señor mío -replicó Sancho-; que son muy en daño de la salud y muy en perjuicio de la conciencia. Si no, dígame ahora: si acaso en muchos días no topamos hombre armado con celada, ¿qué hemos de hacer? ¿Hase de cumplir el juramento, a despecho de tantos inconvenientes e incomodidades, como será el dormir vestido, y el no dormir en poblado, y otras mil penitencias que contenía el juramento de aquel loco viejo del marqués de Mantua, que vuestra merced quiere revalidar ahora? Mire vuestra merced bien, que por todos estos caminos no andan hombres armados, sino arrieros y carreteros, que no sólo no traen celadas, pero quizá no las han oído nombrar en todos los días de su vida.

-Engañaste en eso -dijo don Quijote-, porque no habremos estado dos horas por estas encrucijadas, cuando veamos más armados que los que vinieron sobre Albraca a la conquista de Angélica la Bella.

-Alto, pues; sea así -dijo Sancho-, y a Dios prazga que nos suceda bien, y que se llegue ya el tiempo de ganar esta ínsula que tan cara me cuesta, y muérame yo luego.

-Ya te he dicho, Sancho, que no te dé eso cuidado alguno; que, cuando faltare ínsula, ahí está el reino de Dinamarca o el de Soliadisa, que te vendrán como anillo al dedo; y más, que, por ser en tierra firme, te debes más alegrar. Pero dejemos esto para su tiempo, y mira si traes algo en esas alforjas que comamos, porque vamos luego en busca de algún castillo donde alojemos esta noche y hagamos el bálsamo que te he dicho; porque yo te voto a Dios que me va doliendo mucho la oreja.

-Aquí trayo una cebolla, y un poco de queso y no sé cuántos mendrugos de pan -dijo Sancho-, pero no son manjares que pertenecen a tan valiente caballero como vuestra merced.

-¡Qué mal lo entiendes! -respondió don Quijote-. Hágote saber, Sancho, que es honra de los caballeros andantes no comer en un mes; y, ya que coman, sea de aquello que hallaren más a mano; y esto se te hiciera cierto si hubieras leído tantas historias como yo; que, aunque han sido muchas, en todas ellas no he hallado hecha relación de que los caballeros andantes comiesen, si no era acaso y en algunos suntuosos banquetes que les hacían, y los demás días se los pasaban en flores. Y, aunque se deja entender que no podían pasar sin comer y sin hacer todos los otros menesteres naturales, porque, en efeto, eran hombres como nosotros, hase de entender también que, andando lo más del tiempo de su vida por las florestas y despoblados, y sin cocinero, que su más ordinaria comida sería de viandas rústicas, tales como las que tú ahora me ofreces. Así que, Sancho amigo, no te congoje lo que a mí me da gusto. Ni querrás tú hacer mundo nuevo, ni sacar la caballería andante de sus quicios.

-Perdóneme vuestra merced -dijo Sancho-; que, como yo no sé leer ni escribir, como otra vez he dicho, no sé ni he caído en las reglas de la profesión caballeresca; y, de aquí adelante, yo proveeré las alforjas de todo género de fruta seca para vuestra merced, que es caballero, y para mí las proveeré, pues no lo soy, de otras cosas volátiles y de más sustancia.

-No digo yo, Sancho -replicó don Quijote-, que sea forzoso a los caballeros andantes no comer otra cosa sino esas frutas que dices, sino que su más ordinario sustento debía de ser dellas, y de algunas yerbas que hallaban por los campos, que ellos conocían y yo también conozco.

-Virtud es -respondió Sancho-conocer esas yerbas; que, según yo me voy imaginando, algún día será menester usar de ese conocimiento.

Y, sacando, en esto, lo que dijo que traía, comieron los dos en buena paz y compañía. Pero, deseosos de buscar donde alojar aquella noche, acabaron con mucha brevedad su pobre y seca comida. Subieron luego a caballo, y diéronse prisa por llegar a poblado antes que anocheciese; pero faltóles el sol, y la esperanza de alcanzar lo que deseaban, junto a unas chozas de unos cabreros, y así, determinaron de pasarla allí; que cuanto fue de pesadumbre para Sancho no llegar a poblado, fue de contento para su amo dormirla al cielo descubierto, por parecerle que cada vez que esto le sucedía era hacer un acto posesivo que facilitaba la prueba de su caballería.

Capítulo XI

De lo que le sucedió a don Quijote con unos cabreros

FUE RECOGIDO de los cabreros con buen ánimo; y, habiendo Sancho, lo mejor que pudo, acomodado a Rocinante y a su jumento, se fue tras el olor que despedían de sí ciertos tasajos de cabra que hirviendo al fuego en un caldero estaban; y, aunque él quisiera en aquel mismo punto ver si estaban en sazón de trasladarlos del caldero al estómago, lo dejó de hacer, porque los cabreros los quitaron del fuego, y, tendiendo por el suelo unas pieles de ovejas, aderezaron con mucha priesa su rústica mesa y convidaron a los dos, con muestras de muy buena voluntad, con lo que tenían. Sentáronse a la redonda de las pieles seis dellos, que eran los que en la majada había, habiendo primero con groseras ceremonias rogado a don Quijote que se sentase sobre un dornajo que vuelto del revés le pusieron. Sentóse don Quijote, y quedábase Sancho en pie para servirle la copa, que era hecha de cuerno. Viéndole en pie su amo, le dijo: -Porque veas, Sancho, el bien que en sí encierra la andante caballería, y cuán a pique están los que en cualquiera ministerio della se ejercitan de venir brevemente a ser honrados y estimados del mundo, quiero que aquí a mi lado y en compañía desta buena gente te sientes, y que seas una mesma cosa conmigo, que soy tu amo y natural señor; que comas en mi plato y bebas por donde yo bebiere; porque de la caballería andante se puede decir lo mismo que del amor se dice: que todas las cosas iguala.

-¡Gran merced! -dijo Sancho-; pero sé decir a vuestra merced que, como yo tuviese bien de comer, tan bien y mejor me lo comería en pie y a mis solas como sentado a par de un emperador. Y aun, si va a decir verdad, mucho mejor me sabe lo que como en mi rincón, sin melindres ni respetos, aunque sea pan y cebolla, que los gallipavos de otras mesas donde me sea forzoso mascar despacio, beber poco, limpiarme a menudo, no estornudar ni toser si me viene gana, ni hacer otras cosas que la soledad y la libertad traen consigo. Ansí que, señor mío, estas honras que vuestra merced quiere darme por ser ministro y adherente de la caballería andante, como lo soy siendo escudero de vuestra merced, conviértalas en otras cosas que me sean de más cómodo y provecho; que éstas, aunque las doy por bien recibidas, las renuncio para desde aquí al fin del mundo.

-Con todo eso, te has de sentar; porque a quien se humilla, Dios le ensalza.

Y, asiéndole por el brazo, le forzó a que junto dél se sentase.

No entendían los cabreros aquella jerigonza de escuderos y de caballeros andantes, y no hacían otra cosa que comer y callar, y mirar a sus huéspedes, que, con mucho donaire y gana, embaulaban tasajo como el puño. Acabado el servicio de carne, tendieron sobre las zaleas gran cantidad de bellotas avellanadas, y juntamente pusieron un medio queso, más duro que si fuera hecho de argamasa. No estaba, en esto, ocioso el cuerno, porque andaba a la redonda tan a menudo (ya lleno, ya vacío, como arcaduz de noria), que con facilidad vació un zaque de dos que estaban de manifiesto. Después que don Quijote hubo bien satisfecho su estómago, tomó un puño de bellotas en la mano y, mirándolas atentamente, soltó la voz a semejantes razones: -Dichosa edad y siglos dichosos aquéllos a quien los antiguos pusieron nombre de dorados, y no porque en ellos el oro, que en esta nuestra edad de hierro tanto se estima, se alcanzase en aquella venturosa sin fatiga alguna, sino porque entonces los que en ella vivían ignoraban estas dos palabras de tuyo y mío. Eran en aquella santa edad todas las cosas comunes; a nadie le era necesario, para alcanzar su ordinario sustento, tomar otro trabajo que alzar la mano y alcanzarle de las robustas encinas, que liberalmente les estaban convidando con su dulce y sazonado fruto. Las claras fuentes y corrientes ríos, en magnífica abundancia, sabrosas y transparentes aguas les ofrecían. En las quiebras de las peñas y en lo hueco de los árboles formaban su república las solícitas y discretas abejas, ofreciendo a cualquiera mano, sin interés alguno, la fértil cosecha de su dulcísimo trabajo. Los valientes alcornoques despedían de sí, sin otro artificio que el de su cortesía, sus anchas y livianas cortezas, con que se comenzaron a cubrir las casas, sobre rústicas estacas sustentadas, no más que para defensa de las inclemencias del cielo. Todo era paz entonces, todo amistad, todo concordia; aún no se había atrevido la pesada reja del corvo arado a abrir ni visitar las entrañas piadosas de nuestra primera madre, que ella, sin ser forzada, ofrecía, por todas las partes de su fértil y espacioso seno, lo que pudiese hartar, sustentar y deleitar a los hijos que entonces la poseían. Entonces sí que andaban las simples y hermosas zagalejas de valle en valle y de otero en otero, en trenza y en cabello, sin más vestidos de aquellos que eran menester para cubrir honestamente lo que la honestidad quiere y ha querido siempre que se cubra; y no eran sus adornos de los que ahora se usan, a quien la púrpura de Tiro y la por tantos modos martirizada seda encarecen, sino de algunas hojas verdes de lampazos y yedra entretejidas, con lo que quizá iban tan pomposas y compuestas como van agora nuestras cortesanas con las raras y peregrinas invenciones que la curiosidad ociosa les ha mostrado. Entonces se decoraban los concetos amorosos del alma simple y sencillamente, del mismo modo y manera que ella los concebía, sin buscar artificioso rodeo de palabras para encarecerlos. No había la fraude, el engaño ni la malicia mezclándose con la verdad y llaneza. La justicia se estaba en sus propios términos, sin que la osasen turbar ni ofender los del favor y los del interese, que tanto ahora la menoscaban, turban y persiguen. La ley del encaje aún no se había sentado en el entendimiento del juez, porque entonces no había qué juzgar, ni quién fuese juzgado. Las doncellas y la honestidad andaban, como tengo dicho, por dondequiera, sola y señora, sin temor que la ajena desenvoltura y lascivo intento le menoscabasen, y su perdición nacía de su gusto y propia voluntad. Y agora, en estos nuestros detestables siglos, no está segura ninguna, aunque la oculte y cierre otro nuevo laberinto como el de Creta; porque allí, por los resquicios o por el aire, con el celo de la maldita solicitud, se les entra la amorosa pestilencia y les hace dar con todo su recogimiento al traste. Para cuya seguridad, andando más los tiempos y creciendo más la malicia, se instituyó la orden de los caballeros andantes, para defender las doncellas, amparar las viudas y socorrer a los huérfanos y a los menesterosos. Desta orden soy yo, hermanos cabreros, a quien agradezco el gasaje y buen acogimiento que hacéis a mí y a mi escudero; que, aunque por ley natural están todos los que viven obligados a favorecer a los caballeros andantes, todavía, por saber que sin saber vosotros esta obligación me acogistes y regalastes, es razón que, con la voluntad a mí posible, os agradezca la vuestra.

Toda esta larga arenga -que se pudiera muy bien escusar-dijo nuestro caballero porque las bellotas que le dieron le trujeron a la memoria la edad dorada y antojósele hacer aquel inútil razonamiento a los cabreros, que, sin respondelle palabra, embobados y suspensos, le estuvieron escuchando. Sancho, asimesmo, callaba y comía bellotas, y visitaba muy a menudo el segundo zaque, que, porque se enfriase el vino, le tenían colgado de un alcornoque.

Más tardó en hablar don Quijote que en acabarse la cena; al fin de la cual, uno de los cabreros dijo: -Para que con más veras pueda vuestra merced decir, señor caballero andante, que le agasajamos con prompta y buena voluntad, queremos darle solaz y contento con hacer que cante un compañero nuestro que no tardará mucho en estar aquí; el cual es un zagal muy entendido y muy enamorado, y que, sobre todo, sabe leer y escribir y es músico de un rabel, que no hay más que desear.

Apenas había el cabrero acabado de decir esto, cuando llegó a sus oídos el son del rabel, y de allí a poco llegó el que le tañía, que era un mozo de hasta veinte y dos años, de muy buena gracia. Preguntáronle sus compañeros si había cenado, y, respondiendo que sí, el que había hecho los ofrecimientos le dijo: -De esa manera, Antonio, bien podrás hacernos placer de cantar un poco, porque vea este señor huésped que tenemos quien; también por los montes y selvas hay quien sepa de música. Hémosle dicho tus buenas habilidades, y deseamos que las muestres y nos saques verdaderos; y así, te ruego por tu vida que te sientes y cantes el romance de tus amores que te compuso el beneficiado tu tío, que en el pueblo ha parecido muy bien.

-Que me place -respondió el mozo.

Y, sin hacerse más de rogar, se sentó en el tronco de una desmochada encina, y, templando su rabel, de allí a poco, con muy buena gracia, comenzó a cantar, diciendo desta manera: ANTONIO

-Yo sé, Olalla, que me adoras, puesto que no me lo has dicho
ni aun con los ojos siquiera,
mudas lenguas de amoríos.

Porque sé que eres sabida, 5
en que me quieres me afirmo;
que nunca fue desdichado
amor que fue conocido.

Bien es verdad que tal vez,
Olalla, me has dado indicio 10

que tienes de bronce el alma
y el blanco pecho de risco.

Mas allá entre tus reproches
y honestísimos desvíos,
tal vez la esperanza muestra 15
la orilla de su vestido.

Abalánzase al señuelo
mi fe, que nunca ha podido,
ni menguar por no llamado,
ni crecer por escogido. 20

Si el amor es cortesía,
de la que tienes colijo
que el fin de mis esperanzas
ha de ser cual imagino.

Y si son servicios parte 25
de hacer un pecho benigno, algunos de los que he hecho
fortalecen mi partido.

Porque si has mirado en ello,
más de una vez habrás visto 30
que me he vestido en los lunes
lo que me honraba el domingo.

Como el amor y la gala
andan un mesmo camino,
en todo tiempo a tus ojos 35
quise mostrarme polido.

Dejo el bailar por tu causa,
ni las músicas te pinto que has escuchado a deshoras
y al canto del gallo primo. 40

No cuento las alabanzas
que de tu belleza he dicho;
que, aunque verdaderas, hacen
ser yo de algunas malquisto.

Teresa del Berrocal, 45
yo alabándote, me dijo:
«Tal piensa que adora a un ángel,
y viene a adorar a un jimio;

merced a los muchos dijes
y a los cabellos postizos, 50
y a hipócritas hermosuras,
que engañan al Amor mismo».

Desmentíla y enojóse;
volvió por ella su primo:
desafióme, y ya sabes 55

lo que yo hice y él hizo.

No te quiero yo a montón,
ni te pretendo y te sirvo
por lo de barraganía;
que más bueno es mi designio. 60

Coyundas tiene la Iglesia que son lazadas de sirgo;

pon tú el cuello en la gamella;
verás como pongo el mío.

Donde no, desde aquí juro, 65
por el santo más bendito,
de no salir destas sierras
sino para capuchino.

Con esto dio el cabrero fin a su canto; y, aunque don Quijote le rogó que algo más cantase, no lo consintió Sancho Panza, porque estaba más para dormir que para oír canciones. Y así, dijo a su amo: -Bien puede vuestra merced acomodarse desde luego adonde ha de posar esta noche, que el trabajo que estos buenos hombres tienen todo el día no permite que pasen las noches cantando.

-Ya te entiendo, Sancho -le respondió don Quijote-; que bien se me trasluce que las visitas del zaque piden más recompensa de sueño que de música.

-A todos nos sabe bien, bendito sea Dios -respondió Sancho.

-No lo niego -replicó don Quijote-, pero acomódate tú donde quisieres, que los de mi profesión mejor parecen velando que durmiendo. Pero, con todo esto, sería bien, Sancho, que me vuelvas a curar esta oreja, que me va doliendo más de lo que es menester.

Hizo Sancho lo que se le mandaba; y, viendo uno de los cabreros la herida, le dijo que no tuviese pena, que él pondría remedio con que fácilmente se sanase. Y, tomando algunas hojas de romero, de mucho que por allí había, las mascó y las mezcló con un poco de sal, y, aplicándoselas a la oreja, se la vendó muy bien, asegurándole que no había menester otra medicina; y así fue la verdad.

Capítulo XII

De lo que contó un cabrero a los que estaban con don Quijote

ESTANDO en esto, llegó otro mozo de los que les traían del aldea el bastimento, y dijo: -¿Sabéis lo que pasa en el lugar, compañeros?

-¿Cómo lo podemos saber? -respondió uno dellos.

-Pues sabed -prosiguió el mozo-que murió esta mañana aquel famoso pastor estudiante llamado Grisóstomo, y se murmura que ha muerto de amores de aquella endiablada moza de Marcela, la hija de Guillermo el rico, aquélla que se anda en hábito de pastora por esos andurriales.

-Por Marcela dirás -dijo uno.

-Por ésa digo -respondió el cabrero-. Y es lo bueno, que mandó en su testamento que le enterrasen en el campo, como si fuera moro, y que sea al pie de la peña donde está la fuente del alcornoque; porque, según es fama, y él dicen que lo dijo, aquel lugar es adonde él la vio la vez primera. Y también mandó otras cosas, tales, que los abades del pueblo dicen que no se han de cumplir, ni es bien que se cumplan, porque parecen de gentiles. A todo lo cual responde aquel gran su amigo Ambrosio, el estudiante, que también se vistió de pastor con él, que se ha de cumplir todo, sin faltar nada, como lo dejó mandado Grisóstomo, y sobre esto anda el pueblo alborotado; mas, a lo que se dice, en fin se hará lo que Ambrosio y todos los pastores sus amigos quieren; y mañana le vienen a enterrar con gran pompa adonde tengo dicho. Y tengo para mí que ha de ser cosa muy de ver; a lo menos, yo no dejaré de ir a verla, si supiese no volver mañana al lugar.

-Todos haremos lo mismo -respondieron los cabreros-; y echaremos suertes a quién ha de quedar a guardar las cabras de todos.

-Bien dices, Pedro -dijo uno-; aunque no será menester usar de esa diligencia, que yo me quedaré por todos. Y no lo atribuyas a virtud y a poca curiosidad mía, sino a que no me deja andar el garrancho que el otro día me pasó este pie.

-Con todo eso, te lo agradecemos -respondió Pedro.

Y don Quijote rogó a Pedro le dijese qué muerto era aquél y qué pastora aquélla; a lo cual Pedro respondió que lo que sabía era que el muerto era un hijodalgo rico, vecino de un lugar que estaba en aquellas sierras, el cual había sido estudiante muchos años en Salamanca, al cabo de los cuales había vuelto a su lugar, con opinión de muy sabio y muy leído.

-«Principalmente, decían que sabía la ciencia de las estrellas, y de lo que pasan, allá en el cielo, el sol y la luna; porque puntualmente nos decía el cris del sol y de la luna.»

-Eclipse se llama, amigo, que no cris, el escurecerse esos dos luminares mayores -dijo don Quijote.

Mas Pedro, no reparando en niñerías, prosiguió su cuento diciendo: -«Asimesmo adivinaba cuándo había de ser el año abundante o estil.»

-Estéril queréis decir, amigo -dijo don Quijote.

-Estéril o estil -respondió Pedro-, todo se sale allá. «Y digo que con esto que decía se hicieron su padre y sus amigos, que le daban crédito, muy ricos, porque hacían lo que él les aconsejaba, diciéndoles: “Sembrad este año cebada, no trigo; en éste podéis sembrar garbanzos y no cebada; el que viene será de guilla de aceite; los tres siguientes no se cogerá gota”.»

-Esa ciencia se llama astrología -dijo don Quijote.

-No sé yo cómo se llama -replicó Pedro-, mas sé que todo esto sabía y aún más. «Finalmente, no pasaron muchos meses, después que vino de Salamanca, cuando un día remaneció vestido de pastor, con su cayado y pellico, habiéndose quitado los hábitos largos que como escolar traía; y juntamente se vistió con él de pastor otro su grande amigo, llamado Ambrosio, que había sido su compañero en los estudios. Olvidábaseme de decir como Grisóstomo, el difunto, fue grande hombre de componer coplas; tanto, que él hacía los villancicos para la noche del Nacimiento del Señor, y los autos para el día de Dios, que los representaban los mozos de nuestro pueblo, y todos decían que eran por el cabo. Cuando los del lugar vieron tan de improviso vestidos de pastores a los dos escolares, quedaron admirados, y no podían adivinar la causa que les había movido a hacer aquella tan estraña mudanza. Ya en este tiempo era muerto el padre de nuestro Grisóstomo, y él quedó heredado en mucha cantidad de hacienda, así en muebles como en raíces, y en no pequeña cantidad de ganado, mayor y menor, y en gran cantidad de dineros; de todo lo cual quedó el mozo señor desoluto, y en verdad que todo lo merecía, que era muy buen compañero y caritativo y amigo de los buenos, y tenía una cara como una bendición. Después se vino a entender que el haberse mudado de traje no había sido por otra cosa que por andarse por estos despoblados en pos de aquella pastora Marcela que nuestro zagal nombró denantes, de la cual se había enamorado el pobre difunto de Grisóstomo.» Y quiéroos decir agora, porque es bien que lo sepáis, quién es esta rapaza; quizá, y aun sin quizá, no habréis oído semejante cosa en todos los días de vuestra vida, aunque viváis más años que sarna.

-Decid Sarra -replicó don Quijote, no pudiendo sufrir el trocar de los vocablos del cabrero.

-Harto vive la sarna -respondió Pedro-; y si es, señor, que me habéis de andar zaheriendo a cada paso los vocablos, no acabaremos en un año.

-Perdonad, amigo -dijo don Quijote-; que por haber tanta diferencia de sarna a Sarra os lo dije; pero vos respondistes muy bien, porque vive más sarna que Sarra; y proseguí vuestra historia, que no os replicaré más en nada.

-«Digo, pues, señor mío de mi alma -dijo el cabrero-, que en nuestra aldea hubo un labrador aún más rico que el padre de Grisóstomo, el cual se llamaba Guillermo, y al cual dio Dios, amén de las muchas y grandes riquezas, una hija, de cuyo parto murió su madre, que fue la más honrada mujer que hubo en todos estos contornos. No parece sino que ahora la veo, con aquella cara que del un cabo tenía el sol y del otro la luna; y, sobre todo, hacendosa y amiga de los pobres, por lo que creo que debe de estar su ánima a la hora de ahora gozando de Dios en el otro mundo. De pesar de la muerte de tan buena mujer murió su marido Guillermo, dejando a su hija Marcela, muchacha y rica, en poder de un tío suyo sacerdote y beneficiado en nuestro lugar. Creció la niña con tanta belleza, que nos hacía acordar de la de su madre, que la tuvo muy grande; y, con todo esto, se juzgaba que le había de pasar la de la hija. Y así fue, que, cuando llegó a edad de catorce a quince años, nadie la miraba que no bendecía a Dios, que tan hermosa la había criado, y los más quedaban enamorados y perdidos por ella. Guardábala su tío con mucho recato y con mucho encerramiento; pero, con todo esto, la fama de su mucha hermosura se extendió de manera que, así por ella como por sus muchas riquezas, no solamente de los de nuestro pueblo, sino de los de muchas leguas a la redonda, y de los mejores dellos, era rogado, solicitado e importunado su tío se la diese por mujer. Mas él, que a las derechas es buen cristiano, aunque quisiera casarla luego, así como la vía de edad, no quiso hacerlo sin su consentimiento, sin tener ojo a la ganancia y granjería que le ofrecía el tener la hacienda de la moza, dilatando su casamiento. Y a fe que se dijo esto en más de un corrillo en el pueblo, en alabanza del buen sacerdote.» Que quiero que sepa, señor andante, que en estos lugares cortos de todo se trata y de todo se murmura; y tened para vos, como yo tengo para mí, que debía de ser demasiadamente bueno el clérigo que obliga a sus feligreses a que digan bien dél, especialmente en las aldeas.

-Así es la verdad -dijo don Quijote-, y proseguí adelante, que el cuento es muy bueno, y vos, buen Pedro, le contáis con muy buena gracia.

-La del Señor no me falte, que es la que hace al caso. «Y en lo demás sabréis que, aunque el tío proponía a la sobrina y le decía las calidades de cada uno en particular, de los muchos que por mujer la pedían, rogándole que se casase y escogiese a su gusto, jamás ella respondió otra cosa sino que por entonces no quería casarse, y que, por ser tan muchacha, no se sentía hábil para poder llevar

la carga del matrimonio. Con estas que daba, al parecer justas excusas, dejaba el tío de importunarla, y esperaba a que entrase algo más en edad y ella supiese escoger compañía a su gusto. Porque decía él, y decía muy bien, que no habían de dar los padres a sus hijos estado contra su voluntad. Pero hételo aquí, cuando no me cato, que remanece un día la melindrosa Marcela hecha pastora; y, sin ser parte su tío ni todos los del pueblo, que se lo desaconsejaban, dio en irse al campo con las demás zagalas del lugar, y dio en guardar su mismo ganado. Y, así como ella salió en público y su hermosura se vio al descubierto, no os sabré buenamente decir cuántos ricos mancebos, hidalgos y labradores han tomado el traje de Grisóstomo y la andan requebrando por esos campos. Uno de los cuales, como ya está dicho, fue nuestro difunto, del cual decían que la dejaba de querer, y la adoraba. Y no se piense que porque Marcela se puso en aquella libertad y vida tan suelta y de tan poco o de ningún recogimiento, que por eso ha dado indicio, ni por semejas, que venga en menoscabo de su honestidad y recato; antes es tanta y tal la vigilancia con que mira por su honra, que de cuantos la sirven y solicitan ninguno se ha alabado, ni con verdad se podrá alabar, que le haya dado alguna pequeña esperanza de alcanzar su deseo. Que, puesto que no huye ni se esquivo de la compañía y conversación de los pastores, y los trata cortés y amigablemente, en llegando a descubrirle su intención cualquiera dellos, aunque sea tan justa y santa como la del matrimonio, los arroja de sí como con un trabuco. Y con esta manera de condición hace más daño en esta tierra que si por ella entrara la pestilencia; porque su afabilidad y hermosura atrae los corazones de los que la tratan a servirla y a amarla, pero su desdén y desengaño los conduce a términos de desesperarse; y así, no saben qué decirle, sino llamarla a voces cruel y desagradecida, con otros títulos a éste semejantes, que bien la calidad de su condición manifiestan. Y si aquí estuviédeses, señor, algún día, veríades resonar estas sierras y estos valles con los lamentos de los desengañados que la siguen. No está muy lejos de aquí un sitio donde hay casi dos docenas de altas hayas, y no hay ninguna que en su lisa corteza no tenga grabado y escrito el nombre de Marcela; y encima de alguna, una corona grabada en el mismo árbol, como si más claramente dijera su amante que Marcela la lleva y la merece de toda la hermosura humana. Aquí sospira un pastor, allí se queja otro; acullá se oyen amorosas canciones, acá desesperadas endechas. Cuál hay que pasa todas las horas de la noche sentado al pie de alguna encina o peñasco, y allí, sin plegar los llorosos ojos, embebecido y transportado en sus pensamientos, le halló el sol a la mañana; y cuál hay que, sin dar vado ni tregua a sus suspiros, en mitad del ardor de la más enfadosa siesta del verano, tendido sobre la ardiente arena, envía sus quejas al piadoso cielo. Y déste y de aquél, y de aquéllos y de éstos, libre y desenfadadamente triunfa la hermosa Marcela; y todos los que la conocemos estamos esperando en qué ha de parar su altivez y quién ha de ser el dichoso que ha de venir a domeñar condición tan terrible y gozar de hermosura tan estremada.» Por ser todo lo que he contado tan averiguada verdad, me doy a entender que también lo es la que nuestro zagal dijo que se decía de la causa de la muerte de Grisóstomo. Y así, os aconsejo, señor, que no dejéis de hallaros mañana a su entierro, que será muy de ver, porque Grisóstomo tiene muchos amigos, y no está de este lugar a aquél donde manda enterrarse media legua.

-En cuidado me lo tengo -dijo don Quijote-, y agradézcoos el gusto que me habéis dado con la narración de tan sabroso cuento.

-¡Oh! -replicó el cabrero-, aún no sé yo la mitad de los casos sucedidos a los amantes de Marcela, mas podría ser que mañana topásemos en el camino algún pastor que nos los dijese. Y, por ahora, bien será que os vais a dormir debajo de techado, porque el sereno os podría dañar la herida, puesto que es tal la medicina que se os ha puesto, que no hay que temer de contrario accidente.

Sancho Panza, que ya daba al diablo el tanto hablar del cabrero, solicitó, por su parte, que su amo se entrase a dormir en la choza de Pedro. Hízolo así, y todo lo más de la noche se le pasó en memorias de su señora Dulcinea, a imitación de los amantes de Marcela. Sancho Panza se acomodó entre Rocinante y su jumento, y durmió, no como enamorado desfavorecido, sino como hombre molido a coces.

Capítulo XIII

Donde se da fin al cuento de la pastora Marcela, con otros sucesos

MAS, APENAS comenzó a descubrirse el día por los balcones del oriente, cuando los cinco de los seis cabreros se levantaron y fueron a despertar a don Quijote, y a decille si estaba todavía con propósito de ir a ver el famoso entierro de Grisóstomo, y que ellos le harían compañía. Don Quijote, que otra cosa no deseaba, se levantó y mandó a Sancho que ensillase y enalbardase al momento, lo cual él hizo con mucha diligencia, y con la misma se pusieron luego todos en camino. Y no hubieron andado un cuarto de legua, cuando, al cruzar de una senda, vieron venir hacia ellos hasta seis pastores, vestidos con pellicos negros y coronadas las cabezas con guirnaldas de ciprés y de amarga adelfa. Traía cada uno un grueso bastón de acebo en la mano. Venían con ellos, asimesmo, dos gentiles hombres de a caballo, muy bien aderezados de camino, con otros tres mozos de a pie que los acompañaban. En llegándose a juntar, se saludaron cortésmente, y, preguntándose los unos a los otros dónde iban, supieron que todos se encaminaban al lugar del entierro; y así, comenzaron a caminar todos juntos.

Uno de los de a caballo, hablando con su compañero, le dijo:

-Páreceme, señor Vivaldo, que habemos de dar por bien empleada la tardanza que hiciéremos en ver este famoso entierro, que no podrá dejar de ser famoso, según estos pastores nos han contado estrañezas, ansí del muerto pastor como de la pastora homicida.

-Así me lo parece a mí -respondió Vivaldo-; y no digo yo hacer tardanza de un día, pero de cuatro la hiciera a trueco de verle.

Preguntóles don Quijote qué era lo que habían oído de Marcela y de Grisóstomo. El caminante dijo que aquella madrugada habían encontrado con aquellos pastores, y que, por haberles visto en aquel tan triste traje, les habían preguntado la ocasión por que iban de aquella manera; que uno dellos se lo contó, contando la estrañeza y hermosura de una pastora llamada Marcela, y los amores de muchos que la recuestaban, con la muerte de aquel Grisóstomo a cuyo entierro iban. Finalmente, él contó todo lo que Pedro a don Quijote había contado.

Cesó esta plática y comenzóse otra, preguntando el que se llamaba Vivaldo a don Quijote qué era la ocasión que le movía a andar armado de aquella manera por tierra tan pacífica. A lo cual respondió don Quijote:

-La profesión de mi ejercicio no consiente ni permite que yo ande de otra manera. El buen paso, el regalo y el reposo, allá se inventó para los blandos cortesanos; mas el trabajo, la inquietud y las armas sólo se inventaron e hicieron para aquellos que el mundo llama caballeros andantes, de los cuales yo, aunque indigno, soy el menor de todos.

Apenas le oyeron esto, cuando todos le tuvieron por loco; y, por averiguarlo más y ver qué género de locura era el suyo, le tornó a preguntar Vivaldo que qué quería decir «caballeros andantes».

-¿No han vuestras mercedes leído -respondió don Quijote- los anales e historias de Inglaterra, donde se tratan las famosas fazañas del rey Arturo, que continuamente en nuestro romance castellano llamamos el rey Artús, de quien es tradición antigua y común en todo aquel reino de la Gran Bretaña que este rey no murió, sino que, por arte de encantamento, se convirtió en cuervo, y que, andando los tiempos, ha de volver a reinar y a cobrar su reino y cetro; a cuya causa no se probará que desde aquel tiempo a éste haya ningún inglés muerto cuervo alguno? Pues en tiempo deste buen rey fue instituida aquella famosa orden de caballería de los caballeros de la Tabla Redonda, y pasaron, sin faltar un punto, los amores que allí se cuentan de don Lanzarote del Lago con la reina Ginebra, siendo medianera dellos y sabidora aquella tan honrada dueña Quinaña, de donde nació aquel tan sabido romance, y tan decantado en nuestra España, de:

Nunca fuera caballero
de damas tan bien servido
como fuera Lanzarote
cuando de Bretaña vino;

con aquel progreso tan dulce y tan suave de sus amorosos y fuertes fechos. Pues desde entonces, de mano en mano, fue aquella orden de caballería estendiéndose y dilatándose por muchas y diversas partes del mundo; y en ella fueron famosos y conocidos por sus fechos el valiente Amadís de Gaula, con todos sus hijos y nietos, hasta la quinta generación, y el valeroso Felismarte de Hircania, y el nunca como se debe alabado Tirante el Blanco, y casi que en nuestros días vimos y comunicamos y oímos al invencible y valeroso caballero don Belianís de Grecia. Esto, pues, señores, es ser caballero andante, y la que he dicho es la orden de su caballería; en la cual, como otra vez he dicho, yo, aunque pecador, he hecho profesión, y lo mesmo que profesaron los caballeros referidos profeso yo. Y así, me voy por estas soledades y despoblados buscando las aventuras, con ánimo deliberado de ofrecer mi brazo y mi persona a la más peligrosa que la suerte me deparare, en ayuda de los flacos y menesterosos.

Por estas razones que dijo, acabaron de enterarse los caminantes que era don Quijote falto de juicio, y del género de locura que lo señoreaba, de lo cual recibieron la misma admiración que recibían todos aquellos que de nuevo venían en conocimiento della. Y Vivaldo, que era persona muy discreta y de alegre condición, por pasar sin pesadumbre el poco camino que decían que les faltaba, al llegar a la sierra del entierro, quiso darle ocasión a que pasase más adelante con sus disparates. Y así, le dijo:

-Paréceme, señor caballero andante, que vuestra merced ha profesado una de las más estrechas profesiones que hay en la tierra, y tengo para mí que aun la de los frailes cartujos no es tan estrecha.

-Tan estrecha bien podía ser -respondió nuestro don Quijote-, pero tan necesaria en el mundo no estoy en dos dedos de ponello en duda. Porque, si va a decir verdad, no hace menos el soldado que pone en ejecución lo que su capitán le manda que el mismo capitán que se lo ordena. Quiero decir que los religiosos, con toda paz y sosiego, piden al cielo el bien de la tierra; pero los soldados y caballeros ponemos en ejecución lo que ellos piden, defendiéndola con el valor de nuestros brazos y filos de nuestras espadas; no debajo de cubierta, sino al cielo abierto, puestos por blanco de los insufribles rayos del sol en el verano y de los erizados yelos del invierno. Así que, somos ministros de Dios en la tierra, y brazos por quien se ejecuta en ella su justicia. Y, como las cosas de la guerra y las a ellas tocantes y concernientes no se pueden poner en ejecución sino sudando, afanando y trabajando, síguese que aquellos que la profesan tienen, sin duda, mayor trabajo que aquellos que en sosegada paz y reposo están rogando a Dios favorezca a los que poco pueden. No quiero yo decir, ni me pasa por pensamiento, que es tan buen estado el de caballero andante como el del encerrado religioso; sólo quiero inferir, por lo que yo padezco, que, sin duda, es más trabajoso y más aporreado, y más hambriento y sediento, miserable, roto y piojoso; porque no hay duda sino que los caballeros andantes pasados pasaron mucha malaventura en el discurso de su vida. Y si algunos subieron a ser emperadores por el valor de su brazo, a fe que les costó buen porqué de su sangre y de su sudor; y que si a los que a tal grado subieron les faltaran encantadores y sabios que los ayudaran, que ellos quedaran bien defraudados de sus deseos y bien engañados de sus esperanzas.

-De ese parecer estoy yo -replicó el caminante-; pero una cosa, entre otras muchas, me parece muy mal de los caballeros andantes, y es que, cuando se ven en ocasión de acometer una grande y peligrosa aventura, en que se vee manifiesto peligro de perder la vida, nunca en aquel instante de acometella se acuerdan de encomendarse a Dios, como cada cristiano está obligado a hacer en peligros semejantes; antes, se encomiendan a sus damas, con tanta gana y devoción como si ellas fueran su Dios: cosa que me parece que huele algo a gentilidad.

-Señor -respondió don Quijote-, eso no puede ser menos en ninguna manera, y caería en mal caso el caballero andante que otra cosa hiciese; que ya está en uso y costumbre en la caballería andantesca que el caballero andante que, al acometer algún gran fecho de armas, tuviese su señora delante, vuelva a ella los ojos blanda y amorosamente, como que le pide con ellos le favorezca y ampare en el dudoso trance que acomete; y aun si nadie le oye, está obligado a decir algunas palabras entre dientes, en que de todo corazón se le encomiende; y desto tenemos innumerables ejemplos en las historias. Y no se ha de entender por esto que han de dejar de encomendarse a Dios; que tiempo y lugar les queda para hacerlo en el discurso de la obra.

-Con todo eso -replicó el caminante-, me queda un escrúpulo, y es que muchas veces he leído que se traban palabras entre dos andantes caballeros, y, de una en otra, se les viene a encender la cólera, y a volver los caballos y tomar una buena pieza del campo, y luego, sin más ni más, a todo el correr dellos, se vuelven a encontrar; y, en mitad de la corrida, se encomiendan a sus damas; y lo que suele suceder del encuentro es que el uno cae por las ancas del caballo, pasado con la lanza del contrario de parte a parte, y al otro le viene también que, a no tenerse a las crines del suyo, no pudiera dejar de venir al suelo. Y no sé yo cómo el muerto tuvo lugar para encomendarse a Dios en el discurso de esta tan acelerada obra. Mejor fuera que las palabras que en la carrera gastó encomendándose a su dama las gastara en lo que debía y estaba obligado como cristiano. Cuanto más, que yo tengo para mí que no todos los caballeros andantes tienen damas a quien encomendarse, porque no todos son enamorados.

-Eso no puede ser -respondió don Quijote-: digo que no puede ser que haya caballero andante sin dama, porque tan propio y tan natural les es a los tales ser enamorados como al cielo tener estrellas, y a buen seguro que no se haya visto historia donde se halle caballero andante sin amores; y por el mismo caso que estuviese sin ellos, no sería tenido por legítimo caballero, sino por bastardo, y que entró en la fortaleza de la caballería dicha, no por la puerta, sino por las bardas, como salteador y ladrón.

-Con todo eso -dijo el caminante-, me parece, si mal no me acuerdo, haber leído que don Galaor, hermano del valeroso Amadís de Gaula, nunca tuvo dama señalada a quien pudiese encomendarse; y, con todo esto, no fue tenido en

menos, y fue un muy valiente y famoso caballero.

A lo cual respondió nuestro don Quijote:

-Señor, una golondrina sola no hace verano. Cuanto más, que yo sé que de secreto estaba ese caballero muy bien enamorado; fuera que, aquello de querer a todas bien cuantas bien le parecían era condición natural, a quien no podía ir a la mano. Pero, en resolución, averiguado está muy bien que él tenía una sola a quien él había hecho señora de su voluntad, a la cual se encomendaba muy a menudo y muy secretamente, porque se preció de secreto caballero.

-Luego, si es de esencia que todo caballero andante haya de ser enamorado -dijo el caminante-, bien se puede creer que vuestra merced lo es, pues es de la profesión. Y si es que vuestra merced no se precia de ser tan secreto como don Galaor, con las veras que puedo le suplico, en nombre de toda esta compañía y en el mío, nos diga el nombre, patria, calidad y hermosura de su dama; que ella se tendría por dichosa de que todo el mundo sepa que es querida y servida de un tal caballero como vuestra merced parece.

Aquí dio un gran suspiro don Quijote y dijo:

-Yo no podré afirmar si la dulce mi enemiga gusta, o no, de que el mundo sepa que yo la sirvo; sólo sé decir, respondiendo a lo que con tanto comedimiento se me pide, que su nombre es Dulcinea; su patria, el Toboso, un lugar de la Mancha; su calidad, por lo menos, ha de ser de princesa, pues es reina y señora mía; su hermosura, sobrehumana, pues en ella se vienen a hacer verdaderos todos los imposibles y quiméricos atributos de belleza que los poetas dan a sus damas: que sus cabellos son oro, su frente campos elíseos, sus cejas arcos del cielo, sus ojos soles, sus mejillas rosas, sus labios corales, perlas sus dientes, alabastro su cuello, mármol su pecho, marfil sus manos, su blancura nieve, y las partes que a la vista humana encubrió la honestidad son tales, según yo pienso y entiendo, que sólo la discreta consideración puede encarecerlas, y no compararlas.

-El linaje, prosapia y alcurnia queríamos saber -replicó Vivaldo.

A lo cual respondió don Quijote:

-No es de los antiguos Curcios, Gayos y Cipiones romanos, ni de los modernos Colonas y Ursinos; ni de los Moncadas y Requesenes de Cataluña, ni menos de los Rebellas y Villanovas de Valencia; Palafoxes, Nuzas, Rocabertis, Corellas, Lunas, Alagones, Urreas, Foces y Gurreas de Aragón; Cerdas, Manriques, Mendozas y Guzmanes de Castilla; Alencastros, Pallas y Meneses de Portugal; pero es de los del Toboso de la Mancha, linaje, aunque moderno, tal, que puede dar generoso principio a las más ilustres familias de los venideros siglos. Y no se me replique en esto, si no fuere con las condiciones que puso

Cervino al pie del trofeo de las armas de Orlando, que decía:

NADIE LAS MUEVA

QUE ESTAR NO PUEDA CON ROLDÁN A PRUEBA.

-Aunque el mío es de los Cachopines de Laredo -respondió el caminante-, no le osaré yo poner con el del Toboso de la Mancha, puesto que, para decir verdad, semejante apellido hasta ahora no ha llegado a mis oídos.

-¡Como eso no habrá llegado! -replicó don Quijote.

Con gran atención iban escuchando todos los demás la plática de los dos, y aun hasta los mismos cabreros y pastores conocieron la demasiada falta de juicio de nuestro don Quijote. Sólo Sancho Panza pensaba que cuanto su amo decía era verdad, sabiendo él quién era y habiéndole conocido desde su nacimiento; y en lo que dudaba algo era en creer aquello de la linda Dulcinea del Toboso, porque nunca tal nombre ni tal princesa había llegado jamás a su noticia, aunque vivía tan cerca del Toboso.

En estas pláticas iban, cuando vieron que, por la quiebra que dos altas montañas hacían, bajaban hasta veinte pastores, todos con pellicos de negra lana vestidos y coronados con guirnaldas, que, a lo que después pareció, eran cuál de tejo y cuál de ciprés. Entre seis dellos traían unas andas, cubiertas de mucha diversidad de flores y de ramos. Lo cual visto por uno de los cabreros, dijo:

-Aquellos que allí vienen son los que traen el cuerpo de Grisóstomo, y el pie de aquella montaña es el lugar donde él mandó que le enterrasen.

Por esto se dieron prisa a llegar, y fue a tiempo que ya los que venían habían puesto las andas en el suelo; y cuatro dellos con agudos picos estaban cavando la sepultura a un lado de una dura peña.

Recibiéronse los unos y los otros cortésmente; y luego don Quijote y los que con él venían se pusieron a mirar las andas, y en ellas vieron cubierto de flores un cuerpo muerto, vestido como pastor, de edad, al parecer, de treinta años; y, aunque muerto, mostraba que vivo había sido de rostro hermoso y de disposición gallarda. Alrededor dél tenía en las mismas andas algunos libros y muchos papeles, abiertos y cerrados. Y así los que esto miraban, como los que abrían la sepultura, y todos los demás que allí había, guardaban un maravilloso silencio, hasta que uno de los que al muerto trujeron dijo a otro:

-Mirá bien, Ambrosio, si es éste el lugar que Grisóstomo dijo, ya que queréis que tan puntualmente se cumpla lo que dejó mandado en su testamento.

-Éste es -respondió Ambrosio-; que muchas veces en él me contó mi desdichado amigo la historia de su desventura. Allí me dijo él que vio la vez primera a aquella enemiga mortal del linaje humano, y allí fue también donde la primera vez le declaró su pensamiento, tan honesto como enamorado, y allí fue la última vez donde Marcela le acabó de desengañar y desdeñar, de suerte que puso fin a la tragedia de su miserable vida. Y aquí, en memoria de tantas desdichas, quiso él que le depositasen en las entrañas del eterno olvido.

Y, volviéndose a don Quijote y a los caminantes, prosiguió diciendo:

-Ese cuerpo, señores, que con piadosos ojos estáis mirando, fue depositario de un alma en quien el cielo puso infinita parte de sus riquezas. Ése es el cuerpo de Grisóstomo, que fue único en el ingenio, solo en la cortesía, extremo en la gentileza, fénix en la amistad, magnífico sin tasa, grave sin presunción, alegre sin bajeza, y, finalmente, primero en todo lo que es ser bueno, y sin segundo en todo lo que fue ser desdichado. Quiso bien, fue aborrecido; adoró, fue desdeñado; rogó a una fiera, importunó a un mármol, corrió tras el viento, dio voces a la soledad, sirvió a la ingratitud, de quien alcanzó por premio ser despojos de la muerte en la mitad de la carrera de su vida, a la cual dio fin una pastora a quien él procuraba eternizar para que viviera en la memoria de las gentes, cual lo pudieran mostrar bien esos papeles que estáis mirando, si él no me hubiera mandado que los entregara al fuego en habiendo entregado su cuerpo a la tierra.

-De mayor rigor y crueldad usaréis vos con ellos -dijo Vivaldo- que su mismo dueño, pues no es justo ni acertado que se cumpla la voluntad de quien lo que ordena va fuera de todo razonable discurso. Y no le tuviera bueno Augusto César si consintiera que se pusiera en ejecución lo que el divino Mantuano dejó en su testamento mandado. Ansí que, señor Ambrosio, ya que deis el cuerpo de vuestro amigo a la tierra, no queráis dar sus escritos al olvido; que si él ordenó como agraviado, no es bien que vos cumpláis como indiscreto. Antes haced, dando la vida a estos papeles, que la tenga siempre la crueldad de Marcela, para que sirva de ejemplo, en los tiempos que están por venir, a los vivientes, para que se aparten y huyan de caer en semejantes despeñaderos; que ya sé yo, y los que aquí venimos, la historia deste vuestro enamorado y desesperado amigo, y sabemos la amistad vuestra, y la ocasión de su muerte, y lo que dejó mandado al acabar de la vida; de la cual lamentable historia se puede sacar cuánto haya sido la crueldad de Marcela, el amor de Grisóstomo, la fe de la amistad vuestra, con el paradero que tienen los que a rienda suelta corren por la senda que el desvariado amor delante de los ojos les pone. Anoche supimos la muerte de Grisóstomo, y que en este lugar había de ser enterrado; y así, de curiosidad y de lástima, dejamos nuestro derecho viaje, y acordamos de venir a ver con los ojos

lo que tanto nos había lastimado en oído. Y, en pago desta lástima y del deseo que en nosotros nació de remedialla si pudiéramos, te rogamos, ¡oh discreto Ambrosio! (a lo menos, yo te lo suplico de mi parte), que, dejando de abrasar estos papeles, me dejes llevar algunos dellos.

Y, sin aguardar que el pastor respondiese, alargó la mano y tomó algunos de los que más cerca estaban; viendo lo cual Ambrosio, dijo:

-Por cortesía consentiré que os quedéis, señor, con los que ya habéis tomado; pero pensar que dejaré de abrasar los que quedan es pensamiento vano.

Vivaldo, que deseaba ver lo que los papeles decían, abrió luego el uno dellos y vio que tenía por título: Canción desesperada. Oyólo Ambrosio y dijo:

-Ése es el último papel que escribió el desdichado; y, porque veáis, señor, en el término que le tenían sus desventuras, leelde de modo que seáis oído; que bien os dará lugar a ello el que se tardare en abrir la sepultura.

-Eso haré yo de muy buena gana -dijo Vivaldo.

Y, como todos los circunstantes tenían el mismo deseo, se le pusieron a la redonda; y él, leyendo en voz clara, vio que así decía:

Capítulo XIV

Donde se ponen los versos desesperados del difunto pastor, con otros no esperados sucesos

CANCIÓN DE GRISÓSTOMO

YA QUE quieres, cruel, que se publique, de lengua en lengua y de una en otra gente, del áspero rigor tuyo la fuerza, haré que el mismo infierno comunique al triste pecho mío un son doliente, 5

con que el uso común de mi voz tuerza.

Y al par de mi deseo, que se esfuerza a decir mi dolor y tus hazañas, de la espantable voz irá el acento, y en él mezcladas, por mayor tormento, 10 pedazos de las míseras entrañas.

Escucha, pues, y presta atento oído, no al concertado son, sino al rüido que de lo hondo de mi amargo pecho, llevado de un forzoso desvarío, 15 por gusto mío sale y tu despecho.

El rugir del león, del lobo fiero el temeroso aullido, el silbo horrendo de escamosa serpiente, el espantable baladro de algún monstruo, el agorero 20 graznar de la corneja, y el estruendo del viento contrastado en mar inestable;

del ya vencido toro el implacable bramido, y de la viuda tortolilla el sentible arrullar; el triste canto 25

del envidiado búho, con el llanto de toda la infernal negra cuadrilla, salgan con la doliente ánima fuera, mezclados en un son, de tal manera que se confundan los sentidos todos, 30

pues la pena cruel que en mí se halla para contalla pide nuevos modos.

De tanta confusión no las arenas del padre Tajo oirán los tristes ecos, ni del
famoso Betis las olivas: 35

que allí se esparcirán mis duras penas en altos riscos y en profundos huecos, con muerta lengua y con palabras vivas; o ya en oscuros valles, o en esquivas playas, desnudas de contrato humano, 40

o adonde el sol jamás mostró su lumbre, o entre la venenosa muchedumbre de fieras que alimenta el libio llano; que, puesto que en los páramos desiertos los ecos roncós de mi mal, inciertos, 45 suenen con tu rigor tan sin segundo, por privilegio de mis cortos hados, serán llevados por el ancho mundo.

Mata un desdén, atierra la paciencia, o verdadera o falsa, una sospecha; 50
matan los celos con rigor más fuerte; desconcierta la vida larga ausencia;
contra un temor de olvido no aprovecha firme esperanza de dichosa suerte.

En todo hay cierta, inevitable muerte; 55

mas yo, ¡milagro nunca visto!, vivo celoso, ausente, desdeñado y cierto de las sospechas que me tienen muerto; y en el olvido en quien mi fuego avivo, y, entre tantos tormentos, nunca alcanza 60

mi vista a ver en sombra a la esperanza, ni yo, desesperado, la procuro; antes, por estremarme en mi querella, estar sin ella eternamente juro.

¿Puédese, por ventura, en un instante 65

esperar y temer, o es bien hacello, siendo las causas del temor más ciertas?

¿Tengo, si el duro celo está delante, de cerrar estos ojos, si he de vello por mil heridas en el alma abiertas? 70

¿Quién no abrirá de par en par las puertas a la desconfianza, cuando mira descubierto el desdén, y las sospechas, ¡oh amarga conversión!, verdades hechas, y la limpia verdad vuelta en mentira? 75

¡Oh, en el reino de amor fieros tiranos celos, ponedme un hierro en estas manos!

Dame, desdén, una torcida sogá.

Mas, ¡ay de mí!, que, con cruel vitoria, vuestra memoria el sufrimiento ahoga.
80

Yo muero, en fin; y, porque nunca espere buen suceso en la muerte ni en la vida, pertinaz estaré en mi fantasía.

Diré que va acertado el que bien quiere, y que es más libre el alma más rendida 85

a la de amor antigua tiranía.

Diré que la enemiga siempre mía hermosa el alma como el cuerpo tiene, y que su olvido de mi culpa nace, y que, en fe de los males que nos hace, 90

amor su imperio en justa paz mantiene.

Y, con esta opinión y un duro lazo, acelerando el miserable plazo a que me han conducido sus desdenes, ofreceré a los vientos cuerpo y alma, 95 sin lauro o palma de futuros bienes.

Tú, que con tantas sinrazones muestras la razón que me fuerza a que la haga a la cansada vida que aborrezco, pues ya ves que te da notorias muestras 100

esta del corazón profunda llaga, de cómo, alegre, a tu rigor me ofrezco, si, por dicha, conoces que merezco que el cielo claro de tus bellos ojos en mi muerte se turbe, no lo hagas; 105 que no quiero que en nada satisfagas, al darte de mi alma los despojos.

Antes, con risa en la ocasión funesta, descubre que el fin mío fue tu fiesta; mas gran simpleza es avisarte desto, 110

pues sé que está tu gloria conocida en que mi vida llegue al fin tan presto.

Venga, que es tiempo ya, del hondo abismo Tántalo con su sed; Sísifo venga con el peso terrible de su canto; 115

Ticio traya su buitre, y ansimismo con su rueda Egión no se detenga, ni las hermanas que trabajan tanto; y todos juntos su mortal quebranto trasladen en mi pecho, y en voz baja 120

-si ya a un desesperado son debidas-canten obsequias tristes, doloridas, al cuerpo a quien se niegue aun la mortaja.

Y el portero infernal de los tres rostros, con otras mil quimeras y mil monstros, 125

lleven el doloroso contrapunto; que otra pompa mejor no me parece que la merece un amador difunto.

Canción desesperada, no te quejes cuando mi triste compañía dejes; 130

antes, pues que la causa do naciste con mi desdicha aumenta su ventura, aun en la sepultura no estés triste.

Bien les pareció, a los que escuchado habían, la canción de Grisóstomo, puesto que el que la leyó dijo que no le parecía que conformaba con la relación que él había oído del recato y bondad de Marcela, porque en ella se quejaba Grisóstomo de celos, sospechas y de ausencia, todo en perjuicio del buen crédito y buena fama de Marcela. A lo cual respondió Ambrosio, como aquel que sabía bien los más escondidos pensamientos de su amigo: -Para que, señor, os satisfagáis desa duda, es bien que sepáis que cuando este desdichado escribió esta canción estaba ausente de Marcela, de quien él se había ausentado por su voluntad, por ver si usaba con él la ausencia de sus ordinarios fueros. Y, como al enamorado ausente no hay cosa que no le fatigue ni temor que no le dé alcance, así le fatigaban a Grisóstomo los celos imaginados y las sospechas temidas como si fueran verdaderas. Y con esto queda en su punto la verdad que la fama pregona de la bondad de Marcela; la cual, fuera de ser cruel, y un poco arrogante y un mucho desdeñosa, la misma envidia ni debe ni puede ponerle falta alguna.

-Así es la verdad -respondió Vivaldo.

Y, queriendo leer otro papel de los que había reservado del fuego, lo estorbó una maravillosa visión -que tal parecía ella-que improvisamente se les ofreció a los ojos; y fue que, por cima de la peña donde se cavaba la sepultura, pareció la pastora Marcela, tan hermosa que pasaba a su fama su hermosura. Los que hasta entonces no la habían visto la miraban con admiración y silencio, y los que ya estaban acostumbrados a verla no quedaron menos suspensos que los que nunca la habían visto. Mas, apenas la hubo visto Ambrosio, cuando, con muestras de ánimo indignado, le dijo: -¿Vienes a ver, por ventura, ¡oh fiero basilisco destas montañas!, si con tu presencia vierten sangre las heridas deste miserable a quien tu crueldad quitó la vida? ¿O vienes a ufanarte en las crueles hazañas de tu condición, o a ver desde esa altura, como otro despiadado Nero, el incendio de su abrasada Roma, o a pisar, arrogante, este desdichado cadáver, como la ingrata hija al de su padre Tarquino? Dinos presto a lo que vienes, o qué es aquello de que más gustas; que, por saber yo que los pensamientos de Grisóstomo jamás dejaron de obedecerte en vida, haré que, aun él muerto, te obedezcan los de todos aquellos que se llamaron sus amigos.

-No vengo, ¡oh Ambrosio!, a ninguna cosa de las que has dicho -respondió Marcela-, sino a volver por mí misma, y a dar a entender cuán fuera de razón van todos aquellos que de sus penas y de la muerte de Grisóstomo me culpan; y así, ruego a todos los que aquí estáis me estéis atentos, que no será menester mucho tiempo ni gastar muchas palabras para persuadir una verdad a los discretos.

»Hízome el cielo, según vosotros decís, hermosa, y de tal manera que, sin ser poderosos a otra cosa, a que me améis os mueve mi hermosura; y, por el amor que me mostráis, decís, y aun queréis, que esté yo obligada a amaros. Yo conozco, con el natural entendimiento que Dios me ha dado, que todo lo hermoso es amable; mas no alcanzo que, por razón de ser amado, esté obligado lo que es amado por hermoso a amar a quien le ama. Y más, que podría acontecer que el amador de lo hermoso fuese feo, y, siendo lo feo digno de ser aborrecido, cae muy mal el decir “Quiérote por hermosa; hasme de amar aunque sea feo”. Pero, puesto caso que corran igualmente las hermosuras, no por eso han de correr iguales los deseos, que no todas hermosuras enamoran; que algunas alegran la vista y no rinden la voluntad; que si todas las bellezas enamorasen y rindiesen, sería un andar las voluntades confusas y descaminadas, sin saber en cuál habían de parar; porque, siendo infinitos los sujetos hermosos, infinitos

habían de ser los deseos. Y, según yo he oído decir, el verdadero amor no se divide, y ha de ser voluntario, y no forzoso. Siendo esto así, como yo creo que lo es, ¿por qué queréis que rinda mi voluntad por fuerza, obligada no más de que decís que me queréis bien? Si no, decidme: si como el cielo me hizo hermosa me hiciera fea, ¿fuera justo que me quejara de vosotros porque no me amábades? Cuanto más, que habéis de considerar que yo no escogí la hermosura que tengo; que, tal cual es, el cielo me la dio de gracia, sin yo pedilla ni escogella. Y, así como la víbora no merece ser culpada por la ponzoña que tiene, puesto que con ella mata, por habérsela dado naturaleza, tampoco yo merezco ser reprehendida por ser hermosa; que la hermosura en la mujer honesta es como el fuego apartado o como la espada aguda, que ni él quema ni ella corta a quien a ellos no se acerca. La honra y las virtudes son adornos del alma, sin las cuales el cuerpo, aunque lo sea, no debe de parecer hermoso. Pues si la honestidad es una de las virtudes que al cuerpo y al alma más adornan y hermocean, ¿por qué la ha de perder la que es amada por hermosa, por corresponder a la intención de aquel que, por sólo su gusto, con todas sus fuerzas e industrias procura que la pierda?

»Yo nací libre, y para poder vivir libre escogí la soledad de los campos. Los árboles destas montañas son mi compañía, las claras aguas destos arroyos mis espejos; con los árboles y con las aguas comunico mis pensamientos y hermosura. Fuego soy apartado y espada puesta lejos. A los que he enamorado con la vista he desengañado con las palabras. Y si los deseos se sustentan con esperanzas, no habiendo yo dado alguna a Grisóstomo ni a otro alguno, el fin de ninguno dellos bien se puede decir que antes le mató su porfía que mi crueldad. Y si se me hace cargo que eran honestos sus pensamientos, y que por esto estaba obligada a corresponder a ellos, digo que, cuando en ese mismo lugar donde ahora se cava su sepultura me descubrió la bondad de su intención, le dije yo que la mía era vivir en perpetua soledad, y de que sola la tierra gozase el fruto de mi recogimiento y los despojos de mi hermosura; y si él, con todo este desengaño, quiso porfiar contra la esperanza y navegar contra el viento, ¿qué mucho que se anegase en la mitad del golfo de su desatino? Si yo le entretuviera, fuera falsa; si le contentara, hiciera contra mi mejor intención y prosupuesto. Porfió desengañado, desesperó sin ser aborrecido: ¡mirad ahora si será razón que de su pena se me dé a mí la culpa! Quéjese el engañado, desespérese aquel a quien le faltaron las prometidas esperanzas, confíese el que yo llamare, ufánese el que yo admitiere; pero no me llame cruel ni homicida aquel a quien yo no prometo, engaño, llamo ni admito.

»El cielo aún hasta ahora no ha querido que yo ame por destino, y el pensar que tengo de amar por elección es escusado. Este general desengaño sirva a cada uno de los que me solicitan de su particular provecho; y entiéndase, de aquí adelante, que si alguno por mí muriere, no muere de celoso ni desdichado, porque quien a nadie quiere, a ninguno debe dar celos; que los desengaños no se han de tomar en cuenta de desdenes. El que me llama fiera y basilisco, déjeme como cosa perjudicial y mala; el que me llama ingrata, no me sirva; el que desconocida, no me conozca; quien cruel, no me siga; que esta fiera, este basilisco, esta ingrata, esta cruel y esta desconocida ni los buscará, servirá, conocerá ni seguirá en ninguna manera. Que si a Grisóstomo mató su impaciencia y arrojado deseo, ¿por qué se ha de culpar mi honesto proceder y recato? Si yo conservo mi limpieza con la compañía de los árboles, ¿por qué ha de querer que la pierda el que quiere que la tenga con los hombres? Yo, como sabéis, tengo riquezas propias y no codicio las ajenas; tengo libre condición y no gusto de sujetarme: ni quiero ni aborrezco a nadie. No engaño a éste ni solicito aquél, ni burlo con uno ni me entretengo con el otro. La conversación honesta de las zagalas destas aldeas y el cuidado de mis cabras me entretiene. Tienen mis deseos por término estas montañas, y si de aquí salen, es a contemplar la hermosura del cielo, pasos con que camina el alma a su morada primera.

Y, en diciendo esto, sin querer oír respuesta alguna, volvió las espaldas y se entró por lo más cerrado de un monte que allí cerca estaba, dejando admirados, tanto de su discreción como de su hermosura, a todos los que allí estaban. Y algunos dieron muestras -de aquellos que de la poderosa flecha de los rayos de sus bellos ojos estaban heridos-de quererla seguir, sin aprovecharse del manifiesto desengaño que habían oído. Lo cual visto por don Quijote, pareciéndole que allí venía bien usar de su caballería, socorriendo a las doncellas menesterosas, puesta la mano en el puño de su espada, en altas e inteligibles voces, dijo: -Ninguna persona, de cualquier estado y condición que sea, se atreva a seguir a la hermosa Marcela, so pena de caer en la furiosa indignación mía. Ella ha mostrado con claras y suficientes razones la poca o ninguna culpa que ha tenido en la muerte de Grisóstomo, y cuán ajena vive de condescender con los deseos de ninguno de sus amantes, a cuya causa es justo que, en lugar de ser seguida y perseguida, sea honrada y estimada de todos los buenos del mundo, pues muestra que en él ella es sola la que con tan honesta intención vive.

O ya que fuese por las amenazas de don Quijote, o porque Ambrosio les dijo que concluyesen con lo que a su buen amigo debían, ninguno de los pastores se movió ni apartó de allí hasta que, acabada la sepultura y abrasados los papeles de Grisóstomo, pusieron su cuerpo en ella, no sin muchas lágrimas de los circunstantes. Cerraron la sepultura con una gruesa peña, en tanto que se acababa una losa que, según Ambrosio dijo, pensaba mandar hacer, con un epitafio que había de decir desta manera: YACE AQUÍ DE UN AMADOR

EL MÍSERO CUERPO HELADO, QUE FUE PASTOR DE GANADO, PERDIDO POR DESAMOR.

MURIÓ A MANOS DEL RIGOR 5

DE UNA ESQUIVA HERMOSA INGRATA, CON QUIEN SU IMPERIO DILATA
LA TIRANÍA DE AMOR.

Luego esparcieron por cima de la sepultura muchas flores y ramos, y, dando todos el pésame a su amigo Ambrosio, se despidieron dél. Lo mismo hicieron Vivaldo y su compañero, y don Quijote se despidió de sus huéspedes y de los caminantes, los cuales le rogaron se viniese con ellos a Sevilla, por ser lugar tan acomodado a hallar aventuras, que en cada calle y tras cada esquina se ofrecen más que en otro alguno. Don Quijote les agradeció el aviso y el ánimo que mostraban de hacerle merced, y dijo que por entonces no quería ni debía ir a Sevilla, hasta que hubiese despojado todas aquellas sierras de ladrones malandrines, de quien era fama que todas estaban llenas. Viendo su buena determinación, no quisieron los caminantes importunarle más, sino, tornándose a despedir de nuevo, le dejaron y prosiguieron su camino, en el cual no les faltó de qué tratar, así de la historia de Marcela y Grisóstomo como de las locuras de don Quijote. El cual determinó de ir a buscar a la pastora Marcela y ofrecerle todo lo que él podía en su servicio. Mas no le avino como él pensaba, según se cuenta en el discurso desta verdadera historia, dando aquí fin la segunda parte.

Tercera parte del ingenioso hidalgo don Quijote de la Mancha

Capítulo XV

Donde se cuenta la desgraciada aventura que se topó don Quijote en topar con unos desalmados yangüeses

CUENTA el sabio Cide Hamete Benengeli que, así como don Quijote se despidió de sus huéspedes y de todos los que se hallaron al entierro del pastor Grisóstomo, él y su escudero se entraron por el mismo bosque donde vieron que se había entrado la pastora Marcela; y, habiendo andado más de dos horas por él, buscándola por todas partes sin poder hallarla, vinieron a parar a un prado lleno de fresca yerba, junto del cual corría un arroyo apacible y fresco; tanto, que convidó y forzó a pasar allí las horas de la siesta, que rigurosamente comenzaba ya a entrar.

Apeáronse don Quijote y Sancho, y, dejando al jumento y a Rocinante a sus anchuras pacer de la mucha yerba que allí había, dieron saco a las alforjas, y, sin cerimonia alguna, en buena paz y compañía, amo y mozo comieron lo que en ellas hallaron.

No se había curado Sancho de echar sueltas a Rocinante, seguro de que le conocía por tan manso y tan poco rijoso que todas las yeguas de la dehesa de Córdoba no le hicieran tomar mal siniestro. Ordenó, pues, la suerte, y el diablo, que no todas veces duerme, que andaban por aquel valle paciendo una manada de hacas galicianas de unos arrieros gallegos, de los cuales es costumbre sestear con su recua en lugares y sitios de yerba y agua; y aquel donde acertó a hallarse don Quijote era muy a propósito de los gallegos.

Sucedió, pues, que a Rocinante le vino en deseo de refocilarse con las señoras facas; y saliendo, así como las olió, de su natural paso y costumbre, sin pedir licencia a su dueño, tomó un trotico algo picadillo y se fue a comunicar su necesidad con ellas. Mas ellas, que, a lo que pareció, debían de tener más gana de pacer que de ál, recibieronle con las herraduras y con los dientes, de tal manera que, a poco espacio, se le rompieron las cinchas y quedó, sin silla, en pelota. Pero lo que él debió más de sentir fue que, viendo los arrieros la fuerza que a sus yeguas se les hacía, acudieron con estacas, y tantos palos le dieron que le derribaron malparado en el suelo.

Ya en esto don Quijote y Sancho, que la paliza de Rocinante habían visto, llegaban ijadeando; y dijo don Quijote a Sancho:

-A lo que yo veo, amigo Sancho, éstos no son caballeros, sino gente soez y de baja ralea. Dígolo porque bien me puedes ayudar a tomar la debida venganza del agravio que delante de nuestros ojos se le ha hecho a Rocinante.

-¿Qué diablos de venganza hemos de tomar -respondió Sancho-, si éstos son más de veinte y nosotros no más de dos, y aun, quizá, nosotros sino uno y medio?

-Yo valgo por ciento -replicó don Quijote.

Y, sin hacer más discursos, echó mano a su espada y arremetió a los gallegos, y lo mismo hizo Sancho Panza, incitado y movido del ejemplo de su amo. Y, a las primeras, dio don Quijote una cuchillada a uno, que le abrió un sayo de cuero de que venía vestido, con gran parte de la espalda.

Los gallegos, que se vieron maltratar de aquellos dos hombres solos, siendo ellos tantos, acudieron a sus estacas, y, cogiendo a los dos en medio, comenzaron a menudear sobre ellos con grande ahínco y vehemencia. Verdad es que al segundo toque dieron con Sancho en el suelo, y lo mismo le avino a don Quijote, sin que le valiese su destreza y buen ánimo; y quiso su ventura que viniese a caer a los pies de Rocinante, que aún no se había levantado; donde se echa de ver la furia con que machacan estacas puestas en manos rústicas y enojadas.

Viendo, pues, los gallegos el mal recado que habían hecho, con la mayor presteza que pudieron, cargaron su recua y siguieron su camino, dejando a los dos aventureros de mala traza y de peor talante.

El primero que se resintió fue Sancho Panza; y, hallándose junto a su señor, con voz enferma y lastimada, dijo:

-¡Señor don Quijote! ¡Ah, señor don Quijote!

-¿Qué quieres, Sancho hermano? -respondió don Quijote con el mismo tono afeminado y doliente que Sancho.

-Querría, si fuese posible -respondió Sancho Panza-, que vuestra merced me diese dos tragos de aquella bebida del feo Blas, si es que la tiene vuestra merced ahí a mano. Quizá será de provecho para los quebrantamientos de huesos como lo es para las heridas.

-Pues, a tenerla yo aquí, desgraciado yo, ¿qué nos faltaba? -respondió don Quijote-. Mas yo te juro, Sancho Panza, a fe de caballero andante, que antes que pasen dos días, si la fortuna no ordena otra cosa, la tengo de tener en mi poder, o mal me han de andar las manos.

-Pues ¿en cuántos le parece a vuestra merced que podremos mover los pies? -replicó Sancho Panza.

-De mí sé decir -dijo el molido caballero don Quijote-que no sabré poner término a esos días. Mas yo me tengo la culpa de todo, que no había de poner mano a la espada contra hombres que no fuesen armados caballeros como yo; y así, creo que, en pena de haber pasado las leyes de la caballería, ha permitido el dios de las batallas que se me diese este castigo. Por lo cual, Sancho Panza, conviene que estés advertido en esto que ahora te diré, porque importa mucho a la salud de entrambos; y es que, cuando veas que semejante canalla nos hace algún agravio, no aguardes a que yo ponga mano al espada para ellos, porque no lo haré en ninguna manera, sino pon tú mano a tu espada y castígalos muy a tu sabor; que si en su ayuda y defensa acudieren caballeros, yo te sabré defender y ofendellos con todo mi poder; que ya habrás visto por mil señales y experiencias hasta adónde se estiende el valor de este mi fuerte brazo.

Tal quedó de arrogante el pobre señor con el vencimiento del valiente vizcaíno. Mas no le pareció tan bien a Sancho Panza el aviso de su amo que dejase de responder, diciendo:

-Señor, yo soy hombre pacífico, manso, sosegado, y sé disimular cualquiera injuria, porque tengo mujer y hijos que sustentar y criar. Así que, séale a vuestra merced también aviso, pues no puede ser mandato, que en ninguna manera pondré mano a la espada, ni contra villano ni contra caballero; y que, desde aquí para delante de Dios, perdono cuantos agravios me han hecho y han de hacer: ora me los haya hecho, o haga o haya de hacer, persona alta o baja, rico o pobre, hidalgo o pechero, sin eceptar estado ni condición alguna.

Lo cual oído por su amo, le respondió:

-Quisiera tener aliento para poder hablar un poco descansado, y que el dolor que tengo en esta costilla se aplacara tanto cuanto, para darte a entender, Panza, en el error en que estás. Ven acá, pecador; si el viento de la fortuna, hasta ahora tan contrario, en nuestro favor se vuelve, llevándonos las velas del deseo para que seguramente y sin contraste alguno tomemos puerto en alguna de las ínsulas que te tengo prometida, ¿qué sería de ti si, ganándola yo, te hiciese señor della? Pues ¿lo vendrás a imposibilitar por no ser caballero, ni quererlo ser, ni tener valor ni intención de vengar tus injurias y defender tu señorío? Porque has de saber que en los reinos y provincias nuevamente conquistados nunca están tan quietos los ánimos de sus naturales, ni tan de parte del nuevo señor que no se tengan temor de que han de hacer alguna novedad para alterar de nuevo las cosas, y volver, como dicen, a probar ventura; y así, es menester que el nuevo poseedor tenga entendimiento para saberse gobernar, y valor para ofender y defenderse en cualquiera acontecimiento.

-En este que ahora nos ha acontecido -respondió Sancho-, quisiera yo tener ese entendimiento y ese valor que vuestra merced dice; mas yo le juro, a fe de pobre hombre, que más estoy para bizmas que para pláticas. Mire vuestra merced si se puede levantar, y ayudaremos a Rocinante, aunque no lo merece, porque él fue la causa principal de todo este molimiento. Jamás tal creí de

Rocinante, que le tenía por persona casta y tan pacífica como yo. En fin, bien dicen que es menester mucho tiempo para venir a conocer las personas, y que no hay cosa segura en esta vida. ¿Quién dijera que tras de aquellas tan grandes cuchilladas como vuestra merced dio a aquel desdichado caballero andante, había de venir, por la posta y en seguimiento suyo, esta tan grande tempestad de palos que ha descargado sobre nuestras espaldas?

-Aun las tuyas, Sancho -replicó don Quijote-, deben de estar hechas a semejantes nublados; pero las mías, criadas entre sinabafas y holandas, claro está que sentirán más el dolor desta desgracia. Y si no fuese porque imagino..., ¿qué digo imagino?, sé muy cierto, que todas estas incomodidades son muy anejas al ejercicio de las armas, aquí me dejaría morir de puro enojo.

A esto replicó el escudero:

-Señor, ya que estas desgracias son de la cosecha de la caballería, dígame vuestra merced si suceden muy a menudo, o si tienen sus tiempos limitados en que acaecen; porque me parece a mí que a dos cosechas quedaremos inútiles para la tercera, si Dios, por su infinita misericordia, no nos socorre.

-Sábetelo, amigo Sancho -respondió don Quijote-, que la vida de los caballeros andantes está sujeta a mil peligros y desventuras; y, ni más ni menos, está en potencia propinqua de ser los caballeros andantes reyes y emperadores, como lo ha mostrado la experiencia en muchos y diversos caballeros, de cuyas historias yo tengo entera noticia. Y pudierate contar agora, si el dolor me diera lugar, de algunos que, sólo por el valor de su brazo, han subido a los altos grados que he contado; y estos mismos se vieron antes y después en diversas calamidades y miserias. Porque el valeroso Amadís de Gaula se vio en poder de su mortal enemigo Arcaláus el encantador, de quien se tiene por averiguado que le dio, teniéndole preso, más de docientos azotes con las riendas de su caballo, atado a una columna de un patio. Y aun hay un autor secreto, y de no poco crédito, que dice que, habiendo cogido al Caballero del Febo con una cierta trampa que se le hundió debajo de los pies, en un cierto castillo, y al caer, se halló en una honda sima debajo de tierra, atado de pies y manos, y allí le echaron una destas que llaman melecinas, de agua de nieve y arena, de lo que llegó muy al cabo; y si no fuera socorrido en aquella gran cuita de un sabio grande amigo suyo, lo pasara muy mal el pobre caballero. Ansí que, bien puedo yo pasar entre tanta buena gente; que mayores afrentas son las que éstos pasaron, que no las que ahora nosotros pasamos. Porque quiero hacerte sabidor, Sancho, que no afrentan las heridas que se dan con los instrumentos que acaso se hallan en las manos; y esto está en la ley del duelo, escrito por palabras expresas: que si el zapatero da a otro con la horma que tiene en la mano, puesto que verdaderamente es de palo, no por eso se dirá que queda apaleado aquel a quien dio con ella. Digo esto porque

no pienses que, puesto que quedamos desta pendencia molidos, quedamos afrentados; porque las armas que aquellos hombres traían, con que nos machacaron, no eran otras que sus estacas, y ninguno dellos, a lo que se me acuerda, tenía estoque, espada ni puñal.

-No me dieron a mí lugar -respondió Sancho-a que mirase en tanto; porque, apenas puse mano a mi tizona, cuando me santiguaron los hombros con sus pinos, de manera que me quitaron la vista de los ojos y la fuerza de los pies, dando conmigo adonde ahora yago, y adonde no me da pena alguna el pensar si fue afrenta o no lo de los estacazos, como me la da el dolor de los golpes, que me han de quedar tan impresos en la memoria como en las espaldas.

-Con todo eso, te hago saber, hermano Panza -replicó don Quijote-, que no hay memoria a quien el tiempo no acabe, ni dolor que muerte no le consuma.

-Pues ¿qué mayor desdicha puede ser -replicó Panza-de aquella que aguarda al tiempo que la consuma y a la muerte que la acabe? Si esta nuestra desgracia fuera de aquellas que con un par de bizmas se curan, aun no tan malo; pero voy viendo que no han de bastar todos los emplastos de un hospital para ponerlas en buen término siquiera.

-Déjate deso y saca fuerzas de flaqueza, Sancho -respondió don Quijote-, que así haré yo, y veamos cómo está Rocinante; que, a lo que me parece, no le ha cabido al pobre la menor parte desta desgracia.

-No hay de qué maravillarse deso -respondió Sancho-, siendo él tan buen caballero andante; de lo que yo me maravillo es de que mi jumento haya quedado libre y sin costas donde nosotros salimos sin costillas.

-Siempre deja la ventura una puerta abierta en las desdichas, para dar remedio a ellas -dijo don Quijote-. Dígolo porque esa bestezuela podrá suplir ahora la falta de Rocinante, llevándome a mí desde aquí a algún castillo donde sea curado de mis heridas. Y más, que no tendré a deshonra la tal caballería, porque me acuerdo haber leído que aquel buen viejo Sileno, ayo y pedagogo del alegre dios de la risa, cuando entró en la ciudad de las cien puertas iba, muy a su placer, caballero sobre un muy hermoso asno.

-Verdad será que él debía de ir caballero, como vuestra merced dice -respondió Sancho-, pero hay grande diferencia del ir caballero al ir atravesado como costal de basura.

A lo cual respondió don Quijote:

-Las heridas que se reciben en las batallas, antes dan honra que la quitan. Así que, Panza amigo, no me repliques más, sino, como ya te he dicho, levántate lo mejor que pudieres y ponme de la manera que más te agradare encima de tu jumento, y vamos de aquí antes que la noche venga y nos saltee en este despoblado.

-Pues yo he oído decir a vuestra merced -dijo Panza-que es muy de caballeros andantes el dormir en los páramos y desiertos lo más del año, y que lo tienen a mucha ventura.

-Eso es -dijo don Quijote-cuando no pueden más, o cuando están enamorados; y es tan verdad esto, que ha habido caballero que se ha estado sobre una peña, al sol y a la sombra, y a las inclemencias del cielo, dos años, sin que lo supiese su señora. Y uno déstos fue Amadís, cuando, llamándose Beltenebros, se alojó en la Peña Pobre, ni sé si ocho años o ocho meses, que no estoy muy bien en la cuenta: basta que él estuvo allí haciendo penitencia, por no sé qué sinsabor que le hizo la señora Oriana. Pero dejemos ya esto, Sancho, y acaba, antes que suceda otra desgracia al jumento, como a Rocinante.

-Aun ahí sería el diablo -dijo Sancho.

Y, despidiendo treinta ayes, y sesenta suspiros, y ciento y veinte pésetes y reniegos de quien allí le había traído, se levantó, quedándose agobiado en la mitad del camino, como arco turquesco, sin poder acabar de enderezarse; y con todo este trabajo aparejó su asno, que también había andado algo distraído con la demasiada libertad de aquel día. Levantó luego a Rocinante, el cual, si tuviera lengua con que quejarse, a buen seguro que Sancho ni su amo no le fueran en zaga.

En resolución, Sancho acomodó a don Quijote sobre el asno y puso de reata a Rocinante; y, llevando al asno de cabestro, se encaminó, poco más a menos, hacia donde le pareció que podía estar el camino real. Y la suerte, que sus cosas de bien en mejor iba guiando, aún no hubo andado una pequeña legua, cuando le deparó el camino, en el cual descubrió una venta que, a pesar suyo y gusto de don Quijote, había de ser castillo. Porfiaba Sancho que era venta, y su amo que no, sino castillo; y tanto duró la porfía, que tuvieron lugar, sin acabarla, de llegar a ella, en la cual Sancho se entró, sin más averiguación, con toda su recua.

Capítulo XVI

De lo que le sucedió al ingenioso hidalgo en la venta que él imaginaba ser castillo

EL VENTERO, que vio a don Quijote atravesado en el asno, preguntó a Sancho qué mal traía. Sancho le respondió que no era nada, sino que había dado una caída de una peña abajo, y que venía algo brumadas las costillas. Tenía el ventero por mujer a una, no de la condición que suelen tener las de semejante trato, porque naturalmente era caritativa y se dolía de las calamidades de sus prójimos; y así, acudió luego a curar a don Quijote y hizo que una hija suya, doncella, muchacha y de muy buen parecer, la ayudase a curar a su huésped. Servía en la venta, asimesmo, una moza asturiana, ancha de cara, llana de cogote, de nariz roma, del un ojo tuerta y del otro no muy sana. Verdad es que la gallardía del cuerpo suplía las demás faltas: no tenía siete palmos de los pies a la cabeza, y las espaldas, que algún tanto le cargaban, la hacían mirar al suelo más de lo que ella quisiera. Esta gentil moza, pues, ayudó a la doncella, y las dos hicieron una muy mala cama a don Quijote en un camaranchón que, en otros tiempos, daba manifiestos indicios que había servido de pajar muchos años. En la cual también alojaba un arriero, que tenía su cama hecha un poco más allá de la de nuestro don Quijote. Y, aunque era de las enjalmas y mantas de sus machos, hacía mucha ventaja a la de don Quijote, que sólo contenía cuatro mal lisas tablas, sobre dos no muy iguales bancos, y un colchón que en lo sutil parecía colcha, lleno de bodoques, que, a no mostrar que eran de lana por algunas roturas, al tiento, en la dureza, semejaban de guijarro, y dos sábanas hechas de cuero de adarga, y una frazada, cuyos hilos, si se quisieran contar, no se perdiera uno solo de la cuenta.

En esta maldita cama se acostó don Quijote, y luego la ventera y su hija le emplastaron de arriba abajo, alumbrándoles Maritornes, que así se llamaba la asturiana; y, como al bizmalle viese la ventera tan acardenalado a partes a don Quijote, dijo que aquello más parecían golpes que caída.

-No fueron golpes -dijo Sancho-, sino que la peña tenía muchos picos y tropezones.

Y que cada uno había hecho su cardenal. Y también le dijo:

-Haga vuestra merced, señora, de manera que queden algunas estopas, que no faltará quien las haya menester; que también me duelen a mí un poco los lomos.

-Desa manera -respondió la ventera-, también debistes vos de caer.

-No caí -dijo Sancho Panza-, sino que del sobresalto que tomé de ver caer a mi amo, de tal manera me duele a mí el cuerpo que me parece que me han dado mil palos.

-Bien podrá ser eso -dijo la doncella-; que a mí me ha acontecido muchas veces soñar que caía de una torre abajo y que nunca acababa de llegar al suelo, y, cuando despertaba del sueño, hallarme tan molida y quebrantada como si verdaderamente hubiera caído.

-Ahí está el toque, señora -respondió Sancho Panza-: que yo, sin soñar nada, sino estando más despierto que ahora estoy, me hallo con pocos menos cardenales que mi señor don Quijote.

-¿Cómo se llama este caballero? -preguntó la asturiana Maritornes.

-Don Quijote de la Mancha -respondió Sancho Panza-, y es caballero aventurero, y de los mejores y más fuertes que de luengos tiempos acá se han visto en el mundo.

-¿Qué es caballero aventurero? -replicó la moza.

-¿Tan nueva sois en el mundo que no lo sabéis vos? -respondió Sancho Panza-. Pues sabed, hermana mía, que caballero aventurero es una cosa que en dos palabras se ve apaleado y emperador. Hoy está la más desdichada criatura del mundo y la más menesterosa, y mañana tendría dos o tres coronas de reinos que dar a su escudero.

-Pues ¿cómo vos, siéndolo deste tan buen señor -dijo la ventera-, no tenéis, a lo que parece, siquiera algún condado?

-Aún es temprano -respondió Sancho-, porque no ha sino un mes que andamos buscando las aventuras, y hasta ahora no hemos topado con ninguna que lo sea. Y tal vez hay que se busca una cosa y se halla otra. Verdad es que, si mi señor don Quijote sana desta herida o caída y yo no quedo contrecho della, no trocaría mis esperanzas con el mejor título de España.

Todas estas pláticas estaba escuchando, muy atento, don Quijote, y, sentándose en el lecho como pudo, tomando de la mano a la ventera, le dijo:

-Creedme, hermosa señora, que os podéis llamar venturosa por haber alojado en este vuestro castillo a mi persona, que es tal, que si yo no la alabo, es por lo que suele decirse que la alabanza propia envilece; pero mi escudero os dirá quién soy. Sólo os digo que tendré eternamente escrito en mi memoria el servicio que me habedes fecho, para agradecéroslo mientras la vida me durare; y pluguiera a los altos cielos que el amor no me tuviera tan rendido y tan sujeto a sus leyes, y los ojos de aquella hermosa ingrata que digo entre mis dientes; que los desta hermosa doncella fueran señores de mi libertad.

Confusas estaban la ventera y su hija y la buena de Maritornes oyendo las razones del andante caballero, que así las entendían como si hablara en griego, aunque bien alcanzaron que todas se encaminaban a ofrecimiento y requiebros; y, como no usadas a semejante lenguaje, mirábanle y admirábanse, y parecíales otro hombre de los que se usaban; y, agradeciéndole con venteriles razones sus ofrecimientos, le dejaron; y la asturiana Maritornes curó a Sancho, que no menos lo había menester que su amo.

Había el arriero concertado con ella que aquella noche se refocilarían juntos, y ella le había dado su palabra de que, en estando sosegados los huéspedes y durmiendo sus amos, le iría a buscar y satisfacerle el gusto en cuanto le mandase. Y cuéntase desta buena moza que jamás dio semejantes palabras que no las cumpliese, aunque las diese en un monte y sin testigo alguno; porque presumía muy de hidalga, y no tenía por afrenta estar en aquel ejercicio de servir en la venta, porque decía ella que desgracias y malos sucesos la habían traído a aquel estado.

El duro, estrecho, apocado y fementido lecho de don Quijote estaba primero en mitad de aquel estrellado establo, y luego, junto a él, hizo el suyo Sancho, que sólo contenía una estera de enea y una manta, que antes mostraba ser de anjeo tundido que de lana. Sucedió a estos dos lechos el del arriero, fabricado, como se ha dicho, de las enjalmas y todo el adorno de los dos mejores mulos que traía, aunque eran doce, lucios, gordos y famosos, porque era uno de los ricos arrieros de Arévalo, según lo dice el autor desta historia, que deste arriero hace particular mención, porque le conocía muy bien, y aun quieren decir que era algo pariente suyo. Fuera de que Cide Mahamate Benengeli fue historiador muy curioso y muy puntual en todas las cosas; y échase bien de ver, pues las que quedan referidas, con ser tan mínimas y tan rateras, no las quiso pasar en silencio; de donde podrán tomar ejemplo los historiadores graves, que nos cuentan las acciones tan corta y sucintamente que apenas nos llegan a los labios, dejándose en el tintero, ya por descuido, por malicia o ignorancia, lo más sustancial de la obra. ¡Bien haya mil veces el autor de Tablante de Ricamonte, y aquel del otro libro donde se cuenta los hechos del conde Tomillas; y con qué puntualidad lo describen todo!

Digo, pues, que después de haber visitado el arriero a su recua y dádole el segundo pienso, se tendió en sus enjalmas y se dio a esperar a su puntualísima Maritornes. Ya estaba Sancho bismado y acostado, y, aunque procuraba dormir, no lo consentía el dolor de sus costillas; y don Quijote, con el dolor de las suyas, tenía los ojos abiertos como liebre. Toda la venta estaba en silencio, y en toda ella no había otra luz que la que daba una lámpara que colgada en medio del portal ardía.

Esta maravillosa quietud, y los pensamientos que siempre nuestro caballero

traía de los sucesos que a cada paso se cuentan en los libros autores de su desgracia, le trujo a la imaginación una de las estrañas locuras que buenamente imaginarse pueden. Y fue que él se imaginó haber llegado a un famoso castillo - que, como se ha dicho, castillos eran a su parecer todas las ventas donde alojaba-, y que la hija del ventero lo era del señor del castillo, la cual, vencida de su gentileza, se había enamorado dél y prometido que aquella noche, a furto de sus padres, vendría a yacer con él una buena pieza; y, teniendo toda esta quimera, que él se había fabricado, por firme y valedera, se comenzó a acuitar y a pensar en el peligroso trance en que su honestidad se había de ver, y propuso en su corazón de no cometer alevosía a su señora Dulcinea del Toboso, aunque la misma reina Ginebra con su dama Quinañona se le pusiesen delante.

Pensando, pues, en estos disparates, se llegó el tiempo y la hora -que para él fue menguada-de la venida de la asturiana, la cual, en camisa y descalza, cogidos los cabellos en una albanega de fustán, con tábitos y atentados pasos, entró en el aposento donde los tres alojaban en busca del arriero. Pero, apenas llegó a la puerta, cuando don Quijote la sintió, y, sentándose en la cama, a pesar de sus bizmas y con dolor de sus costillas, tendió los brazos para recibir a su fermosa doncella. La asturiana, que, toda recogida y callando, iba con las manos delante buscando a su querido, topó con los brazos de don Quijote, el cual la asió fuertemente de una muñeca y, tirándola hacía sí, sin que ella osase hablar palabra, la hizo sentar sobre la cama. Tentóle luego la camisa, y, aunque ella era de harpillera, a él le pareció ser de finísimo y delgado cendal. Traía en las muñecas unas cuentas de vidro, pero a él le dieron vislumbres de preciosas perlas orientales. Los cabellos, que en alguna manera tiraban a crines, él los marcó por hebras de lucidísimo oro de Arabia, cuyo resplandor al del mismo sol escurecía. Y el aliento, que, sin duda alguna, olía a ensalada fiambre y trasnochada, a él le pareció que arrojaba de su boca un olor suave y aromático; y, finalmente, él la pintó en su imaginación de la misma traza y modo que lo había leído en sus libros de la otra princesa que vino a ver el mal ferido caballero, vencida de sus amores, con todos los adornos que aquí van puestos. Y era tanta la ceguedad del pobre hidalgo, que el tacto, ni el aliento, ni otras cosas que traía en sí la buena doncella, no le desengañaban, las cuales pudieran hacer vomitar a otro que no fuera arriero; antes, le parecía que tenía entre sus brazos a la diosa de la hermosura. Y, teniéndola bien asida, con voz amorosa y baja le comenzó a decir:

-Quisiera hallarme en términos, fermosa y alta señora, de poder pagar tamaña merced como la que con la vista de vuestra gran fermosura me habedes fecho, pero ha querido la fortuna, que no se cansa de perseguir a los buenos, ponerme en este lecho, donde yago tan molido y quebrantado que, aunque de mi voluntad

quisiera satisfacer a la vuestra, fuera imposible. Y más, que se añade a esta imposibilidad otra mayor, que es la prometida fe que tengo dada a la sin par Dulcinea del Toboso, única señora de mis más escondidos pensamientos; que si esto no hubiera de por medio, no fuera yo tan sandio caballero que dejara pasar en blanco la venturosa ocasión en que vuestra gran bondad me ha puesto.

Maritornes estaba congojadísima y trasudando de verse tan asida de don Quijote, y, sin entender ni estar atenta a las razones que le decía, procuraba, sin hablar palabra, desasirse. El bueno del arriero, a quien tenían despierto sus malos deseos, desde el punto que entró su coima por la puerta, la sintió; estuvo atentamente escuchando todo lo que don Quijote decía, y, celoso de que la asturiana le hubiese faltado la palabra por otro, se fue llegando más al lecho de don Quijote, y estúvose quedo hasta ver en qué paraban aquellas razones, que él no podía entender. Pero, como vio que la moza forcejaba por desasirse y don Quijote trabajaba por tenella, pareciéndole mal la burla, enarboló el brazo en alto y descargó tan terrible puñada sobre las estrechas quijadas del enamorado caballero, que le bañó toda la boca en sangre; y, no contento con esto, se le subió encima de las costillas, y con los pies más que de trote, se las paseó todas de cabo a cabo.

El lecho, que era un poco endeble y de no firmes fundamentos, no pudiendo sufrir la añadidura del arriero, dio consigo en el suelo, a cuyo gran ruido despertó el ventero, y luego imaginó que debían de ser pendencias de Maritornes, porque, habiéndola llamado a voces, no respondía. Con esta sospecha se levantó, y, encendiendo un candil, se fue hacia donde había sentido la pelaza. La moza, viendo que su amo venía, y que era de condición terrible, toda medrosica y alborotada, se acogió a la cama de Sancho Panza, que aún dormía, y allí se acorruco y se hizo un ovillo. El ventero entró diciendo:

-¿Adónde estás, puta? A buen seguro que son tus cosas éstas.

En esto, despertó Sancho, y, sintiendo aquel bulto casi encima de sí, pensó que tenía la pesadilla, y comenzó a dar puñadas a una y otra parte, y entre otras alcanzó con no sé cuántas a Maritornes, la cual, sentida del dolor, echando a rodar la honestidad, dio el retorno a Sancho con tantas que, a su despecho, le quitó el sueño; el cual, viéndose tratar de aquella manera y sin saber de quién, alzándose como pudo, se abrazó con Maritornes, y comenzaron entre los dos la más reñida y graciosa escaramuza del mundo.

Viendo, pues, el arriero, a la lumbrer del candil del ventero, cuál andaba su dama, dejando a don Quijote, acudió a darme el socorro necesario. Lo mismo hizo el ventero, pero con intención diferente, porque fue a castigar a la moza, creyendo sin duda que ella sola era la ocasión de toda aquella armonía. Y así como suele decirse: «el gato al rato, el rato a la cuerda, la cuerda al palo», daba el arriero a Sancho, Sancho a la moza, la moza a él, el ventero a la moza, y todos menudeaban con tanta priesa que no se daban punto de reposo; y fue lo bueno que al ventero se le apagó el candil, y, como quedaron ascuras, dábanse tan sin compasión todos a bulto que, a doquiera que ponían la mano, no dejaban cosa sana.

Alojaba acaso aquella noche en la venta un cuadrillero de los que llaman de la Santa Hermandad Vieja de Toledo, el cual, oyendo ansimesmo el extraño estruendo de la pelea, asió de su media vara y de la caja de lata de sus títulos, y entró ascuras en el aposento, diciendo:

-¡Ténganse a la justicia! ¡Ténganse a la Santa Hermandad!

Y el primero con quien topó fue con el apuñeado de don Quijote, que estaba en su derribado lecho, tendido boca arriba, sin sentido alguno, y, echándole a tiento mano a las barbas, no cesaba de decir:

-¡Favor a la justicia!

Pero, viendo que el que tenía asido no se bullía ni meneaba, se dio a entender que estaba muerto, y que los que allí dentro estaban eran sus matadores; y con esta sospecha reforzó la voz, diciendo:

-¡Ciérrese la puerta de la venta! ¡Miren no se vaya nadie, que han muerto aquí a un hombre!

Esta voz sobresaltó a todos, y cada cual dejó la pendencia en el grado que le tomó la voz. Retiróse el ventero a su aposento, el arriero a sus enjalmas, la moza a su rancho; solos los desventurados don Quijote y Sancho no se pudieron mover de donde estaban. Soltó en esto el cuadrillero la barba de don Quijote, y salió a buscar luz para buscar y prender los delincuentes; mas no la halló, porque el ventero, de industria, había muerto la lámpara cuando se retiró a su estancia, y fuele forzoso acudir a la chimenea, donde, con mucho trabajo y tiempo, encendió el cuadrillero otro candil.

Capítulo XVII

Donde se prosiguen los innumerables trabajos que el bravo don Quijote y su buen escudero Sancho Panza pasaron en la venta que, por su mal, pensó que era castillo

HABÍA ya vuelto en este tiempo de su parasismo don Quijote, y, con el mismo tono de voz con que el día antes había llamado a su escudero, cuando estaba tendido en el val de las estacas, le comenzó a llamar, diciendo:

-Sancho amigo, ¿duermes? ¿Duermes, amigo Sancho?

-¡Qué tengo de dormir, pesia a mí -respondió Sancho, lleno de pesadumbre y de despecho-; que no parece sino que todos los diablos han andado conmigo esta noche!

-Puédeslo creer así, sin duda -respondió don Quijote-, porque, o yo sé poco, o este castillo es encantado. Porque has de saber... Mas, esto que ahora quiero decirte hasme de jurar que lo tendrás secreto hasta después de mi muerte.

-Sí juro -respondió Sancho.

-Dígolo -replicó don Quijote-, porque soy enemigo de que se quite la honra a nadie.

-Digo que sí juro -tornó a decir Sancho-que lo callaré hasta después de los días de vuestra merced, y plega a Dios que lo pueda descubrir mañana.

-¿Tan malas obras te hago, Sancho -respondió don Quijote-, que me querías ver muerto con tanta brevedad?

-No es por eso -respondió Sancho-, sino porque soy enemigo de guardar mucho las cosas, y no querría que se me pudriesen de guardadas.

-Sea por lo que fuere -dijo don Quijote-; que más fío de tu amor y de tu cortesía; y así, has de saber que esta noche me ha sucedido una de las más estrañas aventuras que yo sabré encarecer; y, por contártela en breve, sabrás que poco ha que a mí vino la hija del señor deste castillo, que es la más apuesta y hermosa doncella que en gran parte de la tierra se puede hallar. ¿Qué te podría decir del adorno de su persona? ¿Qué de su gallardo entendimiento? ¿Qué de otras cosas ocultas, que, por guardar la fe que debo a mi señora Dulcinea del Toboso, dejaré pasar intactas y en silencio? Sólo te quiero decir que, envidioso el cielo de tanto bien como la ventura me había puesto en las manos, o quizá, y esto es lo más cierto, que, como tengo dicho, es encantado este castillo, al tiempo que yo estaba con ella en dulcísimos y amorosísimos coloquios, sin que yo la viese ni supiese por dónde venía, vino una mano pegada a algún brazo de algún descomunal gigante y asentóme una puñada en las quijadas, tal, que las tengo todas bañadas en sangre; y después me molió de tal suerte que estoy peor que ayer cuando los gallegos, que, por demasías de Rocinante, nos hicieron el agravio que sabes. Por donde conjeturo que el tesoro de la fermosura desta doncella le debe de guardar algún encantado moro, y no debe de ser para mí.

-Ni para mí tampoco -respondió Sancho-, porque más de cuatrocientos moros me han aporreado a mí, de manera que el molimiento de las estacas fue tortas y pan pintado. Pero dígame, señor, ¿cómo llama a ésta buena y rara aventura, habiendo quedado della cual quedamos? Aun vuestra merced menos mal, pues tuvo en sus manos aquella incomparable fermosura que ha dicho, pero yo, ¿qué tuve sino los mayores porrazos que pienso recibir en toda mi vida? ¡Desdichado de mí y de la madre que me parió, que ni soy caballero andante, ni lo pienso ser jamás, y de todas las malandanzas me cabe la mayor parte!

-Luego, ¿también estás tú aporreado? -respondió don Quijote.

-¿No le he dicho que sí, pesia a mi linaje? -dijo Sancho.

-No tengas pena, amigo -dijo don Quijote-, que yo haré agora el bálsamo precioso con que sanaremos en un abrir y cerrar de ojos.

Acabó en esto de encender el candil el cuadrillero, y entró a ver el que pensaba que era muerto; y, así como le vio entrar Sancho, viéndole venir en camisa y con su paño de cabeza y candil en la mano, y con una muy mala cara, preguntó a su amo:

-Señor, ¿si será éste, a dicha, el moro encantado, que nos vuelve a castigar, si se dejó algo en el tintero?

-No puede ser el moro -respondió don Quijote-, porque los encantados no se dejan ver de nadie.

-Si no se dejan ver, déjanse sentir -dijo Sancho-; si no, díganlo mis espaldas.

-También lo podrían decir las mías -respondió don Quijote-, pero no es bastante indicio ése para creer que este que se vea sea el encantado moro.

Llegó el cuadrillero, y, como los halló hablando en tan sosegada conversación, quedó suspenso. Bien es verdad que aún don Quijote se estaba boca arriba, sin poderse menear, de puro molido y emplastado. Llegóse a él el cuadrillero y díjole:

-Pues ¿cómo va, buen hombre?

-Hablara yo más bien criado -respondió don Quijote-, si fuera que vos. ¿Úsase en esta tierra hablar desa suerte a los caballeros andantes, majadero?

El cuadrillero, que se vio tratar tan mal de un hombre de tan mal parecer, no lo pudo sufrir, y, alzando el candil con todo su aceite, dio a don Quijote con él en la cabeza, de suerte que le dejó muy bien descalabrado; y, como todo quedó

ascuras, salióse luego; y Sancho Panza dijo:

-Sin duda, señor, que éste es el moro encantado, y debe de guardar el tesoro para otros, y para nosotros sólo guarda las puñadas y los candilazos.

-Así es -respondió don Quijote-, y no hay que hacer caso destas cosas de encantamientos, ni hay para qué tomar cólera ni enojo con ellas; que, como son invisibles y fantásticas, no hallaremos de quién vengarnos, aunque más lo procuremos. Levántate, Sancho, si puedes, y llama al alcaide desta fortaleza, y procura que se me dé un poco de aceite, vino, sal y romero para hacer el salutífero bálsamo; que en verdad que creo que lo he bien menester ahora, porque se me va mucha sangre de la herida que esta fantasma me ha dado.

Levantóse Sancho con harto dolor de sus huesos, y fue ascuras donde estaba el ventero; y, encontrándose con el cuadrillero, que estaba escuchando en qué paraba su enemigo, le dijo:

-Señor, quienquiera que seáis, hacednos merced y beneficio de darnos un poco de romero, aceite, sal y vino, que es menester para curar uno de los mejores caballeros andantes que hay en la tierra, el cual yace en aquella cama, malferido por las manos del encantado moro que está en esta venta.

Cuando el cuadrillero tal oyó, túvole por hombre falto de seso; y, porque ya comenzaba a amanecer, abrió la puerta de la venta, y, llamando al ventero, le dijo lo que aquel buen hombre quería. El ventero le proveyó de cuanto quiso, y Sancho se lo llevó a don Quijote, que estaba con las manos en la cabeza, quejándose del dolor del candilazo, que no le había hecho más mal que levantarle dos chichones algo crecidos, y lo que él pensaba que era sangre no era sino sudor que sudaba con la congoja de la pasada tormenta.

En resolución, él tomó sus simples, de los cuales hizo un compuesto, mezclándolos todos y cociéndolos un buen espacio, hasta que le pareció que estaban en su punto. Pidió luego alguna redoma para echallo, y, como no la hubo en la venta, se resolvió de ponello en una alcuza o aceitera de hoja de lata, de quien el ventero le hizo grata donación. Y luego dijo sobre la alcuza más de ochenta paternostres y otras tantas avemarías, salves y credos, y a cada palabra acompañaba una cruz, a modo de bendición; a todo lo cual se hallaron presentes Sancho, el ventero y cuadrillero; que ya el arriero sosegadamente andaba entendiendo en el beneficio de sus machos.

Hecho esto, quiso él mesmo hacer luego la experiencia de la virtud de aquel precioso bálsamo que él se imaginaba; y así, se bebió, de lo que no pudo caber en la alcuza y quedaba en la olla donde se había cocido, casi media azumbre; y apenas lo acabó de beber, cuando comenzó a vomitar de manera que no le quedó cosa en el estómago; y con las ansias y agitación del vómito le dio un sudor copiosísimo, por lo cual mandó que le arropasen y le dejasen solo. Hiciéronlo ansí, y quedóse dormido más de tres horas, al cabo de las cuales despertó y se sintió aliviadísimo del cuerpo, y en tal manera mejor de su quebrantamiento que se tuvo por sano; y verdaderamente creyó que había acertado con el bálsamo de Fierabrás, y que con aquel remedio podía acometer desde allí adelante, sin temor alguno, cualesquiera ruinas, batallas y pendencias, por peligrosas que fuesen.

Sancho Panza, que también tuvo a milagro la mejoría de su amo, le rogó que le diese a él lo que quedaba en la olla, que no era poca cantidad. Concedióselo don Quijote, y él, tomándola a dos manos, con buena fe y mejor talante, se la echó a pechos, y envasó bien poco menos que su amo. Es, pues, el caso que el estómago del pobre Sancho no debía de ser tan delicado como el de su amo, y así, primero que vomitase, le dieron tantas ansias y bascas, con tantos trasudores y desmayos que él pensó bien y verdaderamente que era llegada su última hora; y, viéndose tan afligido y congojado, maldecía el bálsamo y al ladrón que se lo había dado. Viéndole así don Quijote, le dijo:

-Yo creo, Sancho, que todo este mal te viene de no ser armado caballero, porque tengo para mí que este licor no debe de aprovechar a los que no lo son.

-Si eso sabía vuestra merced -replicó Sancho-, ¡mal haya yo y toda mi parentela!, ¿para qué consintió que lo gustase?

En esto, hizo su operación el brebaje, y comenzó el pobre escudero a desaguarse por entrambas canales, con tanta priesa, que la estera de enea, sobre quien se había vuelto a echar, ni la manta de anjeo con que se cubría, fueron más de provecho. Sudaba y trasudaba con tales parasismos y accidentes, que no solamente él, sino todos pensaron que se le acababa la vida. Duróle esta borrasca y mala andanza casi dos horas, al cabo de las cuales no quedó como su amo, sino tan molido y quebrantado, que no se podía tener.

Pero don Quijote, que, como se ha dicho, se sintió aliviado y sano, quiso partirse luego a buscar aventuras, pareciéndole que todo el tiempo que allí se tardaba era quitársele al mundo y a los en él menesterosos de su favor y amparo; y más con la seguridad y confianza que llevaba en su bálsamo. Y así, forzado deste deseo, él mismo ensilló a Rocinante y enalbardó al jumento de su escudero, a quien también ayudó a vestir y a subir en el asno. Púsose luego a caballo, y, llegándose a un rincón de la venta, asió de un lanzón que allí estaba, para que le sirviese de lanza.

Estábanle mirando todos cuantos había en la venta, que pasaban de más de veinte personas; mirábale también la hija del ventero, y él también no quitaba los ojos della, y de cuando en cuando arrojaba un suspiro que parecía que le arrancaba de lo profundo de sus entrañas, y todos pensaban que debía de ser del dolor que sentía en las costillas; a lo menos, pensábanlo aquellos que la noche antes le habían visto bizmar.

Ya que estuvieron los dos a caballo, puesto a la puerta de la venta, llamó al ventero, y con voz muy reposada y grave le dijo:

-Muchas y muy grandes son las mercedes, señor alcaide, que en este vuestro castillo he recebido, y quedo obligadísimo a agradecéros las todos los días de mi vida. Si os las puedo pagar en haceros vengado de algún soberbio que os haya fecho algún agravio, sabed que mi oficio no es otro sino valer a los que poco pueden, y vengar a los que reciben tuertos, y castigar alevosías. Recorred vuestra memoria, y si halláis alguna cosa deste jaez que encomendarme, no hay sino decilla; que yo os prometo, por la orden de caballero que recibí, de faceros satisfecho y pagado a toda vuestra voluntad.

El ventero le respondió con el mismo sosiego:

-Señor caballero, yo no tengo necesidad de que vuestra merced me vengue ningún agravio, porque yo sé tomar la venganza que me parece, cuando se me hacen. Sólo he menester que vuestra merced me pague el gasto que esta noche ha hecho en la venta, así de la paja y cebada de sus dos bestias, como de la cena y camas.

-Luego, ¿venta es ésta? -replicó don Quijote.

-Y muy honrada -respondió el ventero.

-Engañado he vivido hasta aquí -respondió don Quijote-, que en verdad que pensé que era castillo, y no malo; pero, pues es ansí que no es castillo sino venta, lo que se podrá hacer por agora es que perdonéis por la paga, que yo no puedo contravenir a la orden de los caballeros andantes, de los cuales sé cierto, sin que hasta ahora haya leído cosa en contrario, que jamás pagaron posada ni otra cosa en venta donde estuviesen, porque se les debe de fuero y de derecho cualquier buen acogimiento que se les hiciere, en pago del insufrible trabajo que padecen buscando las aventuras de noche y de día, en invierno y en verano, a pie y a caballo, con sed y con hambre, con calor y con frío, sujetos a todas las inclemencias del cielo y a todos los incómodos de la tierra.

-Poco tengo yo que ver en eso -respondió el ventero-; págueseme lo que se me debe, y dejémonos de cuentos ni de caballerías, que yo no tengo cuenta con otra cosa que con cobrar mi hacienda.

-Vos sois un sandio y mal hostelero -respondió don Quijote.

Y, poniendo piernas al Rocinante y terciando su lanzón, se salió de la venta sin que nadie le detuviese, y él, sin mirar si le seguía su escudero, se alongó un buen trecho.

El ventero, que le vio ir y que no le pagaba, acudió a cobrar de Sancho Panza, el cual dijo que, pues su señor no había querido pagar, que tampoco él pagaría; porque, siendo él escudero de caballero andante, como era, la misma regla y razón corría por él como por su amo en no pagar cosa alguna en los mesones y ventas. Amohinóse mucho desto el ventero, y amenazóle que si no le pagaba, que lo cobraría de modo que le pesase. A lo cual Sancho respondió que, por la ley de caballería que su amo había recibido, no pagaría un solo cornado, aunque le costase la vida; porque no había de perder por él la buena y antigua usanza de los caballeros andantes, ni se habían de quejar dél los escuderos de los tales que estaban por venir al mundo, reprochándole el quebrantamiento de tan justo fuero.

Quiso la mala suerte del desdichado Sancho que, entre la gente que estaba en la venta, se hallasen cuatro perales de Segovia, tres agujeros del Potro de Córdoba y dos vecinos de la Heria de Sevilla, gente alegre, bien intencionada, maleante y juguetona, los cuales, casi como instigados y movidos de un mismo espíritu, se llegaron a Sancho, y, apeándole del asno, uno dellos entró por la manta de la cama del huésped, y, echándole en ella, alzaron los ojos y vieron que el techo era algo más bajo de lo que habían menester para su obra, y determinaron salirse al corral, que tenía por límite el cielo. Y allí, puesto Sancho en mitad de la manta, comenzaron a levantarle en alto y a holgarse con él como con perro por carnestolendas.

Las voces que el mísero manteado daba fueron tantas, que llegaron a los oídos de su amo; el cual, determinándose a escuchar atentamente, creyó que alguna nueva aventura le venía, hasta que claramente conoció que el que gritaba era su escudero; y, volviendo las riendas, con un penado galope llegó a la venta, y, hallándola cerrada, la rodeó por ver si hallaba por donde entrar; pero no hubo llegado a las paredes del corral, que no eran muy altas, cuando vio el mal juego que se le hacía a su escudero. Viole bajar y subir por el aire, con tanta gracia y presteza que, si la cólera le dejara, tengo para mí que se riera. Probó a subir desde el caballo a las bardas, pero estaba tan molido y quebrantado, que aun apearse no pudo; y así, desde encima del caballo, comenzó a decir tantos denuestos y baldones a los que a Sancho manteaban, que no es posible acertar a escribillos; mas no por esto cesaban ellos de su risa y de su obra, ni el volador Sancho dejaba sus quejas, mezcladas ya con amenazas, ya con ruegos; mas todo aprovechaba poco, ni aprovechó, hasta que de puro cansados le dejaron. Trujéronle allí su asno, y, subiéndole encima, le arroparon con su gabán. Y la compasiva de Maritornes, viéndole tan fatigado, le pareció ser bien socorrelle con un jarro de agua, y así, se le trujo del pozo, por ser más frío. Tomóle Sancho, y llevándole a la boca, se paró a las voces que su amo le daba, diciendo:

-¡Hijo Sancho, no bebas agua! ¡Hijo, no la bebas, que te matará! ¿Ves? Aquí tengo el santísimo bálsamo -y enseñáble la alcuza del brebaje-, que con dos gotas que dél bebas sanarás sin duda.

A estas voces volvió Sancho los ojos, como de través, y dijo con otras mayores:

-¿Por dicha hásele olvidado a vuestra merced como yo no soy caballero, o quiere que acabe de vomitar las entrañas que me quedaron de anoche? Guárdese su licor con todos los diablos y déjeme a mí.

Y el acabar de decir esto y el comenzar a beber todo fue uno; mas, como al primer trago vio que era agua, no quiso pasar adelante, y rogó a Maritornes que se le trujese de vino, y así lo hizo ella de muy buena voluntad, y lo pagó de su mismo dinero; porque, en efecto, se dice della que, aunque estaba en aquel trato, tenía unas sombras y lejos de cristiana.

Así como bebió Sancho, dio de los carcaños a su asno, y, abriéndole la puerta de la venta de par en par, se salió della, muy contento de no haber pagado nada y de haber salido con su intención, aunque había sido a costa de sus acostumbrados fiadores, que eran sus espaldas. Verdad es que el ventero se quedó con sus alforjas en pago de lo que se le debía; mas Sancho no las echó menos, según salió turbado. Quiso el ventero atrancar bien la puerta así como le vio fuera, mas no lo consintieron los manteadores, que eran gente que, aunque don Quijote fuera verdaderamente de los caballeros andantes de la Tabla Redonda, no le estimaran en dos ardites.

Capítulo XVIII

Donde se cuentan las razones que pasó Sancho Panza con su señor Don Quijote, con otras aventuras dignas de ser contadas

LLEGÓ Sancho a su amo marchito y desmayado; tanto, que no podía arrear a su jumento. Cuando así le vio don Quijote, le dijo:

-Ahora acabo de creer, Sancho bueno, que aquel castillo o venta, de que es encantado sin duda; porque aquellos que tan atrozmente tomaron pasatiempo contigo, ¿qué podían ser sino fantasmas y gente del otro mundo? Y confirmo esto por haber visto que, cuando estaba por las bardas del corral mirando los actos de tu triste tragedia, no me fue posible subir por ellas, ni menos pude apear-me de Rocinante, porque me debían de tener encantado; que te juro, por la fe de quien soy, que si pudiera subir o apear-me, que yo te hiciera vengado de manera que aquellos follones y malandrines se acordaran de la burla para siempre, aunque en ello supiera contravenir a las leyes de la caballería, que, como ya muchas veces te he dicho, no consienten que caballero ponga mano contra quien no lo sea, si no fuere en defensa de su propia vida y persona, en caso de urgente y gran necesidad.

-También me vengara yo si pudiera, fuera o no fuera armado caballero, pero no pude; aunque tengo para mí que aquellos que se holgaron conmigo no eran fantasmas ni hombres encantados, como vuestra merced dice, sino hombres de carne y de hueso como nosotros; y todos, según los oí nombrar cuando me volteaban, tenían sus nombres: que el uno se llamaba Pedro Martínez, y el otro Tenorio Hernández, y el ventero oí que se llamaba Juan Palomeque el Zurdo. Así que, señor, el no poder saltar las bardas del corral, ni apear-se del caballo, en ál estuvo que en encantamientos. Y lo que yo saco en limpio de todo esto es que estas aventuras que andamos buscando, al cabo al cabo, nos han de traer a tantas desventuras que no sepamos cuál es nuestro pie derecho. Y lo que sería mejor y más acertado, según mi poco entendimiento, fuera el volvernos a nuestro lugar, ahora que es tiempo de la siega y de entender en la hacienda, dejándonos de andar de Ceca en Meca y de zoca en colodra, como dicen.

-¡Qué poco sabes, Sancho -respondió don Quijote-, de achaque de caballería! Calla y ten paciencia, que día vendrá donde veas por vista de ojos cuán honrosa cosa es andar en este ejercicio. Si no, dime: ¿qué mayor contento puede haber en el mundo, o qué gusto puede igualarse al de vencer una batalla y al de triunfar de su enemigo? Ninguno, sin duda alguna.

-Así debe de ser -respondió Sancho-, puesto que yo no lo sé; sólo sé que, después que somos caballeros andantes, o vuestra merced lo es (que yo no hay para qué me cuente en tan honroso número), jamás hemos vencido batalla alguna, si no fue la del vizcaíno, y aun de aquélla salió vuestra merced con media oreja y media celada menos; que, después acá, todo ha sido palos y más palos, puñadas y más puñadas, llevando yo de ventaja el manteamiento y haberme sucedido por personas encantadas, de quien no puedo vengarme, para saber hasta dónde llega el gusto del vencimiento del enemigo, como vuestra merced dice.

-Ésa es la pena que yo tengo y la que tú debes tener, Sancho -respondió don Quijote-; pero, de aquí adelante, yo procuraré haber a las manos alguna espada hecha por tal maestría, que al que la trujere consigo no le puedan hacer ningún género de encantamientos; y aun podría ser que me deparase la ventura aquella de Amadís, cuando se llamaba el Caballero de la Ardiente Espada, que fue una de las mejores espadas que tuvo caballero en el mundo, porque, fuera que tenía la virtud dicha, cortaba como una navaja, y no había armadura, por fuerte y encantada que fuese, que se le parase delante.

-Yo soy tan venturoso -dijo Sancho-que, cuando eso fuese y vuestra merced viniese a hallar espada semejante, sólo vendría a servir y aprovechar a los armados caballeros, como el bálsamo; y a los escuderos, que se los papen duelos.

-No temas eso, Sancho -dijo don Quijote-, que mejor lo hará el cielo contigo.

En estos coloquios iban don Quijote y su escudero, cuando vio don Quijote que por el camino que iban venía hacia ellos una grande y espesa polvareda; y, en viéndola, se volvió a Sancho y le dijo:

-Éste es el día, ¡oh Sancho!, en el cual se ha de ver el bien que me tiene guardado mi suerte; éste es el día, digo, en que se ha de mostrar, tanto como en otro alguno, el valor de mi brazo, y en el que tengo de hacer obras que queden escritas en el libro de la Fama por todos los venideros siglos. ¿Ves aquella polvareda que allí se levanta, Sancho? Pues toda es cuajada de un copiosísimo ejército que de diversas e innumerables gentes por allí viene marchando.

-A esa cuenta, dos deben de ser -dijo Sancho-, porque desta parte contraria se levanta asimesmo otra semejante polvareda.

Volvió a mirarlo don Quijote, y vio que así era la verdad; y, alegrándose sobremanera, pensó, sin duda alguna, que eran dos ejércitos que venían a embestirse y a encontrarse en mitad de aquella espaciosa llanura; porque tenía a todas horas y momentos llena la fantasía de aquellas batallas, encantamientos, sucesos, desatinos, amores, desafíos, que en los libros de caballerías se cuentan, y todo cuanto hablaba, pensaba o hacía era encaminado a cosas semejantes. Y la polvareda que había visto la levantaban dos grandes manadas de ovejas y carneros que, por aquel mismo camino, de dos diferentes partes venían, las cuales, con el polvo, no se echaron de ver hasta que llegaron cerca. Y con tanto ahínco afirmaba don Quijote que eran ejércitos, que Sancho lo vino a creer y a decirle:

-Señor, pues ¿qué hemos de hacer nosotros?

-¿Qué? -dijo don Quijote-: favorecer y ayudar a los menesterosos y desvalidos. Y has de saber, Sancho, que este que viene por nuestra frente le conduce y guía el grande emperador Alifanfarón, señor de la grande isla Trapobana; este otro que a mis espaldas marcha es el de su enemigo, el rey de los garamantas, Pentapolén del Arremangado Brazo, porque siempre entra en las batallas con el brazo derecho desnudo.

-Pues, ¿por qué se quieren tan mal estos dos señores? -preguntó Sancho.

-Quiérense mal -respondió don Quijote- porque este Alefanfarón es un foribundo pagano y está enamorado de la hija de Pentapolín, que es una muy hermosa y además agraciada señora, y es cristiana, y su padre no se la quiere entregar al rey pagano si no deja primero la ley de su falso profeta Mahoma y se vuelve a la suya.

-¡Para mis barbas -dijo Sancho-, si no hace muy bien Pentapolín, y que le tengo de ayudar en cuanto pudiere!

-En eso harás lo que debes, Sancho -dijo don Quijote-, porque, para entrar en batallas semejantes, no se requiere ser armado caballero.

-Bien se me alcanza eso -respondió Sancho-, pero ¿dónde pondremos a este asno que estemos ciertos de hallarle después de pasada la refriega? Porque el entrar en ella en semejante caballería no creo que está en uso hasta agora.

-Así es verdad -dijo don Quijote-. Lo que puedes hacer dél es dejarle a sus aventuras, ora se pierda o no, porque serán tantos los caballos que tendremos, después que salgamos vencedores, que aun corre peligro Rocinante no le trueque por otro. Pero estáme atento y mira, que te quiero dar cuenta de los caballeros más principales que en estos dos ejércitos vienen. Y, para que mejor los veas y notes, retirémonos a aquel altillo que allí se hace, de donde se deben de descubrir los dos ejércitos.

Hiciéronlo así, y pusiéronse sobre una loma, desde la cual se vieran bien las dos manadas que a don Quijote se le hicieron ejército, si las nubes del polvo que levantaban no les turbara y cegara la vista; pero, con todo esto, viendo en su imaginación lo que no veía ni había, con voz levantada comenzó a decir:

-Aquel caballero que allí ves de las armas jaldes, que trae en el escudo un león coronado, rendido a los pies de una doncella, es el valeroso Laurcalco, señor de la Puente de Plata; el otro de las armas de las flores de oro, que trae en el escudo

tres coronas de plata en campo azul, es el temido Micocolembos, gran duque de Quirocia; el otro de los miembros gigantes, que está a su derecha mano, es el nunca medroso Brandabarbarán de Boliche, señor de las tres Arabias, que viene armado de aquel cuero de serpiente, y tiene por escudo una puerta que, según es fama, es una de las del templo que derribó Sansón, cuando con su muerte se vengó de sus enemigos. Pero vuelve los ojos a estotra parte y verás delante y en la frente destotro ejército al siempre vencedor y jamás vencido Timonel de Carcajona, príncipe de la Nueva Vizcaya, que viene armado con las armas partidas a cuarteles, azules, verdes, blancas y amarillas, y trae en el escudo un gato de oro en campo leonado, con una letra que dice: Miau, que es el principio del nombre de su dama, que, según se dice, es la sin par Miulina, hija del duque Alfeñiquén del Algarbe; el otro, que carga y oprime los lomos de aquella poderosa alfana, que trae las armas como nieve blancas y el escudo blanco y sin empresa alguna, es un caballero novel, de nación francés, llamado Pierres Papín, señor de las baronías de Utrique; el otro, que bate las ijadas con los herrados carcaños a aquella pintada y ligera cebría, y trae las armas de los veros azules, es el poderoso duque de Nerbia, Espartafilardo del Bosque, que trae por empresa en el escudo una esparraguera, con una letra en castellano que dice así: Rastrea mi suerte.

Y desta manera fue nombrando muchos caballeros del uno y del otro escuadrón, que él se imaginaba, y a todos les dio sus armas, colores, empresas y motes de improviso, llevado de la imaginación de su nunca vista locura; y, sin parar, prosiguió diciendo:

-A este escuadrón frontero forman y hacen gentes de diversas naciones: aquí están los que bebían las dulces aguas del famoso Janto; los montuosos que pisan los masílicos campos; los que criban el finísimo y menudo oro en la felice Arabia; los que gozan las famosas y frescas riberas del claro Termodonte; los que sangran por muchas y diversas vías al dorado Pactolo; los núbidas, dudosos en sus promesas; los persas, arcos y flechas famosos; los partos, los medos, que pelean huyendo; los árabes, de mudables casas; los citas, tan crueles como blancos; los etiopes, de horadados labios, y otras infinitas naciones, cuyos rostros conozco y veo, aunque de los nombres no me acuerdo. En estotro escuadrón vienen los que beben las corrientes cristalinas del olivífero Betis; los que tersan y pulen sus rostros con el licor del siempre rico y dorado Tajo; los que gozan las provechosas aguas del divino Genil; los que pisan los tartesios campos, de pastos abundantes; los que se alegran en los elíseos jerezanos prados; los manchegos, ricos y coronados de rubias espigas; los de hierro vestidos, reliquias antiguas de la sangre goda; los que en Pisuerga se bañan, famoso por la mansedumbre de su corriente; los que su ganado apacientan en las estendidas dehesas del tortuoso Guadiana, celebrado por su escondido curso; los que tiemblan con el frío del silvoso Pirineo y con los blancos copos del levantado Apenino; finalmente, cuantos toda la Europa en sí contiene y encierra.

¡Válame Dios, y cuántas provincias dijo, cuántas naciones nombró, dándole a cada una, con maravillosa presteza, los atributos que le pertenecían, todo absorto y empapado en lo que había leído en sus libros mentirosos!

Estaba Sancho Panza colgado de sus palabras, sin hablar ninguna, y, de cuando en cuando, volvía la cabeza a ver si veía los caballeros y gigantes que su amo nombraba; y, como no descubría a ninguno, le dijo:

-Señor, encomiendo al diablo hombre, ni gigante, ni caballero de cuantos vuestra merced dice parece por todo esto; a lo menos, yo no los veo; quizá todo debe ser encantamento, como las fantasmas de anoche.

-¿Cómo dices eso? -respondió don Quijote-. ¿No oyes el relinchar de los caballos, el tocar de los clarines, el ruido de los atambores?

-No oigo otra cosa -respondió Sancho-sino muchos balidos de ovejas y carneros.

Y así era la verdad, porque ya llegaban cerca los dos rebaños.

-El miedo que tienes -dijo don Quijote-te hace, Sancho, que ni veas ni oyas a derechas; porque uno de los efectos del miedo es turbar los sentidos y hacer que las cosas no parezcan lo que son; y si es que tanto temes, retírate a una parte y déjame solo, que solo basto a dar la victoria a la parte a quien yo diere mi ayuda.

Y, diciendo esto, puso las espuelas a Rocinante, y, puesta la lanza en el ristre, bajó de la costezuela como un rayo. Diole voces Sancho, diciéndole:

-¡Vuélvase vuestra merced, señor don Quijote, que voto a Dios que son carneros y ovejas las que va a embestir! ¡Vuélvase, desdichado del padre que me engendró! ¿Qué locura es ésta? Mire que no hay gigante ni caballero alguno, ni gatos, ni armas, ni escudos partidos ni enteros, ni veros azules ni endiablados. ¿Qué es lo que hace? ¡Pecador soy yo a Dios!

Ni por ésas volvió don Quijote; antes, en altas voces, iba diciendo:

-¡Ea, caballeros, los que seguís y militáis debajo de las banderas del valeroso emperador Pentapolín del Arremangado Brazo, seguidme todos: veréis cuán fácilmente le doy venganza de su enemigo Alefanfarón de la Trapobana!

Esto diciendo, se entró por medio del escuadrón de las ovejas, y comenzó de alanceallas con tanto coraje y denuedo como si de veras alanceara a sus mortales enemigos. Los pastores y ganaderos que con la manada venían dábanle voces que no hiciese aquello; pero, viendo que no aprovechaban, descñéronse las hondas y comenzaron a saludarle los oídos con piedras como el puño. Don Quijote no se curaba de las piedras; antes, discurriendo a todas partes, decía:

-¿Adónde estás, soberbio Alifanfuón? Vente a mí; que un caballero solo soy, que desea, de solo a solo, probar tus fuerzas y quitarte la vida, en pena de la que das al valeroso Pentapolín Garamanta.

Llegó en esto una peladilla de arroyo, y, dándole en un lado, le sepultó dos costillas en el cuerpo. Viéndose tan maltrecho, creyó sin duda que estaba muerto o malferido, y, acordándose de su licor, sacó su alcuza y púsosela a la boca, y comenzó a echar licor en el estómago; mas, antes que acabase de envasar lo que a él le parecía que era bastante, llegó otra almendra y dióle en la mano y en el alcuza tan de lleno, que se la hizo pedazos, llevándole de camino tres o cuatro dientes y muelas de la boca, y machucándole malamente dos dedos de la mano.

Tal fue el golpe primero, y tal el segundo, que le fue forzoso al pobre caballero dar consigo del caballo abajo. Llegáronse a él los pastores y creyeron que le habían muerto; y así, con mucha priesa, recogieron su ganado, y cargaron de las reses muertas, que pasaban de siete, y, sin averiguar otra cosa, se fueron.

Estábase todo este tiempo Sancho sobre la cuesta, mirando las locuras que su amo hacía, y arrancábase las barbas, maldiciendo la hora y el punto en que la fortuna se le había dado a conocer. Viéndole, pues, caído en el suelo, y que ya los pastores se habían ido, bajó de la cuesta y llegóse a él, y hallóle de muy mal arte, aunque no había perdido el sentido, y díjole:

-¿No le decía yo, señor don Quijote, que se volviese, que los que iba a acometer no eran ejércitos, sino manadas de carneros?

-Como eso puede desaparecer y contrahacer aquel ladrón del sabio mi enemigo. Sábetelo, Sancho, que es muy fácil cosa a los tales hacernos parecer lo que quieren, y este maligno que me persigue, envidioso de la gloria que vio que yo había de alcanzar desta batalla, ha vuelto los escuadrones de enemigos en manadas de ovejas. Si no, haz una cosa, Sancho, por mi vida, porque te desengañes y veas ser verdad lo que te digo: sube en tu asno y síguelos bonitamente, y verás cómo, en alejándose de aquí algún poco, se vuelven en su ser primero, y, dejando de ser carneros, son hombres hechos y derechos, como yo te los pinté primero... Pero no vayas ahora, que he menester tu favor y ayuda; llégate a mí y mira cuántas muelas y dientes me faltan, que me parece que no me ha quedado ninguno en la boca.

Llegóse Sancho tan cerca, que casi le metía los ojos en la boca, y fue a tiempo que ya había obrado el bálsamo en el estómago de don Quijote; y, al tiempo que Sancho llegó a mirarle la boca, arrojó de sí, más recio que una escopeta, cuanto dentro tenía, y dio con todo ello en las barbas del compasivo escudero.

-¡Santa María! -dijo Sancho-, ¿y qué es esto que me ha sucedido? Sin duda, este pecador está herido de muerte, pues vomita sangre por la boca.

Pero, reparando un poco más en ello, echó de ver en la color, sabor y olor, que no era sangre, sino el bálsamo de la alcuza que él le había visto beber; y fue tanto el asco que tomó que, revolviéndosele el estómago, vomitó las tripas sobre su mismo señor, y quedaron entrambos como de perlas. Acudió Sancho a su asno para sacar de las alforjas con qué limpiarse y con qué curar a su amo; y, como no las halló, estuvo a punto de perder el juicio. Maldíjose de nuevo, y propuso en su corazón de dejar a su amo y volverse a su tierra, aunque perdiese el salario de lo servido y las esperanzas del gobierno de la prometida ínsula.

Levantóse en esto don Quijote, y, puesta la mano izquierda en la boca, porque no se le acabasen de salir los dientes, asió con la otra las riendas de Rocinante, que nunca se había movido de junto a su amo -tal era de leal y bien acondicionado-, y fuese adonde su escudero estaba, de pechos sobre su asno, con la mano en la mejilla, en guisa de hombre pensativo además. Y, viéndole don Quijote de aquella manera, con muestras de tanta tristeza, le dijo:

-Sábetete, Sancho, que no es un hombre más que otro si no hace más que otro. Todas estas borrascas que nos suceden son señales de que presto ha de serenar el tiempo y han de sucedernos bien las cosas; porque no es posible que el mal ni el bien sean durables, y de aquí se sigue que, habiendo durado mucho el mal, el bien está ya cerca. Así que, no debes congojarte por las desgracias que a mí me suceden, pues a ti no te cabe parte dellas.

-¿Cómo no? -respondió Sancho-. Por ventura, el que ayer mantearon, ¿era otro que el hijo de mi padre? Y las alforjas que hoy me faltan, con todas mis alhajas, ¿son de otro que del mismo?

-¿Que te faltan las alforjas, Sancho? -dijo don Quijote.

-Sí que me faltan -respondió Sancho.

-Dese modo, no tenemos qué comer hoy -replicó don Quijote.

-Eso fuera -respondió Sancho-cuando faltaran por estos prados las yerbas que vuestra merced dice que conoce, con que suelen suplir semejantes faltas los tan malaventurados andantes caballeros como vuestra merced es.

-Con todo eso -respondió don Quijote-, tomara yo ahora más aún un cuartal de pan, o una hogaza y dos cabezas de sardinas arenques, que cuantas yerbas describe Dioscórides, aunque fuera el ilustrado por el doctor Laguna. Mas, con todo esto, sube en tu jumento, Sancho el bueno, y vente tras mí; que Dios, que es proveedor de todas las cosas, no nos ha de faltar, y más andando tan en su servicio como andamos, pues no falta a los mosquitos del aire, ni a los gusanillos de la tierra, ni a los renacuajos del agua; y es tan piadoso que hace salir su sol sobre los buenos y los malos, y llueve sobre los injustos y justos.

-Más bueno era vuestra merced -dijo Sancho-para predicador que para caballero andante.

-De todo sabían y han de saber los caballeros andantes, Sancho -dijo don Quijote-, porque caballero andante hubo en los pasados siglos que así se paraba a hacer un sermón o plática, en mitad de un campo real, como si fuera graduado por la Universidad de París; de donde se infiere que nunca la lanza embotó la pluma, ni la pluma la lanza.

-Ahora bien, sea así como vuestra merced dice -respondió Sancho-, vamos ahora de aquí, y procuremos donde alojar esta noche, y quiera Dios que sea en parte donde no haya mantas, ni manteadores, ni fantasmas, ni moros encantados; que si los hay, daré al diablo el hato y el garabato.

-Pídeselo tú a Dios, hijo -dijo don Quijote-, y guía tú por donde quisieres, que esta vez quiero dejar a tu elección el alojarnos. Pero dame acá la mano y atiéntame con el dedo, y mira bien cuántos dientes y muelas me faltan deste lado derecho de la quijada alta, que allí siento el dolor.

Metió Sancho los dedos, y, estándole tentando, le dijo:

-¿Cuántas muelas solía vuestra merced tener en esta parte?

-Cuatro -respondió don Quijote-, fuera de la cordal, todas enteras y muy sanas.

-Mire vuestra merced bien lo que dice, señor -respondió Sancho.

-Digo cuatro, si no eran cinco -respondió don Quijote-, porque en toda mi vida me han sacado diente ni muela de la boca, ni se me ha caído ni comido de neguijón ni de reuma alguna.

-Pues en esta parte de abajo -dijo Sancho- no tiene vuestra merced más de dos muelas y media, y en la de arriba, ni media ni ninguna, que toda está rasa como la palma de la mano.

-¡Sin ventura yo! -dijo don Quijote, oyendo las tristes nuevas que su escudero le daba-, que más quisiera que me hubieran derribado un brazo, como no fuera el de la espada; porque te hago saber, Sancho, que la boca sin muelas es como molino sin piedra, y en mucho más se ha de estimar un diente que un diamante. Mas a todo esto estamos sujetos los que profesamos la estrecha orden de la caballería. Sube, amigo, y guía, que yo te seguiré al paso que quisieres.

Hízolo así Sancho, y encaminóse hacia donde le pareció que podía hallar acogimiento, sin salir del camino real, que por allí iba muy seguido.

Yéndose, pues, poco a poco, porque el dolor de las quijadas de don Quijote no le dejaba sosegar ni atender a darse prisa, quiso Sancho entretenerle y divertille diciéndole alguna cosa; y, entre otras que le dijo, fue lo que se dirá en el siguiente capítulo.

Capítulo XIX

De las discretas razones que Sancho pasaba con su amo, y de la aventura que le sucedió con un cuerpo muerto, con otros acontecimientos famosos

-PARÉCEME, señor mío, que todas estas desventuras que estos días nos han sucedido, sin duda alguna han sido pena del pecado cometido por vuestra merced contra la orden de su caballería, no habiendo cumplido el juramento que hizo de no comer pan a manteles ni con la reina folgar, con todo aquello que a esto se sigue y vuestra merced juró de cumplir, hasta quitar aquel almete de Malandrino, o como se llama el moro, que no me acuerdo bien.

-Tienes mucha razón, Sancho -dijo don Quijote-; mas, para decirte verdad, ello se me había pasado de la memoria; y también puedes tener por cierto que por la culpa de no habérmelo tú acordado en tiempo te sucedió aquello de la manta; pero yo haré la enmienda, que modos hay de composición en la orden de la caballería para todo.

-Pues ¿juré yo algo, por dicha? -respondió Sancho.

-No importa que no hayas jurado -dijo don Quijote-: basta que yo entiendo que de participantes no estás muy seguro, y, por sí o por no, no será malo proveernos de remedio.

-Pues si ello es así -dijo Sancho-, mire vuestra merced no se le torne a olvidar esto, como lo del juramento; quizá les volverá la gana a las fantasmas de solazarse otra vez conmigo, y aun con vuestra merced si le ven tan pertinaz.

En estas y otras pláticas les tomó la noche en mitad del camino, sin tener ni descubrir donde aquella noche se recogiesen; y lo que no había de bueno en ello era que perecían de hambre; que, con la falta de las alforjas, les faltó toda la despensa y matalotaje. Y, para acabar de confirmar esta desgracia, les sucedió una aventura que, sin artificio alguno, verdaderamente lo parecía. Y fue que la noche cerró con alguna escuridad; pero, con todo esto, caminaban, creyendo Sancho que, pues aquel camino era real, a una o dos leguas, de buena razón, hallaría en él alguna venta.

Yendo, pues, desta manera, la noche oscura, el escudero hambriento y el amo con gana de comer, vieron que por el mismo camino que iban venían hacia ellos gran multitud de lumbres, que no parecían sino estrellas que se movían. Pasmóse Sancho en viéndolas, y don Quijote no las tuvo todas consigo; tiró el uno del cabestro a su asno, y el otro de las riendas a su rocino, y estuvieron quedos, mirando atentamente lo que podía ser aquello, y vieron que las lumbres se iban acercando a ellos, y mientras más se llegaban, mayores parecían; a cuya vista Sancho comenzó a temblar como un azogado, y los cabellos de la cabeza se le erizaron a don Quijote; el cual, animándose un poco, dijo:

-Ésta, sin duda, Sancho, debe de ser grandísima y peligrosísima aventura, donde será necesario que yo muestre todo mi valor y esfuerzo.

-¡Desdichado de mí! -respondió Sancho-; si acaso esta aventura fuese de fantasmas, como me lo va pareciendo, ¿adónde habrá costillas que la sufran?

-Por más fantasmas que sean -dijo don Quijote-, no consentiré yo que te toque en el pelo de la ropa; que si la otra vez se burlaron contigo, fue porque no pude yo saltar las paredes del corral, pero ahora estamos en campo raso, donde podré yo como quisiere esgremir mi espada.

-Y si le encantan y entomecen, como la otra vez lo hicieron -dijo Sancho-, ¿qué aprovechará estar en campo abierto o no?

-Con todo eso -replicó don Quijote-, te ruego, Sancho, que tengas buen ánimo, que la experiencia te dará a entender el que yo tengo.

-Sí tendré, si a Dios place -respondió Sancho.

Y, apartándose los dos a un lado del camino, tornaron a mirar atentamente lo que aquello de aquellas lumbres que caminaban podía ser; y de allí a muy poco descubrieron muchos encamisados, cuya temerosa visión de todo punto remató el ánimo de Sancho Panza, el cual comenzó a dar diente con diente, como quien tiene frío de quartana; y creció más el batir y dentellear cuando distintamente vieron lo que era, porque descubrieron hasta veinte encamisados, todos a caballo, con sus hachas encendidas en las manos; detrás de los cuales venía una litera cubierta de luto, a la cual seguían otros seis de a caballo, enlutados hasta los pies de las mulas; que bien vieron que no eran caballos en el sosiego con que caminaban. Iban los encamisados murmurando entre sí, con una voz baja y compasiva. Esta estraña visión, a tales horas y en tal despoblado, bien bastaba para poner miedo en el corazón de Sancho, y aun en el de su amo; y así fuera en cuanto a don Quijote, que ya Sancho había dado al través con todo su esfuerzo. Lo contrario le avino a su amo, al cual en aquel punto se le representó en su imaginación al vivo que aquélla era una de las aventuras de sus libros.

Figurósele que la litera eran andas donde debía de ir algún malferido o muerto caballero, cuya venganza a él solo estaba reservada; y, sin hacer otro discurso, enristró su lanzón, púsose bien en la silla, y con gentil brío y continente se puso en la mitad del camino por donde los encamisados forzosamente habían de pasar, y cuando los vio cerca alzó la voz y dijo:

-Deteneos, caballeros, o quienquiera que seáis, y dadme cuenta de quién sois, de dónde venís, adónde vais, qué es lo que en aquellas andas lleváis; que, según las muestras, o vosotros habéis fecho, o vos han fecho, algún desaguisado, y conviene y es menester que yo lo sepa, o bien para castigaros del mal que fecistes, o bien para vengaros del tuerto que vos ficieron.

-Vamos de priesa -respondió uno de los encamisados-y está la venta lejos, y no nos podemos detener a dar tanta cuenta como pedís.

Y, picando la mula, pasó adelante. Sintióse desta respuesta grandemente don Quijote, y, trabando del freno, dijo:

-Deteneos y sed más bien criado, y dadme cuenta de lo que os he preguntado; si no, conmigo sois todos en batalla.

Era la mula asombradiza, y al tomarla del freno se espantó de manera que, alzándose en los pies, dio con su dueño por las ancas en el suelo. Un mozo que iba a pie, viendo caer al encamisado, comenzó a denostar a don Quijote, el cual, ya encolerizado, sin esperar más, enristrando su lanzón, arremetió a uno de los enlutados, y, malferido, dio con él en tierra; y, revolviéndose por los demás, era cosa de ver con la presteza que los acometía y desbarataba; que no parecía sino que en aquel instante le habían nacido alas a Rocinante, según andaba de ligero y orgulloso.

Todos los encamisados era gente medrosa y sin armas, y así, con facilidad, en un momento dejaron la refriega y comenzaron a correr por aquel campo con las hachas encendidas, que no parecían sino a los de las máscaras que en noche de regocijo y fiesta corren. Los enlutados, asimesmo, revueltos y envueltos en sus faldamentos y lobs, no se podían mover; así que, muy a su salvo, don Quijote los apaleó a todos y les hizo dejar el sitio mal de su grado, porque todos pensaron que aquél no era hombre, sino diablo del infierno que les salía a quitar el cuerpo muerto que en la litera llevaban.

Todo lo miraba Sancho, admirado del ardimiento de su señor, y decía entre sí:

-Sin duda este mi amo es tan valiente y esforzado como él dice.

Estaba una hacha ardiendo en el suelo, junto al primero que derribó la mula, a cuya luz le pudo ver don Quijote; y, llegándose a él, le puso la punta del lanzón en el rostro, diciéndole que se rindiese; si no, que le mataría. A lo cual respondió el caído:

-Harto rendido estoy, pues no me puedo mover, que tengo una pierna quebrada; suplico a vuestra merced, si es caballero cristiano, que no me mate; que cometerá un gran sacrilegio, que soy licenciado y tengo las primeras órdenes.

-Pues, ¿quién diablos os ha traído aquí -dijo don Quijote-, siendo hombre de Iglesia?

-¿Quién, señor? -replicó el caído-: mi desventura.

-Pues otra mayor os amenaza -dijo don Quijote-, si no me satisfacéis a todo cuanto primero os pregunté.

-Con facilidad será vuestra merced satisfecho -respondió el licenciado-; y así, sabrá vuestra merced que, aunque denantes dije que yo era licenciado, no soy sino bachiller, y llámome Alonso López; soy natural de Alcobendas; vengo de la ciudad de Baeza con otros once sacerdotes, que son los que huyeron con las hachas; vamos a la ciudad de Segovia acompañando un cuerpo muerto, que va en aquella litera, que es de un caballero que murió en Baeza, donde fue depositado; y ahora, como digo, llevábamos sus huesos a su sepultura, que está en Segovia, de donde es natural.

-¿Y quién le mató? -preguntó don Quijote.

-Dios, por medio de unas calenturas pestilentes que le dieron -respondió el bachiller.

-Desa suerte -dijo don Quijote-, quitado me ha Nuestro Señor del trabajo que había de tomar en vengar su muerte si otro alguno le hubiera muerto; pero, habiéndole muerto quien le mató, no hay sino callar y encoger los hombros, porque lo mesmo hiciera si a mí mismo me matara. Y quiero que sepa vuestra reverencia que yo soy un caballero de la Mancha, llamado don Quijote, y es mi oficio y ejercicio andar por el mundo enderezando tuertos y desfaciendo agravios.

-No sé cómo pueda ser eso de enderezar tuertos -dijo el bachiller-, pues a mí de derecho me habéis vuelto tuerto, dejándome una pierna quebrada, la cual no se verá derecha en todos los días de su vida; y el agravio que en mí habéis deshecho ha sido dejarme agraviado de manera que me quedará agraviado para siempre; y harta desventura ha sido topar con vos, que vais buscando aventuras.

-No todas las cosas -respondió don Quijote- suceden de un mismo modo. El daño estuvo, señor bachiller Alonso López, en venir, como veníades, de noche, vestidos con aquellas sobrepellices, con las hachas encendidas, rezando, cubiertos de luto, que propiamente semejábaden cosa mala y del otro mundo; y así, yo no pude dejar de cumplir con mi obligación acometiéndolos, y os acometiera aunque verdaderamente supiera que érades los memos satanases del infierno, que por tales os juzgué y tuve siempre.

-Ya que así lo ha querido mi suerte -dijo el bachiller-, suplico a vuestra merced, señor caballero andante (que tan mala andanza me ha dado), me ayude a salir de debajo desta mula, que me tiene tomada una pierna entre el estribo y la silla.

-¡Hablara yo para mañana! -dijo don Quijote-. Y ¿hasta cuándo aguardábaden a decirme vuestro afán?

Dio luego voces a Sancho Panza que viniese; pero él no se curó de venir, porque andaba ocupado desvalijando una acémila de repuesto que traían aquellos buenos señores, bien bastecida de cosas de comer. Hizo Sancho costal de su gabán, y, recogiendo todo lo que pudo y cupo en el talego, cargó su jumento, y luego acudió a las voces de su amo y ayudó a sacar al señor bachiller de la opresión de la mula; y, poniéndole encima della, le dio la hacha, y don Quijote le dijo que siguiese la derrota de sus compañeros, a quien de su parte pidiese perdón del agravio, que no había sido en su mano dejar de haberle hecho. Díjole también Sancho:

-Si acaso quisieren saber esos señores quién ha sido el valeroso que tales los puso, diráles vuestra merced que es el famoso don Quijote de la Mancha, que por otro nombre se llama el Caballero de la Triste Figura.

Con esto, se fue el bachiller; y don Quijote preguntó a Sancho que qué le había movido a llamarle el Caballero de la Triste Figura, más entonces que nunca.

-Yo se lo diré -respondió Sancho-: porque le he estado mirando un rato a la luz de aquella hacha que lleva aquel malandante, y verdaderamente tiene vuestra merced la más mala figura, de poco acá, que jamás he visto; y débelo de haber causado, o ya el cansancio deste combate, o ya la falta de las muelas y dientes.

-No es eso -respondió don Quijote-, sino que el sabio, a cuyo cargo debe de estar el escribir la historia de mis hazañas, le habrá parecido que será bien que yo tome algún nombre apelativo, como lo tomaban todos los caballeros pasados: cuál se llamaba el de la Ardiente Espada; cuál, el del Unicornio; aquel, de las Doncellas; aquéste, el del Ave Fénix; el otro, el Caballero del Grifo; estotro, el de la Muerte; y por estos nombres e insignias eran conocidos por toda la redondez de la tierra. Y así, digo que el sabio ya dicho te habrá puesto en la lengua y en el pensamiento ahora que me llamas el Caballero de la Triste Figura, como pienso llamarme desde hoy en adelante; y, para que mejor me cuadre tal nombre, determino de hacer pintar, cuando haya lugar, en mi escudo una muy triste figura.

-No hay para qué gastar tiempo y dineros en hacer esa figura -dijo Sancho-, sino lo que se ha de hacer es que vuestra merced descubra la suya y dé rostro a los que le miraren; que, sin más ni más, y sin otra imagen ni escudo, le llamarán el de la Triste Figura; y créame que le digo verdad, porque le prometo a vuestra merced, señor, y esto sea dicho en burlas, que le hace tan mala cara la hambre y la falta de las muelas, que, como ya tengo dicho, se podrá muy bien escusar la triste pintura.

Rióse don Quijote del donaire de Sancho, pero, con todo, propuso de llamarse de aquel nombre en pudiendo pintar su escudo, o rodela, como había imaginado.

En esto, volvió el bachiller y le dijo a don Quijote:

-Olvidábaseme de decir que advierta vuestra merced que queda descomulgado por haber puesto las manos violentamente en cosa sagrada: juxta illud: Si quis suadente diabolo, etc.

-No entiendo ese latín -respondió don Quijote-, mas yo sé bien que no puse las manos, sino este lanzón; cuanto más, que yo no pensé que ofendía a sacerdotes ni a cosas de la Iglesia, a quien respeto y adoro como católico y fiel cristiano que soy, sino a fantasmas y a vestiglos del otro mundo; y, cuando eso así fuese, en la memoria tengo lo que le pasó al Cid Ruy Díaz, cuando quebró la silla del embajador de aquel rey delante de Su Santidad del Papa, por lo cual lo descomulgó, y anduvo aquel día el buen Rodrigo de Vivar como muy honrado y valiente caballero.

En oyendo esto el bachiller, se fue, como queda dicho, sin replicarle palabra. Quisiera don Quijote mirar si el cuerpo que venía en la litera eran huesos o no, pero no lo consintió Sancho, diciéndole:

-Señor, vuestra merced ha acabado esta peligrosa aventura lo más a su salvo de todas las que yo he visto; esta gente, aunque vencida y desbaratada, podría ser que cayese en la cuenta de que los venció sola una persona, y, corridos y avergonzados desto, volviesen a rehacerse y a buscarnos, y nos diesen en qué entender. El jumento está como conviene, la montaña cerca, la hambre carga, no hay qué hacer sino retirarnos con gentil compás de pies, y, como dicen, váyase el muerto a la sepultura y el vivo a la hogaza.

Y, antecogiendo su asno, rogó a su señor que le siguiese; el cual, pareciéndole que Sancho tenía razón, sin volverle a replicar, le siguió. Y, a poco trecho que caminaban por entre dos montañuelas, se hallaron en un espacioso y escondido valle, donde se apearon; y Sancho alivió el jumento, y, tendidos sobre la verde yerba, con la salsa de su hambre, almorzaron, comieron, merendaron y cenaron a un mismo punto, satisfaciendo sus estómagos con más de una fiambarrera que los señores clérigos del difunto -que pocas veces se dejan mal pasar-en la acémila de su repuesto traían.

Mas sucedióles otra desgracia, que Sancho la tuvo por la peor de todas, y fue que no tenían vino que beber, ni aun agua que llegar a la boca; y, acosados de la sed, dijo Sancho, viendo que el prado donde estaban estaba colmado de verde y menuda yerba, lo que se dirá en el siguiente capítulo.

Capítulo XX

De la jamás vista ni oída aventura que con más poco peligro fue acabada de famoso caballero en el mundo, como la que acabó el valeroso don Quijote de la Mancha

NO ES POSIBLE, señor mío, sino que estas yerbas dan testimonio de que por aquí cerca debe de estar alguna fuente o arroyo que estas yerbas humedece; y así, será bien que vamos un poco más adelante, que ya toparemos donde podamos mitigar esta terrible sed que nos fatiga, que, sin duda, causa mayor pena que la hambre.

Parecióle bien el consejo a don Quijote, y, tomando de la rienda a Rocinante, y Sancho del cabestro a su asno, después de haber puesto sobre él los relieves que de la cena quedaron, comenzaron a caminar por el prado arriba a tiento, porque la escuridad de la noche no les dejaba ver cosa alguna; mas, no hubieron andado docientos pasos, cuando llegó a sus oídos un grande ruido de agua, como que de algunos grandes y levantados riscos se despeñaba. Alegróles el ruido en gran manera, y, parándose a escuchar hacia qué parte sonaba, oyeron a deshora otro estruendo que les aguó el contento del agua, especialmente a Sancho, que naturalmente era medroso y de poco ánimo. Digo que oyeron que daban unos golpes a compás, con un cierto crujir de hierros y cadenas, que, acompañados del furioso estruendo del agua, que pusieran pavor a cualquier otro corazón que no fuera el de don Quijote.

Era la noche, como se ha dicho, oscura, y ellos acertaron a entrar entre unos árboles altos, cuyas hojas, movidas del blando viento, hacían un temeroso y manso ruido; de manera que la soledad, el sitio, la escuridad, el ruido del agua con el susurro de las hojas, todo causaba horror y espanto, y más cuando vieron que ni los golpes cesaban, ni el viento dormía, ni la mañana llegaba; añadiéndose a todo esto el ignorar el lugar donde se hallaban. Pero don Quijote, acompañado de su intrépido corazón, saltó sobre Rocinante, y, embrazando su rodela, terció su lanzón y dijo:

-Sancho amigo, has de saber que yo nací, por querer del cielo, en esta nuestra edad de hierro, para resucitar en ella la de oro, o la dorada, como suele llamarse. Yo soy aquél para quien están guardados los peligros, las grandes hazañas, los valerosos hechos. Yo soy, digo otra vez, quien ha de resucitar los de la Tabla Redonda, los Doce de Francia y los Nueve de la Fama, y el que ha de poner en olvido los Platires, los Tablantes, Olivantes y Tirantes, los Febos y Belianises, con toda la caterva de los famosos caballeros andantes del pasado tiempo, haciendo en este en que me hallo tales grandezas, estrañezas y fechos de armas, que escurezcan las más claras que ellos ficieron. Bien notas, escudero fiel y legal, las tinieblas desta noche, su estraño silencio, el sordo y confuso estruendo destos árboles, el temeroso ruido de aquella agua en cuya busca venimos, que parece que se despeña y derrumba desde los altos montes de la luna, y aquel incesable golpear que nos hiere y lastima los oídos; las cuales cosas, todas juntas y cada una por sí, son bastantes a infundir miedo, temor y espanto en el pecho del mismo Marte, cuanto más en aquel que no está acostumbrado a semejantes acontecimientos y aventuras. Pues todo esto que yo te pinto son incentivos y despertadores de mi ánimo, que ya hace que el corazón me reviente en el pecho, con el deseo que tiene de acometer esta aventura, por más dificultosa que se muestra. Así que, aprieta un poco las cinchas a Rocinante y quédate a Dios, y espérame aquí hasta tres días no más, en los cuales, si no volviere, puedes tú volverte a nuestra aldea, y desde allí, por hacerme merced y buena obra, irás al Toboso, donde dirás a la incomparable señora mía Dulcinea que su cautivo caballero murió por acometer cosas que le hiciesen digno de poder llamarse suyo.

Cuando Sancho oyó las palabras de su amo, comenzó a llorar con la mayor ternura del mundo y a decille:

-Señor, yo no sé por qué quiere vuestra merced acometer esta tan temerosa aventura: ahora es de noche, aquí no nos vee nadie, bien podemos torcer el camino y desviarnos del peligro, aunque no bebamos en tres días; y, pues no hay quien nos vea, menos habrá quien nos note de cobardes; cuanto más, que yo he oído predicar al cura de nuestro lugar, que vuestra merced bien conoce, que quien busca el peligro perece en él; así que, no es bien tentar a Dios acometiendo tan desaforado hecho, donde no se puede escapar sino por milagro; y basta los que ha hecho el cielo con vuestra merced en librarle de ser manteado, como yo lo fui, y en sacarle vencedor, libre y salvo de entre tantos enemigos como acompañaban al difunto. Y, cuando todo esto no mueva ni ablande ese duro corazón, muévale el pensar y creer que apenas se habrá vuestra merced apartado de aquí, cuando yo, de miedo, dé mi ánima a quien quisiere llevarla. Yo salí de mi tierra y dejé hijos y mujer por venir a servir a vuestra merced, creyendo valer más y no menos; pero, como la cudicia rompe el saco, a mí me ha rasgado mis esperanzas, pues cuando más vivas las tenía de alcanzar aquella negra y malhadada ínsula que tantas veces vuestra merced me ha prometido, veo que, en pago y trueco della, me quiere ahora dejar en un lugar tan apartado del trato humano. Por un solo Dios, señor mío, que non se me faga tal desaguizado; y ya que del todo no quiera vuestra merced desistir de acometer este fecho, dilátelo, a lo menos, hasta la mañana; que, a lo que a mí me muestra la ciencia que aprendí cuando era pastor, no debe de haber desde aquí al alba tres horas, porque la boca de la Bocina está encima de la cabeza, y hace la media noche en la línea del brazo izquierdo.

-¿Cómo puedes tú, Sancho -dijo don Quijote-, ver dónde hace esa línea, ni dónde está esa boca o ese colodrillo que dices, si hace la noche tan oscura que no parece en todo el cielo estrella alguna?

-Así es -dijo Sancho-, pero tiene el miedo muchos ojos y ve las cosas debajo de tierra, cuanto más encima en el cielo; puesto que, por buen discurso, bien se puede entender que hay poco de aquí al día.

-Falte lo que faltare -respondió don Quijote-; que no se ha de decir por mí, ahora ni en ningún tiempo, que lágrimas y ruegos me apartaron de hacer lo que debía a estilo de caballero; y así, te ruego, Sancho, que calles; que Dios, que me ha puesto en corazón de acometer ahora esta tan no vista y tan temerosa aventura, tendrá cuidado de mirar por mi salud y de consolar tu tristeza. Lo que has de hacer es apretar bien las cinchas a Rocinante y quedarte aquí, que yo daré la vuelta presto, o vivo o muerto.

Viendo, pues, Sancho la última resolución de su amo y cuán poco valían con él sus lágrimas, consejos y ruegos, determinó de aprovecharse de su industria y hacerle esperar hasta el día, si pudiese; y así, cuando apretaba las cinchas al caballo, bonitamente y sin ser sentido, ató con el cabestro de su asno ambos pies a Rocinante, de manera que cuando don Quijote se quiso partir, no pudo, porque el caballo no se podía mover sino a saltos. Viendo Sancho Panza el buen suceso de su embuste, dijo:

-Ea, señor, que el cielo, conmovido de mis lágrimas y plegarias, ha ordenado que no se pueda mover Rocinante; y si vos queréis porfiar, y espolear, y dalle, será enojar a la fortuna y dar coces, como dicen, contra el aguijón.

Desesperábase con esto don Quijote, y, por más que ponía las piernas al caballo, menos le podía mover; y, sin caer en la cuenta de la ligadura, tuvo por bien de sosegar y esperar, o a que amaneciese, o a que Rocinante se menease, creyendo, sin duda, que aquello venía de otra parte que de la industria de Sancho; y así, le dijo:

-Pues así es, Sancho, que Rocinante no puede moverse, yo soy contento de esperar a que ría el alba, aunque yo llore lo que ella tardare en venir.

-No hay que llorar -respondió Sancho-, que yo entretendré a vuestra merced contando cuentos desde aquí al día, si ya no es que se quiere apearse y echarse a dormir un poco sobre la verde yerba, a uso de caballeros andantes, para hallarse más descansado cuando llegue el día y punto de acometer esta tan desemejable aventura que le espera.

-¿A qué llamas apear o a qué dormir? -dijo don Quijote-. ¿Soy yo, por ventura, de aquellos caballeros que toman reposo en los peligros? Duerme tú, que naciste para dormir, o haz lo que quisieres, que yo haré lo que viere que más viene con mi pretensión.

No se enoje vuestra merced, señor mío -respondió Sancho-, que no lo dije por tanto.

Y, llegándose a él, puso la una mano en el arzón delantero y la otra en el otro, de modo que quedó abrazado con el muslo izquierdo de su amo, sin osarse apartar dél un dedo: tal era el miedo que tenía a los golpes, que todavía alternativamente sonaban. Díjole don Quijote que contase algún cuento para entretenerle, como se lo había prometido, a lo que Sancho dijo que sí hiciera si le dejara el temor de lo que oía.

-Pero, con todo eso, yo me esforzaré a decir una historia que, si la acierto a contar y no me van a la mano, es la mejor de las historias; y estéme vuestra merced atento, que ya comienzo. «Érase que se era, el bien que viniere para todos sea, y el mal, para quien lo fuere a buscar...» Y advierta vuestra merced, señor mío, que el principio que los antiguos dieron a sus consejas no fue así comoquiera, que fue una sentencia de Catón Zonzorino, romano, que dice: «Y el mal, para quien le fuere a buscar», que viene aquí como anillo al dedo, para que vuestra merced se esté quedo y no vaya a buscar el mal a ninguna parte, sino que nos volvamos por otro camino, pues nadie nos fuerza a que sigamos éste, donde tantos miedos nos sobresaltan.

-Sigue tu cuento, Sancho -dijo don Quijote-, y del camino que hemos de seguir déjame a mí el cuidado.

-«Digo, pues -prosiguió Sancho-, que en un lugar de Estremadura había un pastor cabrerizo (quiero decir que guardaba cabras), el cual pastor o cabrerizo, como digo, de mi cuento, se llamaba Lope Ruiz; y este Lope Ruiz andaba enamorado de una pastora que se llamaba Torralba, la cual pastora llamada Torralba era hija de un ganadero rico, y este ganadero rico...»

-Si desamano cuentas tu cuento, Sancho -dijo don Quijote-, repitiendo dos veces lo que vas diciendo, no acabarás en dos días; dilo seguidamente y cuéntalo como hombre de entendimiento, y si no, no digas nada.

-De la misma manera que yo lo cuento -respondió Sancho-, se cuentan en mi tierra todas las consejas, y yo no sé contarlas de otra, ni es bien que vuestra merced me pida que haga usos nuevos.

-Di como quisieres -respondió don Quijote-; que, pues la suerte quiere que no pueda dejar de escucharte, prosigue.

-«Así que, señor mío de mi ánima -prosiguió Sancho-, que, como ya tengo

dicho, este pastor andaba enamorado de Torralba, la pastora, que era una moza rolliza, zahareña y tiraba algo a hombruna, porque tenía unos pocos de bigotes, que parece que ahora la veo.»

-Luego, ¿conocístela tú? -dijo don Quijote.

-No la conocí yo -respondió Sancho-, pero quien me contó este cuento me dijo que era tan cierto y verdadero, que podía bien, cuando lo contase a otro, afirmar y jurar que lo había visto todo. «Así que, yendo días y viniendo días, el diablo, que no duerme y que todo lo añasca, hizo de manera que el amor que el pastor tenía a la pastora se volviese en omecillo y mala voluntad; y la causa fue, según malas lenguas, una cierta cantidad de celillos que ella le dio, tales, que pasaban de la raya y llegaban a lo vedado; y fue tanto lo que el pastor la aborreció de allí adelante que, por no verla, se quiso ausentar de aquella tierra e irse donde sus ojos no la viesan jamás. La Torralba, que se vio desdeñada del Lope, luego le quiso bien, mas que nunca le había querido.»

-Ésa es natural condición de mujeres -dijo don Quijote-: desdeñar a quien las quiere y amar a quien las aborrece. Pasa adelante, Sancho.

-«Sucedió -dijo Sancho-que el pastor puso por obra su determinación, y, antecogiendo sus cabras, se encaminó por los campos de Estremadura, para pasarse a los reinos de Portugal. La Torralba, que lo supo, se fue tras él, y seguía a pie y descalza desde lejos, con un bordón en la mano y con unas alforjas al cuello, donde llevaba, según es fama, un pedazo de espejo y otro de un peine, y no sé qué botecillo de mudas para la cara; mas, llevase lo que llevase, que yo no me quiero meter ahora en averiguallo, sólo diré que dicen que el pastor llegó con su ganado a pasar el río Guadiana, y en aquella sazón iba crecido y casi fuera de madre, y por la parte que llegó no había barca ni barco, ni quien le pasase a él ni a su ganado de la otra parte, de lo que se congojó mucho, porque veía que la Torralba venía ya muy cerca y le había de dar mucha pesadumbre con sus ruegos y lágrimas; mas, tanto anduvo mirando, que vio un pescador que tenía junto a sí un barco, tan pequeño que solamente podían caber en él una persona y una cabra; y, con todo esto, le habló y concertó con él que le pasase a él y a trecientas cabras que llevaba. Entró el pescador en el barco, y pasó una cabra; volvió, y pasó otra; tornó a volver, y tornó a pasar otra.» Tenga vuestra merced cuenta en las cabras que el pescador va pasando, porque si se pierde una de la memoria, se acabará el cuento y no será posible contar más palabra dél. «Sigo, pues, y digo que el desembarcadero de la otra parte estaba lleno de cieno y resbaloso, y tardaba el pescador mucho tiempo en ir y volver. Con todo esto, volvió por otra cabra, y otra, y otra...»

-Haz cuenta que las pasó todas -dijo don Quijote-: no andes yendo y viniendo desa manera, que no acabarás de pasarlas en un año.

-¿Cuántas han pasado hasta ahora? -dijo Sancho.

-¡Yo qué diablos sé! -respondió don Quijote-.

-He ahí lo que yo dije: que tuviese buena cuenta. Pues, por Dios, que se ha acabado el cuento, que no hay pasar adelante.

-¿Cómo puede ser eso? -respondió don Quijote-. ¿Tan de esencia de la historia es saber las cabras que han pasado, por estenso, que si se yerra una del número no puedes seguir adelante con la historia?

-No señor, en ninguna manera -respondió Sancho-; porque, así como yo pregunté a vuestra merced que me dijese cuántas cabras habían pasado y me respondió que no sabía, en aquel mismo instante se me fue a mí de la memoria cuanto me quedaba por decir, y a fe que era de mucha virtud y contento.

-¿De modo -dijo don Quijote-que ya la historia es acabada?

-Tan acabada es como mi madre -dijo Sancho.

-Dígame de verdad -respondió don Quijote-que tú has contado una de las más nuevas consejas, cuento o historia, que nadie pudo pensar en el mundo; y que tal modo de contarla ni dejarla, jamás se podrá ver ni habrá visto en toda la vida, aunque no esperaba yo otra cosa de tu buen discurso; mas no me maravillo, pues quizá estos golpes, que no cesan, te deben de tener turbado el entendimiento.

-Todo puede ser -respondió Sancho-, mas yo sé que en lo de mi cuento no hay más que decir: que allí se acaba do comienza el yerro de la cuenta del pasaje de las cabras.

-Acabe norabuena donde quisiere -dijo don Quijote-, y veamos si se puede mover Rocinante.

Tornóle a poner las piernas, y él tornó a dar saltos y a estarse quedo: tanto estaba de bien atado.

En esto, parece ser, o que el frío de la mañana, que ya venía, o que Sancho hubiese cenado algunas cosas lenitivas, o que fuese cosa natural -que es lo que más se debe creer-, a él le vino en voluntad y deseo de hacer lo que otro no pudiera hacer por él; mas era tanto el miedo que había entrado en su corazón, que no osaba apartarse un negro de uña de su amo. Pues pensar de no hacer lo que tenía gana, tampoco era posible; y así, lo que hizo, por bien de paz, fue soltar la mano derecha, que tenía asida al arzón trasero, con la cual, bonitamente y sin rumor alguno, se soltó la lazada corrediza con que los calzones se sostenían, sin ayuda de otra alguna, y, en quitándosela, dieron luego abajo y se le quedaron como grillos. Tras esto, alzó la camisa lo mejor que pudo y echó al aire entrambas posaderas, que no eran muy pequeñas. Hecho esto -que él pensó que era lo más que tenía que hacer para salir de aquel terrible aprieto y angustia-, le sobrevino otra mayor, que fue que le pareció que no podía mudarse sin hacer estrépito y ruido, y comenzó a apretar los dientes y a encoger los hombros, recogiendo en sí el aliento todo cuanto podía; pero, con todas estas diligencias, fue tan desdichado que, al cabo al cabo, vino a hacer un poco de ruido, bien diferente de aquel que a él le ponía tanto miedo. Oyólo don Quijote y dijo:

-¿Qué rumor es ése, Sancho?

-No sé, señor -respondió él-. Alguna cosa nueva debe de ser, que las aventuras y desventuras nunca comienzan por poco.

Tornó otra vez a probar ventura, y sucedióle tan bien que, sin más ruido ni alboroto que el pasado, se halló libre de la carga que tanta pesadumbre le había dado. Mas, como don Quijote tenía el sentido del olfato tan vivo como el de los oídos, y Sancho estaba tan junto y cosido con él, que casi por línea recta subían los vapores hacia arriba, no se pudo escusar de que algunos no llegasen a sus narices; y, apenas hubieron llegado, cuando él fue al socorro, apretándolas entre los dos dedos; y, con tono algo gangoso, dijo:

-Paréceme, Sancho, que tienes mucho miedo.

-Sí tengo -respondió Sancho-; mas ¿en qué lo echa de ver vuestra merced ahora más que nunca?

-En que ahora más que nunca hueles, y no a ámbar -respondió don Quijote.

-Bien podrá ser -dijo Sancho-, mas yo no tengo la culpa, sino vuestra merced, que me trae a deshoras y por estos no acostumbrados pasos.

-Retírate tres o cuatro allá, amigo -dijo don Quijote (todo esto sin quitarse los dedos de las narices)-, y desde aquí adelante ten más cuenta con tu persona y con lo que debes a la mía; que la mucha conversación que tengo contigo ha engendrado este menosprecio.

-Apostaré -replicó Sancho-que piensa vuestra merced que yo he hecho de mi persona alguna cosa que no deba.

-Peor es meneallo, amigo Sancho -respondió don Quijote.

En estos coloquios y otros semejantes pasaron la noche amo y mozo. Mas, viendo Sancho que a más andar se venía la mañana, con mucho tiento desligó a Rocinante y se ató los calzones. Como Rocinante se vio libre, aunque él de suyo no era nada brioso, parece que se resintió, y comenzó a dar manotadas; porque corvetas -con perdón suyo-no las sabía hacer. Viendo, pues, don Quijote que ya Rocinante se movía, lo tuvo a buena señal, y creyó que lo era de que acometiese aquella temerosa aventura.

Acabó en esto de descubrirse el alba y de parecer distintamente las cosas, y vio don Quijote que estaba entre unos árboles altos, que ellos eran castaños, que hacen la sombra muy oscura. Sintió también que el golpear no cesaba, pero no vio quién lo podía causar; y así, sin más detenerse, hizo sentir las espuelas a Rocinante, y, tornando a despedirse de Sancho, le mandó que allí le aguardase tres días, a lo más largo, como ya otra vez se lo había dicho; y que, si al cabo dellos no hubiese vuelto, tuviese por cierto que Dios había sido servido de que en aquella peligrosa aventura se le acabasen sus días. Tornóle a referir el recado y embajada que había de llevar de su parte a su señora Dulcinea, y que, en lo que tocaba a la paga de sus servicios, no tuviese pena, porque él había dejado hecho su testamento antes que saliera de su lugar, donde se hallaría gratificado de todo lo tocante a su salario, rata por cantidad, del tiempo que hubiese servido; pero que si Dios le sacaba de aquel peligro sano y salvo y sin cautela, se podía tener por muy más que cierta la prometida ínsula.

De nuevo tornó a llorar Sancho, oyendo de nuevo las lastimeras razones de su buen señor, y determinó de no dejarle hasta el último tránsito y fin de aquel negocio.

Destas lágrimas y determinación tan honrada de Sancho Panza saca el autor desta historia que debía de ser bien nacido, y, por lo menos, cristiano viejo. Cuyo sentimiento enterneció algo a su amo, pero no tanto que mostrase flaqueza alguna; antes, disimulando lo mejor que pudo, comenzó a caminar hacia la parte por donde le pareció que el ruido del agua y del golpear venía.

Seguíale Sancho a pie, llevando, como tenía de costumbre, del cabestro a su jumento, perpetuo compañero de sus prósperas y adversas fortunas; y, habiendo andado una buena pieza por entre aquellos castaños y árboles sombríos, dieron en un pradecillo que al pie de unas altas peñas se hacía, de las cuales se precipitaba un grandísimo golpe de agua. Al pie de las peñas, estaban unas casas mal hechas, que más parecían ruinas de edificios que casas, de entre las cuales advirtieron que salía el ruido y estruendo de aquel golpear, que aún no cesaba.

Alborotóse Rocinante con el estruendo del agua y de los golpes, y, sosegándole don Quijote, se fue llegando poco a poco a las casas, encomendándose de todo corazón a su señora, suplicándole que en aquella temerosa jornada y empresa le favoreciese, y de camino se encomendaba también a Dios, que no le olvidase. No se le quitaba Sancho del lado, el cual alargaba cuanto podía el cuello y la vista por entre las piernas de Rocinante, por ver si vería ya lo que tan suspenso y medroso le tenía.

Otros cien pasos serían los que anduvieron, cuando, al doblar de una punta, pareció descubierta y patente la misma causa, sin que pudiese ser otra, de aquel horrísono y para ellos espantable ruido, que tan suspensos y medrosos toda la noche los había tenido. Y eran -si no lo has, ¡oh lector!, por pesadumbre y enojoseis mazos de batán, que con sus alternativos golpes aquel estruendo formaban.

Cuando don Quijote vio lo que era, enmudeció y pasmóse de arriba abajo. Miróle Sancho, y vio que tenía la cabeza inclinada sobre el pecho, con muestras de estar corrido. Miró también don Quijote a Sancho, y vio que tenía los carrillos hinchados y la boca llena de risa, con evidentes señales de querer reventar con ella, y no pudo su melancolía tanto con él que, a la vista de Sancho, pudiese dejar de reírse; y, como vio Sancho que su amo había comenzado, soltó la presa de manera que tuvo necesidad de apretarse las ijadas con los puños, por no reventar riendo. Cuatro veces sosegó, y otras tantas volvió a su risa con el mismo ímpetu que primero; de lo cual ya se daba al diablo don Quijote, y más cuando le oyó decir, como por modo de fisga:

-«Has de saber, ¡oh Sancho amigo!, que yo nací, por querer del cielo, en esta nuestra edad de hierro, para resucitar en ella la dorada, o de oro. Yo soy aquél para quien están guardados los peligros, las hazañas grandes, los valerosos fechos...»

Y por aquí fue repitiendo todas o las más razones que don Quijote dijo la vez primera que oyeron los temerosos golpes.

Viendo, pues, don Quijote que Sancho hacía burla dél, se corrió y enojó en tanta manera, que alzó el lanzón y le asentó dos palos, tales que, si, como los recibió en las espaldas, los recibiera en la cabeza, quedara libre de pagarle el salario, si no fuera a sus herederos. Viendo Sancho que sacaba tan malas veras de sus burlas, con temor de que su amo no pasase adelante en ellas, con mucha humildad le dijo:

-Sosiéguese vuestra merced; que, por Dios, que me burlo.

-Pues, porque os burláis, no me burlo yo -respondió don Quijote-. Venid acá, señor alegre: ¿paréceos a vos que, si como éstos fueron mazos de batán, fueran otra peligrosa aventura, no había yo mostrado el ánimo que convenía para emprendella y acaballa? ¿Estoy yo obligado, a dicha, siendo, como soy, caballero, a conocer y distinguir los sonos y saber cuáles son de batán o no? Y más, que podría ser, como es verdad, que no los he visto en mi vida, como vos los habréis visto, como villano ruin que sois, criado y nacido entre ellos. Si no, haced vos que estos seis mazos se vuelvan en seis jayanes, y echádmelos a las barbas uno a uno, o todos juntos, y, cuando yo no diere con todos patas arriba, haced de mí la burla que quisiéredes.

-No haya más, señor mío -replicó Sancho-, que yo confieso que he andado algo risueño en demasía. Pero dígame vuestra merced, ahora que estamos en paz (así Dios le saque de todas las aventuras que le sucedieren tan sano y salvo como le ha sacado ésta), ¿no ha sido cosa de reír, y lo es de contar, el gran miedo que hemos tenido? A lo menos, el que yo tuve; que de vuestra merced ya yo sé que no le conoce, ni sabe qué es temor ni espanto.

-No niego yo -respondió don Quijote- que lo que nos ha sucedido no sea cosa digna de risa, pero no es digna de contarse; que no son todas las personas tan discretas que sepan poner en su punto las cosas.

-A lo menos -respondió Sancho-, supo vuestra merced poner en su punto el lanzón, apuntándome a la cabeza, y dándome en las espaldas, gracias a Dios y a la diligencia que puse en ladearme. Pero vaya, que todo saldrá en la colada; que yo he oído decir: «Ése te quiere bien, que te hace llorar»; y más, que suelen los principales señores, tras una mala palabra que dicen a un criado, darle luego unas calzas; aunque no sé lo que le suelen dar tras haberle dado de palos, si ya no es que los caballeros andantes dan tras palos ínsulas o reinos en tierra firme.

-Tal podría correr el dado -dijo don Quijote-que todo lo que dices viniese a ser verdad; y perdona lo pasado, pues eres discreto y sabes que los primeros movimientos no son en mano del hombre, y está advertido de aquí adelante en una cosa, para que te abstengas y reportes en el hablar demasiado conmigo; que en cuantos libros de caballerías he leído, que son infinitos, jamás he hallado que ningún escudero hablase tanto con su señor como tú con el tuyo. Y en verdad que lo tengo a gran falta, tuya y mía: tuya, en que me estimas en poco; mía, en que no me dejo estimar en más. Sí, que Gandalín, escudero de Amadís de Gaula, conde fue de la ínsula Firme; y se lee dél que siempre hablaba a su señor con la gorra en la mano, inclinada la cabeza y doblado el cuerpo more turquesco. Pues, ¿qué diremos de Gasabal, escudero de don Galaor, que fue tan callado que, para declararnos la excelencia de su maravilloso silencio, sola una vez se nombra su nombre en toda aquella tan grande como verdadera historia? De todo lo que he dicho has de inferir, Sancho, que es menester hacer diferencia de amo a mozo, de señor a criado y de caballero a escudero. Así que, desde hoy en adelante, nos hemos de tratar con más respeto, sin darnos cordelejo, porque, de cualquiera manera que yo me enoje con vos, ha de ser mal para el cántaro. Las mercedes y beneficios que yo os he prometido llegarán a su tiempo; y si no llegaren, el salario, a lo menos, no se ha de perder, como ya os he dicho.

-Está bien cuanto vuestra merced dice -dijo Sancho-, pero querría yo saber, por si acaso no llegase el tiempo de las mercedes y fuese necesario acudir al de los salarios, cuánto ganaba un escudero de un caballero andante en aquellos tiempos, y si se concertaban por meses, o por días, como peones de albañir.

-No creo yo -respondió don Quijote-que jamás los tales escuderos estuvieron a salario, sino a merced. Y si yo ahora te le he señalado a ti en el testamento cerrado que dejé en mi casa, fue por lo que podía suceder; que aún no sé cómo prueba en estos tan calamitosos tiempos nuestros la caballería, y no querría que por pocas cosas penase mi ánima en el otro mundo. Porque quiero que sepas, Sancho, que en él no hay estado más peligroso que el de los aventureros.

-Así es verdad -dijo Sancho-, pues sólo el ruido de los mazos de un batán pudo alborotar y desasosegar el corazón de un tan valeroso andante aventurero como es vuestra merced. Mas, bien puede estar seguro que, de aquí adelante, no despliegue mis labios para hacer donaire de las cosas de vuestra merced, si no fuere para honrarle, como a mi amo y señor natural.

-Desa manera -replicó don Quijote-, vivirás sobre la haz de la tierra; porque, después de a los padres, a los amos se ha de respetar como si lo fuesen.

Capítulo XXI

Que trata de la alta aventura y rica ganancia del yelmo de Mambrino, con otras cosas sucedidas a nuestro invencible caballero

EN ESTO, comenzó a llover un poco, y quisiera Sancho que se entraran en el molino de los batanes; mas habíales cobrado tal aborrecimiento don Quijote, por la pesada burla, que en ninguna manera quiso entrar dentro; y así, torciendo el camino a la derecha mano, dieron en otro como el que habían llevado el día de antes.

De allí a poco, descubrió don Quijote un hombre a caballo, que traía en la cabeza una cosa que relumbraba como si fuera de oro, y aún él apenas le hubo visto, cuando se volvió a Sancho y le dijo:

-Paréceme, Sancho, que no hay refrán que no sea verdadero, porque todos son sentencias sacadas de la misma experiencia, madre de las ciencias todas, especialmente aquel que dice: «Donde una puerta se cierra, otra se abre». Dígolo porque si anoche nos cerró la ventura la puerta de la que buscábamos, engañándonos con los batanes, ahora nos abre de par en par otra, para otra mejor y más cierta aventura; que si yo no acertare a entrar por ella, mía será la culpa, sin que la pueda dar a la poca noticia de batanes ni a la escuridad de la noche. Digo esto porque, si no me engaño, hacia nosotros viene uno que trae en su cabeza puesto el yelmo de Mambrino, sobre que yo hice el juramento que sabes.

-Mire vuestra merced bien lo que dice, y mejor lo que hace -dijo Sancho-, que no querría que fuesen otros batanes que nos acabasen de abatanar y aporrear el sentido.

-¡Válate el diablo por hombre! -replicó don Quijote-. ¿Qué va de yelmo a batanes?

-No sé nada -respondió Sancho-; mas, a fe que si yo pudiera hablar tanto como solía, que quizá diera tales razones que vuestra merced viera que se engañaba en lo que dice.

-¿Cómo me puedo engañar en lo que digo, traidor escrupuloso? -dijo don Quijote-. Dime, ¿no ves aquel caballero que hacia nosotros viene, sobre un caballo rucio rodado, que trae puesto en la cabeza un yelmo de oro?

-Lo que yo veo y columbro -respondió Sancho- no es sino un hombre sobre un asno pardo, como el mío, que trae sobre la cabeza una cosa que relumbra.

-Pues ése es el yelmo de Mambrino -dijo don Quijote-. Apártate a una parte y déjame con él a solas: verás cuán sin hablar palabra, por ahorrar del tiempo, concluyo esta aventura y queda por mío el yelmo que tanto he deseado.

-Yo me tengo en cuidado el apartarme -replicó Sancho-, mas quiera Dios, torno a decir, que orégano sea, y no batanes.

-Ya os he dicho, hermano, que no me mentéis, ni por pienso, más eso de los batanes -dijo don Quijote-; que voto..., y no digo más, que os batanee el alma.

Calló Sancho, con temor que su amo no cumpliese el voto que le había echado, redondo como una bola.

Es, pues, el caso que el yelmo, y el caballo y caballero que don Quijote veía, era esto: que en aquel contorno había dos lugares, el uno tan pequeño, que ni tenía botica ni barbero, y el otro, que estaba junto a él, sí; y así, el barbero del mayor servía al menor, en el cual tuvo necesidad un enfermo de sangrarse y otro de hacerse la barba, para lo cual venía el barbero, y traía una bacía de azófar; y quiso la suerte que, al tiempo que venía, comenzó a llover, y, porque no se le manchase el sombrero, que debía de ser nuevo, se puso la bacía sobre la cabeza; y, como estaba limpia, desde media legua relumbraba. Venía sobre un asno pardo, como Sancho dijo, y ésta fue la ocasión que a don Quijote le pareció caballo rucio rodado, y caballero, y yelmo de oro; que todas las cosas que veía, con mucha facilidad las acomodaba a sus desvariadas caballerías y malandantes pensamientos. Y cuando él vio que el pobre caballero llegaba cerca, sin ponerse con él en razones, a todo correr de Rocinante le enristró con el lanzón bajo, llevando intención de pasarle de parte a parte; mas cuando a él llegaba, sin detener la furia de su carrera, le dijo:

-¡Defiéndete, cautiva criatura, o entriégame de tu voluntad lo que con tanta razón se me debe!

El barbero, que, tan sin pensarlo ni temerlo, vio venir aquella fantasma sobre sí, no tuvo otro remedio, para poder guardarse del golpe de la lanza, si no fue el dejarse caer del asno abajo; y no hubo tocado al suelo, cuando se levantó más ligero que un gamo y comenzó a correr por aquel llano, que no le alcanzara el viento. Dejóse la bacía en el suelo, con la cual se contentó don Quijote, y dijo que el pagano había andado discreto y que había imitado al castor, el cual, viéndose acosado de los cazadores, se taraza y arpa con los dientes aquello por lo que él, por distinto natural, sabe que es perseguido. Mandó a Sancho que alzase el yelmo, el cual, tomándola en las manos, dijo:

-Por Dios, que la bacía es buena y que vale un real de a ocho como un maravedí.

Y, dándosela a su amo, se la puso luego en la cabeza, rodeándola a una parte y a otra, buscándole el encaje; y, como no se le hallaba, dijo:

-Sin duda que el pagano, a cuya medida se forjó primero esta famosa celada, debía de tener grandísima cabeza, y lo peor dello es que le falta la mitad.

Cuando Sancho oyó llamar a la bacía celada, no pudo tener la risa; mas vínosele a las mientes la cólera de su amo, y calló en la mitad della.

-¿De qué te ríes, Sancho? -dijo don Quijote.

-Ríome -respondió él-de considerar la gran cabeza que tenía el pagano dueño deste almete, que no semeja sino una bacía de barbero pintiparada.

-¿Sabes qué imagino, Sancho? Que esta famosa pieza deste encantado yelmo, por algún extraño accidente, debió de venir a manos de quien no supo conocer ni estimar su valor, y, sin saber lo que hacía, viéndola de oro purísimo, debió de fundir la otra mitad para aprovecharse del precio, y de la otra mitad hizo ésta, que parece bacía de barbero, como tú dices. Pero, sea lo que fuere; que para mí que la conozco no hace al caso su trasmutación; que yo la aderezaré en el primer lugar donde haya herrero, y de suerte que no le haga ventaja, ni aun le llegue, la que hizo y forjó el dios de las herrerías para el dios de las batallas; y, en este entretanto, la traeré como pudiere, que más vale algo que no nada; cuanto más, que bien será bastante para defenderme de alguna pedrada.

-Eso será -dijo Sancho-si no se tira con honda, como se tiraron en la pelea de los dos ejércitos, cuando le santiguaron a vuestra merced las muelas y le rompieron el alcuza donde venía aquel benditísimo brebaje que me hizo vomitar las asaduras.

-No me da mucha pena el haberle perdido, que ya sabes tú, Sancho -dijo don Quijote-, que yo tengo la receta en la memoria.

-También la tengo yo -respondió Sancho-, pero si yo le hiciere ni le probare más en mi vida, aquí sea mi hora. Cuanto más, que no pienso ponerme en ocasión de haberle menester, porque pienso guardarme con todos mis cinco sentidos de ser ferido ni de ferir a nadie. De lo del ser otra vez manteado, no digo nada, que semejantes desgracias mal se pueden prevenir, y si vienen, no hay que hacer otra cosa sino encoger los hombros, detener el aliento, cerrar los ojos y dejarse ir por donde la suerte y la manta nos llevare.

-Mal cristiano eres, Sancho -dijo, oyendo esto, don Quijote-, porque nunca olvidas la injuria que una vez te han hecho; pues sábette que es de pechos nobles y generosos no hacer caso de niñerías. ¿Qué pie sacaste cojo, qué costilla quebrada, qué cabeza rota, para que no se te olvide aquella burla? Que, bien apurada la cosa, burla fue y pasatiempo; que, a no entenderlo yo ansí, ya yo hubiera vuelto allá y hubiera hecho en tu venganza más daño que el que hicieron los griegos por la robada Elena. La cual, si fuera en este tiempo, o mi Dulcinea fuera en aquél, pudiera estar segura que no tuviera tanta fama de hermosa como tiene.

Y aquí dio un suspiro, y le puso en las nubes. Y dijo Sancho:

-Pase por burlas, pues la venganza no puede pasar en veras; pero yo sé de qué calidad fueron las veras y las burlas, y sé también que no se me caerán de la memoria, como nunca se quitarán de las espaldas. Pero, dejando esto aparte, dígame vuestra merced qué haremos deste caballo rucio rodado, que parece asno pardo, que dejó aquí desamparado aquel Martino que vuestra merced derribó; que, según él puso los pies en polvorosa y cogió las de Villadiego, no lleva pergenio de volver por él jamás; y ¡para mis barbas, si no es bueno el rucio!

-Nunca yo acostumbro -dijo don Quijote-despojar a los que venzo, ni es uso de caballería quitarles los caballos y dejarlos a pie, si ya no fuese que el vencedor hubiese perdido en la pendencia el suyo; que, en tal caso, lícito es tomar el del vencido, como ganado en guerra lícita. Así que, Sancho, deja ese caballo, o asno, o lo que tú quisieres que sea, que, como su dueño nos vea alongados de aquí, volverá por él.

-Dios sabe si quisiera llevarle -replicó Sancho-, o, por lo menos, trocalle con este mío, que no me parece tan bueno. Verdaderamente que son estrechas las leyes de caballería, pues no se estienden a dejar trocar un asno por otro; y querría saber si podría trocar los aparejos siquiera.

-En eso no estoy muy cierto -respondió don Quijote-; y, en caso de duda, hasta estar mejor informado, digo que los trueques, si es que tienes dellos necesidad extrema.

-Tan extrema es -respondió Sancho-que si fueran para mi misma persona, no los hubiera menester más.

Y luego, habilitado con aquella licencia, hizo mutatio caparum y puso su jumento a las mil lindezas, dejándole mejorado en tercio y quinto.

Hecho esto, almorzaron de las sobras del real que del acémila despojaron, bebieron del agua del arroyo de los batanes, sin volver la cara a mirallos: tal era el aborrecimiento que les tenían por el miedo en que les habían puesto.

Cortada, pues, la cólera, y aun la malenconía, subieron a caballo, y, sin tomar determinado camino, por ser muy de caballeros andantes el no tomar ninguno cierto, se pusieron a caminar por donde la voluntad de Rocinante quiso, que se llevaba tras sí la de su amo, y aun la del asno, que siempre le seguía por dondequiera que guiaba, en buen amor y compañía. Con todo esto, volvieron al camino real y siguieron por él a la ventura, sin otro disignio alguno.

Yendo, pues, así caminando, dijo Sancho a su amo:

-Señor, ¿quiere vuestra merced darme licencia que departa un poco con él? Que, después que me puso aquel áspero mandamiento del silencio, se me han podrido más de cuatro cosas en el estómago, y una sola que ahora tengo en el pico de la lengua no querría que se mal lograra.

-Dila -dijo don Quijote-, y sé breve en tus razonamientos, que ninguno hay gustoso si es largo.

-Digo, pues, señor -respondió Sancho-, que, de algunos días a esta parte, he considerado cuán poco se gana y granjea de andar buscando estas aventuras que vuestra merced busca por estos desiertos y encrucijadas de caminos, donde, ya que se venzan y acaben las más peligrosas, no hay quien las vea ni sepa; y así, se han de quedar en perpetuo silencio, y en perjuicio de la intención de vuestra merced y de lo que ellas merecen. Y así, me parece que sería mejor, salvo el mejor parecer de vuestra merced, que nos fuésemos a servir a algún emperador, o a otro príncipe grande que tenga alguna guerra, en cuyo servicio vuestra merced muestre el valor de su persona, sus grandes fuerzas y mayor entendimiento; que, visto esto del señor a quien sirviéremos, por fuerza nos ha de remunerar, a cada cual según sus méritos, y allí no faltará quien ponga en escrito las hazañas de vuestra merced, para perpetua memoria. De las mías no digo nada, pues no han de salir de los límites escuderiles; aunque sé decir que, si se usa en la caballería escribir hazañas de escuderos, que no pienso que se han de quedar las mías entre renglones.

-No dices mal, Sancho -respondió don Quijote-; mas, antes que se llegue a ese término, es menester andar por el mundo, como en aprobación, buscando las aventuras, para que, acabando algunas, se cobre nombre y fama tal que, cuando se fuere a la corte de algún gran monarca, ya sea el caballero conocido por sus obras; y que, apenas le hayan visto entrar los muchachos por la puerta de la ciudad, cuando todos le sigan y rodeen, dando voces, diciendo: «Éste es el Caballero del Sol», o de la Sierpe, o de otra insignia alguna, debajo de la cual hubiere acabado grandes hazañas. «Éste es -dirán-el que venció en singular batalla al gigantazo Brocabruno de la Gran Fuerza; el que desencantó al Gran Mameluco de Persia del largo encantamento en que había estado casi novecientos años». Así que, de mano en mano, irán pregonando tus hechos, y luego, al alboroto de los muchachos y de la demás gente, se parará a las fenestras de su real palacio el rey de aquel reino, y así como vea al caballero, conociéndole por las armas o por la empresa del escudo, forzosamente ha de decir: «¡Ea, sus! ¡Salgan mis caballeros, cuantos en mi corte están, a recibir a la flor de la caballería, que allí viene!» A cuyo mandamiento saldrán todos, y él llegará hasta la mitad de la escalera, y le abrazará estrechísimamente, y le dará paz besándole en el rostro; y luego le llevará por la mano al aposento de la señora reina, adonde el caballero la hallará con la infanta, su hija, que ha de ser una de las más hermosas y acabadas doncellas que, en gran parte de lo descubierto de la tierra, a duras penas se pueda hallar. Sucederá tras esto, luego en continente, que ella ponga los ojos en el caballero y él en los della, y cada uno parezca a otro cosa más divina que humana; y, sin saber cómo ni cómo no, han de quedar presos y enlazados en la intricable red amorosa, y con gran cuita en sus corazones por no saber cómo se han de hablar para descubrir sus ansias y sentimientos. Desde allí le llevarán, sin duda, a algún cuarto del palacio, ricamente aderezado, donde, habiéndole quitado las armas, le traerán un rico manto de escarlata con que se cubra; y si bien pareció armado, tan bien y mejor ha de parecer en farseto. Venida la noche, cenará con el rey, reina e infanta, donde nunca quitará los ojos della, mirándola a furto de los circustantes, y ella hará lo mismo con la misma sagacidad, porque, como tengo dicho, es muy discreta doncella. Levantarse han las tablas, y entrará a deshora por la puerta de la sala un feo y pequeño enano con una hermosa dueña, que, entre dos gigantes, detrás del enano viene, con cierta aventura, hecha por un antiquísimo sabio, que el que la acabare será tenido por el mejor caballero del mundo. Mandará luego el rey que todos los que están presentes la prueben, y ninguno le dará fin y cima sino el caballero huésped, en mucho pro de su fama, de lo cual quedará contentísima la infanta, y se tendrá por contenta y pagada además, por haber puesto y colocado sus pensamientos en tan alta parte. Y lo bueno es que este rey, o príncipe, o lo que es, tiene una muy reñida guerra con otro tan poderoso como él, y el caballero huésped le pide (al cabo de algunos días que ha estado en su corte) licencia para ir a servirle en aquella guerra dicha. Darásela el rey de muy buen talante, y el caballero le besará cortésmente las manos por la merced que le face. Y aquella noche se despedirá de su señora la infanta por las rejas de un jardín, que cae en el aposento donde ella duerme, por las cuales ya otras muchas veces la había hablado, siendo medianera y sabidora de todo una doncella de quien la infanta mucho se fiaba. Sospirará él, desmayaráse ella, traerá agua la doncella, acuitaráse mucho porque viene la mañana, y no querría que fuesen descubiertos, por la honra de su señora. Finalmente, la infanta volverá en sí y dará sus blancas manos por la reja al caballero, el cual se las besará mil y mil veces y se las bañará en lágrimas. Quedará concertado entre los dos del modo que se han de hacer saber sus buenos o malos sucesos, y rogará la princesa que se detenga lo menos que pudiere; prometérselo ha él con muchos juramentos; tórñale a besar las manos, y despídese con tanto sentimiento que estará poco por acabar la vida. Vase desde allí a su aposento, échase sobre su lecho, no puede dormir del dolor de la partida, madruga muy de mañana, vase a despedir del rey y de la reina y de la infanta; dícnle, habiéndose despedido de los dos, que la señora infanta está mal dispuesta y que no puede recibir visita; piensa el caballero que es de pena de su partida, traspásasele el corazón, y falta poco de no dar indicio manifiesto de su pena. Está la doncella medianera delante, halo de notar todo, váselo a decir a su señora, la cual la recibe con lágrimas y le dice que una de las mayores penas que tiene es no saber quién sea su caballero, y si es de linaje de reyes o no; asegúrala la doncella que no puede caber tanta cortesía, gentileza y valentía como la de su caballero sino en sujeto real y grave; consuélase con esto la cuitada; procura consolarse, por no dar mal indicio de sí a sus padres, y, a cabo de dos días, sale en público. Ya se es ido el caballero: pelea en la guerra, vence al enemigo del rey, gana muchas ciudades, triunfa de muchas batallas, vuelve a la corte, ve a su señora por donde suele, concíértase que la pida a su padre por mujer en pago de sus servicios. No se la quiere dar el rey, porque no sabe quién es; pero, con todo esto, o robada o de otra cualquier suerte que sea, la infanta viene a ser su esposa y su padre lo viene a tener a gran ventura, porque se vino a averiguar que el tal caballero es hijo de un valeroso rey de no sé qué reino, porque creo que no debe de estar en el mapa. Muérese el padre, hereda la infanta, queda rey el caballero en dos palabras. Aquí entra luego el hacer mercedes a su escudero y a todos aquellos que le ayudaron a subir a tan alto estado: casa a su escudero con una doncella de la infanta, que será, sin duda, la que fue tercera en sus amores, que es hija de un duque muy principal.

-Eso pido, y barras derechas -dijo Sancho-; a eso me atengo, porque todo, al pie de la letra, ha de suceder por vuestra merced, llamándose el Caballero de la Triste Figura.

-No lo dudes, Sancho -replicó don Quijote-, porque del mismo y por los mismos pasos que esto he contado suben y han subido los caballeros andantes a ser reyes y emperadores. Sólo falta agora mirar qué rey de los cristianos o de los paganos tenga guerra y tenga hija hermosa; pero tiempo habrá para pensar esto, pues, como te tengo dicho, primero se ha de cobrar fama por otras partes que se acuda a la corte. También me falta otra cosa; que, puesto caso que se halle rey con guerra y con hija hermosa, y que yo haya cobrado fama increíble por todo el universo, no sé yo cómo se podía hallar que yo sea de linaje de reyes, o, por lo menos, primo segundo de emperador; porque no me querrá el rey dar a su hija por mujer si no está primero muy enterado en esto, aunque más lo merezcan mis famosos hechos. Así que, por esta falta, temo perder lo que mi brazo tiene bien merecido. Bien es verdad que yo soy hijodalgo de solar conocido, de posesión y propiedad y de devengar quinientos sueldos; y podría ser que el sabio que escribiese mi historia deslindase de tal manera mi parentela y decendencia, que me hallase quinto o sexto nieto de rey. Porque te hago saber, Sancho, que hay dos maneras de linajes en el mundo: unos que traen y derriban su decendencia de príncipes y monarcas, a quien poco a poco el tiempo ha deshecho, y han acabado en punta, como pirámide puesta al revés; otros tuvieron principio de gente baja, y van subiendo de grado en grado, hasta llegar a ser grandes señores. De manera que está la diferencia en que unos fueron, que ya no son, y otros son, que ya no fueron; y podría ser yo éstos que, después de averiguado, hubiese sido mi principio grande y famoso, con lo cual se debía de contentar el rey, mi suegro, que hubiere de ser. Y cuando no, la infanta me ha de querer de manera que, a pesar de su padre, aunque claramente sepa que soy hijo de un azacán, me ha de admitir por señor y por esposo; y si no, aquí entra el roballa y llevalla donde más gusto me diere; que el tiempo o la muerte ha de acabar el enojo de sus padres.

-Ahí entra bien también -dijo Sancho-lo que algunos desalmados dicen: «No pidas de grado lo que puedes tomar por fuerza»; aunque mejor cuadra decir: «Más vale salto de mata que ruego de hombres buenos». Dígolo porque si el señor rey, suegro de vuestra merced, no se quisiere domeñar a entregalle a mi señora la infanta, no hay sino, como vuestra merced dice, roballa y trasponella. Pero está el daño que, en tanto que se hagan las paces y se goce pacíficamente del reino, el pobre escudero se podrá estar a diente en esto de las mercedes. Si ya no es que la doncella tercera, que ha de ser su mujer, se sale con la infanta, y él pasa con ella su mala ventura, hasta que el cielo ordene otra cosa; porque bien podrá, creo yo, desde luego dársela su señor por ligítima esposa.

-Eso no hay quien la quite -dijo don Quijote.

-Pues, como eso sea -respondió Sancho-, no hay sino encomendarnos a Dios, y dejar correr la suerte por donde mejor lo encaminare.

-Hágalo Dios -respondió don Quijote-como yo deseo y tú, Sancho, has menester; y ruin sea quien por ruin se tiene.

-Sea par Dios -dijo Sancho-, que yo cristiano viejo soy, y para ser conde esto me basta.

-Y aun te sobra -dijo don Quijote-; y cuando no lo fueras, no hacía nada al caso, porque, siendo yo el rey, bien te puedo dar nobleza, sin que la compres ni me sirvas con nada. Porque, en haciéndote conde, cádate ahí caballero, y digan lo que dijeren; que a buena fe que te han de llamar señoría, mal que les pese.

-Y ¡montas, que no sabría yo autorizar el litado! -dijo Sancho.

-Dictado has de decir, que no litado -dijo su amo.

-Sea así -respondió Sancho Panza-. Digo que le sabría bien acomodar, porque, por vida mía, que un tiempo fui muñidor de una cofradía, y que me asentaba tan bien la ropa de muñidor, que decían todos que tenía presencia para poder ser prioste de la misma cofradía. Pues, ¿qué será cuando me ponga un ropón ducal a cuestras, o me vista de oro y de perlas, a uso de conde extranjero? Para mí tengo que me han de venir a ver de cien leguas.

-Bien parecerás -dijo don Quijote-, pero será menester que te rapes las barbas a menudo; que, según las tienes de espesas, aborrascadas y mal puestas, si no te las rapas a navaja, cada dos días por lo menos, a tiro de escopeta se echará de ver lo que eres.

-¿Qué hay más -dijo Sancho-, sino tomar un barbero y tenelle asalariado en casa? Y aun, si fuere menester, le haré que ande tras mí, como caballerizo de grande.

-Pues, ¿cómo sabes tú -preguntó don Quijote- que los grandes llevan detrás de sí a sus caballerizos?

-Yo se lo diré -respondió Sancho-: los años pasados estuve un mes en la corte, y allí vi que, paseándose un señor muy pequeño, que decían que era muy grande, un hombre le seguía a caballo a todas las vueltas que daba, que no parecía sino que era su rabo. Pregunté que cómo aquel hombre no se juntaba con el otro, sino que siempre andaba tras dél. Respondiéronme que era su caballerizo y que era uso de grandes llevar tras sí a los tales. Desde entonces lo sé tan bien que nunca se me ha olvidado.

-Digo que tienes razón -dijo don Quijote-, y que así puedes tú llevar a tu barbero; que los usos no vinieron todos juntos, ni se inventaron a una, y puedes ser tú el primero conde que lleve tras sí su barbero; y aun es de más confianza el hacer la barba que ensillar un caballo.

-Quédese eso del barbero a mi cargo -dijo Sancho-, y al de vuestra merced se quede el procurar venir a ser rey y el hacerme conde.

-Así será -respondió don Quijote.

Y, alzando los ojos, vio lo que se dirá en el siguiente capítulo.

Capítulo XXII

De la libertad que dio don Quijote a muchos desdichados que, mal de su grado, los llevaban donde no quisieran ir

CUENTA Cide Hamete Benengeli, autor árabe y manchego, en esta gravísima, altisonante, mínima, dulce e imaginada historia que, después que entre el famoso don Quijote de la Mancha y Sancho Panza, su escudero, pasaron aquellas razones que en el fin del capítulo veinte y uno quedan referidas, que don Quijote alzó los ojos y vio que por el camino que llevaba venían hasta doce hombres a pie, ensartados, como cuentas, en una gran cadena de hierro por los cuellos, y todos con esposas a las manos. Venían ansimismo con ellos dos hombres de a caballo y dos de a pie; los de a caballo, con escopetas de rueda, y los de a pie, con dardos y espadas; y que así como Sancho Panza los vido, dijo:

-Ésta es cadena de galeotes, gente forzada del rey, que va a las galeras.

-¿Cómo gente forzada? -preguntó don Quijote-. ¿Es posible que el rey haga fuerza a ninguna gente?

-No digo eso -respondió Sancho-, sino que es gente que, por sus delitos, va condenada a servir al rey en las galeras de por fuerza.

-En resolución -replicó don Quijote-, comoquiera que ello sea, esta gente, aunque los llevan, van de por fuerza, y no de su voluntad.

-Así es -dijo Sancho.

-Pues desamane -dijo su amo-, aquí encaja la ejecución de mi oficio: desfacer fuerzas y socorrer y acudir a los miserables.

-Advierta vuestra merced -dijo Sancho- que la justicia, que es el mismo rey, no hace fuerza ni agravio a semejante gente, sino que los castiga en pena de sus delitos.

Llegó, en esto, la cadena de los galeotes, y don Quijote, con muy corteses razones, pidió a los que iban en su guarda fuesen servidos de informarle y decille la causa, o causas, por que llevan aquella gente de aquella manera.

Una de las guardas de a caballo respondió que eran galeotes, gente de Su Majestad que iba a galeras, y que no había más que decir, ni él tenía más que saber.

-Con todo eso -replicó don Quijote-, querría saber de cada uno dellos en particular la causa de su desgracia.

Añadió a éstas otras tales y tan comedidas razones, para moverlos a que le dijesen lo que deseaba, que la otra guarda de a caballo le dijo:

-Aunque llevamos aquí el registro y la fe de las sentencias de cada uno destos malaventurados, no es tiempo éste de detenerles a sacarlas ni a leellas; vuestra merced llegue y se lo pregunte a ellos mismos, que ellos lo dirán si quisieren, que sí querrán, porque es gente que recibe gusto de hacer y decir bellaquerías.

Con esta licencia, que don Quijote se tomara aunque no se la dieran, se llegó a la cadena, y al primero le preguntó que por qué pecados iba de tan mala guisa. Él le respondió que por enamorado iba de aquella manera.

-¿Por eso no más? -replicó don Quijote-. Pues, si por enamorados echan a galeras, días ha que pudiera yo estar bogando en ellas.

-No son los amores como los que vuestra merced piensa -dijo el galeote-; que los míos fueron que quise tanto a una canasta de colar, atestada de ropa blanca, que la abracé conmigo tan fuertemente que, a no quitármela la justicia por fuerza, aún hasta agora no la hubiera dejado de mi voluntad. Fue en fragante, no hubo lugar de tormento; concluyóse la causa, acomodáronme las espaldas con ciento, y por añadidura tres precisos de gurapas, y acabóse la obra.

-¿Qué son gurapas? -preguntó don Quijote.

-Gurapas son galeras -respondió el galeote.

El cual era un mozo de hasta edad de veinte y cuatro años, y dijo que era natural de Piedrahíta. Lo mismo preguntó don Quijote al segundo, el cual no respondió palabra, según iba de triste y malencónico; mas respondió por él el primero, y dijo:

-Éste, señor, va por canario; digo, por músico y cantor.

-Pues, ¿cómo -repitió don Quijote-, por músicos y cantores van también a galeras?

-Sí, señor -respondió el galeote-, que no hay peor cosa que cantar en el ansia.

-Antes, he yo oído decir -dijo don Quijote- que quien canta sus males espanta.

-Acá es al revés -dijo el galeote-, que quien canta una vez llora toda la vida.

-No lo entiendo -dijo don Quijote.

Mas una de las guardas le dijo:

-Señor caballero, cantar en el ansia se dice, entre esta gente non santa, confesar en el tormento. A este pecador le dieron tormento y confesó su delito, que era ser cuatrero, que es ser ladrón de bestias, y, por haber confesado, le condenaron por seis años a galeras, amén de docientos azotes que ya lleva en las espaldas. Y va siempre pensativo y triste, porque los demás ladrones que allá quedan y aquí van le maltratan y aniquilan, y escarnecen y tienen en poco, porque confesó y no tuvo ánimo de decir nones. Porque dicen ellos que tantas letras tiene un no como un sí, y que harta ventura tiene un delincuente, que está en su lengua su vida o su muerte, y no en la de los testigos y probanzas; y para mí tengo que no van muy fuera de camino.

-Y yo lo entiendo así -respondió don Quijote.

El cual, pasando al tercero, preguntó lo que a los otros; el cual, de presto y con mucho desenfado, respondió y dijo:

-Yo voy por cinco años a las señoras gurapas por faltarme diez ducados.

-Yo daré veinte de muy buena gana -dijo don Quijote-por libraros de esa pesadumbre.

-Eso me parece -respondió el galeote-como quien tiene dineros en mitad del golfo y se está muriendo de hambre, sin tener adonde comprar lo que ha menester. Dígolo porque si a su tiempo tuviera yo esos veinte ducados que vuestra merced ahora me ofrece, hubiera untado con ellos la péndola del escribano y avivado el ingenio del procurador, de manera que hoy me viera en mitad de la plaza de Zocodover, de Toledo, y no en este camino, atraillado como galgo; pero Dios es grande: paciencia y basta.

Pasó don Quijote al cuarto, que era un hombre de venerable rostro con una barba blanca que le pasaba del pecho; el cual, oyéndose preguntar la causa por que allí venía, comenzó a llorar y no respondió palabra; mas el quinto condenado le sirvió de lengua, y dijo:

-Este hombre honrado va por cuatro años a galeras, habiendo paseado las acostumbradas vestido en pompa y a caballo.

-Eso es -dijo Sancho Panza-, a lo que a mí me parece, haber salido a la vergüenza.

-Así es -replicó el galeote-; y la culpa por que le dieron esta pena es por haber sido corredor de oreja, y aun de todo el cuerpo. En efecto, quiero decir que este caballero va por alcahuete, y por tener asimesmo sus puntas y collar de hechicero.

-A no haberle añadido esas puntas y collar -dijo don Quijote-, por solamente el alcahuete limpio, no merecía él ir a bogar en las galeras, sino a mandallas y a ser general dellas; porque no es así comoquiera el oficio de alcahuete, que es oficio de discretos y necesárisimo en la república bien ordenada, y que no le debía ejercer sino gente muy bien nacida; y aun había de haber veedor y examinador de los tales, como le hay de los demás oficios, con número deputado y conocido, como corredores de lonja; y desta manera se escusarían muchos males que se causan por andar este oficio y ejercicio entre gente idiota y de poco entendimiento, como son mujercillas de poco más a menos, pajecillos y truhanes de pocos años y de poca experiencia, que, a la más necesaria ocasión y cuando es menester dar una traza que importe, se les yelan las migas entre la boca y la mano y no saben cuál es su mano derecha. Quisiera pasar adelante y dar las razones por que convenía hacer elección de los que en la república habían de tener tan necesario oficio, pero no es el lugar acomodado para ello: algún día lo diré a quien lo pueda proveer y remediar. Sólo digo ahora que la pena que me ha causado ver estas blancas canas y este rostro venerable en tanta fatiga, por alcahuete, me la ha quitado el adjunto de ser hechicero; aunque bien sé que no hay hechizos en el mundo que puedan mover y forzar la voluntad, como algunos simples piensan; que es libre nuestro albedrío, y no hay yerba ni encanto que le fuerce. Lo que suelen hacer algunas mujercillas simples y algunos embusteros bellacos es algunas misturas y venenos con que vuelven locos a los hombres, dando a entender que tienen fuerza para hacer querer bien, siendo, como digo, cosa imposible forzar la voluntad.

-Así es -dijo el buen viejo-, y, en verdad, señor, que en lo de hechicero que no tuve culpa; en lo de alcahuete, no lo pude negar. Pero nunca pensé que hacía mal en ello: que toda mi intención era que todo el mundo se holgase y viviese en paz y quietud, sin pendencias ni penas; pero no me aprovechó nada este buen deseo para dejar de ir adonde no espero volver, según me cargan los años y un mal de orina que llevo, que no me deja reposar un rato.

Y aquí tornó a su llanto, como de primero; y túvole Sancho tanta compasión, que sacó un real de a cuatro del seno y se le dio de limosna.

Pasó adelante don Quijote, y preguntó a otro su delito, el cual respondió con no menos, sino con mucha más gallardía que el pasado:

-Yo voy aquí porque me burlé demasiadamente con dos primas hermanas mías, y con otras dos hermanas que no lo eran mías; finalmente, tanto me burlé con todas, que resultó de la burla crecer la parentela, tan intrincadamente que no hay diablo que la declare. Probóseme todo, faltó favor, no tuve dineros, víame a pique de perder los tragaderos, sentenciáronme a galeras por seis años, consentí: castigo es de mi culpa; mozo soy: dure la vida, que con ella todo se alcanza. Si vuestra merced, señor caballero, lleva alguna cosa con que socorrer a estos pobretes, Dios se lo pagará en el cielo, y nosotros tendremos en la tierra cuidado de rogar a Dios en nuestras oraciones por la vida y salud de vuestra merced, que sea tan larga y tan buena como su buena presencia merece.

Éste iba en hábito de estudiante, y dijo una de las guardas que era muy grande hablador y muy gentil latino.

Tras todos éstos, venía un hombre de muy buen parecer, de edad de treinta años, sino que al mirar metía el un ojo en el otro un poco. Venía diferentemente atado que los demás, porque traía una cadena al pie, tan grande que se la liaba por todo el cuerpo, y dos argollas a la garganta, la una en la cadena, y la otra de las que llaman guardaamigo o piedeamigo, de la cual decendían dos hierros que llegaban a la cintura, en los cuales se asían dos esposas, donde llevaba las manos, cerradas con un grueso candado, de manera que ni con las manos podía llegar a la boca, ni podía bajar la cabeza a llegar a las manos. Preguntó don Quijote que cómo iba aquel hombre con tantas prisiones más que los otros. Respondióle la guarda porque tenía aquel solo más delitos que todos los otros juntos, y que era tan atrevido y tan grande bellaco que, aunque le llevaban de aquella manera, no iban seguros dél, sino que temían que se les había de huir.

-¿Qué delitos puede tener -dijo don Quijote-, si no han merecido más pena que echalle a las galeras?

-Va por diez años -replicó la guarda-, que es como muerte civil. No se quiera saber más, sino que este buen hombre es el famoso Ginés de Pasamonte, que por otro nombre llaman Ginesillo de Parapilla.

-Señor comisario -dijo entonces el galeote-, váyase poco a poco, y no andemos ahora a deslindar nombres y sobrenombres. Ginés me llamo y no Ginesillo, y Pasamonte es mi alcurnia, y no Parapilla, como voacé dice; y cada uno se dé una vuelta a la redonda, y no hará poco.

-Hable con menos tono -replicó el comisario-, señor ladrón de más de la marca, si no quiere que le haga callar, mal que le pese.

-Bien parece -respondió el galeote- que va el hombre como Dios es servido, pero algún día sabrá alguno si me llamo Ginesillo de Parapilla o no.

-Pues, ¿no te llaman así, embustero? -dijo la guarda.

-Sí llaman -respondió Ginés-, mas yo haré que no me lo llamen, o me las pelaría donde yo digo entre mis dientes. Señor caballero, si tiene algo que darnos, dénoslo ya, y vaya con Dios, que ya enfada con tanto querer saber vidas ajenas; y si la mía quiere saber, sepa que yo soy Ginés de Pasamonte, cuya vida está escrita por estos pulgares.

-Dice verdad -dijo el comisario-: que él mismo ha escrito su historia, que no hay más, y deja empeñado el libro en la cárcel en docientos reales.

-Y le pienso quitar -dijo Ginés-, si quedara en docientos ducados.

-¿Tan bueno es? -dijo don Quijote.

-Es tan bueno -respondió Ginés- que mal año para Lazarillo de Tormes y para todos cuantos de aquel género se han escrito o escribieren. Lo que le sé decir a voacé es que trata verdades, y que son verdades tan lindas y tan donosas que no pueden haber mentiras que se le igualen.

-¿Y cómo se intitula el libro? -preguntó don Quijote.

-La vida de Ginés de Pasamonte -respondió el mismo.

-¿Y está acabado? -preguntó don Quijote.

-¿Cómo puede estar acabado -respondió él-, si aún no está acabada mi vida? Lo que está escrito es desde mi nacimiento hasta el punto que esta última vez me han echado en galeras.

-Luego, ¿otra vez habéis estado en ellas? -dijo don Quijote.

-Para servir a Dios y al rey, otra vez he estado cuatro años, y ya sé a qué sabe el bizcocho y el corbacho -respondió Ginés-; y no me pesa mucho de ir a ellas, porque allí tendré lugar de acabar mi libro, que me quedan muchas cosas que decir, y en las galeras de España hay mas sosiego de aquel que sería menester, aunque no es menester mucho más para lo que yo tengo de escribir, porque me lo sé de coro.

-Hábil pareces -dijo don Quijote.

-Y desdichado -respondió Ginés-; porque siempre las desdichas persiguen al buen ingenio.

-Persiguen a los bellacos -dijo el comisario.

-Ya le he dicho, señor comisario -respondió Pasamonte-, que se vaya poco a poco, que aquellos señores no le dieron esa vara para que maltratase a los pobres que aquí vamos, sino para que nos guiase y llevase adonde Su Majestad manda. Si no, ¡por vida de...! ¡Basta!, que podría ser que saliesen algún día en la colada las manchas que se hicieron en la venta; y todo el mundo calle, y viva bien, y hable mejor y caminemos, que ya es mucho regodeo éste.

Alzó la vara en alto el comisario para dar a Pasamonte en respuesta de sus amenazas, mas don Quijote se puso en medio y le rogó que no le maltratase, pues no era mucho que quien llevaba tan atadas las manos tuviese algún tanto suelta la lengua. Y, volviéndose a todos los de la cadena, dijo:

-De todo cuanto me habéis dicho, hermanos carísimos, he sacado en limpio que, aunque os han castigado por vuestras culpas, las penas que vais a padecer no os dan mucho gusto, y que vais a ellas muy de mala gana y muy contra vuestra voluntad; y que podría ser que el poco ánimo que aquél tuvo en el tormento, la falta de dineros déste, el poco favor del otro y, finalmente, el torcido juicio del juez, hubiese sido causa de vuestra perdición y de no haber salido con la justicia que de vuestra parte teníades. Todo lo cual se me representa a mí ahora en la memoria de manera que me está diciendo, persuadiendo y aun forzando que muestre con vosotros el efeto para que el cielo me arrojó al mundo, y me hizo profesar en él la orden de caballería que profeso, y el voto que en ella hice de favorecer a los menesterosos y oprimidos de los mayores. Pero, porque sé que una de las partes de la prudencia es que lo que se puede hacer por bien no se haga por mal, quiero rogar a estos señores guardianes y comisario sean servidos de desataros y dejaros ir en paz, que no faltarán otros que sirvan al rey en mejores ocasiones; porque me parece duro caso hacer esclavos a los que Dios y naturaleza hizo libres. Cuanto más, señores guardas -añadió don Quijote-, que estos pobres no han cometido nada contra vosotros. Allá se lo haya cada uno con su pecado; Dios hay en el cielo, que no se descuida de castigar al malo ni de premiar al bueno, y no es bien que los hombres honrados sean verdugos de los otros hombres, no yéndoles nada en ello. Pido esto con esta mansedumbre y sosiego, porque tenga, si lo cumplís, algo que agradecereros; y, cuando de grado no lo hagáis, esta lanza y esta espada, con el valor de mi brazo, harán que lo hagáis por fuerza.

-¡Donosa majadería! -respondió el comisario-. ¡Bueno está el donaire con que ha salido a cabo de rato! ¡Los forzados del rey quiere que le dejemos, como si tuviéramos autoridad para soltarlos o él la tuviera para mandárnoslo! Váyase vuestra merced, señor, norabuena, su camino adelante, y enderécese ese bacín que trae en la cabeza, y no ande buscando tres pies al gato.

-¡Vos sois el gato, y el rato, y el bellaco! -respondió don Quijote.

Y, diciendo y haciendo, arremetió con él tan presto que, sin que tuviese lugar de ponerse en defensa, dio con él en el suelo, malherido de una lanzada; y avínole bien, que éste era el de la escopeta. Las demás guardas quedaron atónitas y suspensas del no esperado acontecimiento; pero, volviendo sobre sí, pusieron mano a sus espadas los de a caballo, y los de a pie a sus dardos, y arremetieron a don Quijote, que con mucho sosiego los aguardaba; y, sin duda, lo pasara mal si los galeotes, viendo la ocasión que se les ofrecía de alcanzar libertad, no la procuraran, procurando romper la cadena donde venían ensartados. Fue la revuelta de manera que las guardas, ya por acudir a los galeotes, que se desataban, ya por acometer a don Quijote, que los acometía, no hicieron cosa que fuese de provecho.

Ayudó Sancho, por su parte, a la soltura de Ginés de Pasamonte, que fue el primero que saltó en la campaña libre y desembarazado, y, arremetiendo al comisario caído, le quitó la espada y la escopeta, con la cual, apuntando al uno y señalando al otro, sin disparalla jamás, no quedó guarda en todo el campo, porque se fueron huyendo, así de la escopeta de Pasamonte como de las muchas pedradas que los ya sueltos galeotes les tiraban.

Entristeciósese mucho Sancho deste suceso, porque se le representó que los que iban huyendo habían de dar noticia del caso a la Santa Hermandad, la cual, a campana herida, saldría a buscar los delincuentes, y así se lo dijo a su amo, y le rogó que luego de allí se partiesen y se emboscasen en la sierra, que estaba cerca.

-Bien está eso -dijo don Quijote-, pero yo sé lo que ahora conviene que se haga.

Y, llamando a todos los galeotes, que andaban alborotados y habían despojado al comisario hasta dejarle en cueros, se le pusieron todos a la redonda para ver lo que les mandaba, y así les dijo:

-De gente bien nacida es agradecer los beneficios que reciben, y uno de los pecados que más a Dios ofende es la ingratitud. Dígolo porque ya habéis visto, señores, con manifiesta experiencia, el que de mí habéis recibido; en pago del cual querría, y es mi voluntad, que, cargados de esa cadena que quité de vuestros cuellos, luego os pongáis en camino y vais a la ciudad del Toboso, y allí os presentéis ante la señora Dulcinea del Toboso y le digáis que su caballero, el de la Triste Figura, se le envía a encomendar, y le contéis, punto por punto, todos los que ha tenido esta famosa aventura hasta ponerlos en la deseada libertad; y, hecho esto, os podréis ir donde quisiéredes a la buena ventura.

Respondió por todos Ginés de Pasamonte, y dijo:

-Lo que vuestra merced nos manda, señor y libertador nuestro, es imposible de toda imposibilidad cumplirlo, porque no podemos ir juntos por los caminos, sino solos y divididos, y cada uno por su parte, procurando meterse en las entrañas de la tierra, por no ser hallado de la Santa Hermandad, que, sin duda alguna, ha de salir en nuestra busca. Lo que vuestra merced puede hacer, y es justo que haga, es mudar ese servicio y montazgo de la señora Dulcinea del Toboso en alguna cantidad de avemarías y credos, que nosotros diremos por la intención de vuestra merced; y ésta es cosa que se podrá cumplir de noche y de día, huyendo o reposando, en paz o en guerra; pero pensar que hemos de volver ahora a las ollas de Egipto, digo, a tomar nuestra cadena y a ponernos en camino del Toboso, es pensar que es ahora de noche, que aún no son las diez del día, y es pedir a nosotros eso como pedir peras al olmo.

-Pues ¡voto a tal! -dijo don Quijote, ya puesto en cólera-, don hijo de la puta, don Ginesillo de Paropillo, o como os llamáis, que habéis de ir vos solo, rabo entre piernas, con toda la cadena a cuestas.

Pasamonte, que no era nada bien sufrido, estando ya enterado que don Quijote no era muy cuerdo, pues tal disparate había acometido como el de querer darles libertad, viéndose tratar de aquella manera, hizo del ojo a los compañeros, y, apartándose aparte, comenzaron a llover tantas piedras sobre don Quijote, que no se daba manos a cubrirse con la rodela; y el pobre de Rocinante no hacía más caso de la espuela que si fuera hecho de bronce. Sancho se puso tras su asno, y con él se defendía de la nube y pedrisco que sobre entrambos llovía. No se pudo escudar tan bien don Quijote que no le acertasen no sé cuántos guijarros en el cuerpo, con tanta fuerza que dieron con él en el suelo; y apenas hubo caído, cuando fue sobre él el estudiante y le quitó la bacía de la cabeza, y dióle con ella tres o cuatro golpes en las espaldas y otros tantos en la tierra, con que la hizo pedazos. Quitáronle una ropilla que traía sobre las armas, y las medias calzas le querían quitar si las grebas no lo estorbaran. A Sancho le quitaron el gabán, y, dejándole en pelota, repartiendo entre sí los demás despojos de la batalla, se fueron cada uno por su parte, con más cuidado de escaparse de la Hermandad, que temían, que de cargarse de la cadena e ir a presentarse ante la señora

Dulcinea del Toboso.

Solos quedaron jumento y Rocinante, Sancho y Don Quijote; el jumento, cabizbajo y pensativo, sacudiendo de cuando en cuando las orejas, pensando que aún no había cesado la borrasca de las piedras, que le perseguían los oídos; Rocinante, tendido junto a su amo, que también vino al suelo de otra pedrada; Sancho, en pelota y temeroso de la Santa Hermandad; don Quijote, mohinísimo de verse tan malparado por los mismos a quien tanto bien había hecho.

Capítulo XXIII

De lo que le aconteció al famoso don Quijote en Sierra Morena, que fue una de las más raras aventuras que en esta verdadera historia se cuentan

VIÉNDOSE tan malparado don Quijote, dijo a su escudero:

-Siempre, Sancho, lo he oído decir, que el hacer bien a villanos es echar agua en la mar. Si yo hubiera creído lo que me dijiste, yo hubiera escusado esta pesadumbre; pero ya está hecho: paciencia, y escarmentar para desde aquí adelante.

-Así escarmentará vuestra merced -respondió Sancho- como yo soy turco; pero, pues dice que si me hubiera creído se hubiera escusado este daño, créame ahora y escusará otro mayor; porque le hago saber que con la Santa Hermandad no hay usar de caballerías, que no se le da a ella por cuantos caballeros andantes hay dos maravedís; y sepa que ya me parece que sus saetas me zumban por los oídos.

-Naturalmente eres cobarde, Sancho -dijo don Quijote-, pero, porque no digas que soy contumaz y que jamás hago lo que me aconsejas, por esta vez quiero tomar tu consejo y apartarme de la furia que tanto temes; mas ha de ser con una condición: que jamás, en vida ni en muerte, has de decir a nadie que yo me retiré y aparté deste peligro de miedo, sino por complacer a tus ruegos; que si otra cosa dijeres, mentirás en ello, y desde ahora para entonces, y desde entonces para ahora, te desmiento, y digo que mientes y mentirás todas las veces que lo penses o lo dijeres. Y no me repliques más, que en sólo pensar que me aparto y retiro de algún peligro, especialmente déste, que parece que lleva algún es no es de sombra de miedo, estoy ya para quedarme, y para aguardar aquí solo, no solamente a la Santa Hermandad que dices y temes, sino a los hermanos de los doce tribus de Israel, y a los siete Macabeos, y a Cástor y a Pólux, y aun a todos los hermanos y hermandades que hay en el mundo.

-Señor -respondió Sancho-, que el retirar no es huir, ni el esperar es cordura, cuando el peligro sobrepuja a la esperanza, y de sabios es guardarse hoy para mañana y no aventurarse todo en un día. Y sepa que, aunque zafio y villano, todavía se me alcanza algo desto que llaman buen gobierno; así que, no se arrepienta de haber tomado mi consejo, sino suba en Rocinante, si puede, o si no yo le ayudaré, y sígame, que el caletre me dice que hemos menester ahora más los pies que las manos.

Subió don Quijote, sin replicarle más palabra, y, guiando Sancho sobre su asno, se entraron por una parte de Sierra Morena, que allí junto estaba, llevando Sancho intención de atravesarla toda e ir a salir al Viso, o a Almodóvar del Campo, y esconderse algunos días por aquellas asperezas, por no ser hallados si la Hermandad los buscara. Animóle a esto haber visto que de la refriega de los galeotes se había escapado libre la despensa que sobre su asno venía, cosa que la juzgó a milagro, según fue lo que llevaron y buscaron los galeotes. 1

Así como don Quijote entró por aquellas montañas, se le alegró el corazón, pareciéndole aquellos lugares acomodados para las aventuras que buscaba. Reducíansele a la memoria los maravillosos acaecimientos que en semejantes soledades y asperezas habían sucedido a caballeros andantes. Iba pensando en estas cosas, tan embebecido y trasportado en ellas que de ninguna otra se acordaba. Ni Sancho llevaba otro cuidado -después que le pareció que caminaba por parte segura-sino de satisfacer su estómago con los relieves que del despojo clerical habían quedado; y así, iba tras su amo sentado a la mujeriega sobre su jumento, sacando de un costal y embaulando en su panza; y no se le diera por hallar otra ventura, entretanto que iba de aquella manera, un ardite.

En esto, alzó los ojos y vio que su amo estaba parado, procurando con la punta del lanzón alzar no sé qué bulto que estaba caído en el suelo, por lo cual se dio prisa a llegar a ayudarle si fuese menester; y cuando llegó fue a tiempo que alzaba con la punta del lanzón un cojín y una maleta asida a él, medio podridos, o podridos del todo, y deshechos; mas, pesaba tanto, que fue necesario que Sancho se apease a tomarlos, y mandóle su amo que viese lo que en la maleta venía.

Hízolo con mucha presteza Sancho, y, aunque la maleta venía cerrada con una cadena y su candado, por lo roto y podrido della vio lo que en ella había, que eran cuatro camisas de delgada holanda y otras cosas de lienzo, no menos curiosas que limpias, y en un pañizuelo halló un buen montoncillo de escudos de oro; y, así como los vio, dijo:

-¡Bendito sea todo el cielo, que nos ha deparado una aventura que sea de provecho!

Y buscando más, halló un librito de memoria, ricamente guarnecido. Éste le pidió don Quijote, y mandóle que guardase el dinero y lo tomase para él. Besóle las manos Sancho por la merced, y, desvalijando a la valija de su lencería, la puso en el costal de la despensa. Todo lo cual visto por don Quijote, dijo:

-Paréceme, Sancho, y no es posible que sea otra cosa, que algún caminante descaminado debió de pasar por esta sierra, y, salteándole malandrines, le debieron de matar, y le trujeron a enterrar en esta tan escondida parte.

-No puede ser eso -respondió Sancho-, porque si fueran ladrones, no se dejaran aquí este dinero.

-Verdad dices -dijo don Quijote-, y así, no adivino ni doy en lo que esto pueda ser; mas, espérate: veremos si en este librito de memoria hay alguna cosa escrita por donde podamos rastrear y venir en conocimiento de lo que deseamos.

Abrióle, y lo primero que halló en él escrito, como en borrador, aunque de muy buena letra, fue un soneto, que, leyéndole alto porque Sancho también lo oyese, vio que decía desta manera:

O le falta al Amor conocimiento,
o le sobra crueldad, o no es mi pena
igual a la ocasión que me condena
al género más duro de tormento.

Pero si Amor es dios, es argumento 5 que nada ignora, y es razón muy buena que un dios no sea cruel. Pues, ¿quién ordena el terrible dolor que adoro y siento?

Si digo que sois vos, Fili, no acierto;
que tanto mal en tanto bien no cabe, 10

ni me viene del cielo esta ruina.

Presto habré de morir, que es lo más cierto;
que al mal de quien la causa no se sabe
milagro es acertar la medicina.

-Por esa trova -dijo Sancho-no se puede saber nada, si ya no es que por ese hilo que está ahí se saque el ovillo de todo.

-¿Qué hilo está aquí? -dijo don Quijote.

-Paréceme -dijo Sancho-que vuestra merced nombró ahí hilo.

-No dije sino Fili -respondió don Quijote-, y éste, sin duda, es el nombre de la dama de quien se queja el autor deste soneto; y a fe que debe de ser razonable poeta, o yo sé poco del arte.

-Luego, ¿también -dijo Sancho-se le entiende a vuestra merced de trovas?

-Y más de lo que tú piensas -respondió don Quijote-, y veráslo cuando lleves una carta, escrita en verso de arriba abajo, a mi señora Dulcinea del Toboso. Porque quiero que sepas, Sancho, que todos o los más caballeros andantes de la edad pasada eran grandes trovadores y grandes músicos; que estas dos habilidades, o gracias, por mejor decir, son anexas a los enamorados andantes. Verdad es que las coplas de los pasados caballeros tienen más de espíritu que de primor.

-Lea más vuestra merced -dijo Sancho-, que ya hallará algo que nos satisfaga.

Volvió la hoja don Quijote y dijo:

-Esto es prosa, y parece carta.

-¿Carta misiva, señor? -preguntó Sancho.

-En el principio no parece sino de amores -respondió don Quijote.

-Pues lea vuestra merced alto -dijo Sancho-, que gusto mucho destas cosas de amores.

-Que me place -dijo don Quijote.

Y, leyéndola alto, como Sancho se lo había rogado, vio que decía desta manera:

Tu falsa promesa y mi cierta desventura me llevan a parte donde antes volverán a tus oídos las nuevas de mi muerte que las razones de mis quejas. Desechásteme, ¡oh ingrata!, por quien tiene más, no por quien vale más que yo; mas si la virtud fuera riqueza que se estimara, no envidiara yo dichas ajenas ni llorara desdichas propias. Lo que levantó tu hermosura han derribado tus obras: por ella entendí que eras ángel, y por ellas conozco que eres mujer. Quédate en paz, causadora de mi guerra, y haga el cielo que los engaños de tu esposo estén siempre encubiertos, porque tú no quedes arrepentida de lo que heciste y yo no tome venganza de lo que no deseo.

Acabando de leer la carta, dijo don Quijote:

-Menos por ésta que por los versos se puede sacar más de que quien la escribió es algún desdeñado amante.

Y, hojeando casi todo el librito, halló otros versos y cartas, que algunos pudo leer y otros no; pero lo que todos contenían eran quejas, lamentos, desconfianzas, sabores y sinsabores, favores y desdenes, solenizados los unos y llorados los otros.

En tanto que don Quijote pasaba el libro, pasaba Sancho la maleta, sin dejar rincón en toda ella, ni en el cojín, que no buscara, escudriñase e inquiriese, ni costura que no deshiciese, ni vedija de lana que no escarmenase, porque no se quedase nada por diligencia ni mal recado: tal golosina habían despertado en él los hallados escudos, que pasaban de ciento. Y, aunque no halló mas de lo hallado, dio por bien empleados los vuelos de la manta, el vomitar del brebaje, las bendiciones de las estacas, las puñadas del arriero, la falta de las alforjas, el robo del gabán y toda la hambre, sed y cansancio que había pasado en servicio de su buen señor, pareciéndole que estaba más que rebién pagado con la merced recibida de la entrega del hallazgo.

Con gran deseo quedó el Caballero de la Triste Figura de saber quién fuese el dueño de la maleta, conjeturando, por el soneto y carta, por el dinero en oro y por las tan buenas camisas, que debía de ser de algún principal enamorado, a quien desdenes y malos tratamientos de su dama debían de haber conducido a algún desesperado término. Pero, como por aquel lugar inhabitable y escabroso no parecía persona alguna de quien poder informarse, no se curó de más que de pasar adelante, sin llevar otro camino que aquel que Rocinante quería, que era por donde él podía caminar, siempre con imaginación que no podía faltar por aquellas malezas alguna estraña aventura.

Yendo, pues, con este pensamiento, vio que, por cima de una montañuela que delante de los ojos se le ofrecía, iba saltando un hombre, de risco en risco y de mata en mata, con estraña ligereza. Figurósele que iba desnudo, la barba negra y espesa, los cabellos muchos y rabultados, los pies descalzos y las piernas sin cosa alguna; los muslos cubrían unos calzones, al parecer de terciopelo leonado, mas tan hechos pedazos que por muchas partes se le descubrían las carnes. Traía la cabeza descubierta, y, aunque pasó con la ligereza que se ha dicho, todas estas menudencias miró y notó el Caballero de la Triste Figura; y, aunque lo procuró, no pudo seguille, porque no era dado a la debilidad de Rocinante andar por aquellas asperezas, y más siendo él de suyo pisacorto y flemático. Luego imaginó don Quijote que aquél era el dueño del cojín y de la maleta, y propuso en sí de buscallo, aunque supiese andar un año por aquellas montañas hasta hallarle; y así, mandó a Sancho que se apease del asno y atajase por la una parte de la montaña, que él iría por la otra y podría ser que topasen, con esta diligencia, con aquel hombre que con tanta priesa se les había quitado de delante.

-No podré hacer eso -respondió Sancho-, porque, en apartándome de vuestra merced, luego es conmigo el miedo, que me asalta con mil géneros de sobresaltos y visiones. Y sírvale esto que digo de aviso, para que de aquí adelante no me aparte un dedo de su presencia.

-Así será -dijo el de la Triste Figura-, y yo estoy muy contento de que te quieras valer de mi ánimo, el cual no te ha de faltar, aunque te falte el ánima del cuerpo. Y vente ahora tras mí poco a poco, o como pudieres, y haz de los ojos lanternas; rodearemos esta serrezuela: quizá toparemos con aquel hombre que vimos, el cual, sin duda alguna, no es otro que el dueño de nuestro hallazgo.

A lo que Sancho respondió:

-Harto mejor sería no buscallo, porque si le hallamos y acaso fuese el dueño del dinero, claro está que lo tengo de restituir; y así, fuera mejor, sin hacer esta inútil diligencia, poseerlo yo con buena fe hasta que, por otra vía menos curiosa y diligente, pareciera su verdadero señor; y quizá fuera a tiempo que lo hubiera gastado, y entonces el rey me hacía franco.

-Engañaste en eso, Sancho -respondió don Quijote-; que, ya que hemos caído en sospecha de quién es el dueño, cuasi delante, estamos obligados a buscarle y volvérselos; y, cuando no le buscásemos, la vehemente sospecha que tenemos de que él lo sea nos pone ya en tanta culpa como si lo fuese. Así que, Sancho amigo, no te dé pena el buscallo, por la que a mí se me quitará si le hallo.

Y así, picó a Rocinante, y siguióle Sancho con su acostumbrado jumento; y, habiendo rodeado parte de la montaña, hallaron en un arroyo, caída, muerta y medio comida de perros y picada de grajos, una mula ensillada y enfrenada; todo lo cual confirmó en ellos más la sospecha de que aquel que huía era el dueño de la mula y del cojín.

Estándola mirando, oyeron un silbo como de pastor que guardaba ganado, y a deshora, a su siniestra mano, parecieron una buena cantidad de cabras, y tras ellas, por cima de la montaña, pareció el cabrero que las guardaba, que era un hombre anciano. Dióle voces don Quijote, y rogóle que bajase donde estaban. Él respondió a gritos que quién les había traído por aquel lugar, pocas o ningunas veces pisado sino de pies de cabras o de lobos y otras fieras que por allí andaban. Respondióle Sancho que bajase, que de todo le darían buena cuenta. Bajó el cabrero, y, en llegando adonde don Quijote estaba, dijo:

-Apostaré que está mirando la mula de alquiler que está muerta en esa hondonada. Pues a buena fe que ha ya seis meses que está en ese lugar. Díganme: ¿han topado por ahí a su dueño?

-No hemos topado a nadie -respondió don Quijote-, sino a un cojín y a una maletilla que no lejos deste lugar hallamos.

-También la hallé yo -respondió el cabrero-, mas nunca la quise alzar ni llegar a ella, temeroso de algún desmán y de que no me la pidiesen por de hurto; que es el diablo sutil, y debajo de los pies se levanta allombre cosa donde tropiece y caya, sin saber cómo ni cómo no.

-Eso mismo es lo que yo digo -respondió Sancho-: que también la hallé yo, y no quise llegar a ella con un tiro de piedra; allí la dejé y allí se queda como se estaba, que no quiero perro con cencerro.

-Decidme, buen hombre -dijo don Quijote-, ¿sabéis vos quién sea el dueño destas prendas?

-Lo que sabré yo decir -dijo el cabrero-es que «habrá al pie de seis meses, poco más a menos, que llegó a una majada de pastores, que estará como tres leguas deste lugar, un mancebo de gentil talle y apostura, caballero sobre esa misma mula que ahí está muerta, y con el mismo cojín y maleta que decís que hallastes y no tocastes. Preguntónos que cuál parte desta sierra era la más áspera y escondida; dijímosle que era esta donde ahora estamos; y es ansí la verdad, porque si entráis media legua más adentro, quizá no acertaréis a salir; y estoy maravillado de cómo habéis podido llegar aquí, porque no hay camino ni senda que a este lugar encamine. Digo, pues, que, en oyendo nuestra respuesta el mancebo, volvió las riendas y encaminó hacia el lugar donde le señalamos, dejándonos a todos contentos de su buen tallo, y admirados de su demanda y de la priesa con que le víamos caminar y volverse hacia la sierra; y desde entonces nunca más le vimos, hasta que desde allí a algunos días salió al camino a uno de nuestros pastores, y, sin decirle nada, se llegó a él y le dio muchas puñadas y coces, y luego se fue a la borrica del hato y le quitó cuanto pan y queso en ella traía; y, con extraña ligereza, hecho esto, se volvió a emboscar en la sierra. Como esto supimos algunos cabreros, le anduvimos a buscar casi dos días por lo más cerrado desta sierra, al cabo de los cuales le hallamos metido en el hueco de un grueso y valiente alcornoque. Salió a nosotros con mucha mansedumbre, ya roto el vestido, y el rostro disfigurado y tostado del sol, de tal suerte que apenas le conocíamos, sino que los vestidos, aunque rotos, con la noticia que dellos teníamos, nos dieron a entender que era el que buscábamos. Saludónos cortésmente, y en pocas y muy buenas razones nos dijo que no nos maravillásemos de verle andar de aquella suerte, porque así le convenía para cumplir cierta penitencia que por sus muchos pecados le había sido impuesta. Rogámosle que nos dijese quién era, mas nunca lo pudimos acabar con él. Pedímosle también que, cuando hubiese menester el sustento, sin el cual no podía pasar, nos dijese dónde le hallaríamos, porque con mucho amor y cuidado se lo llevaríamos; y que si esto tampoco fuese de su gusto, que, a lo menos, saliese a pedirlo, y no a quitarlo a los pastores. Agradeció nuestro ofrecimiento, pidió perdón de los asaltos pasados, y ofreció de pedillo de allí adelante por amor de Dios, sin dar molestia alguna a nadie. En cuanto lo que tocaba a la estancia de su habitación, dijo que no tenía otra que aquella que le ofrecía la ocasión donde le tomaba la noche; y acabó su plática con un tan tierno llanto, que bien fuéramos de piedra los que escuchado le habíamos, si en él no le acompañáramos, considerándole cómo le habíamos visto la vez primera, y cuál le veíamos entonces. Porque, como tengo dicho, era un muy gentil y agraciado mancebo, y en sus cortesías y concertadas razones mostraba ser bien nacido y muy cortesana persona; que, puesto que éramos rústicos los que le escuchábamos, su gentileza era tanta, que bastaba a darse a conocer a la misma rusticidad. Y, estando en lo mejor de su plática, paró y enmudecióse; clavó los ojos en el suelo por un buen espacio, en el cual todos estuvimos quedos y suspensos, esperando en qué había de parar aquel embelesamiento, con no poca lástima de verlo; porque, por lo que hacía de abrir los ojos, estar fijo mirando al suelo sin mover pestaña gran rato, y otras veces cerrarlos, apretando los labios y enarcando las cejas, fácilmente conocimos que algún accidente de locura le había sobrevenido. Mas él nos dio a entender presto ser verdad lo que pensábamos, porque se levantó con gran furia del suelo, donde se había echado, y arremetió con el primero que halló junto a sí, con tal denuedo y rabia que, si no se le quitáramos, le matara a puñadas y a bocados; y todo esto hacía diciendo: “¡Ah, fementido Fernando! ¡Aquí, aquí me pagarás la sinrazón que me heciste: estas manos te sacarán el corazón, donde albergan y tienen manida todas las maldades juntas, principalmente la fraude y el engaño!” Y a éstas añadía otras razones, que todas se encaminaban a decir mal de aquel Fernando y a tacharle de traidor y fementido. Quitámossele, pues, con no poca pesadumbre, y él, sin decir más palabra, se apartó de nosotros y se emboscó corriendo por entre estos jarales y malezas, de modo que nos imposibilitó el seguille. Por esto conjeturamos que la locura le venía a tiempos, y que alguno que se llamaba Fernando le debía de haber hecho alguna mala obra, tan pesada cuanto lo mostraba el término a que le había conducido. Todo lo cual se ha confirmado después acá con las veces, que han sido muchas, que él ha salido al camino, unas a pedir a los pastores le den de lo que llevan para comer y otras a quitárselo por fuerza; porque cuando está con el accidente de la locura, aunque los pastores se lo ofrezcan de buen grado, no lo admite, sino que lo toma a puñadas; y cuando está en su seso, lo pide por amor de Dios, cortés y comedidamente, y rinde por ello muchas gracias, y no con falta de lágrimas. Y en verdad os digo, señores -prosiguió el cabrero-, que ayer determinamos yo y cuatro zagales, los dos criados y los dos amigos míos, de buscarle hasta tanto que le hallemos, y, después de hallado, ya por fuerza ya por grado, le hemos de llevar a la villa de Almodóvar, que está de aquí ocho leguas, y allí le curaremos, si es que su mal tiene cura, o sabremos quién es cuando esté en sus seso, y si tiene parientes a quien dar noticia de su desgracia». Esto es, señores, lo que sabré deciros de lo que me habéis preguntado; y entended que el dueño de las prendas que hallastes es el mismo que vistes pasar con tanta ligereza como desnudez -que ya le había dicho don Quijote cómo había visto pasar aquel hombre saltando por la sierra.

El cual quedó admirado de lo que al cabrero había oído, y quedó con más deseo de saber quién era el desdichado loco; y propuso en sí lo mismo que ya tenía pensado: de buscallo por toda la montaña, sin dejar rincón ni cueva en ella que no mirase, hasta hallarle. Pero hízolo mejor la suerte de lo que él pensaba ni esperaba, porque en aquel mismo instante pareció, por entre una quebrada de una sierra que salía donde ellos estaban, el mancebo que buscaba, el cual venía hablando entre sí cosas que no podían ser entendidas de cerca, cuanto más de lejos. Su traje era cual se ha pintado, sólo que, llegando cerca, vio don Quijote que un colete hecho pedazos que sobre sí traía era de ámbar; por donde acabó de entender que persona que tales hábitos traía no debía de ser de ínfima calidad.

En llegando el mancebo a ellos, les saludó con una voz desentonada y bronca, pero con mucha cortesía. Don Quijote le volvió las saludes con no menos comedimiento, y, apeándose de Rocinante, con gentil continente y donaire, le fue a abrazar y le tuvo un buen espacio estrechamente entre sus brazos, como si de luengos tiempos le hubiera conocido. El otro, a quien podemos llamar el Roto de la Mala Figura -como a don Quijote el de la Triste-, después de haberse dejado abrazar, le apartó un poco de sí, y, puestas sus manos en los hombros de don Quijote, le estuvo mirando, como que quería ver si le conocía; no menos admirado quizá de ver la figura, talle y armas de don Quijote, que don Quijote lo estaba de verle a él. En resolución, el primero que habló después del abrazamiento fue el Roto, y dijo lo que se dirá adelante.

Capítulo XXIV

Donde se prosigue la aventura de la Sierra Morena

DICE la historia que era grandísima la atención con que don Quijote escuchaba al astroso Caballero de la Sierra, el cual, prosiguiendo su plática, dijo:

-Por cierto, señor, quienquiera que seáis, que yo no os conozco, yo os agradezco las muestras y la cortesía que conmigo habéis usado; y quisiera yo hallarme en términos que con más que la voluntad pudiera servir la que habéis mostrado tenerme en el buen acogimiento que me habéis hecho, mas no quiere mi suerte darme otra cosa con que corresponda a las buenas obras que me hacen, que buenos deseos de satisfacerlas.

-Los que yo tengo -respondió don Quijote-son de serviros; tanto, que tenía determinado de no salir destas sierras hasta hallaros y saber de vos si el dolor que en la estrañeza de vuestra vida mostráis tener se podía hallar algún género de remedio; y si fuera menester buscarle, buscarle con la diligencia posible. Y, cuando vuestra desventura fuera de aquellas que tienen cerradas las puertas a todo género de consuelo, pensaba ayudaros a llorarla y plañirla como mejor pudiera, que todavía es consuelo en las desgracias hallar quien se duela dellas. Y, si es que mi buen intento merece ser agradecido con algún género de cortesía, yo os suplico, señor, por la mucha que veo que en vos se encierra, y juntamente os conjuro por la cosa que en esta vida más habéis amado o amáis, que me digáis quién sois y la causa que os ha traído a vivir y a morir entre estas soledades como bruto animal, pues moráis entre ellos tan ajeno de vos mismo cual lo muestra vuestro traje y persona. Y juro -añadió don Quijote-, por la orden de caballería que recibí, aunque indigno y pecador, y por la profesión de caballero andante, que si en esto, señor, me complacéis, de serviros con las veras a que me obliga el ser quien soy: ora remediando vuestra desgracia, si tiene remedio, ora ayudándoos a llorarla, como os lo he prometido.

El Caballero del Bosque, que de tal manera oyó hablar al de la Triste Figura, no hacía sino mirarle, y remirarle y tornarle a mirar de arriba abajo; y, después que le hubo bien mirado, le dijo:

-Si tienen algo que darme a comer, por amor de Dios que me lo den; que, después de haber comido, yo haré todo lo que se me manda, en agradecimiento de tan buenos deseos como aquí se me han mostrado.

Luego sacaron, Sancho de su costal y el cabrero de su zurrón, con que satisfizo el Roto su hambre, comiendo lo que le dieron como persona atontada, tan aprieta que no daba espacio de un bocado al otro, pues antes los engullía que tragaba; y, en tanto que comía, ni él ni los que le miraban hablaban palabra. Como acabó de comer, les hizo de señas que le siguiesen, como lo hicieron, y él los llevó a un verde pradecillo que a la vuelta de una peña poco desviada de allí estaba. En llegando a él, se tendió en el suelo, encima de la yerba, y los demás hicieron lo mismo; y todo esto sin que ninguno hablase, hasta que el Roto, después de haberse acomodado en su asiento, dijo:

-Si gustáis, señores, que os diga en breves razones la inmensidad de mis desventuras, habéisme de prometer de que con ninguna pregunta, ni otra cosa, no interromperéis el hilo de mi triste historia; porque en el punto que lo hagáis, en ése se quedará lo que fuere contando.

Estas razones del Roto trujeron a la memoria a don Quijote el cuento que le había contado su escudero, cuando no acertó el número de las cabras que habían pasado el río y se quedó la historia pendiente. Pero, volviendo al Roto, prosiguió diciendo:

-Esta prevención que hago es porque querría pasar brevemente por el cuento de mis desgracias; que el traerlas a la memoria no me sirve de otra cosa que añadir otras de nuevo, y, mientras menos me preguntáredes, más presto acabaré yo de decillas, puesto que no dejaré por contar cosa alguna que sea de importancia para no satisfacer del todo a vuestro deseo.

Don Quijote se lo prometió, en nombre de los demás, y él, con este seguro, comenzó desta manera:

-«Mi nombre es Cardenio; mi patria, una ciudad de las mejores desta Andalucía; mi linaje, noble; mis padres, ricos; mi desventura, tanta que la deben de haber llorado mis padres y sentido mi linaje, sin poderla aliviar con su riqueza; que para remediar desdichas del cielo poco suelen valer los bienes de fortuna. Vivía en esta misma tierra un cielo, donde puso el amor toda la gloria que yo acertara a desearme: tal es la hermosura de Luscinda, doncella tan noble y tan rica como yo, pero de más ventura y de menos firmeza de la que a mis honrados pensamientos se debía. A esta Luscinda amé, quise y adoré desde mis tiernos y primeros años, y ella me quiso a mí con aquella sencillez y buen ánimo que su poca edad permitía. Sabían nuestros padres nuestros intentos, y no les pesaba dello, porque bien veían que, cuando pasaran adelante, no podían tener otro fin que el de casarnos, cosa que casi la concertaba la igualdad de nuestro linaje y riquezas. Creció la edad, y con ella el amor de entrambos, que al padre de Luscinda le pareció que por buenos respetos estaba obligado a negarme la entrada de su casa, casi imitando en esto a los padres de aquella Tisbe tan decantada de los poetas. Y fue esta negación añadir llama a llama y deseo a deseo, porque, aunque pusieron silencio a las lenguas, no le pudieron poner a las plumas, las cuales, con más libertad que las lenguas, suelen dar a entender a quien quieren lo que en el alma está encerrado; que muchas veces la presencia de la cosa amada turba y enmudece la intención más determinada y la lengua más atrevida. ¡Ay cielos, y cuántos billetes le escribí! ¡Cuán regaladas y honestas respuestas tuve! ¡Cuántas canciones compuse y cuántos enamorados versos, donde el alma declaraba y trasladaba sus sentimientos, pintaba sus encendidos deseos, entretenía sus memorias y recreaba su voluntad!

»En efeto, viéndome apurado, y que mi alma se consumía con el deseo de verla, determiné poner por obra y acabar en un punto lo que me pareció que más convenía para salir con mi deseado y merecido premio; y fue el pedírsela a su padre por legítima esposa, como lo hice; a lo que él me respondió que me agradecía la voluntad que mostraba de honralle, y de querer honrarme con prendas suyas, pero que, siendo mi padre vivo, a él tocaba de justo derecho hacer aquella demanda; porque, si no fuese con mucha voluntad y gusto suyo, no era Luscinde mujer para tomarse ni darse a hurto.

»Yo le agradecí su buen intento, pareciéndome que llevaba razón en lo que decía, y que mi padre vendría en ello como yo se lo dijese; y con este intento, luego en aquel mismo instante, fui a decirle a mi padre lo que deseaba. Y, al tiempo que entré en un aposento donde estaba, le hallé con una carta abierta en la mano, la cual, antes que yo le dijese palabra, me la dio y me dijo: “Por esa carta verás, Cardenio, la voluntad que el duque Ricardo tiene de hacerte merced”.» Este duque Ricardo, como ya vosotros, señores, debéis de saber, es un grande de España que tiene su estado en lo mejor desta Andalucía. «Tomé y leí la carta, la cual venía tan encarecida que a mí mismo me pareció mal si mi padre dejaba de cumplir lo que en ella se le pedía, que era que me enviase luego donde él estaba; que quería que fuese compañero, no criado, de su hijo el mayor, y que él tomaba a cargo el ponerme en estado que correspondiese a la estimación en que me tenía. Leí la carta y enmudecí leyéndola, y más cuando oí que mi padre me decía: “De aquí a dos días te partirás, Cardenio, a hacer la voluntad del duque; y da gracias a Dios que te va abriendo camino por donde alcances lo que yo sé que mereces”. Añadió a éstas otras razones de padre consejero.

»Llegóse el término de mi partida, hablé una noche a Luscinde, díjele todo lo que pasaba, y lo mesmo hice a su padre, suplicándole se entretuviese algunos días y dilatase el darle estado hasta que yo viese lo que Ricardo me quería. Él me lo prometió y ella me lo confirmó con mil juramentos y mil desmayos. Vine, en fin, donde el duque Ricardo estaba. Fui dél tan bien recebido y tratado, que desde luego comenzó la envidia a hacer su oficio, teniéndomela los criados antiguos, pareciéndoles que las muestras que el duque daba de hacerme merced habían de ser en perjuicio suyo. Pero el que más se holgó con mi ida fue un hijo segundo del duque, llamado Fernando, mozo gallardo, gentilhombre, liberal y enamorado, el cual, en poco tiempo, quiso que fuese tan su amigo, que daba que decir a todos; y, aunque el mayor me quería bien y me hacía merced, no llegó al extremo con que don Fernando me quería y trataba.

»Es, pues, el caso que, como entre los amigos no hay cosa secreta que no se comunique, y la privanza que yo tenía con don Fernando dejada de serlo por ser amistad, todos sus pensamientos me declaraba, especialmente uno enamorado, que le traía con un poco de desasosiego. Quería bien a una labradora, vasalla de su padre (y ella los tenía muy ricos), y era tan hermosa, recatada, discreta y honesta que nadie que la conocía se determinaba en cuál destas cosas tuviese más excelencia ni más se aventajase. Estas tan buenas partes de la hermosa labradora redujeron a tal término los deseos de don Fernando, que se determinó, para poder alcanzarlo y conquistar la entereza de la labradora, darle palabra de ser su esposo, porque de otra manera era procurar lo imposible. Yo, obligado de su amistad, con las mejores razones que supe y con los más vivos ejemplos que pude, procuré estorbarle y apartarle de tal propósito. Pero, viendo que no aprovechaba, determiné de decirle el caso al duque Ricardo, su padre. Mas don Fernando, como astuto y discreto, se receló y temió desto, por parecerle que estaba yo obligado, en vez de buen criado, no tener encubierta cosa que tan en perjuicio de la honra de mi señor el duque venía; y así, por divertirme y engañarme, me dijo que no hallaba otro mejor remedio para poder apartar de la memoria la hermosura que tan sujeto le tenía, que el ausentarse por algunos meses; y que quería que el ausencia fuese que los dos nos viniésemos en casa de mi padre, con ocasión que darían al duque que venía a ver y a feriar unos muy buenos caballos que en mi ciudad había, que es madre de los mejores del mundo.

»Apenas le oí yo decir esto, cuando, movido de mi afición, aunque su determinación no fuera tan buena, la aprobara yo por una de las más acertadas que se podían imaginar, por ver cuán buena ocasión y coyuntura se me ofrecía de volver a ver a mi Luscinda. Con este pensamiento y deseo, aprobé su parecer y esforcé su propósito, diciéndole que lo pusiese por obra con la brevedad posible, porque, en efeto, la ausencia hacía su oficio, a pesar de los más firmes pensamientos. Ya cuando él me vino a decir esto, según después se supo, había gozado a la labradora con título de esposo, y esperaba ocasión de descubrirse a su salvo, temeroso de lo que el duque su padre haría cuando supiese su disparate.

»Sucedió, pues, que, como el amor en los mozos, por la mayor parte, no lo es, sino apetito, el cual, como tiene por último fin el deleite, en llegando a alcanzarle se acaba y ha de volver atrás aquello que parecía amor, porque no puede pasar adelante del término que le puso naturaleza, el cual término no le

puso a lo que es verdadero amor...; quiero decir que, así como don Fernando gozó a la labradora, se le aplacaron sus deseos y se resfriaron sus ahíncos; y si primero fingía quererse ausentar, por remediarlos, ahora de veras procuraba irse, por no ponerlos en ejecución. Diole el duque licencia, y mandóme que le acompañase. Venimos a mi ciudad, recibióle mi padre como quien era; vi yo luego a Luscinda, tornaron a vivir, aunque no habían estado muertos ni amortiguados, mis deseos, de los cuales di cuenta, por mi mal, a don Fernando, por parecerme que, en la ley de la mucha amistad que mostraba, no le debía encubrir nada. Alabéle la hermosura, donaire y discreción de Luscinda de tal manera, que mis alabanzas movieron en él los deseos de querer ver doncella de tantas buenas partes adornada. Cumplíselos yo, por mi corta suerte, enseñándosela una noche, a la luz de una vela, por una ventana por donde los dos solíamos hablarnos. Viola en sayo, tal, que todas las bellezas hasta entonces por él vistas las puso en olvido. Enmudeció, perdió el sentido, quedó absorto y, finalmente, tan enamorado cual lo veréis en el discurso del cuento de mi desventura. Y, para encenderle más el deseo, que a mí me celaba y al cielo a solas descubría, quiso la fortuna que hallase un día un billete suyo pidiéndome que la pidiese a su padre por esposa, tan discreto, tan honesto y tan enamorado que, en leyéndolo, me dijo que en sola Luscinda se encerraban todas las gracias de hermosura y de entendimiento que en las demás mujeres del mundo estaban repartidas.

»Bien es verdad que quiero confesar ahora que, puesto que yo veía con cuán justas causas don Fernando a Luscinda alababa, me pesaba de oír aquellas alabanzas de su boca, y comencé a temer y a recelarme dél, porque no se pasaba momento donde no quisiese que tratásemos de Luscinda, y él movía la plática, aunque la trujese por los cabellos; cosa que despertaba en mí un no sé qué de celos, no porque yo temiese revés alguno de la bondad y de la fe de Luscinda, pero, con todo eso, me hacía temer mi suerte lo mesmo que ella me aseguraba. Procuraba siempre don Fernando leer los papeles que yo a Luscinda enviaba y los que ella me respondía, a título que de la discreción de los dos gustaba mucho. Acaeció, pues, que, habiéndome pedido Luscinda un libro de caballerías en que leer, de quien era ella muy aficionada, que era el de Amadís de Gaula...»

No hubo bien oído don Quijote nombrar libro de caballerías, cuando dijo:

-Con que me dijera vuestra merced, al principio de su historia, que su merced de la señora Luscinda era aficionada a libros de caballerías, no fuera menester otra exageración para darme a entender la alteza de su entendimiento, porque no le tuviera tan bueno como vos, señor, le habéis pintado, si careciera del gusto de tan sabrosa leyenda: así que, para conmigo, no es menester gastar más palabras en declararme su hermosura, valor y entendimiento; que, con sólo haber

entendido su afición, la confirmo por la más hermosa y más discreta mujer del mundo. Y quisiera yo, señor, que vuestra merced le hubiera enviado junto con Amadís de Gaula al bueno de Don Rugel de Grecia, que yo sé que gustara la señora Luscinda mucho de Daraida y Geraya, y de las discreciones del pastor Darinel y de aquellos admirables versos de sus bucólicas, cantadas y representadas por él con todo donaire, discreción y desenvoltura. Pero tiempo podrá venir en que se enmiende esa falta, y no dura más en hacerse la enmienda de cuanto quiera vuestra merced ser servido de venirse conmigo a mi aldea, que allí le podré dar más de trecientos libros, que son el regalo de mi alma y el entretenimiento de mi vida; aunque tengo para mí que ya no tengo ninguno, merced a la malicia de malos y envidiosos encantadores. Y perdóneme vuestra merced el haber contravenido a lo que prometimos de no interrumpir su plática, pues, en oyendo cosas de caballerías y de caballeros andantes, así es en mi mano dejar de hablar en ellos, como lo es en la de los rayos del sol dejar de calentar, ni humedecer en los de la luna. Así que, perdón y proseguir, que es lo que ahora hace más al caso.

En tanto que don Quijote estaba diciendo lo que queda dicho, se le había caído a Cardenio la cabeza sobre el pecho, dando muestras de estar profundamente pensativo. Y, puesto que dos veces le dijo don Quijote que prosiguiese su historia, ni alzaba la cabeza ni respondía palabra; pero, al cabo de un buen espacio, la levantó y dijo:

-No se me puede quitar del pensamiento, ni habrá quien me lo quite en el mundo, ni quien me dé a entender otra cosa (y sería un majadero el que lo contrario entendiese o creyese), sino que aquel bellaconazo del maestro Elisabat estaba amancebado con la reina Madésima.

-Eso no, ¡voto a tal! -respondió con mucha cólera don Quijote (y arrojóle, como tenía de costumbre)-; y ésa es una muy gran malicia, o bellaquería, por mejor decir: la reina Madásima fue muy principal señora, y no se ha de presumir que tan alta princesa se había de amancebar con un sacapotras; y quien lo contrario entendiere, miente como muy gran bellaco. Y yo se lo daré a entender, a pie o a caballo, armado o desarmado, de noche o de día, o como más gusto le diere.

Estáble mirando Cardenio muy atentamente, al cual ya había venido el accidente de su locura y no estaba para proseguir su historia; ni tampoco don Quijote se la oyera, según le había disgustado lo que de Madásima le había oído. ¡Estraño caso; que así volvió por ella como si verdaderamente fuera su verdadera y natural señora: tal le tenían sus descomulgados libros! Digo, pues, que, como ya Cardenio estaba loco y se oyó tratar de mentís y de bellaco, con otros denuestos semejantes, parecióle mal la burla, y alzó un guijarro que halló junto a sí, y dio con él en los pechos tal golpe a don Quijote que le hizo caer de espaldas. Sancho Panza, que de tal modo vio parar a su señor, arremetió al loco con el puño cerrado; y el Roto le recibió de tal suerte que con una puñada dio con él a sus pies, y luego se subió sobre él y le brumó las costillas muy a su sabor. El cabrero, que le quiso defender, corrió el mismo peligro. Y, después que los tuvo a todos rendidos y molidos, los dejó y se fue, con gentil sosiego, a emboscarse en la montaña.

Levantóse Sancho, y, con la rabia que tenía de verse aporreado tan sin merecerlo, acudió a tomar la venganza del cabrero, diciéndole que él tenía la culpa de no haberles avisado que a aquel hombre le tomaba a tiempos la locura; que, si esto supieran, hubieran estado sobre aviso para poderse guardar. Respondió el cabrero que ya lo había dicho, y que si él no lo había oído, que no era suya la culpa. Replicó Sancho Panza, y tornó a replicar el cabrero, y fue el fin de las réplicas asirse de las barbas y darse tales puñadas que, si don Quijote no los pusiera en paz, se hicieran pedazos. Decía Sancho, asido con el cabrero:

-Déjeme vuestra merced, señor Caballero de la Triste Figura, que en éste, que es villano como yo y no está armado caballero, bien puedo a mi salvo satisfacerme del agravio que me ha hecho, peleando con él mano a mano, como hombre honrado.

-Así es -dijo don Quijote-, pero yo sé que él no tiene ninguna culpa de lo sucedido.

Con esto los apaciguó, y don Quijote volvió a preguntar al cabrero si sería posible hallar a Cardenio, porque quedaba con grandísimo deseo de saber el fin de su historia. Díjole el cabrero lo que primero le había dicho, que era no saber de cierto su manida; pero que, si anduviese mucho por aquellos contornos, no dejaría de hallarle, o cuerdo o loco.

Capítulo XXV

Que trata de las estrañas cosas que en Sierra Morena sucedieron al valiente caballero de la Mancha, y de la imitación que hizo a la penitencia de Beltenebros

DESPIDIÓSE del cabrero don Quijote, y, subiendo otra vez sobre Rocinante, mandó a Sancho que le siguiese, el cual lo hizo, con su jumento, de muy mala gana. Íbanse poco a poco entrando en lo más áspero de la montaña, y Sancho iba muerto por razonar con su amo, y deseaba que él comenzase la plática, por no contravenir a lo que le tenía mandado; mas, no pudiendo sufrir tanto silencio, le dijo:

-Señor don Quijote, vuestra merced me eche su bendición y me dé licencia; que desde aquí me quiero volver a mi casa, y a mi mujer y a mis hijos, con los cuales, por lo menos, hablaré y departiré todo lo que quisiere; porque querer vuestra merced que vaya con él por estas soledades, de día y de noche, y que no le hable cuando me diere gusto es enterrarme en vida. Si ya quisiera la suerte que los animales hablaran, como hablaban en tiempos de Guisopete, fuera menos mal, porque departiera yo con mi jumento lo que me viniera en gana, y con esto pasara mi mala ventura; que es recia cosa, y que no se puede llevar en paciencia, andar buscando aventuras toda la vida y no hallar sino coces y manteamientos, ladrillazos y puñadas, y, con todo esto, nos hemos de coser la boca, sin osar decir lo que el hombre tiene en su corazón, como si fuera mudo.

-Ya te entiendo, Sancho -respondió don Quijote-: tú mueres porque te alce el entredicho que te tengo puesto en la lengua. Dale por alzado y di lo que quisieres, con condición que no ha de durar este alzamiento más de en cuanto anduviéremos por estas sierras.

-Sea así -dijo Sancho-: hable yo ahora, que después Dios sabe lo que será; y, comenzando a gozar de ese salvoconduto, digo que ¿qué le iba a vuestra merced en volver tanto por aquella reina Magimasa, o como se llama? O, ¿qué hacía al caso que aquel abad fuese su amigo o no? Que, si vuestra merced pasara con ello, pues no era su juez, bien creo yo que el loco pasara adelante con su historia, y se hubieran ahorrado el golpe del guijarro, y las coces, y aun más de seis torniscones.

-A fe, Sancho -respondió don Quijote-, que si tú supieras, como yo lo sé, cuán honrada y cuán principal señora era la reina Madásima, yo sé que dijeras que tuve mucha paciencia, pues no quebré la boca por donde tales blasfemias salieron; porque es muy gran blasfemia decir ni pensar que una reina esté amancebada con un cirujano. La verdad del cuento es que aquel maestro Elisabat, que el loco dijo, fue un hombre muy prudente y de muy sanos consejos, y sirvió de ayo y de médico a la reina; pero pensar que ella era su amiga es disparate digno de muy gran castigo. Y, porque veas que Cardenio no supo lo que dijo, has de advertir que cuando lo dijo ya estaba sin juicio.

-Eso digo yo -dijo Sancho-: que no había para qué hacer cuenta de las palabras de un loco, porque si la buena suerte no ayudara a vuestra merced y encaminara el guijarro a la cabeza, como le encaminó al pecho, buenos quedáramos por haber vuelto por aquella mi señora, que Dios cohonda. Pues ¡montas, que no se librara Cardenio por loco!

-Contra cuerdos y contra locos está obligado cualquier caballero andante a volver por la honra de las mujeres, cualesquiera que sean, cuanto más por las reinas de tan alta guisa y pro como fue la reina Madásima, a quien yo tengo particular afición por sus buenas partes; porque, fuera de haber sido hermosa, además fue muy prudente y muy sufrida en sus calamidades, que las tuvo muchas; y los consejos y compañía del maestro Elisabat le fue y le fueron de mucho provecho y alivio para poder llevar sus trabajos con prudencia y paciencia. Y de aquí tomó ocasión el vulgo ignorante y mal intencionado de decir y pensar que ella era su manceba; y mienten, digo otra vez, y mentirán otras docientas, todos los que tal pensaren y dijeren.

-Ni yo lo digo ni lo pienso -respondió Sancho-: allá se lo hayan; con su pan se lo coman. Si fueron amancebados, o no, a Dios habrán dado la cuenta. De mis viñas vengo, no sé nada; no soy amigo de saber vidas ajenas; que el que compra y miente, en su bolsa lo siente. Cuanto más, que desnudo nací, desnudo me hallo: ni pierdo ni gano; mas que lo fuesen, ¿qué me va a mí? Y muchos piensan que hay tocinos y no hay estacas. Mas, ¿quién puede poner puertas al campo? Cuanto más, que de Dios dijeron.

-¡Válame Dios -dijo don Quijote-, y qué de necedades vas, Sancho, ensartando! ¿Qué va de lo que tratamos a los refranes que enhilas? Por tu vida, Sancho, que calles; y de aquí adelante, entremétete en espolear a tu asno, y deja de hacello en lo que no te importa. Y entiende con todos tus cinco sentidos que todo cuanto yo he hecho, hago e hiciere, va muy puesto en razón y muy conforme a las reglas de caballería, que las sé mejor que cuantos caballeros las profesaron en el mundo.

-Señor -respondió Sancho-, y ¿es buena regla de caballería que andemos perdidos por estas montañas, sin senda ni camino, buscando a un loco, el cual, después de hallado, quizá le vendrá en voluntad de acabar lo que dejó comenzado, no de su cuento, sino de la cabeza de vuestra merced y de mis costillas, acabándonoslas de romper de todo punto?

-Calla, te digo otra vez, Sancho -dijo don Quijote-; porque te hago saber que no sólo me trae por estas partes el deseo de hallar al loco, cuanto el que tengo de hacer en ellas una hazaña con que he de ganar perpetuo nombre y fama en todo lo descubierto de la tierra; y será tal, que he de echar con ella el sello a todo aquello que puede hacer perfecto y famoso a un andante caballero.

-Y ¿es de muy gran peligro esa hazaña? -preguntó Sancho Panza.

-No -respondió el de la Triste Figura-, puesto que de tal manera podía correr el dado, que echásemos azar en lugar de encuentro; pero todo ha de estar en tu diligencia.

-¿En mi diligencia? -dijo Sancho.

-Sí -dijo don Quijote-, porque si vuelves presto de adonde pienso enviarte, presto se acabará mi pena y presto comenzará mi gloria. Y, porque no es bien que te tenga más suspenso, esperando en lo que han de parar mis razones, quiero, Sancho, que sepas que el famoso Amadís de Gaula fue uno de los más perfectos caballeros andantes. No he dicho bien fue uno: fue el solo, el primero, el único, el señor de todos cuantos hubo en su tiempo en el mundo. Mal año y mal mes para don Belianís y para todos aquellos que dijeron que se le igualó en algo, porque se engañan, juro cierto. Digo asimismo que, cuando algún pintor quiere salir famoso en su arte, procura imitar los originales de los más únicos pintores que sabe; y esta misma regla corre por todos los más oficios o ejercicios de cuenta que sirven para adorno de las repúblicas. Y así lo ha de hacer y hace el que quiere alcanzar nombre de prudente y sufrido, imitando a Ulises, en cuya persona y trabajos nos pinta Homero un retrato vivo de prudencia y de sufrimiento; como también nos mostró Virgilio, en persona de Eneas, el valor de un hijo piadoso y la sagacidad de un valiente y entendido capitán, no pintándolo ni descubriéndolo como ellos fueron, sino como habían de ser, para quedar ejemplo a los venideros hombres de sus virtudes. Desta misma suerte, Amadís fue el norte, el lucero, el sol de los valientes y enamorados caballeros, a quien debemos de imitar todos aquellos que debajo de la bandera de amor y de la caballería militamos. Siendo, pues, esto así, como lo es, hallo yo, Sancho amigo, que el caballero andante que más le imitare estará más cerca de alcanzar la perfección de la caballería. Y una de las cosas en que más este caballero mostró su prudencia, valor, valentía, sufrimiento, firmeza y amor, fue cuando se retiró, desdeñado de la señora Oriana, a hacer penitencia en la Peña Pobre, mudado su nombre en el de Beltenebros, nombre, por cierto, significativo y propio para la vida que él de su voluntad había escogido. Así que, me es a mí más fácil imitarle en esto que no en hender gigantes, descabezar serpientes, matar endriagos, desbaratar ejércitos, fracasar armadas y deshacer encantamientos. Y, pues estos lugares son tan acomodados para semejantes efectos, no hay para qué se deje pasar la ocasión, que ahora con tanta comodidad me ofrece sus guedejas.

-En efecto -dijo Sancho-, ¿qué es lo que vuestra merced quiere hacer en este tan remoto lugar?

-¿Ya no te he dicho -respondió don Quijote-que quiero imitar a Amadís, haciendo aquí del desesperado, del sandio y del furioso, por imitar juntamente al valiente don Roldán, cuando halló en una fuente las señales de que Angélica la Bella había cometido vileza con Medoro, de cuya pesadumbre se volvió loco y arrancó los árboles, enturbió las aguas de las claras fuentes, mató pastores, destruyó ganados, abrasó chozas, derribó casas, arrastró yeguas y hizo otras cien mil insolencias, dignas de eterno nombre y escritura? Y, puesto que yo no pienso imitar a Roldán, o Orlando, o Rotolando (que todos estos tres nombres tenía), parte por parte en todas las locuras que hizo, dijo y pensó, haré el bosquejo, como mejor pudiere, en las que me pareciere ser más esenciales. Y podrá ser que viniese a contentarme con sola la imitación de Amadís, que sin hacer locuras de daño, sino de lloros y sentimientos, alcanzó tanta fama como el que más.

-Paréceme a mí -dijo Sancho-que los caballeros que lo tal hicieron fueron provocados y tuvieron causa para hacer esas necedades y penitencias, pero vuestra merced, ¿qué causa tiene para volverse loco? ¿Qué dama le ha desdeñado, o qué señales ha hallado que le den a entender que la señora Dulcinea del Toboso ha hecho alguna niñería con moro o cristiano?

-Ahí está el punto -respondió don Quijote-y ésa es la fineza de mi negocio; que volverse loco un caballero andante con causa, ni grado ni gracias: el toque está desatinar sin ocasión y dar a entender a mi dama que si en seco hago esto, ¿qué hiciera en mojado? Cuanto más, que harta ocasión tengo en la larga ausencia que he hecho de la siempre señora mía Dulcinea del Toboso; que, como ya oíste decir a aquel pastor de marras, Ambrosio: quien está ausente todos los males tiene y teme. Así que, Sancho amigo, no gastes tiempo en aconsejarme que deje tan rara, tan felice y tan no vista imitación. Loco soy, loco he de ser hasta tanto que tú vuelvas con la respuesta de una carta que contigo pienso enviar a mi señora Dulcinea; y si fuere tal cual a mi fe se le debe, acabarse ha mi sandez y mi penitencia; y si fuere al contrario, seré loco de veras, y, siéndolo, no sentiré nada. Ansí que, de cualquiera manera que responda, saldré del conflicto y trabajo en que me dejares, gozando el bien que me trujeres, por cuerdo, o no sintiendo el mal que me aportares, por loco. Pero dime, Sancho, ¿traes bien guardado el yelmo de Mambrino?; que ya vi que le alzaste del suelo cuando aquel desagradecido le quiso hacer pedazos; pero no pudo, donde se puede echar de ver la fineza de su temple.

A lo cual respondió Sancho:

-Vive Dios, señor Caballero de la Triste Figura, que no puedo sufrir ni llevar en paciencia algunas cosas que vuestra merced dice, y que por ellas vengo a imaginar que todo cuanto me dice de caballerías y de alcanzar reinos e imperios, de dar ínsulas y de hacer otras mercedes y grandezas, como es uso de caballeros andantes, que todo debe de ser cosa de viento y mentira, y todo pastraña, o patraña, o como lo llamáremos. Porque quien oyere decir a vuestra merced que una bacía de barbero es el yelmo de Mambrino, y que no salga de este error en más de cuatro días, ¿qué ha de pensar, sino que quien tal dice y afirma debe de tener güero el juicio? La bacía yo la llevo en el costal, toda abollada, y llévola para aderezarla en mi casa y hacerme la barba en ella, si Dios me diere tanta gracia que algún día me vea con mi mujer y hijos.

-Mira, Sancho, por el mismo que denantes juraste, te juro -dijo don Quijote- que tienes el más corto entendimiento que tiene ni tuvo escudero en el mundo. ¿Que es posible que en cuanto ha que andas conmigo no has echado de ver que todas las cosas de los caballeros andantes parecen quimeras, necedades y desatinos, y que son todas hechas al revés? Y no porque sea ello así, sino porque andan entre nosotros siempre una caterva de encantadores que todas nuestras cosas mudan y truecan y les vuelven según su gusto, y según tienen la gana de favorecernos o destruirnos; y así, eso que a ti te parece bacía de barbero, me parece a mí el yelmo de Mambrino, y a otro le parecerá otra cosa. Y fue rara providencia del sabio que es de mi parte hacer que parezca bacía a todos lo que real y verdaderamente es yelmo de Mambrino, a causa que, siendo él de tanta estima, todo el mundo me perseguirá por quitármele; pero, como ven que no es más de un bacín de barbero, no se curan de procuralle, como se mostró bien en el que quiso rompelle y le dejó en el suelo sin llevarle; que a fe que si le conociera, que nunca él le dejara. Guárdale, amigo, que por ahora no le he menester; que antes me tengo de quitar todas estas armas y quedar desnudo como cuando nací, si es que me da en voluntad de seguir en mi penitencia más a Roldán que a Amadís.

Llegaron, en estas pláticas, al pie de una alta montaña que, casi como peñón tajado, estaba sola entre otras muchas que la rodeaban. Corría por su falda un manso arroyuelo, y hacíaase por toda su redondez un prado tan verde y vicioso, que daba contento a los ojos que le miraban. Había por allí muchos árboles silvestres y algunas plantas y flores, que hacían el lugar apacible. Este sitio escogió el Caballero de la Triste Figura para hacer su penitencia; y así, en viéndole, comenzó a decir en voz alta, como si estuviera sin juicio:

-Éste es el lugar, ¡oh cielos!, que diputo y escojo para llorar la desventura en que vosotros mismos me habéis puesto. Éste es el sitio donde el humor de mis

ojos acrecentará las aguas deste pequeño arroyo, y mis continos y profundos sospiros moverán a la continua las hojas destos montaraces árboles, en testimonio y señal de la pena que mi asendereado corazón padece. ¡Oh vosotros, quienquiera que seáis, rústicos dioses que en este inhabitable lugar tenéis vuestra morada, oíd las quejas deste desdichado amante, a quien una luenga ausencia y unos imaginados celos han traído a lamentarse entre estas asperezas, y a quejarse de la dura condición de aquella ingrata y bella, término y fin de toda humana hermosura! ¡Oh vosotras, napeas y dríadas, que tenéis por costumbre de habitar en las espesuras de los montes, así los ligeros y lascivos sátiros, de quien sois, aunque en vano, amadas, no perturben jamás vuestro dulce sosiego, que me ayudéis a lamentar mi desventura, o, a lo menos, no os canséis de oílla! ¡Oh Dulcinea del Toboso, día de mi noche, gloria de mi pena, norte de mis caminos, estrella de mi ventura, así el cielo te la dé buena en cuanto acertares a pedirle, que consideres el lugar y el estado a que tu ausencia me ha conducido, y que con buen término correspondas al que a mi fe se le debe! ¡Oh solitarios árboles, que desde hoy en adelante habéis de hacer compañía a mi soledad, dad indicio, con el blando movimiento de vuestras ramas, que no os desagrade mi presencia! ¡Oh tú, escudero mío, agradable compañero en más prósperos y adversos sucesos, toma bien en la memoria lo que aquí me verás hacer, para que lo cuentes y recetes a la causa total de todo ello!

Y, diciendo esto, se apeó de Rocinante, y en un momento le quitó el freno y la silla; y, dándole una palmada en las ancas, le dijo:

-Libertad te da el que sin ella queda, ¡oh caballo tan estremado por tus obras cuan desdichado por tu suerte! Vete por do quisieres, que en la frente llevas escrito que no te igualó en ligereza el Hipogrifo de Astolfo, ni el nombrado Frontino, que tan caro le costó a Bradamante.

Viendo esto Sancho, dijo:

-Bien haya quien nos quitó ahora del trabajo de desenalbardar al rucio; que a fe que no faltaran palmadicas que dalle, ni cosas que decille en su alabanza; pero si él aquí estuviera, no consintiera yo que nadie le desalbardara, pues no había para qué, que a él no le tocaban las generales de enamorado ni de desesperado, pues no lo estaba su amo, que era yo, cuando Dios quería. Y en verdad, señor Caballero de la Triste Figura, que si es que mi partida y su locura de vuestra merced va de veras, que será bien tornar a ensillar a Rocinante, para que supla la falta del rucio, porque será ahorrar tiempo a mi ida y vuelta; que si la hago a pie, no sé cuándo llegaré ni cuándo volveré, porque, en resolución, soy mal caminante.

-Digo, Sancho -respondió don Quijote-, que sea como tú quisieres, que no me parece mal tu designio; y digo que de aquí a tres días te partirás, porque quiero que en este tiempo veas lo que por ella hago y digo, para que se lo digas.

-Pues, ¿qué más tengo de ver -dijo Sancho- que lo que he visto?

-¡Bien estás en el cuento! -respondió don Quijote-. Ahora me falta rasgar las vestiduras, esparcir las armas y darme de calabazadas por estas peñas, con otras cosas deste jaez que te han de admirar.

-Por amor de Dios -dijo Sancho-, que mire vuestra merced cómo se da esas calabazadas; que a tal peña podrá llegar, y en tal punto, que con la primera se acabase la máquina desta penitencia; y sería yo de parecer que, ya que a vuestra merced le parece que son aquí necesarias calabazadas y que no se puede hacer esta obra sin ellas, se contentase, pues todo esto es fingido y cosa contrahecha y de burla, se contentase, digo, con dárselas en el agua, o en alguna cosa blanda, como algodón; y déjeme a mí el cargo, que yo diré a mi señora que vuestra merced se las daba en una punta de peña más dura que la de un diamante.

-Yo agradezco tu buena intención, amigo Sancho -respondió don Quijote-, mas quíerote hacer sabidor de que todas estas cosas que hago no son de burlas, sino muy de veras; porque de otra manera, sería contravenir a las órdenes de caballería, que nos mandan que no digamos mentira alguna, pena de relasos, y el hacer una cosa por otra lo mismo es que mentir. Ansí que, mis calabazadas han de ser verdaderas, firmes y valederas, sin que lleven nada del sofístico ni del fantástico. Y será necesario que me dejes algunas hilas para curarme, pues que la ventura quiso que nos faltase el bálsamo que perdimos.

-Más fue perder el asno -respondió Sancho-, pues se perdieron en él las hilas y todo. Y ruégole a vuestra merced que no se acuerde más de aquel maldito brebaje; que en sólo oírle mentar se me revuelve el alma, no que el estómago. Y más le ruego: que haga cuenta que son ya pasados los tres días que me ha dado de término para ver las locuras que hace, que ya las doy por vistas y por pasadas en cosa juzgada, y diré maravillas a mi señora; y escriba la carta y despácheme luego, porque tengo gran deseo de volver a sacar a vuestra merced deste purgatorio donde le dejo.

-¿Purgatorio le llamas, Sancho? -dijo don Quijote-. Mejor hicieras de llamarle infierno, y aun peor, si hay otra cosa que lo sea.

-Quien ha infierno -respondió Sancho-, nula es retencio, según he oído decir.

-No entiendo qué quiere decir retencio -dijo don Quijote.

-Retencio es -respondió Sancho- que quien está en el infierno nunca sale dél, ni puede. Lo cual será al revés en vuestra merced, o a mí me andarán mal los pies, si es que llevo espuelas para avivar a Rocinante; y póngame yo una por una en el Toboso, y delante de mi señora Dulcinea, que yo le diré tales cosas de las necedades y locuras, que todo es uno, que vuestra merced ha hecho y queda

haciendo, que la venga a poner más blanda que un guante, aunque la halle más dura que un alcornoque; con cuya respuesta dulce y melificada volveré por los aires, como brujo, y sacaré a vuestra merced deste purgatorio, que parece infierno y no lo es, pues hay esperanza de salir dél, la cual, como tengo dicho, no la tienen de salir los que están en el infierno, ni creo que vuestra merced dirá otra cosa.

-Así es la verdad -dijo el de la Triste Figura-; pero, ¿qué haremos para escribir la carta?

-Y la libranza pollinesca también -añadió Sancho.

-Todo irá inserto -dijo don Quijote-; y sería bueno, ya que no hay papel, que la escribiésemos, como hacían los antiguos, en hojas de árboles, o en unas tablitas de cera; aunque tan dificultoso será hallarse eso ahora como el papel. Mas ya me ha venido a la memoria dónde será bien, y aun más que bien, escribilla: que es en el librito de memoria que fue de Cardenio; y tú tendrás cuidado de hacerla trasladar en papel, de buena letra, en el primer lugar que hallares, donde haya maestro de escuela de muchachos, o si no, cualquiera sacristán te la trasladará; y no se la des a trasladar a ningún escribano, que hacen letra procesada, que no la entenderá Satanás.

-Pues, ¿qué se ha de hacer de la firma? -dijo Sancho.

-Nunca las cartas de Amadís se firman -respondió don Quijote.

-Está bien -respondió Sancho-, pero la libranza forzosamente se ha de firmar, y ésa, si se traslada, dirán que la firma es falsa y quedaréme sin pollinos.

-La libranza irá en el mismo librito firmada; que, en viéndola, mi sobrina no pondrá dificultad en cumplirla. Y, en lo que toca a la carta de amores, pondrás por firma: «Vuestro hasta la muerte, el Caballero de la Triste Figura». Y hará poco al caso que vaya de mano ajena, porque, a lo que yo me sé acordar, Dulcinea no sabe escribir ni leer, y en toda su vida ha visto letra mía ni carta mía, porque mis amores y los suyos han sido siempre platónicos, sin estenderse a más que a un honesto mirar. Y aun esto tan de cuando en cuando, que osaré jurar con verdad que en doce años que ha que la quiero más que a la lumbre destos ojos que han de comer la tierra, no la he visto cuatro veces; y aun podrá ser que destas cuatro veces no hubiese ella echado de ver la una que la miraba: tal es el recato y encerramiento con que sus padres, Lorenzo Corchuelo, y su madre, Aldonza Nogales, la han criado.

-¡Ta, ta! -dijo Sancho-. ¿Que la hija de Lorenzo Corchuelo es la señora Dulcinea del Toboso, llamada por otro nombre Aldonza Lorenzo?

-Ésa es -dijo don Quijote-, y es la que merece ser señora de todo el universo.

-Bien la conozco -dijo Sancho-, y sé decir que tira tan bien una barra como el más forzado zagal de todo el pueblo. ¡Vive el Dador, que es moza de chapa, hecha y derecha y de pelo en pecho, y que puede sacar la barba del lodo a cualquier caballero andante, o por andar, que la tuviere por señora! ¡Oh hideputa, qué rejo que tiene, y qué voz! Sé decir que se puso un día encima del campanario del aldea a llamar unos zagales suyos que andaban en un barbecho de su padre, y, aunque estaban de allí más de media legua, así la oyeron como si estuvieran al pie de la torre. Y lo mejor que tiene es que no es nada melindrosa, porque tiene mucho de cortesana: con todos se burla y de todo hace mueca y donaire. Ahora digo, señor Caballero de la Triste Figura, que no solamente puede y debe vuestra merced hacer locuras por ella, sino que, con justo título, puede desesperarse y ahorcarse; que nadie habrá que lo sepa que no diga que hizo demasiado de bien, puesto que le lleve el diablo. Y querría ya verme en camino, sólo por vella; que ha muchos días que no la veo, y debe de estar ya trocada, porque gasta mucho la faz de las mujeres andar siempre al campo, al sol y al aire. Y confieso a vuestra merced una verdad, señor don Quijote: que hasta aquí he estado en una grande ignorancia; que pensaba bien y fielmente que la señora Dulcinea debía de ser alguna princesa de quien vuestra merced estaba enamorado, o alguna persona tal, que mereciese los ricos presentes que vuestra merced le ha enviado: así el del vizcaíno como el de los galeotes, y otros muchos que deben ser, según deben de ser muchas las vitorias que vuestra merced ha ganado y ganó en el tiempo que yo aún no era su escudero. Pero, bien considerado, ¿qué se le ha de dar a la señora Aldonza Lorenzo, digo, a la señora Dulcinea del Toboso, de que se le vayan a hincar de rodillas delante della los vencidos que vuestra merced le envía y ha de enviar? Porque podría ser que, al tiempo que ellos llegasen, estuviese ella rastrillando lino, o trillando en las eras, y ellos se corriesen de verla, y ella se riese y enfadase del presente.

-Ya te tengo dicho antes de agora muchas veces, Sancho -dijo don Quijote-, que eres muy grande hablador, y que, aunque de ingenio boto, muchas veces despuntas de agudo. Mas, para que veas cuán necio eres tú y cuán discreto soy yo, quiero que me oyas un breve cuento. «Has de saber que una viuda hermosa, moza, libre y rica, y, sobre todo, desenfadada, se enamoró de un mozo motilón, rollizo y de buen tomo. Alcanzólo a saber su mayor, y un día dijo a la buena viuda, por vía de fraternal reprehensión: “Maravillado estoy, señora, y no sin mucha causa, de que una mujer tan principal, tan hermosa y tan rica como vuestra merced, se haya enamorado de un hombre tan soez, tan bajo y tan idiota como fulano, habiendo en esta casa tantos maestros, tantos presentados y tantos teólogos, en quien vuestra merced pudiera escoger como entre peras, y decir: ‘Éste quiero, aquéste no quiero’”. Mas ella le respondió, con mucho donaire y desenvoltura: “Vuestra merced, señor mío, está muy engañado, y piensa muy a lo antiguo si piensa que yo he escogido mal en fulano, por idiota que le parece, pues, para lo que yo le quiero, tanta filosofía sabe, y más, que Aristóteles”.» Así que, Sancho, por lo que yo quiero a Dulcinea del Toboso, tanto vale como la más alta princesa de la tierra. Sí, que no todos los poetas que alaban damas, debajo de un nombre que ellos a su albedrío les ponen, es verdad que las tienen. ¿Piensas tú que las Amariles, las Filis, las Silvias, las Dianas, las Galateas, las Alidas y otras tales de que los libros, los romances, las tiendas de los barberos, los teatros de las comedias, están llenos, fueron verdaderamente damas de carne y hueso, y de aquéllos que las celebran y celebraron? No, por cierto, sino que las más se las fingen, por dar sujeto a sus versos y porque los tengan por enamorados y por hombres que tienen valor para serlo. Y así, bástame a mí pensar y creer que la buena de Aldonza Lorenzo es hermosa y honesta; y en lo del linaje importa poco, que no han de ir a hacer la información dél para darle algún hábito, y yo me hago cuenta que es la más alta princesa del mundo. Porque has de saber, Sancho, si no lo sabes, que dos cosas solas incitan a amar más que otras, que son la mucha hermosura y la buena fama; y estas dos cosas se hallan consumadamente en Dulcinea, porque en ser hermosa ninguna le iguala, y en la buena fama, pocas le llegan. Y para concluir con todo, yo imagino que todo lo que digo es así, sin que sobre ni falte nada; y píntola en mi imaginación como la deseo, así en la belleza como en la principalidad, y ni la llega Elena, ni la alcanza Lucrecia, ni otra alguna de las famosas mujeres de las edades pretéritas, griega, bárbara o latina. Y diga cada uno lo que quisiere; que si por esto fuere reprehendido de los ignorantes, no seré castigado de los rigurosos.

-Digo que en todo tiene vuestra merced razón -respondió Sancho-, y que yo soy un asno. Mas no sé yo para qué nombro asno en mi boca, pues no se ha de mentar la sogá en casa del ahorcado. Pero venga la carta, y a Dios, que me mudo.

Sacó el libro de memoria don Quijote, y, apartándose a una parte, con mucho sosiego comenzó a escribir la carta; y, en acabándola, llamó a Sancho y le dijo que se la quería leer, porque la tomase de memoria, si acaso se le perdiese por el camino, porque de su desdicha todo se podía temer. A lo cual respondió Sancho:

-Escríbala vuestra merced dos o tres veces ahí en el libro y démele, que yo le llevaré bien guardado, porque pensar que yo la he de tomar en la memoria es disparate: que la tengo tan mala que muchas veces se me olvida cómo me llamo. Pero, con todo eso, dígamela vuestra merced, que me holgaré mucho de oílla, que debe de ir como de molde.

-Escucha, que así dice -dijo don Quijote:

CARTA DE DON QUIJOTE A DULCINEA DEL TOBOSO

Soberana y alta señora:

El ferido de punta de ausencia y el llagado de las telas del corazón, dulcísima Dulcinea del Toboso, te envía la salud que él no tiene. Si tu fermosura me desprecia, si tu valor no es en mi pro, si tus desdenes son en mi afincamiento, maguer que yo sea asaz de sufrido, mal podré sostenerme en esta cuita, que, además de ser fuerte, es muy duradera. Mi buen escudero Sancho te dará entera relación, ¡oh bella ingrata, amada enemiga mía!, del modo que por tu causa quedo. Si gustares de acorrerme, tuyo soy; y si no, haz lo que te viniere en gusto; que, con acabar mi vida, habré satisfecho a tu crueldad y a mi deseo.

Tuyo hasta la muerte,

El Caballero de la Triste Figura.

-Por vida de mi padre -dijo Sancho en oyendo la carta-, que es la más alta cosa que jamás he oído. ¡Pesia a mí, y cómo que le dice vuestra merced ahí todo cuanto quiere, y qué bien que encaja en la firma El Caballero de la Triste Figura! Digo de verdad que es vuestra merced el mismo diablo, y que no haya cosa que no sepa.

-Todo es menester -respondió don Quijote-para el oficio que trayo.

-Ea, pues -dijo Sancho-, ponga vuestra merced en esotra vuelta la cédula de los tres pollinos y fírmela con mucha claridad, porque la conozcan en viéndola.

-Que me place -dijo don Quijote.

Y, habiéndola escrito, se la leyó; que decía así:

Mandaré vuestra merced, por esta primera de pollinos, señora sobrina, dar a Sancho Panza, mi escudero, tres de los cinco que dejé en casa y están a cargo de vuestra merced. Los cuales tres pollinos se los mando librar y pagar por otros tantos aquí recibidos de contado, que consta, y con su carta de pago serán bien dados. Fecha en las entrañas de Sierra Morena, a veinte y dos de agosto deste presente año.

-Buena está -dijo Sancho-; fírmela vuestra merced.

-No es menester firmarla -dijo don Quijote-, sino solamente poner mi rúbrica, que es lo mismo que firma, y para tres asnos, y aun para trecientos, fuera bastante.

-Yo me confío de vuestra merced -respondió Sancho-. Déjeme, iré a ensillar a Rocinante, y aparéjese vuestra merced a echarme su bendición, que luego pienso partirme, sin ver las sandeces que vuestra merced ha de hacer, que yo diré que le vi hacer tantas que no quiera más.

-Por lo menos quiero, Sancho, y porque es menester así, quiero, digo, que me veas en cueros, y hacer una o dos docenas de locuras, que las haré en menos de media hora, porque, habiéndolas tú visto por tus ojos, puedas jurar a tu salvo en las demás que quisieres añadir; y asegúrote que no dirás tú tantas cuantas yo pienso hacer.

-Por amor de Dios, señor mío, que no vea yo en cueros a vuestra merced, que me dará mucha lástima y no podré dejar de llorar; y tengo tal la cabeza, del llanto que anoche hice por el rucio, que no estoy para meterme en nuevos lloros; y si es que vuestra merced gusta de que yo vea algunas locuras, hágalas vestido, breves y las que le vinieren más a cuento. Cuanto más, que para mí no era menester nada deso, y, como ya tengo dicho, fuera ahorrar el camino de mi vuelta, que ha de ser con las nuevas que vuestra merced desea y merece. Y si no, aparéjese la señora Dulcinea; que si no responde como es razón, voto hago solene a quien puedo que le tengo de sacar la buena respuesta del estómago a coces y a bofetones. Porque, ¿dónde se ha de sufrir que un caballero andante, tan famoso como vuestra merced, se vuelva loco, sin qué ni para qué, por una...? No me lo haga decir la señora, porque por Dios que despotrique y lo eche todo a doce, aunque nunca se venda. ¡Bonico soy yo para eso! ¡Mal me conoce! ¡Pues, a fe que si me conociese, que me ayunase!

-A fe, Sancho -dijo don Quijote-, que, a lo que parece, que no estás tú más cuerdo que yo.

-No estoy tan loco -respondió Sancho-, mas estoy más colérico. Pero, dejando esto aparte, ¿qué es lo que ha de comer vuestra merced en tanto que yo vuelvo? ¿Ha de salir al camino, como Cardenio, a quitárselo a los pastores?

-No te dé pena ese cuidado -respondió don Quijote-, porque, aunque tuviera, no comiera otra cosa que las yerbas y frutos que este prado y estos árboles me dieren, que la fineza de mi negocio está en no comer y en hacer otras asperezas equivalentes.

-A Dios, pues. Pero, ¿sabe vuestra merced qué temo? Que no tengo de acertar a volver a este lugar donde agora le dejo, según está de escondido.

-Toma bien las señas, que yo procuraré no apartarme destos contornos -dijo don Quijote-, y aun tendré cuidado de subirme por estos más altos riscos, por ver si te descubro cuando vuelvas. Cuanto más, que lo más acertado será, para que no me yerres y te pierdas, que cortes algunas retamas de las muchas que por aquí hay y las vayas poniendo de trecho a trecho, hasta salir a lo raso, las cuales te servirán de mojones y señales para que me halles cuando vuelvas, a imitación del hilo del laberinto de Teseo.

-Así lo haré -respondió Sancho Panza.

Y, cortando algunos, pidió la bendición a su señor, y, no sin muchas lágrimas de entrambos, se despidió dél. Y, subiendo sobre Rocinante, a quien don Quijote encomendó mucho, y que mirase por él como por su propia persona, se puso en camino del llano, esparciendo de trecho a trecho los ramos de la retama, como su amo se lo había aconsejado. Y así, se fue, aunque todavía le importunaba don Quijote que le viese siquiera hacer dos locuras. Mas no hubo andado cien pasos, cuando volvió y dijo:

-Digo, señor, que vuestra merced ha dicho muy bien: que, para que pueda jurar sin cargo de conciencia que le he visto hacer locuras, será bien que vea siquiera una, aunque bien grande la he visto en la quedada de vuestra merced.

-¿No te lo decía yo? -dijo don Quijote-. Espérate, Sancho, que en un credo las haré.

Y, desnudándose con toda priesa los calzones, quedó en carnes y en pañales, y luego, sin más ni más, dio dos zapatetas en el aire y dos tumbas, la cabeza abajo y los pies en alto, descubriendo cosas que, por no verlas otra vez, volvió Sancho la rienda a Rocinante y se dio por contento y satisfecho de que podía jurar que su amo quedaba loco. Y así, le dejaremos ir su camino, hasta la vuelta, que fue breve.

Capítulo XXVI

Donde se prosiguen las finezas que de enamorado hizo don Quijote en Sierra Morena

VOLVIENDO a contar lo que hizo el de la Triste Figura después que se vio solo, dice la historia que, así como don Quijote acabó de dar las tumbas o vueltas, de medio abajo desnudo y de medio arriba vestido, y que vio que Sancho se había ido sin querer aguardar a ver más sandeces, se subió sobre una punta de una alta peña y allí tornó a pensar lo que otras muchas veces había pensado, sin haberse jamás resuelto en ello. Y era que cuál sería mejor y le estaría más a cuento: imitar a Roldán en las locuras desaforadas que hizo, o Amadís en las malencónicas. Y, hablando entre sí mismo, decía:

-Si Roldán fue tan buen caballero y tan valiente como todos dicen, ¿qué maravilla?, pues, al fin, era encantado y no le podía matar nadie si no era metiéndole un alfiler de a blanca por la planta del pie, y él traía siempre los zapatos con siete suelas de hierro. Aunque no le valieron tretas contra Bernardo del Carpio, que se las entendió y le ahogó entre los brazos en Roncesvalles. Pero, dejando en él lo de la valentía a una parte, vengamos a lo de perder el juicio, que es cierto que le perdió, por las señales que halló en la fontana y por las nuevas que le dio el pastor de que Angélica había dormido más de dos siestas con Medoro, un morillo de cabellos enrizados y paje de Agramante; y si él entendió que esto era verdad y que su dama le había cometido desaguisado, no hizo mucho en volverse loco. Pero yo, ¿cómo puedo imitalle en las locuras, si no le imito en la ocasión dellas? Porque mi Dulcinea del Toboso osaré yo jurar que no ha visto en todos los días de su vida moro alguno, así como él es, en su mismo traje, y que se está hoy como la madre que la parió; y haríale agravio manifiesto si, imaginando otra cosa della, me volviese loco de aquel género de locura de Roldán el furioso. Por otra parte, veo que Amadís de Gaula, sin perder el juicio y sin hacer locuras, alcanzó tanta fama de enamorado como el que más; porque lo que hizo, según su historia, no fue más de que, por verse desdeñado de su señora Oriana, que le había mandado que no pareciese ante su presencia hasta que fuese su voluntad, de que se retiró a la Peña Pobre en compañía de un ermitaño, y allí se hartó de llorar y de encomendarse a Dios, hasta que el cielo le acorrió, en medio de su mayor cuita y necesidad. Y si esto es verdad, como lo es, ¿para qué quiero yo tomar trabajo agora de desnudarme del todo, ni dar pesadumbre a estos árboles, que no me han hecho mal alguno? Ni tengo para qué enturbiar el agua clara destos arroyos, los cuales me han de dar de beber cuando tenga gana. Viva la memoria de Amadís, y sea imitado de don Quijote de la Mancha en todo lo que pudiere; del cual se dirá lo que del otro se dijo: que si no acabó grandes cosas, murió por acometellas; y si yo no soy desechado ni desdeñado de Dulcinea del Toboso, bástame, como ya he dicho, estar ausente della. Ea, pues, manos a la obra: venid a mi memoria, cosas de Amadís, y enseñadme por dónde tengo de comenzar a imitaros. Mas ya sé que lo más que él hizo fue rezar y encomendarse a Dios; pero, ¿qué haré de rosario, que no le tengo?

En esto le vino al pensamiento cómo le haría, y fue que rasgó una gran tira de las faldas de la camisa, que andaban colgando, y dióle once ñudos, el uno más gordo que los demás, y esto le sirvió de rosario el tiempo que allí estuvo, donde rezó un millón de avemarías. Y lo que le fatigaba mucho era no hallar por allí otro ermitaño que le confesase y con quien consolarse. Y así, se entretenía paseándose por el pradecillo, escribiendo y grabando por las cortezas de los árboles y por la menuda arena muchos versos, todos acomodados a su tristeza, y algunos en alabanza de Dulcinea. Mas los que se pudieron hallar enteros y que se pudiesen leer, después que a él allí le hallaron, no fueron más que estos que aquí se siguen:

Árboles, yerbas y plantas
que en aqueste sitio estáis,
tan altos, verdes y tantas,
si de mi mal no os holgáis,
escuchad mis quejas santas. 5

Mi dolor no os alborote,
aunque más terrible sea,
pues, por pagaros escote,
aquí lloró don Quijote
ausencias de Dulcinea 10
del Toboso.

Es aquí el lugar adonde
el amador más leal
de su señora se esconde,
y ha venido a tanto mal 15
sin saber cómo o por dónde.

Tráele amor al estricote,
que es de muy mala ralea;
y así, hasta henchir un pipote,

aquí lloró don Quijote 20
ausencias de Dulcinea
del Toboso.

Buscando las aventuras
por entre las duras peñas,
maldiciendo entrañas duras, 25
que entre riscos y entre breñas
halla el triste desventuras,

hirióle amor con su azote,
no con su blanda correa;
y, en tocándole el cogote, 30
aquí lloró don Quijote
ausencias de Dulcinea
del Toboso.

No causó poca risa en los que hallaron los versos referidos el añadidura del Toboso al nombre de Dulcinea, porque imaginaron que debió de imaginar don Quijote que si, en nombrando a Dulcinea, no decía también del Toboso, no se podría entender la copla; y así fue la verdad, como él después confesó. Otros muchos escribió, pero, como se ha dicho, no se pudieron sacar en limpio, ni enteros, más destas tres coplas. En esto, y en suspirar y en llamar a los faunos y silvanos de aquellos bosques, a las ninfas de los ríos, a la dolorosa y húmida Eco, que le respondiese, consolasen y escuchasen, se entretenía, y en buscar algunas yerbas con que sustentarse en tanto que Sancho volvía; que, si como tardó tres días, tardara tres semanas, el Caballero de la Triste Figura quedara tan desfigurado que no le conociera la madre que lo parió.

Y será bien dejalle, envuelto entre sus suspiros y versos, por contar lo que le avino a Sancho Panza en su mandadería. Y fue que, en saliendo al camino real, se puso en busca del Toboso, y otro día llegó a la venta donde le había sucedido la desgracia de la manta; y no la hubo bien visto, cuando le pareció que otra vez andaba en los aires, y no quiso entrar dentro, aunque llegó a hora que lo pudiera y debiera hacer, por ser la del comer y llevar en deseo de gustar algo caliente;

que había grandes días que todo era fiambre.

Esta necesidad le forzó a que llegase junto a la venta, todavía dudoso si entraría o no. Y, estando en esto, salieron de la venta dos personas que luego le conocieron; y dijo el uno al otro:

-Dígame, señor licenciado, aquel del caballo, ¿no es Sancho Panza, el que dijo el ama de nuestro aventurero que había salido con su señor por escudero?

-Sí es -dijo el licenciado-; y aquél es el caballo de nuestro don Quijote.

Y conociéronle tan bien como aquellos que eran el cura y el barbero de su mismo lugar, y los que hicieron el escrutinio y acto general de los libros. Los cuales, así como acabaron de conocer a Sancho Panza y a Rocinante, deseosos de saber de don Quijote, se fueron a él; y el cura le llamó por su nombre, diciéndole:

-Amigo Sancho Panza, ¿adónde queda vuestro amo?

Conociólos luego Sancho Panza, y determinó de encubrir el lugar y la suerte donde y como su amo quedaba; y así, les respondió que su amo quedaba ocupado en cierta parte y en cierta cosa que le era de mucha importancia, la cual él no podía descubrir, por los ojos que en la cara tenía.

-No, no -dijo el barbero-, Sancho Panza; si vos no nos decís dónde queda, imaginaremos, como ya imaginamos, que vos le habéis muerto y robado, pues venís encima de su caballo. En verdad que nos habéis de dar el dueño del rocín, o sobre eso, morena.

-No hay para qué conmigo amenazas, que yo no soy hombre que robo ni mato a nadie: a cada uno mate su ventura, o Dios, que le hizo. Mi amo queda haciendo penitencia en la mitad desta montaña, muy a su sabor.

Y luego, de corrida y sin parar, les contó de la suerte que quedaba, las aventuras que le habían sucedido y cómo llevaba la carta a la señora Dulcinea del Toboso, que era la hija de Lorenzo Corchuelo, de quien estaba enamorado hasta los hígados.

Quedaron admirados los dos de lo que Sancho Panza les contaba; y, aunque ya sabían la locura de don Quijote y el género della, siempre que la oían se admiraban de nuevo. Pidiéronle a Sancho Panza que les enseñase la carta que llevaba a la señora Dulcinea del Toboso. Él dijo que iba escrita en un libro de memoria y que era orden de su señor que la hiciese trasladar en papel en el primer lugar que llegase; a lo cual dijo el cura que se la mostrase, que él la trasladaría de muy buena letra. Metió la mano en el seno Sancho Panza, buscando el librillo, pero no le halló, ni le podía hallar si le buscara hasta agora, porque se había quedado don Quijote con él y no se le había dado, ni a él se le acordó de pedirle.

Cuando Sancho vio que no hallaba el libro, fuélele parando mortal el rostro;

y, tornándose a tentar todo el cuerpo muy apriesa, tornó a echar de ver que no le hallaba; y, sin más ni más, se echó entrambos puños a las barbas y se arrancó la mitad de ellas, y luego, apriesa y sin cesar, se dio media docena de puñadas en el rostro y en las narices, que se las bañó todas en sangre. Visto lo cual por el cura y el barbero, le dijeron que qué le había sucedido, que tan mal se paraba.

-¿Qué me ha de suceder -respondió Sancho-, sino el haber perdido de una mano a otra, en un estante, tres pollinos, que cada uno era como un castillo?

-¿Cómo es eso? -replicó el barbero.

-He perdido el libro de memoria -respondió Sancho-, donde venía carta para Dulcinea y una cédula firmada de su señor, por la cual mandaba que su sobrina me diese tres pollinos, de cuatro o cinco que estaban en casa.

Y, con esto, les contó la pérdida del rucio. Consolóle el cura, y díjole que, en hallando a su señor, él le haría revalidar la manda y que tornase a hacer la libranza en papel, como era uso y costumbre, porque las que se hacían en libros de memoria jamás se acetaban ni cumplían.

Con esto se consoló Sancho, y dijo que, como aquello fuese así, que no le daba mucha pena la pérdida de la carta de Dulcinea, porque él la sabía casi de memoria, de la cual se podría trasladar donde y cuando quisiesen.

-Decildo, Sancho, pues -dijo el barbero-, que después la trasladaremos.

Paróse Sancho Panza a rascar la cabeza para traer a la memoria la carta, y ya se ponía sobre un pie, y ya sobre otro; unas veces miraba al suelo, otras al cielo; y, al cabo de haberse roído la mitad de la yema de un dedo, teniendo suspensos a los que esperaban que ya la dijese, dijo al cabo de grandísimo rato:

-Por Dios, señor licenciado, que los diablos lleven la cosa que de la carta se me acuerda; aunque en el principio decía: «Alta y sobajada señora».

-No diría -dijo el barbero- sobajada, sino sobrehumana o soberana señora.

-Así es -dijo Sancho-. Luego, si mal no me acuerdo, proseguía..., si mal no me acuerdo: «el llega y falta de sueño, y el ferido besa a vuestra merced las manos, ingrata y muy desconocida hermosa», y no sé qué decía de salud y de enfermedad que le enviaba, y por aquí iba escurriendo, hasta que acababa en «Vuestro hasta la muerte, el Caballero de la Triste Figura».

No poco gustaron los dos de ver la buena memoria de Sancho Panza, y alabáronse mucho, y le pidieron que dijese la carta otras dos veces, para que ellos, ansimesmo, la tomasen de memoria para trasladarla a su tiempo. Tornóla a decir Sancho otras tres veces, y otras tantas volvió a decir otros tres mil disparates. Tras esto, contó asimesmo las cosas de su amo, pero no habló palabra acerca del manteamiento que le había sucedido en aquella venta, en la cual rehusaba entrar. Dijo también como su señor, en trayendo que le trujese buen despacho de la señora Dulcinea del Toboso, se había de poner en camino a procurar cómo ser emperador, o, por lo menos, monarca; que así lo tenían concertado entre los dos, y era cosa muy fácil venir a serlo, según era el valor de su persona y la fuerza de su brazo; y que, en siéndolo, le había de casar a él, porque ya sería viudo, que no podía ser menos, y le había de dar por mujer a una doncella de la emperatriz, heredera de un rico y grande estado de tierra firme, sin ínsulos ni ínsulas, que ya no las quería.

Decía esto Sancho con tanto reposo, limpiándose de cuando en cuando las narices, y con tan poco juicio, que los dos se admiraron de nuevo, considerando cuán vehemente había sido la locura de don Quijote, pues había llevado tras sí el juicio de aquel pobre hombre. No quisieron cansarse en sacarle del error en que estaba, pareciéndoles que, pues no le dañaba nada la conciencia, mejor era dejarle en él, y a ellos les sería de más gusto oír sus necedades. Y así, le dijeron que rogase a Dios por la salud de su señor, que cosa contingente y muy agible era venir, con el discurso del tiempo, a ser emperador, como él decía, o, por lo menos, arzobispo, o otra dignidad equivalente. A lo cual respondió Sancho:

-Señores, si la fortuna rodease las cosas de manera que a mi amo le viniese en voluntad de no ser emperador, sino de ser arzobispo, querría yo saber agora qué suelen dar los arzobispos andantes a sus escuderos.

-Suélenles dar -respondió el cura-algún beneficio, simple o curado, o alguna sacristanía, que les vale mucho de renta rentada, amén del pie de altar, que se suele estimar en otro tanto.

-Para eso será menester -replicó Sancho-que el escudero no sea casado y que sepa ayudar a misa, por lo menos; y si esto es así, ¡desdichado de yo, que soy casado y no sé la primera letra del ABC! ¿Qué será de mí si a mi amo le da antojo de ser arzobispo, y no emperador, como es uso y costumbre de los caballeros andantes?

-No tengáis pena, Sancho amigo -dijo el barbero-, que aquí rogaremos a vuestro amo y se lo aconsejaremos, y aun se lo pondremos en caso de conciencia, que sea emperador y no arzobispo, porque le será más fácil, a causa de que él es más valiente que estudiante.

-Así me ha parecido a mí -respondió Sancho-, aunque sé decir que para todo tiene habilidad. Lo que yo pienso hacer de mi parte es rogarle a Nuestro Señor que le eche a aquellas partes donde él más se sirva y adonde a mí más mercedes me haga.

-Vos lo decís como discreto -dijo el cura-y lo haréis como buen cristiano. Mas lo que ahora se ha de hacer es dar orden como sacar a vuestro amo de aquella inútil penitencia que decís que queda haciendo; y, para pensar el modo que hemos de tener, y para comer, que ya es hora, será bien nos entremos en esta venta.

Sancho dijo que entrasen ellos, que él esperaba allí fuera y que después les diría la causa por que no entraba ni le convenía entrar en ella; mas que les rogaba que le sacasen allí algo de comer que fuese cosa caliente, y, ansimismo, cebada para Rocinante. Ellos se entraron y le dejaron, y, de allí a poco, el barbero le sacó de comer. Después, habiendo bien pensado entre los dos el modo que tendrían para conseguir lo que deseaban, vino el cura en un pensamiento muy acomodado al gusto de don Quijote y para lo que ellos querían. Y fue que dijo al barbero que lo que había pensado era que él se vestiría en hábito de doncella andante, y que él procurase ponerse lo mejor que pudiese como escudero, y que así irían adonde don Quijote estaba, fingiendo ser ella una doncella afligida y menesterosa, y le pediría un don, el cual él no podría dejársele de otorgar, como valeroso caballero andante. Y que el don que le pensaba pedir era que se viniese con ella donde ella le llevase, a desfacelle un agravio que un mal caballero le tenía fecho; y que le suplicaba, ansimesmo, que no la mandase quitar su antifaz, ni la demandase cosa de su hacienda, fasta que la hubiese fecho derecho de aquel mal caballero; y que creyese, sin duda, que don Quijote vendría en todo cuanto le pidiese por este término; y que desta manera le sacarían de allí y le llevarían a su lugar, donde procurarían ver si tenía algún remedio su estraña locura.

Capítulo XXVII

De cómo salieron con su intención el cura y el barbero, con otras cosas dignas de que se cuenten en esta grande historia

NO LE PARECIÓ mal al barbero la invención del cura, sino tan bien, que luego la pusieron por obra. Pidiéronle a la ventera una saya y unas tocas, dejándole en prendas una sotana nueva del cura. El barbero hizo una gran barba de una cola rucia o roja de buey, donde el ventero tenía colgado el peine. Preguntóles la ventera que para qué le pedían aquellas cosas. El cura le contó en breves razones la locura de don Quijote, y cómo convenía aquel disfraz para sacarle de la montaña, donde a la sazón estaba. Cayeron luego el ventero y la ventera en que el loco era su huésped, el del bálsamo, y el amo del manteado escudero, y contaron al cura todo lo que con él les había pasado, sin callar lo que tanto callaba Sancho. En resolución, la ventera vistió al cura de modo que no había más que ver: púsole una saya de paño, llena de fajas de terciopelo negro de un palmo en ancho, todas acuchilladas, y unos corpiños de terciopelo verde, guarnecidos con unos ribetes de raso blanco, que se debieron de hacer, ellos y la saya, en tiempo del rey Wamba. No consintió el cura que le tocasen, sino púsose en la cabeza un birretillo de lienzo colchado que llevaba para dormir de noche, y ciñóse por la frente una liga de tafetán negro, y con otra liga hizo un antifaz, con que se cubrió muy bien las barbas y el rostro; encasquetóse su sombrero, que era tan grande que le podía servir de quitasol, y, cubriéndose su herreruelo, subió en su mula a mujeriegas, y el barbero en la suya, con su barba que le llegaba a la cintura, entre roja y blanca, como aquella que, como se ha dicho, era hecha de la cola de un buey barroso.

Despidiéronse de todos, y de la buena de Maritornes, que prometió de rezar un rosario, aunque pecadora, porque Dios les diese buen suceso en tan arduo y tan cristiano negocio como era el que habían emprendido.

Mas, apenas hubo salido de la venta, cuando le vino al cura un pensamiento: que hacía mal en haberse puesto de aquella manera, por ser cosa indecente que un sacerdote se pusiese así, aunque le fuese mucho en ello; y, diciéndoselo al barbero, le rogó que trocasen trajes, pues era más justo que él fuese la doncella menesterosa, y que él haría el escudero, y que así se profanaba menos su dignidad; y que si no lo quería hacer, determinaba de no pasar adelante, aunque a don Quijote se le llevase el diablo.

En esto, llegó Sancho, y de ver a los dos en aquel traje no pudo tener la risa. En efeto, el barbero vino en todo aquello que el cura quiso, y, trocando la invención, el cura le fue informando el modo que había de tener y las palabras que había de decir a don Quijote para moverle y forzarle a que con él se viniese, y dejase la querencia del lugar que había escogido para su vana penitencia. El barbero respondió que, sin que se le diese lición, él lo pondría bien en su punto. No quiso vestirse por entonces, hasta que estuviesen junto de donde don Quijote estaba; y así, dobló sus vestidos, y el cura acomodó su barba, y siguieron su camino, guiándolos Sancho Panza; el cual les fue contando lo que les aconteció con el loco que hallaron en la sierra, encubriendo, empero, el hallazgo de la maleta y de cuanto en ella venía; que, maguer que tonto, era un poco codicioso el mancebo.

Otro día llegaron al lugar donde Sancho había dejado puestas las señales de las ramas para acertar el lugar donde había dejado a su señor; y, en reconociéndole, les dijo como aquélla era la entrada, y que bien se podían vestir, si era que aquello hacía al caso para la libertad de su señor; porque ellos le habían dicho antes que el ir de aquella suerte y vestirse de aquel modo era toda la importancia para sacar a su amo de aquella mala vida que había escogido, y que le encargaban mucho que no dijese a su amo quien ellos eran, ni que los conocía; y que si le preguntase, como se lo había de preguntar, si dio la carta a Dulcinea, dijese que sí, y que, por no saber leer, le había respondido de palabra, diciéndole que le mandaba, so pena de la su desgracia, que luego al momento se viniese a ver con ella, que era cosa que le importaba mucho; porque con esto y con lo que ellos pensaban decirle tenían por cosa cierta reducirle a mejor vida, y hacer con él que luego se pusiese en camino para ir a ser emperador o monarca; que en lo de ser arzobispo no había de qué temer.

Todo lo escuchó Sancho, y lo tomó muy bien en la memoria, y les agradeció mucho la intención que tenían de aconsejar a su señor fuese emperador y no arzobispo, porque él tenía para sí que, para hacer mercedes a sus escuderos, más podían los emperadores que los arzobispos andantes. También les dijo que sería bien que él fuese delante a buscarle y darle la respuesta de su señora, que ya sería ella bastante a sacarle de aquel lugar, sin que ellos se pusiesen en tanto trabajo. Parecióles bien lo que Sancho Panza decía, y así, determinaron de aguardarle hasta que volviese con las nuevas del hallazgo de su amo.

Entróse Sancho por aquellas quebradas de la sierra, dejando a los dos en una por donde corría un pequeño y manso arroyo, a quien hacían sombra agradable y fresca otras peñas y algunos árboles que por allí estaban. El calor, y el día que allí llegaron, era de los del mes de agosto, que por aquellas partes suele ser el ardor muy grande; la hora, las tres de la tarde: todo lo cual hacía al sitio más agradable, y que convidase a que en él esperasen la vuelta de Sancho, como lo hicieron.

Estando, pues, los dos allí, sosegados y a la sombra, llegó a sus oídos una voz que, sin acompañarla son de algún otro instrumento, dulce y regaladamente sonaba, de que no poco se admiraron, por parecerles que aquél no era lugar donde pudiese haber quien tan bien cantase. Porque, aunque suele decirse que por las selvas y campos se hallan pastores de voces estremadas, más son encarecimientos de poetas que verdades; y más, cuando advirtieron que lo que oían cantar eran versos, no de rústicos ganaderos, sino de discretos cortesanos. Y confirmó esta verdad haber sido los versos que oyeron éstos: ¿Quién menoscaba mis bienes?

Desdenes.

Y ¿quién aumenta mis duelos?

Los celos.

Y ¿quién prueba mi paciencia? 5

Ausencia.

De ese modo, en mi dolencia
ningún remedio se alcanza,
pues me matan la esperanza
desdenes, celos y ausencia. 10

¿Quién me causa este dolor?

Amor.

Y ¿quién mi gloria repugna?

Fortuna.

Y ¿quién consiente en mi duelo? 15

El cielo

De ese modo, yo recelo

morir deste mal extraño,
pues se aumentan en mi daño,
amor, fortuna y el cielo. 20

¿Quién mejorará mi suerte?

La muerte.

Y el bien de amor, ¿quién le alcanza?

Mudanza.

Y sus males, ¿quién los cura? 25

Locura.

De ese modo, no es cordura
querer curar la pasión
cuando los remedios son
muerte, mudanza y locura. 30

La hora, el tiempo, la soledad, la voz y la destreza del que cantaba causó admiración y contento en los dos oyentes, los cuales se estuvieron quedos, esperando si otra alguna cosa oían; pero, viendo que duraba algún tanto el silencio, determinaron de salir a buscar el músico que con tan buena voz cantaba. Y, queriéndolo poner en efeto, hizo la misma voz que no se moviesen, la cual llegó de nuevo a sus oídos, cantando este soneto: SONETO

Santa amistad, que con ligeras alas,
tu apariencia quedándose en el suelo,
entre benditas almas, en el cielo,

subiste alegre a las impíreas salas,

desde allá, cuando quieres, nos señalas 5
la justa paz cubierta con un velo,
por quien a veces se trasluce el cielo
de buenas obras que, a la fin, son malas.

Deja el cielo, ¡oh amistad!, o no permitas que el engaño se vista tu librea, 10
con que destruye a la intención sincera;

que si tus apariencias no le quitas,
presto ha de verse el mundo en la pelea
de la discorde confusión primera.

El canto se acabó con un profundo suspiro, y los dos, con atención, volvieron a esperar si más se cantaba; pero, viendo que la música se había vuelto en sollozos y en lastimeros ayes, acordaron de saber quién era el triste, tan estremado en la voz como doloroso en los gemidos; y no anduvieron mucho, cuando, al volver de una punta de una peña, vieron a un hombre del mismo talle y figura que Sancho Panza les había pintado cuando les contó el cuento de Cardenio; el cual hombre, cuando los vio, sin sobresaltarse, estuvo quedo, con la cabeza inclinada sobre el pecho a guisa de hombre pensativo, sin alzar los ojos a mirarlos más de la vez primera, cuando de improviso llegaron.

El cura, que era hombre bien hablado (como el que ya tenía noticia de su desgracia, pues por las señas le había conocido), se llegó a él, y con breves aunque muy discretas razones le rogó y persuadió que aquella tan miserable vida dejase, porque allí no la perdiese, que era la desdicha mayor de las desdichas. Estaba Cardenio entonces en su entero juicio, libre de aquel furioso accidente que tan a menudo le sacaba de sí mismo; y así, viendo a los dos en traje tan no usado de los que por aquellas soledades andaban, no dejó de admirarse algún tanto, y más cuando oyó que le habían hablado en su negocio como en cosa sabida -porque las razones que el cura le dijo así lo dieron a entender-; y así, respondió desta manera: -Bien veo yo, señores, quienquiera que seáis, que el cielo, que tiene cuidado de socorrer a los buenos, y aun a los malos muchas veces, sin yo merecerlo, me envía, en estos tan remotos y apartados lugares del trato común de las gentes, algunas personas que, poniéndome delante de los ojos con vivas y varias razones cuán sin ella ando en hacer la vida que hago, han procurado sacarme désta a mejor parte; pero, como no saben que sé yo que en saliendo deste daño he de caer en otro mayor, quizá me deben de tener por hombre de flacos discursos, y aun, lo que peor sería, por de ningún juicio. Y no sería maravilla que así fuese, porque a mí se me trasluce que la fuerza de la imaginación de mis desgracias es tan intensa y puede tanto en mi perdición que, sin que yo pueda ser parte a estorbarlo, vengo a quedar como piedra, falto de todo buen sentido y conocimiento; y vengo a caer en la cuenta desta verdad, cuando algunos me dicen y muestran señales de las cosas que he hecho en tanto que aquel terrible accidente me señorea, y no sé más que dolerme en vano y maldecir sin provecho mi ventura, y dar por disculpa de mis locuras el decir la causa dellas a cuantos oírla quieren; porque, viendo los cuerdos cuál es la causa, no se maravillarán de los efetos, y si no me dieren remedio, a lo menos no me darán culpa, convirtiéndoseles el enojo de mi desenvoltura en lástima de mis desgracias. Y si es que vosotros, señores, venís con la misma intención que otros han venido, antes que paséis adelante en vuestras discretas persuaciones, os ruego que escuchéis el cuento, que no le tiene, de mis desventuras; porque quizá, después de entendido, ahorraréis del trabajo que tomaréis en consolar un mal que de todo consuelo es incapaz.

Los dos, que no deseaban otra cosa que saber de su misma boca la causa de su daño, le rogaron se la contase, ofreciéndole de no hacer otra cosa de la que él quisiese, en su remedio o consuelo; y con esto, el triste caballero comenzó su lastimera historia, casi por las mismas palabras y pasos que la había contado a don Quijote y al cabrero pocos días atrás, cuando, por ocasión del maestro Elisabat y puntualidad de don Quijote en guardar el decoro a la caballería, se quedó el cuento imperfeto, como la historia lo deja contado. Pero ahora quiso la buena suerte que se detuvo el accidente de la locura y le dio lugar de contarlo hasta el fin; y así, llegando al paso del billete que había hallado don Fernando entre el libro de Amadís de Gaula, dijo Cardenio que le tenía bien en la memoria, y que decía desta manera: «LUSCINDA A CARDENIO

Cada día descubro en vos valores que me obligan y fuerzan a que en más os estime; y así, si quisiéredes sacarme desta deuda sin ejecutarme en la honra, lo podréis muy bien hacer. Padre tengo, que os conoce y que me quiere bien, el cual, sin forzar mi voluntad, cumplirá la que será justo que vos tengáis, si es que me estimáis como decís y como yo creo.

»-Por este billete me moví a pedir a Luscinda por esposa, como ya os he contado, y éste fue por quien quedó Luscinda en la opinión de don Fernando por una de las más discretas y avisadas mujeres de su tiempo; y este billete fue el que le puso en deseo de destruirme, antes que el mío se efetuase. Díjele yo a don Fernando en lo que reparaba el padre de Luscinda, que era en que mi padre se la pidiese, lo cual yo no le osaba decir, temeroso que no vendría en ello, no porque no tuviese bien conocida la calidad, bondad, virtud y hermosura de Luscinda, y que tenía partes bastantes para enoblecir cualquier otro linaje de España, sino porque yo entendía dél que deseaba que no me casase tan presto, hasta ver lo que el duque Ricardo hacía conmigo. En resolución, le dije que no me aventuraba a decírselo a mi padre, así por aquel inconveniente como por otros muchos que me acobardaban, sin saber cuáles eran, sino que me parecía que lo que yo desease jamás había de tener efeto.

»A todo esto me respondió don Fernando que él se encargaba de hablar a mi padre y hacer con él que hablase al de Luscinda. ¡Oh Mario ambicioso, oh Catilina cruel, oh Sila facinoroso, oh Galalón embustero, oh Vellido traidor, oh Julián vengativo, oh Judas codicioso! Traidor, cruel, vengativo y embustero, ¿qué deservicios te había hecho este triste, que con tanta llaneza te descubrió los secretos y contentos de su corazón? ¿Qué ofensa te hice? ¿Qué palabras te dije, o qué consejos te di, que no fuesen todos encaminados a acrecentar tu honra y tu provecho? Mas, ¿de qué me quejo?, ¡desventurado de mí!, pues es cosa cierta que cuando traen las desgracias la corriente de las estrellas, como vienen de alto abajo, despeñándose con furor y con violencia, no hay fuerza en la tierra que las detenga, ni industria humana que prevenirlas pueda. ¿Quién pudiera imaginar que don Fernando, caballero ilustre, discreto, obligado de mis servicios, poderoso para alcanzar lo que el deseo amoroso le pidiese dondequiera que le ocupase, se había de enconar, como suele decirse, en tomarme a mí una sola oveja, que aún no poseía? Pero quédense estas consideraciones aparte, como inútiles y sin provecho, y añudemos el roto hilo de mi desdichada historia.

»Digo, pues, que, pareciéndole a don Fernando que mi presencia le era inconveniente para poner en ejecución su falso y mal pensamiento, determinó de enviarme a su hermano mayor, con ocasión de pedirle unos dineros para pagar seis caballos, que de industria, y sólo para este efeto de que me ausentase (para poder mejor salir con su dañado intento), el mismo día que se ofreció hablar a mi padre los compró, y quiso que yo viniese por el dinero. ¿Pude yo prevenir esta traición? ¿Pude, por ventura, caer en imaginarla? No, por cierto; antes, con grandísimo gusto, me ofrecí a partir luego, contento de la buena compra hecha. Aquella noche hablé con Luscinda, y le dije lo que con don Fernando quedaba concertado, y que tuviese firme esperanza de que tendrían efeto nuestros buenos y justos deseos. Ella me dijo, tan segura como yo de la traición de don Fernando, que procurase volver presto, porque creía que no tardaría más la conclusión de nuestras voluntades que tardase mi padre de hablar al suyo. No sé qué se fue, que, en acabando de decirme esto, se le llenaron los ojos de lágrimas y un nudo se le atravesó en la garganta, que no le dejaba hablar palabra de otras muchas que me pareció que procuraba decirme.

»Quedé admirado deste nuevo accidente, hasta allí jamás en ella visto, porque siempre nos hablábamos, las veces que la buena fortuna y mi diligencia lo concedía, con todo regocijo y contento, sin mezclar en nuestras pláticas lágrimas, suspiros, celos, sospechas o temores. Todo era engrandecer yo mi ventura, por habérmela dado el cielo por señora: exageraba su belleza, admirábame de su valor y entendimiento. Volvíame ella el recambio, alabando en mí lo que, como enamorada, le parecía digno de alabanza. Con esto, nos contábamos cien mil niñerías y acaecimientos de nuestros vecinos y conocidos, y a lo que más se estendía mi desenvoltura era a tomarle, casi por fuerza, una de sus bellas y blancas manos, y llevarla a mi boca, según daba lugar la estrechez de una baja reja que nos dividía. Pero la noche que precedió al triste día de mi partida, ella lloró, gimió y suspiró, y se fue, y me dejó lleno de confusión y sobresalto, espantado de haber visto tan nuevas y tan tristes muestras de dolor y sentimiento en Luscinda. Pero, por no destruir mis esperanzas, todo lo atribuí a la fuerza del amor que me tenía y al dolor que suele causar la ausencia en los que bien se quieren.

»En fin, yo me partí triste y pensativo, llena el alma de imaginaciones y sospechas, sin saber lo que sospechaba ni imaginaba: claros indicios que me mostraban el triste suceso y desventura que me estaba guardada. Llegué al lugar donde era enviado. Di las cartas al hermano de don Fernando. Fui bien recibido, pero no bien despachado, porque me mandó aguardar, bien a mi disgusto, ocho días, y en parte donde el duque, su padre, no me viese, porque su hermano le escribía que le enviase cierto dinero sin su sabiduría. Y todo fue invención del

falso don Fernando, pues no le faltaban a su hermano dineros para despacharme luego. Orden y mandato fue éste que me puso en condición de no obedecerle, por parecerme imposible sustentar tantos días la vida en el ausencia de Luscinda, y más, habiéndola dejado con la tristeza que os he contado; pero, con todo esto, obedecí, como buen criado, aunque veía que había de ser a costa de mi salud.

»Pero, a los cuatro días que allí llegué, llegó un hombre en mi busca con una carta, que me dio, que en el sobrescrito conocí ser de Luscinda, porque la letra dél era suya. Abríla, temeroso y con sobresalto, creyendo que cosa grande debía de ser la que la había movido a escribirme estando ausente, pues presente pocas veces lo hacía. Preguntéle al hombre, antes de leerla, quién se la había dado y el tiempo que había tardado en el camino. Díjome que acaso, pasando por una calle de la ciudad a la hora de medio día, una señora muy hermosa le llamó desde una ventana, los ojos llenos de lágrimas, y que con mucha priesa le dijo: “Hermano: si sois cristiano, como parecéis, por amor de Dios os ruego que encaminéis luego esta carta al lugar y a la persona que dice el sobrescrito, que todo es bien conocido, y en ello haréis un gran servicio a nuestro Señor; y, para que no os falte comodidad de poderlo hacer, tomad lo que va en este pañuelo”. “Y, diciendo esto, me arrojó por la ventana un pañuelo, donde venían atados cien reales y esta sortija de oro que aquí traigo, con esa carta que os he dado. Y luego, sin aguardar respuesta mía, se quitó de la ventana; aunque primero vio cómo yo tomé la carta y el pañuelo, y, por señas, le dije que haría lo que me mandaba. Y así, viéndome tan bien pagado del trabajo que podía tomar en traérsela y conociendo por el sobrescrito que érades vos a quien se enviaba, porque yo, señor, os conozco muy bien, y obligado asimesmo de las lágrimas de aquella hermosa señora, determiné de no fiarme de otra persona, sino venir yo mesmo a dárosela; y en diez y seis horas que ha que se me dio, he hecho el camino, que sabéis que es de diez y ocho leguas”.

»En tanto que el agradecido y nuevo correo esto me decía, estaba yo colgado de sus palabras, temblándome las piernas de manera que apenas podía sostenerme. En efeto, abrí la carta y vi que contenía estas razones: La palabra que don Fernando os dio de hablar a vuestro padre para que hablase al mío, la ha cumplido más en su gusto que en vuestro provecho. Sabed, señor, que él me ha pedido por esposa, y mi padre, llevado de la ventaja que él piensa que don Fernando os hace, ha venido en lo que quiere, con tantas veras que de aquí a dos días se ha de hacer el desposorio, tan secreto y tan a solas, que sólo han de ser testigos los cielos y alguna gente de casa. Cual yo quedo, imaginaldo; si os cumple venir, veldo; y si os quiero bien o no, el suceso deste negocio os lo dará a entender. A Dios plega que ésta llegue a vuestras manos antes que la mía se vea en condición de juntarse con la de quien tan mal sabe guardar la fe que promete.

»Éstas, en suma, fueron las razones que la carta contenía y las que me hicieron poner luego en camino, sin esperar otra respuesta ni otros dineros; que bien claro conocí entonces que no la compra de los caballos, sino la de su gusto, había movido a don Fernando a enviarme a su hermano. El enojo que contra don Fernando concebí, junto con el temor de perder la prenda que con tantos años de servicios y deseos tenía granjeada, me pusieron alas, pues, casi como en vuelo, otro día me puse en mi lugar, al punto y hora que convenía para ir a hablar a Luscinda. Entré secreto, y dejé una mula en que venía en casa del buen hombre que me había llevado la carta; y quiso la suerte que entonces la tuviese tan buena que hallé a Luscinda puesta a la reja, testigo de nuestros amores. Conocióme Luscinda luego, y conocíla yo; mas no como debía ella conocerme y yo conocerla. Pero, ¿quién hay en el mundo que se pueda alabar que ha penetrado y sabido el confuso pensamiento y condición mudable de una mujer? Ninguno, por cierto.

»Digo, pues, que, así como Luscinda me vio, me dijo: “Cardenio, de boda estoy vestida; ya me están aguardando en la sala don Fernando el traidor y mi padre el codicioso, con otros testigos, que antes lo serán de mi muerte que de mi desposorio. No te turbes, amigo, sino procura hallarte presente a este sacrificio, el cual si no pudiere ser estorbado de mis razones, una daga llevo escondida que podrá estorbar más determinadas fuerzas, dando fin a mi vida y principio a que conozcas la voluntad que te he tenido y tengo”. Yo le respondí turbado y apriesa, temeroso no me faltase lugar para responderla: “Hagan, señora, tus obras verdaderas tus palabras; que si tú llevas daga para acreditarte, aquí llevo yo espada para defenderte con ella o para matarme si la suerte nos fuere contraria”. No creo que pudo oír todas estas razones, porque sentí que la llamaban apriesa, porque el desposado aguardaba. Cerróse con esto la noche de mi tristeza, púsoseme el sol de mi alegría: quedé sin luz en los ojos y sin discurso en el entendimiento. No acertaba a entrar en su casa, ni podía moverme a parte alguna; pero, considerando cuánto importaba mi presencia para lo que suceder pudiese en aquel caso, me animé lo más que pude y entré en su casa. Y, como ya sabía muy bien todas sus entradas y salidas, y más con el alboroto que de secreto en ella andaba, nadie me echó de ver. Así que, sin ser visto, tuve lugar de ponerme en el hueco que hacía una ventana de la misma sala, que con las puntas y remates de dos tapices se cubría, por entre las cuales podía yo ver, sin ser visto, todo cuanto en la sala se hacía.

»¿Quién pudiera decir ahora los sobresaltos que me dio el corazón mientras allí estuve, los pensamientos que me ocurrieron, las consideraciones que hice?, que fueron tantas y tales, que ni se pueden decir ni aun es bien que se digan.

Basta que sepáis que el desposado entró en la sala sin otro adorno que los mismos vestidos ordinarios que solía. Traía por padrino a un primo hermano de Luscinda, y en toda la sala no había persona de fuera, sino los criados de casa. De allí a un poco, salió de una recámara Luscinda, acompañada de su madre y de dos doncellas suyas, tan bien aderezada y compuesta como su calidad y hermosura merecían, y como quien era la perfección de la gala y bizarría cortesana. No me dio lugar mi suspensión y arrobamiento para que mirase y notase en particular lo que traía vestido; sólo pude advertir a las colores, que eran encarnado y blanco, y en las vislumbres que las piedras y joyas del tocado y de todo el vestido hacían, a todo lo cual se aventajaba la belleza singular de sus hermosos y rubios cabellos; tales que, en competencia de las preciosas piedras y de las luces de cuatro hachas que en la sala estaban, la suya con más resplandor a los ojos ofrecían. ¡Oh memoria, enemiga mortal de mi descanso! ¿De qué sirve representarme ahora la incomparable belleza de aquella adorada enemiga mía? ¿No será mejor, cruel memoria, que me acuerdes y representes lo que entonces hizo, para que, movido de tan manifiesto agravio, procure, ya que no la venganza, a lo menos perder la vida?» No os canséis, señores, de oír estas digresiones que hago; que no es mi pena de aquellas que puedan ni deban contarse sucintamente y de paso, pues cada circunstancia suya me parece a mí que es digna de un largo discurso.

A esto le respondió el cura que no sólo no se cansaban en oírle, sino que les daba mucho gusto las menudencias que contaba, por ser tales, que merecían no pasarse en silencio, y la misma atención que lo principal del cuento.

-«Digo, pues -prosiguió Cardenio-, que, estando todos en la sala, entró el cura de la parroquia, y, tomando a los dos por la mano para hacer lo que en tal acto se requiere, al decir: “¿Queréis, señora Luscinda, al señor don Fernando, que está presente, por vuestro legítimo esposo, como lo manda la Santa Madre Iglesia?”, yo saqué toda la cabeza y cuello de entre los tapices, y con atentísimos oídos y alma turbada me puse a escuchar lo que Luscinda respondía, esperando de su respuesta la sentencia de mi muerte o la confirmación de mi vida. ¡Oh, quién se atreviera a salir entonces, diciendo a voces!: “¡Ah Luscinda, Luscinda, mira lo que haces, considera lo que me debes, mira que eres mía y que no puedes ser de otro! Advierte que el decir tú sí y el acabármeme la vida ha de ser todo a un punto. ¡Ah traidor don Fernando, robador de mi gloria, muerte de mi vida! ¿Qué quieres? ¿Qué pretendes? Considera que no puedes cristianamente llegar al fin de tus deseos, porque Luscinda es mi esposa y yo soy su marido”. ¡Ah, loco de mí, ahora que estoy ausente y lejos del peligro, digo que había de hacer lo que no hice! ¡Ahora que dejé robar mi cara prenda, maldigo al robador, de quien pudiera vengarme si tuviera corazón para ello como le tengo para quejarme! En fin, pues fui entonces cobarde y necio, no es mucho que muera ahora corrido, arrepentido y loco.

»Estaba esperando el cura la respuesta de Luscinda, que se detuvo un buen espacio en darla, y, cuando yo pensé que sacaba la daga para acreditarse, o desataba la lengua para decir alguna verdad o desengaño que en mi provecho redundase, oigo que dijo con voz desmayada y flaca: “Sí quiero”; y lo mismo dijo don Fernando; y, dándole el anillo, quedaron en disoluble nudo ligados. Llegó el desposado a abrazar a su esposa, y ella, poniéndose la mano sobre el corazón, cayó desmayada en los brazos de su madre. Resta ahora decir cuál quedé yo viendo, en el sí que había oído, burladas mis esperanzas, falsas las palabras y promesas de Luscinda: imposibilitado de cobrar en algún tiempo el bien que en aquel instante había perdido. Quedé falto de consejo, desamparado, a mi parecer, de todo el cielo, hecho enemigo de la tierra que me sustentaba, negándome el aire aliento para mis suspiros y el agua humor para mis ojos; sólo el fuego se acrecentó de manera que todo ardía de rabia y de celos.

»Alborotáronse todos con el desmayo de Luscinda, y, desabrochándole su madre el pecho para que le diese el aire, se descubrió en él un papel cerrado, que don Fernando tomó luego y se le puso a leer a la luz de una de las hachas; y, en acabando de leerle, se sentó en una silla y se puso la mano en la mejilla, con muestras de hombre muy pensativo, sin acudir a los remedios que a su esposa se hacían para que del desmayo volviese. Yo, viendo alborotada toda la gente de casa, me aventuré a salir, ora fuese visto o no, con determinación que si me viesen, de hacer un desatino tal, que todo el mundo viniera a entender la justa indignación de mi pecho en el castigo del falso don Fernando, y aun en el mudable de la desmayada traidora. Pero mi suerte, que para mayores males, si es posible que los haya, me debe tener guardado, ordenó que en aquel punto me sobrase el entendimiento que después acá me ha faltado; y así, sin querer tomar venganza de mis mayores enemigos (que, por estar tan sin pensamiento mío, fuera fácil tomarla), quise tomarla de mi mano y ejecutar en mí la pena que ellos merecían; y aun quizá con más rigor del que con ellos se usara si entonces les diera muerte, pues la que se recibe repentina presto acaba la pena; mas la que se dilata con tormentos siempre mata, sin acabar la vida.

»En fin, yo salí de aquella casa y vine a la de aquél donde había dejado la mula; hice que me la ensillase, sin despedirme dél subí en ella, y salí de la ciudad, sin osar, como otro Lot, volver el rostro a miralla; y cuando me vi en el campo solo, y que la escuridad de la noche me encubría y su silencio convidaba a quejarme, sin respeto o miedo de ser escuchado ni conocido, solté la voz y desaté la lengua en tantas maldiciones de Luscinda y de don Fernando, como si con ellas satisficiera el agravio que me habían hecho. Dile títulos de cruel, de ingrata, de falsa y desagradecida; pero, sobre todos, de codiciosa, pues la riqueza de mi enemigo la había cerrado los ojos de la voluntad, para quitármela a mí y entregarla a aquél con quien más liberal y franca la fortuna se había mostrado; y, en mitad de la fuga destas maldiciones y vituperios, la disculpaba, diciendo que no era mucho que una doncella recogida en casa de sus padres, hecha y acostumbrada siempre a obedecerlos, hubiese querido condescender con su gusto, pues le daban por esposo a un caballero tan principal, tan rico y tan gentil hombre que, a no querer recibirle, se podía pensar, o que no tenía juicio, o que en otra parte tenía la voluntad: cosa que redundaba tan en perjuicio de su buena opinión y fama. Luego volvía diciendo que, puesto que ella dijera que yo era su esposo, vieran ellos que no había hecho en escogermelo tan mala elección, que no la disculparan, pues antes de ofrecérseles don Fernando no pudieran ellos mismos acertar a desear, si con razón midiesen su deseo, otro mejor que yo para esposo de su hija; y que bien pudiera ella, antes de ponerse en el trance forzoso y último de dar la mano, decir que ya yo le había dado la mía; que yo viniera y concediera con todo cuanto ella acertara a fingir en este caso.

»En fin, me resolví en que poco amor, poco juicio, mucha ambición y deseos de grandezas hicieron que se olvidase de las palabras con que me había engañado, entretenido y sustentado en mis firmes esperanzas y honestos deseos. Con estas voces y con esta inquietud caminé lo que quedaba de aquella noche, y di al amanecer en una entrada destas sierras, por las cuales caminé otros tres días, sin senda ni camino alguno, hasta que vine a parar a unos prados, que no sé a qué mano destas montañas caen, y allí pregunté a unos ganaderos que hacia dónde era lo más áspero destas sierras. Dijéronme que hacia esta parte. Luego me encaminé a ella, con intención de acabar aquí la vida, y, en entrando por estas asperezas, del cansancio y de la hambre se cayó mi mula muerta, o, lo que yo más creo, por desechar de sí tan inútil carga como en mí llevaba. Yo quedé a pie, rendido de la naturaleza, traspasado de hambre, sin tener, ni pensar buscar, quien me socorriese.

»De aquella manera estuve no sé qué tiempo, tendido en el suelo, al cabo del cual me levanté sin hambre, y hallé junto a mí a unos cabreros, que, sin duda, debieron ser los que mi necesidad remediaron, porque ellos me dijeron de la manera que me habían hallado, y cómo estaba diciendo tantos disparates y desatinos, que daba indicios claros de haber perdido el juicio; y yo he sentido en mí, después acá, que no todas veces le tengo cabal, sino tan desmedrado y flaco que hago mil locuras, rasgándome los vestidos, dando voces por estas soledades, maldiciendo mi ventura y repitiendo en vano el nombre amado de mi enemiga, sin tener otro discurso ni intento entonces que procurar acabar la vida voceando; y cuando en mí vuelvo, me hallo tan cansado y molido, que apenas puedo

moverme. Mi más común habitación es en el hueco de un alcornoque, capaz de cubrir este miserable cuerpo. Los vaqueros y cabreros que andan por estas montañas, movidos de caridad, me sustentan, poniéndome el manjar por los caminos y por las peñas por donde entienden que acaso podré pasar y hallarlo; y así, aunque entonces me falte el juicio, la necesidad natural me da a conocer el mantenimiento, y despierta en mí el deseo de apetecerlo y la voluntad de tomarlo. Otras veces me dicen ellos, cuando me encuentran con juicio, que yo salgo a los caminos y que se lo quito por fuerza, aunque me lo den de grado, a los pastores que vienen con ello del lugar a las majadas.

»Desta manera paso mi miserable y extrema vida, hasta que el cielo sea servido de conducirme a su último fin, o de ponerle en mi memoria, para que no me acuerde de la hermosura y de la traición de Luscinda y del agravio de don Fernando; que si esto él hace sin quitarme la vida, yo volveré a mejor discurso mis pensamientos; donde no, no hay sino rogarle que absolutamente tenga misericordia de mi alma, que yo no siento en mí valor ni fuerzas para sacar el cuerpo desta estrechez en que por mi gusto he querido ponerle». Ésta es, ¡oh señores!, la amarga historia de mi desgracia: decidme si es tal, que pueda celebrarse con menos sentimientos que los que en mí habéis visto; y no os canséis en persuadirme ni aconsejarme lo que la razón os dijere que puede ser bueno para mi remedio, porque ha de aprovechar conmigo lo que aprovecha la medicina recetada de famoso médico al enfermo que recibir no la quiere. Yo no quiero salud sin Luscinda; y, pues ella gustó de ser ajena, siendo, o debiendo ser, mía, guste yo de ser de la desventura, pudiendo haber sido de la buena dicha. Ella quiso, con su mudanza, hacer estable mi perdición; yo querré, con procurar perderme, hacer contenta su voluntad, y será ejemplo a los por venir de que a mí solo faltó lo que a todos los desdichados sobra, a los cuales suele ser consuelo la imposibilidad de tenerle, y en mí es causa de mayores sentimientos y males, porque aun pienso que no se han de acabar con la muerte.

Aquí dio fin Cardenio a su larga plática y tan desdichada como amorosa historia. Y, al tiempo que el cura se prevenía para decirle algunas razones de consuelo, le suspendió una voz que llegó a sus oídos, que en lastimados acentos oyeron que decía lo que se dirá en la cuarta parte desta narración, que en este punto dio fin a la tercera el sabio y atentado historiador Cide Hamete Benengeli.

Cuarta parte del ingenioso hidalgo don Quijote de la Mancha

Capítulo XXVIII

Que trata de la nueva y agradable aventura que al cura y barbero sucedió en la misma sierra

FELICÍSIMOS y venturosos fueron los tiempos donde se echó al mundo el audacísimo caballero don Quijote de la Mancha, pues por haber tenido tan honrosa determinación como fue el querer resucitar y volver al mundo la ya perdida y casi muerta orden de la andante caballería, gozamos ahora, en esta nuestra edad, necesitada de alegres entretenimientos, no sólo de la dulzura de su verdadera historia, sino de los cuentos y episodios della, que, en parte, no son menos agradables y artificiosos y verdaderos que la misma historia; la cual, prosiguiendo su rastrillado, torcido y aspado hilo, cuenta que, así como el cura comenzó a prevenirse para consolar a Cardenio, lo impidió una voz que llegó a sus oídos, que, con tristes acentos, decía desta manera:

-¡Ay Dios! ¿Si será posible que he ya hallado lugar que pueda servir de escondida sepultura a la carga pesada deste cuerpo, que tan contra mi voluntad sostengo? Sí será, si la soledad que prometen estas sierras no me miente. ¡Ay, desdichada, y cuán más agradable compañía harán estos riscos y malezas a mi intención, pues me darán lugar para que con quejas comunique mi desgracia al cielo, que no la de ningún hombre humano, pues no hay ninguno en la tierra de quien se pueda esperar consejo en las dudas, alivio en las quejas, ni remedio en los males!

Todas estas razones oyeron y percibieron el cura y los que con él estaban, y por parecerles, como ello era, que allí junto las decían, se levantaron a buscar el dueño, y no hubieron andado veinte pasos, cuando detrás de un peñasco vieron, sentado al pie de un fresno, a un mozo vestido como labrador, al cual, por tener inclinado el rostro, a causa de que se lavaba los pies en el arroyo que por allí corría, no se le pudieron ver por entonces. Y ellos llegaron con tanto silencio que dél no fueron sentidos, ni él estaba a otra cosa atento que a lavarse los pies, que eran tales, que no parecían sino dos pedazos de blanco cristal que entre las otras piedras del arroyo se habían nacido. Suspendióles la blancura y belleza de los pies, pareciéndoles que no estaban hechos a pisar terrones, ni a andar tras el arado y los bueyes, como mostraba el hábito de su dueño; y así, viendo que no habían sido sentidos, el cura, que iba delante, hizo señas a los otros dos que se agazapasen o escondiesen detrás de unos pedazos de peña que allí había, y así lo hicieron todos, mirando con atención lo que el mozo hacía; el cual traía puesto un capotillo pardo de dos haldas, muy ceñido al cuerpo con una toalla blanca. Traía, ansimesmo, unos calzones y polainas de paño pardo, y en la cabeza una montera parda. Tenía las polainas levantadas hasta la mitad de la pierna, que, sin duda alguna, de blanco alabastro parecía. Acabóse de lavar los hermosos pies, y luego, con un paño de tocar, que sacó debajo de la montera, se los limpió; y, al querer quitársele, alzó el rostro, y tuvieron lugar los que mirándole estaban de ver una hermosura incomparable; tal, que Cardenio dijo al cura, con voz baja:

-Ésta, ya que no es Luscinda, no es persona humana, sino divina.

El mozo se quitó la montera, y, sacudiendo la cabeza a una y a otra parte, se comenzaron a descoger y desparcir unos cabellos, que pudieran los del sol tenerles envidia. Con esto conocieron que el que parecía labrador era mujer, y delicada, y aun la más hermosa que hasta entonces los ojos de los dos habían visto, y aun los de Cardenio, si no hubieran mirado y conocido a Luscinda; que después afirmó que sola la belleza de Luscinda podía contender con aquélla. Los luengos y rubios cabellos no sólo le cubrieron las espaldas, mas toda en torno la escondieron debajo de ellos; que si no eran los pies, ninguna otra cosa de su cuerpo se parecía: tales y tantos eran. En esto, les sirvió de peine unas manos, que si los pies en el agua habían parecido pedazos de cristal, las manos en los cabellos semejabán pedazos de apretada nieve; todo lo cual, en más admiración y en más deseo de saber quién era ponía a los tres que la miraban.

Por esto determinaron de mostrarse, y, al movimiento que hicieron de ponerse en pie, la hermosa moza alzó la cabeza, y, apartándose los cabellos de delante de los ojos con entrambas manos, miró los que el ruido hacían; y apenas los hubo visto, cuando se levantó en pie, y, sin aguardar a calzarse ni a recoger los cabellos, asió con mucha presteza un bulto, como de ropa, que junto a sí tenía, y quiso ponerse en huida, llena de turbación y sobresalto; mas no hubo dado seis pasos cuando, no pudiendo sufrir los delicados pies la aspereza de las piedras, dio consigo en el suelo. Lo cual visto por los tres, salieron a ella, y el cura fue el primero que le dijo:

-Deteneos, señora, quienquiera que seáis, que los que aquí veis sólo tienen intención de serviros. No hay para qué os pongáis en tan impertinente huida, porque ni vuestros pies lo podrán sufrir ni nosotros consentir.

A todo esto, ella no respondía palabra, atónita y confusa. Llegaron, pues, a ella, y, asiéndola por la mano el cura, prosiguió diciendo:

-Lo que vuestro traje, señora, nos niega, vuestros cabellos nos descubren: señales claras que no deben de ser de poco momento las causas que han disfrazado vuestra belleza en hábito tan indigno, y traídola a tanta soledad como es ésta, en la cual ha sido ventura el hallaros, si no para dar remedio a vuestros

males, a lo menos para darles consejo, pues ningún mal puede fatigar tanto, ni llegar tan al extremo de serlo, mientras no acaba la vida, que rehúya de no escuchar siquiera el consejo que con buena intención se le da al que lo padece. Así que, señora mía, o señor mío, o lo que vos quisierdes ser, perded el sobresalto que nuestra vista os ha causado y contadnos vuestra buena o mala suerte; que en nosotros juntos, o en cada uno, hallaréis quien os ayude a sentir vuestras desgracias.

En tanto que el cura decía estas razones, estaba la disfrazada moza como embelesada, mirándolos a todos, sin mover labio ni decir palabra alguna: bien así como rústico aldeano que de improviso se le muestran cosas raras y dél jamás vistas. Mas, volviendo el cura a decirle otras razones al mismo efeto encaminadas, dando ella un profundo suspiro, rompió el silencio y dijo:

-Pues que la soledad destas sierras no ha sido parte para encubrirme, ni la soltura de mis descompuestos cabellos no ha permitido que sea mentirosa mi lengua, en balde sería fingir yo de nuevo ahora lo que, si se me creyese, sería más por cortesía que por otra razón alguna. Presupuesto esto, digo, señores, que os agradezco el ofrecimiento que me habéis hecho, el cual me ha puesto en obligación de satisfaceros en todo lo que me habéis pedido, puesto que temo que la relación que os hiciere de mis desdichas os ha de causar, al par de la compasión, la pesadumbre, porque no habéis de hallar remedio para remediarlas ni consuelo para entretenerlas. Pero, con todo esto, porque no ande vacilando mi honra en vuestras intenciones, habiéndome ya conocido por mujer y viéndome moza, sola y en este traje, cosas todas juntas, y cada una por sí, que pueden echar por tierra cualquier honesto crédito, os habré de decir lo que quisiera callar si pudiera.

Todo esto dijo sin parar la que tan hermosa mujer parecía, con tan suelta lengua, con voz tan suave, que no menos les admiró su discreción que su hermosura. Y, tornándole a hacer nuevos ofrecimientos y nuevos ruegos para que lo prometido cumpliera, ella, sin hacerse más de rogar, calzándose con toda honestidad y recogiendo sus cabellos, se acomodó en el asiento de una piedra, y, puestos los tres alrededor della, haciéndose fuerza por detener algunas lágrimas que a los ojos se le venían, con voz reposada y clara, comenzó la historia de su vida desta manera:

-«En esta Andalucía hay un lugar de quien toma título un duque, que le hace uno de los que llaman grandes en España. Éste tiene dos hijos: el mayor, heredero de su estado, y, al parecer, de sus buenas costumbres; y el menor, no sé yo de qué sea heredero, sino de las traiciones de Vellido y de los embustes de Galalón. Deste señor son vasallos mis padres, humildes en linaje, pero tan ricos que si los bienes de su naturaleza igualaran a los de su fortuna, ni ellos tuvieran

más que desear ni yo temiera verme en la desdicha en que me veo; porque quizá nace mi poca ventura de la que no tuvieron ellos en no haber nacido ilustres. Bien es verdad que no son tan bajos que puedan afrentarse de su estado, ni tan altos que a mí me quiten la imaginación que tengo de que de su humildad viene mi desgracia. Ellos, en fin, son labradores, gente llana, sin mezcla de alguna raza mal sonante, y, como suele decirse, cristianos viejos ranciosos; pero tan ricos que su riqueza y magnífico trato les va poco a poco adquiriendo nombre de hidalgos, y aun de caballeros. Puesto que de la mayor riqueza y nobleza que ellos se preciaban era de tenerme a mí por hija; y, así por no tener otra ni otro que los heredase como por ser padres, y aficionados, yo era una de las más regaladas hijas que padres jamás regalaron. Era el espejo en que se miraban, el báculo de su vejez, y el sujeto a quien encaminaban, midiéndolos con el cielo, todos sus deseos; de los cuales, por ser ellos tan buenos, los míos no salían un punto. Y del mismo modo que yo era señora de sus ánimos, así lo era de su hacienda: por mí se recibían y despedían los criados; la razón y cuenta de lo que se sembraba y cogía pasaba por mi mano; los molinos de aceite, los lagares del vino, el número del ganado mayor y menor, el de las colmenas. Finalmente, de todo aquello que un tan rico labrador como mi padre puede tener y tiene, tenía yo la cuenta, y era la mayordoma y señora, con tanta solicitud mía y con tanto gusto suyo, que buenamente no acertaré a encarecerlo. Los ratos que del día me quedaban, después de haber dado lo que convenía a los mayores, a capataces y a otros jornaleros, los entretenía en ejercicios que son a las doncellas tan lícitos como necesarios, como son los que ofrece la aguja y la almohadilla, y la rueca muchas veces; y si alguna, por recrear el ánimo, estos ejercicios dejaba, me acogía al entretenimiento de leer algún libro devoto, o a tocar una arpa, porque la experiencia me mostraba que la música compone los ánimos descompuestos y alivia los trabajos que nacen del espíritu.

»Ésta, pues, era la vida que yo tenía en casa de mis padres, la cual, si tan particularmente he contado, no ha sido por ostentación ni por dar a entender que soy rica, sino porque se advierta cuán sin culpa me he venido de aquel buen estado que he dicho al infelice en que ahora me hallo. Es, pues, el caso que, pasando mi vida en tantas ocupaciones y en un encerramiento tal, que al de un monesterio pudiera compararse, sin ser vista, a mi parecer, de otra persona alguna que de los criados de casa, porque los días que iba a misa era tan de mañana, y tan acompañada de mi madre y de otras criadas, y yo tan cubierta y recatada, que apenas vían mis ojos más tierra de aquella donde ponía los pies; y, con todo esto, los del amor, o los de la ociosidad, por mejor decir, a quien los de lince no pueden igualarse, me vieron, puestos en la solicitud de don Fernando, que éste es el nombre del hijo menor del duque que os he contado.»

No hubo bien nombrado a don Fernando la que el cuento contaba, cuando a Cardenio se le mudó la color del rostro, y comenzó a trasudar, con tan grande alteración que el cura y el barbero, que miraron en ello, temieron que le venía aquel accidente de locura que habían oído decir que de cuando en cuando le venía. Mas Cardenio no hizo otra cosa que trasudar y estarse quedo, mirando de hito en hito a la labradora, imaginando quién ella era; la cual, sin advertir en los movimientos de Cardenio, prosiguió su historia diciendo:

-«Y no me hubieron bien visto cuando, según él dijo después, quedó tan preso de mis amores cuanto lo dieron bien a entender sus demostraciones. Mas, por acabar presto con el cuento, que no le tiene, de mis desdichas, quiero pasar en silencio las diligencias que don Fernando hizo para declararme su voluntad. Sobornó toda la gente de mi casa, dio y ofreció dádivas y mercedes a mis parientes. Los días eran todos de fiesta y de regocijo en mi calle; las noches no dejaban dormir a nadie las músicas. Los billetes que, sin saber cómo, a mis manos venían, eran infinitos, llenos de enamoradas razones y ofrecimientos, con menos letras que promesas y juramentos. Todo lo cual no sólo no me ablandaba, pero me endurecía de manera como si fuera mi mortal enemigo, y que todas las obras que para reducirme a su voluntad hacía, las hiciera para el efeto contrario; no porque a mí me pareciese mal la gentileza de don Fernando, ni que tuviese a demasía sus solicitudes; porque me daba un no sé qué de contento verme tan querida y estimada de un tan principal caballero, y no me pesaba ver en sus papeles mis alabanzas: que en esto, por feas que seamos las mujeres, me parece a mí que siempre nos da gusto el oír que nos llaman hermosas.

»Pero a todo esto se opone mi honestidad y los consejos continuos que mis padres me daban, que ya muy al descubierto sabían la voluntad de don Fernando, porque ya a él no se le daba nada de que todo el mundo la supiese. Decíanme mis padres que en sola mi virtud y bondad dejaban y depositaban su honra y fama, y que considerase la desigualdad que había entre mí y don Fernando, y que por aquí echaría de ver que sus pensamientos, aunque él dijese otra cosa, mas se encaminaban a su gusto que a mi provecho; y que si yo quisiese poner en alguna manera algún inconveniente para que él se dejase de su injusta pretensión, que ellos me casarían luego con quien yo más gustase: así de los más principales de nuestro lugar como de todos los circunvecinos, pues todo se podía esperar de su mucha hacienda y de mi buena fama. Con estos ciertos prometimientos, y con la verdad que ellos me decían, fortificaba yo mi entereza, y jamás quise responder a don Fernando palabra que le pudiese mostrar, aunque de muy lejos, esperanza de alcanzar su deseo.

»Todos estos recatos míos, que él debía de tener por desdenes, debieron de ser causa de avivar más su lascivo apetito, que este nombre quiero dar a la voluntad

que me mostraba; la cual, si ella fuera como debía, no la supiérades vosotros ahora, porque hubiera faltado la ocasión de decíroslo. Finalmente, don Fernando supo que mis padres andaban por darme estado, por quitalle a él la esperanza de poseerme, o, a lo menos, porque yo tuviese más guardas para guardarme; y esta nueva o sospecha fue causa para que hiciese lo que ahora oiréis. Y fue que una noche, estando yo en mi aposento con sola la compañía de una doncella que me servía, teniendo bien cerradas las puertas, por temor que, por descuido, mi honestidad no se viese en peligro, sin saber ni imaginar cómo, en medio destos recatos y prevenciones, y en la soledad deste silencio y encierro, me le hallé delante, cuya vista me turbó de manera que me quitó la de mis ojos y me enmudeció la lengua; y así, no fui poderosa de dar voces, ni aun él creo que me las dejara dar, porque luego se llegó a mí, y, tomándome entre sus brazos (porque yo, como digo, no tuve fuerzas para defenderme, según estaba turbada), comenzó a decirme tales razones, que no sé cómo es posible que tenga tanta habilidad la mentira que las sepa componer de modo que parezcan tan verdaderas. Hacía el traidor que sus lágrimas acreditasen sus palabras y los suspiros su intención. Yo, pobrecilla, sola entre los míos, mal ejercitada en casos semejantes, comencé, no sé en qué modo, a tener por verdaderas tantas falsedades, pero no de suerte que me moviesen a compasión menos que buena sus lágrimas y suspiros.

»Y así, pasándoseme aquel sobresalto primero, torné algún tanto a cobrar mis perdidos espíritus, y con más ánimo del que pensé que pudiera tener, le dije: “Si como estoy, señor, en tus brazos, estuviera entre los de un león fiero y el librarme dellos se me asegurara con que hiciera, o dijera, cosa que fuera en perjuicio de mi honestidad, así fuera posible hacella o decilla como es posible dejar de haber sido lo que fue. Así que, si tú tienes ceñido mi cuerpo con tus brazos, yo tengo atada mi alma con mis buenos deseos, que son tan diferentes de los tuyos como lo verás si con hacerme fuerza quisieres pasar adelante en ellos. Tu vasalla soy, pero no tu esclava; ni tiene ni debe tener imperio la nobleza de tu sangre para deshonar y tener en poco la humildad de la mía; y en tanto me estimo yo, villana y labradora, como tú, señor y caballero. Conmigo no han de ser de ningún efecto tus fuerzas, ni han de tener valor tus riquezas, ni tus palabras han de poder engañarme, ni tus suspiros y lágrimas enternecerme. Si alguna de todas estas cosas que he dicho viera yo en el que mis padres me dieran por esposo, a su voluntad se ajustara la mía, y mi voluntad de la suya no saliera; de modo que, como quedara con honra, aunque quedara sin gusto, de grado te entregara lo que tú, señor, ahora con tanta fuerza procuras. Todo esto he dicho porque no es pensar que de mí alcance cosa alguna el que no fuere mi legítimo esposo”. “Si no reparas más que en eso, bellísima Dorotea -(que éste es el nombre desta desdichada), dijo el desleal caballero-, ves: aquí te doy la mano de serlo tuyo, y sean testigos desta verdad los cielos, a quien ninguna cosa se asconde, y esta imagen de Nuestra Señora que aquí tienes”.»

Cuando Cardenio le oyó decir que se llamaba Dorotea, tornó de nuevo a sus sobresaltos y acabó de confirmar por verdadera su primera opinión; pero no quiso interrromper el cuento, por ver en qué venía a parar lo que él ya casi sabía; sólo dijo:

-¿Que Dorotea es tu nombre, señora? Otra he oído yo decir del mismo, que quizá corre parejas con tus desdichas. Pasa adelante, que tiempo vendrá en que te diga cosas que te espanten en el mismo grado que te lastimen.

Reparó Dorotea en las razones de Cardenio y en su estraño y desastrado traje, y rogóle que si alguna cosa de su hacienda sabía, se la dijese luego; porque si algo le había dejado bueno la fortuna, era el ánimo que tenía para sufrir cualquier desastre que le sobreviniese, segura de que, a su parecer, ninguno podía llegar que el que tenía acrecentase un punto.

-No le perdiera yo, señora -respondió Cardenio-, en decirte lo que pienso, si fuera verdad lo que imagino; y hasta ahora no se pierde coyuntura, ni a ti te importa nada el saberlo.

-Sea lo que fuere -respondió Dorotea-, «lo que en mi cuento pasa fue que, tomando don Fernando una imagen que en aquel aposento estaba, la puso por testigo de nuestro desposorio. Con palabras eficacísimas y juramentos extraordinarios, me dio la palabra de ser mi marido, puesto que, antes que acabase de decirlas, le dije que mirase bien lo que hacía y que considerase el enojo que su padre había de recibir de verle casado con una villana vasalla suya; que no le cegase mi hermosura, tal cual era, pues no era bastante para hallar en ella disculpa de su yerro, y que si algún bien me quería hacer, por el amor que me tenía, fuese dejar correr mi suerte a lo igual de lo que mi calidad podía, porque nunca los tan desiguales casamientos se gozan ni duran mucho en aquel gusto con que se comienzan.

»Todas estas razones que aquí he dicho le dije, y otras muchas de que no me acuerdo, pero no fueron parte para que él dejase de seguir su intento, bien ansí como el que no piensa pagar, que, al concertar de la barata, no repara en inconvenientes. Yo, a esta sazón, hice un breve discurso conmigo, y me dije a mí mesma: “Sí, que no seré yo la primera que por vía de matrimonio haya subido de humilde a grande estado, ni será don Fernando el primero a quien hermosura, o ciega afición, que es lo más cierto, haya hecho tomar compañía desigual a su grandeza. Pues si no hago ni mundo ni uso nuevo, bien es acudir a esta honra que la suerte me ofrece, puesto que en éste no dure más la voluntad que me muestra de cuanto dure el cumplimiento de su deseo; que, en fin, para con Dios seré su esposa. Y si quiero con desdenes despedille, en término le veo que, no usando el que debe, usará el de la fuerza y vendré a quedar deshonorada y sin disculpa de la culpa que me podía dar el que no supiere cuán sin ella he venido a este punto. Porque, ¿qué razones serán bastantes para persuadir a mis padres, y a otros, que este caballero entró en mi aposento sin consentimiento mío?”

»Todas estas demandas y respuestas revolví yo en un instante en la imaginación; y, sobre todo, me comenzaron a hacer fuerza y a inclinarme a lo que fue, sin yo pensarlo, mi perdición: los juramentos de don Fernando, los testigos que ponía, las lágrimas que derramaba, y, finalmente, su disposición y gentileza, que, acompañada con tantas muestras de verdadero amor, pudieran rendir a otro tan libre y recatado corazón como el mío. Llamé a mi criada, para que en la tierra acompañase a los testigos del cielo; tornó don Fernando a reiterar y confirmar sus juramentos; añadió a los primeros nuevos santos por testigos; echóse mil futuras maldiciones, si no cumpliese lo que me prometía; volvió a humedecer sus ojos y a acrecentar sus suspiros; apretóme más entre sus brazos, de los cuales jamás me había dejado; y con esto, y con volverse a salir del aposento mi doncella, yo dejé de serlo y él acabó de ser traidor y fementido.

»El día que sucedió a la noche de mi desgracia se venía aun no tan apriesa como yo pienso que don Fernando deseaba, porque, después de cumplido aquello que el apetito pide, el mayor gusto que puede venir es apartarse de donde le alcanzaron. Digo esto porque don Fernando dio prisa por partirse de mí, y, por industria de mi doncella, que era la misma que allí le había traído, antes que amaneciese se vio en la calle. Y, al despedirse de mí, aunque no con tanto ahínco y vehemencia como cuando vino, me dijo que estuviese segura de su fe y de ser firmes y verdaderos sus juramentos; y, para más confirmación de su palabra, sacó un rico anillo del dedo y lo puso en el mío. En efecto, él se fue y yo quedé ni sé si triste o alegre; esto sé bien decir: que quedé confusa y pensativa, y casi fuera de mí con el nuevo acaecimiento, y no tuve ánimo, o no se me acordó, de reñir a mi doncella por la traición cometida de encerrar a don Fernando en mi mismo aposento, porque aún no me determinaba si era bien o mal el que me había sucedido. Díjele, al partir, a don Fernando que por el mismo camino de aquélla podía verme otras noches, pues ya era suya, hasta que, cuando él quisiese, aquel hecho se publicase. Pero no vino otra alguna, si no fue la siguiente, ni yo pude verle en la calle ni en la iglesia en más de un mes; que en vano me cansé en solicitallo, puesto que supe que estaba en la villa y que los más días iba a caza, ejercicio de que él era muy aficionado.

»Estos días y estas horas bien sé yo que para mí fueron aciagos y menguadas, y bien sé que comencé a dudar en ellos, y aun a descreer de la fe de don Fernando; y sé también que mi doncella oyó entonces las palabras que en reprehensión de su atrevimiento antes no había oído; y sé que me fue forzoso tener cuenta con mis lágrimas y con la compostura de mi rostro, por no dar ocasión a que mis padres me preguntasen que de qué andaba descontenta y me obligasen a buscar mentiras que decilles. Pero todo esto se acabó en un punto, llegándose uno donde se atropellaron respetos y se acabaron los honrados discursos, y adonde se perdió la paciencia y salieron a plaza mis secretos pensamientos. Y esto fue porque, de allí a pocos días, se dijo en el lugar como en una ciudad allí cerca se había casado don Fernando con una doncella hermosísima en todo extremo, y de muy principales padres, aunque no tan rica que, por la dote, pudiera aspirar a tan noble casamiento. Díjose que se llamaba Luscinda, con otras cosas que en sus desposorios sucedieron dignas de admiración.»

Oyó Cardenio el nombre de Luscinda, y no hizo otra cosa que encoger los hombros, morderse los labios, enarcar las cejas y dejar de allí a poco caer por sus ojos dos fuentes de lágrimas. Mas no por esto dejó Dorotea de seguir su cuento, diciendo:

-«Llegó esta triste nueva a mis oídos, y, en lugar de helárseme el corazón en oílla, fue tanta la cólera y rabia que se encendió en él, que faltó poco para no salirme por las calles dando voces, publicando la alevosía y traición que se me había hecho. Mas templóse esta furia por entonces con pensar de poner aquella misma noche por obra lo que puse: que fue ponerme en este hábito, que me dio uno de los que llaman zagales en casa de los labradores, que era criado de mi padre, al cual descubrí toda mi desventura, y le rogué me acompañase hasta la ciudad donde entendí que mi enemigo estaba. Él, después que hubo reprehendido mi atrevimiento y afeado mi determinación, viéndome resuelta en mi parecer, se ofreció a tenerme compañía, como él dijo, hasta el cabo del mundo. Luego, al momento, encerré en una almohada de lienzo un vestido de mujer, y algunas joyas y dineros, por lo que podía suceder. Y en el silencio de aquella noche, sin dar cuenta a mi traidora doncella, salí de mi casa, acompañada de mi criado y de muchas imaginaciones, y me puse en camino de la ciudad a pie, llevada en vuelo del deseo de llegar, ya que no a estorbar lo que tenía por hecho, a lo menos a decir a don Fernando me dijese con qué alma lo había hecho.

»Llegué en dos días y medio donde quería, y, en entrando por la ciudad, pregunté por la casa de los padres de Luscinda, y al primero a quien hice la pregunta me respondió más de lo que yo quisiera oír. Díjome la casa y todo lo que había sucedido en el desposorio de su hija, cosa tan pública en la ciudad, que se hace en corrillos para contarla por toda ella. Díjome que la noche que don Fernando se desposó con Luscinda, después de haber ella dado el sí de ser su esposa, le había tomado un recio desmayo, y que, llegando su esposo a desabrocharle el pecho para que le diese el aire, le halló un papel escrito de la misma letra de Luscinda, en que decía y declaraba que ella no podía ser esposa de don Fernando, porque lo era de Cardenio, que, a lo que el hombre me dijo, era un caballero muy principal de la misma ciudad; y que si había dado el sí a don Fernando, fue por no salir de la obediencia de sus padres. En resolución, tales razones dijo que contenía el papel, que daba a entender que ella había tenido intención de matarse en acabándose de desposar, y daba allí las razones por que se había quitado la vida. Todo lo cual dicen que confirmó una daga que le hallaron no sé en qué parte de sus vestidos. Todo lo cual visto por don Fernando, pareciéndole que Luscinda le había burlado y escarnecido y tenido en poco, arremetió a ella, antes que de su desmayo volviese, y con la misma daga que le hallaron la quiso dar de puñaladas; y lo hiciera si sus padres y los que se hallaron presentes no se lo estorbaran. Dijeron más: que luego se ausentó don Fernando, y que Luscinda no había vuelto de su parasismo hasta otro día, que contó a sus padres cómo ella era verdadera esposa de aquel Cardenio que he dicho. Supe más: que el Cardenio, según decían, se halló presente en los desposorios, y que, en viéndola desposada, lo cual él jamás pensó, se salió de la ciudad desesperado, dejándole primero escrita una carta, donde daba a entender el agravio que Luscinda le había hecho, y de cómo él se iba adonde gentes no le viesen.

»Esto todo era público y notorio en toda la ciudad, y todos hablaban dello; y más hablaron cuando supieron que Luscinda había faltado de casa de sus padres y de la ciudad, pues no la hallaron en toda ella, de que perdían el juicio sus padres y no sabían qué medio se tomar para hallarla. Esto que supe puso en bando mis esperanzas, y tuve por mejor no haber hallado a don Fernando, que no hallarle casado, pareciéndome que aún no estaba del todo cerrada la puerta a mi remedio, dándome yo a entender que podría ser que el cielo hubiese puesto aquel impedimento en el segundo matrimonio, por atraerle a conocer lo que al primero debía, y a caer en la cuenta de que era cristiano y que estaba más obligado a su alma que a los respetos humanos. Todas estas cosas revolvía en mi fantasía, y me consolaba sin tener consuelo, fingiendo unas esperanzas largas y desmayadas, para entretener la vida, que ya aborrezco.

»Estando, pues, en la ciudad, sin saber qué hacerme, pues a don Fernando no hallaba, llegó a mis oídos un público pregón, donde se prometía grande hallazgo a quien me hallase, dando las señas de la edad y del mismo traje que traía; y oí decir que se decía que me había sacado de casa de mis padres el mozo que conmigo vino, cosa que me llegó al alma, por ver cuán de caída andaba mi crédito, pues no bastaba perderle con mi venida, sino añadir el con quién, siendo sujeto tan bajo y tan indigno de mis buenos pensamientos. Al punto que oí el pregón, me salí de la ciudad con mi criado, que ya comenzaba a dar muestras de titubear en la fe que de fidelidad me tenía prometida, y aquella noche nos entramos por lo espeso desta montaña, con el miedo de no ser hallados. Pero, como suele decirse que un mal llama a otro, y que el fin de una desgracia suele ser principio de otra mayor, así me sucedió a mí, porque mi buen criado, hasta entonces fiel y seguro, así como me vio en esta soledad, incitado de su mesma bellaquería antes que de mi hermosura, quiso aprovecharse de la ocasión que, a su parecer, estos yermos le ofrecían; y, con poca vergüenza y menos temor de Dios ni respeto mío, me requirió de amores; y, viendo que yo con feas y justas palabras respondía a las desvergüenzas de sus propósitos, dejó aparte los ruegos, de quien primero pensó aprovecharse, y comenzó a usar de la fuerza. Pero el justo cielo, que pocas o ningunas veces deja de mirar y favorecer a las justas intenciones, favoreció las mías, de manera que con mis pocas fuerzas, y con poco trabajo, di con él por un derrumbadero, donde le dejé, ni sé si muerto o si vivo; y luego, con más ligereza que mi sobresalto y cansancio pedían, me entré por estas montañas, sin llevar otro pensamiento ni otro disignio que esconderme en ellas y huir de mi padre y de aquellos que de su parte me andaban buscando.

»Con este deseo, ha no sé cuántos meses que entré en ellas, donde hallé un ganadero que me llevó por su criado a un lugar que está en las entrañas desta sierra, al cual he servido de zagal todo este tiempo, procurando estar siempre en el campo por encubrir estos cabellos que ahora, tan sin pensarlo, me han descubierto. Pero toda mi industria y toda mi solicitud fue y ha sido de ningún provecho, pues mi amo vino en conocimiento de que yo no era varón, y nació en él el mismo mal pensamiento que en mi criado; y, como no siempre la fortuna con los trabajos da los remedios, no hallé derrumbadero ni barranco de donde despeñar y despenar al amo, como le hallé para el criado; y así, tuve por menor inconveniente dejalle y asconderme de nuevo entre estas asperezas que probar con él mis fuerzas o mis disculpas. Digo, pues, que me torné a emboscar, y a buscar donde sin impedimento alguno pudiese con suspiros y lágrimas rogar al cielo se duela de mi desventura y me dé industria y favor para salir della, o para dejar la vida entre estas soledades, sin que quede memoria desta triste, que tan sin culpa suya habrá dado materia para que de ella se hable y murmure en la suya y en las ajenas tierras.»

Capítulo XXIX

Que trata de la discreción de la hermosa Dorotea, con otras cosas de mucho gusto y pasatiempo

ESTA es, señores, la verdadera historia de mi tragedia: mirad y juzgad ahora si los suspiros que escuchastes, las palabras que oísteis y las lágrimas que de mis ojos salían, tenían ocasión bastante para mostrarse en mayor abundancia; y, considerada la calidad de mi desgracia, veréis que será en vano el consuelo, pues es imposible el remedio della. Sólo os ruego (lo que con facilidad podréis y debéis hacer) que me aconsejéis dónde podré pasar la vida sin que me acabe el temor y sobresalto que tengo de ser hallada de los que me buscan; que, aunque sé que el mucho amor que mis padres me tienen me asegura que seré dellos bien recibida, es tanta la vergüenza que me ocupa sólo el pensar que, no como ellos pensaban, tengo de parecer a su presencia, que tengo por mejor desterrarme para siempre de ser vista que no verles el rostro, con pensamiento que ellos miran el mío ajeno de la honestidad que de mí se debían de tener prometida.

Calló en diciendo esto, y el rostro se le cubrió de un color que mostró bien claro el sentimiento y vergüenza del alma. En las suyas sintieron los que escuchado la habían tanta lástima como admiración de su desgracia; y, aunque luego quisiera el cura consolarla y aconsejarla, tomó primero la mano Cardenio, diciendo:

-En fin, señora, que tú eres la hermosa Dorotea, la hija única del rico Clenardo.

Admirada quedó Dorotea cuando oyó el nombre de su padre, y de ver cuán de poco era el que le nombraba, porque ya se ha dicho de la mala manera que Cardenio estaba vestido; y así, le dijo:

-Y ¿quién sois vos, hermano, que así sabéis el nombre de mi padre? Porque yo, hasta ahora, si mal no me acuerdo, en todo el discurso del cuento de mi desdicha no le he nombrado.

-Soy -respondió Cardenio-aquel sin ventura que, según vos, señora, habéis dicho, Luscinda dijo que era su esposa. Soy el desdichado Cardenio, a quien el mal término de aquel que a vos os ha puesto en el que estáis me ha traído a que me veáis cual me veis: roto, desnudo, falto de todo humano consuelo y, lo que es peor de todo, falto de juicio, pues no le tengo sino cuando al cielo se le antoja dármele por algún breve espacio. Yo, Teodora, soy el que me hallé presente a las sinrazones de don Fernando, y el que aguardó oír el sí que de ser su esposa pronunció Luscinda. Yo soy el que no tuvo ánimo para ver en qué paraba su desmayo, ni lo que resultaba del papel que le fue hallado en el pecho, porque no tuvo el alma sufrimiento para ver tantas desventuras juntas; y así, dejé la casa y la paciencia, y una carta que dejé a un huésped mío, a quien rogué que en manos de Luscinda la pusiese, y víneme a estas soledades, con intención de acabar en ellas la vida, que desde aquel punto aborrecí como mortal enemiga mía. Mas no ha querido la suerte quitármela, contentándose con quitarme el juicio, quizá por guardarme para la buena ventura que he tenido en hallaros; pues, siendo verdad, como creo que lo es, lo que aquí habéis contado, aún podría ser que a entrambos nos tuviese el cielo guardado mejor suceso en nuestros desastres que nosotros pensamos. Porque, presupuesto que Luscinda no puede casarse con don Fernando, por ser mía, ni don Fernando con ella, por ser vuestro, y haberlo ella tan manifiestamente declarado, bien podemos esperar que el cielo nos restituya lo que es nuestro, pues está todavía en ser, y no se ha enajenado ni deshecho. Y, pues este consuelo tenemos, nacido no de muy remota esperanza, ni fundado en desvariadas imaginaciones, suplícoos, señora, que toméis otra resolución en vuestros honrados pensamientos, pues yo la pienso tomar en los míos, acomodándoos a esperar mejor fortuna; que yo os juro, por la fe de caballero y de cristiano, de no desampararos hasta veros en poder de don Fernando, y que, cuando con razones no le pudiere atraer a que conozca lo que os debe, de usar entonces la libertad que me concede el ser caballero, y poder con justo título desafialle, en razón de la sinrazón que os hace, sin acordarme de mis agravios, cuya venganza dejaré al cielo por acudir en la tierra a los vuestros.

Con lo que Cardenio dijo se acabó de admirar Dorotea, y, por no saber qué gracias volver a tan grandes ofrecimientos, quiso tomarle los pies para besárselos; mas no lo consintió Cardenio, y el licenciado respondió por entrambos, y aprobó el buen discurso de Cardenio, y, sobre todo, les rogó, aconsejó y persuadió que se fuesen con él a su aldea, donde se podrían reparar de las cosas que les faltaban, y que allí se daría orden cómo buscar a don Fernando, o cómo llevar a Dorotea a sus padres, o hacer lo que más les pareciese conveniente. Cardenio y Dorotea se lo agradecieron, y acetaron la merced que se les ofrecía. El barbero, que a todo había estado suspenso y callado, hizo también su buena plática y se ofreció con no menos voluntad que el cura a todo aquello que fuese bueno para servirles.

Contó asimesmo con brevedad la causa que allí los había traído, con la estrañeza de la locura de don Quijote, y cómo aguardaban a su escudero, que había ido a buscallo. Vínosele a la memoria a Cardenio, como por sueños, la pendencia que con don Quijote había tenido y contóla a los demás, mas no supo decir por qué causa fue su quisti6n.

En esto, oyeron voces, y conocieron que el que las daba era Sancho Panza, que, por no haberlos hallado en el lugar donde los dej6, los llamaba a voces. Sali6ronle al encuentro, y, pregunt6ndole por don Quijote, les dijo c6mo le haba hallado desnudo en camisa, flaco, amarillo y muerto de hambre, y suspirando por su se1ora Dulcinea; y que, puesto que le haba dicho que ella le mandaba que saliese de aquel lugar y se fuese al del Toboso, donde le quedaba esperando, haba respondido que estaba determinado de no parecer ante su fermosura fasta que hobiese fecho faza1as que le ficiesen digno de su gracia. Y que si aquello pasaba adelante, corr6a peligro de no venir a ser emperador, como estaba obligado, ni aun arzobispo, que era lo menos que pod6a ser. Por eso, que mirasen lo que se haba de hacer para sacarle de all6.

El licenciado le respondi6 que no tuviese pena, que ellos le sacar6an de all6, mal que le pesase. Cont6 luego a Cardenio y a Dorotea lo que ten6an pensado para remedio de don Quijote, a lo menos para llevarle a su casa. A lo cual dijo Dorotea que ella har6a la doncella menesterosa mejor que el barbero, y m6s, que ten6a all6 vestidos con que hacerlo al natural, y que la dejasen el cargo de saber representar todo aquello que fuese menester para llevar adelante su intento, porque ella haba le6do muchos libros de caballer6as y sab6a bien el estilo que ten6an las doncellas cuitadas cuando ped6an sus dones a los andantes caballeros.

-Pues no es menester m6s -dijo el cura-sino que luego se ponga por obra; que, sin duda, la buena suerte se muestra en favor nuestro, pues, tan sin pensarlo, a vosotros, se1ores, se os ha comenzado a abrir puerta para vuestro remedio y a nosotros se nos ha facilitado la que hab6amos menester.

Sac6 luego Dorotea de su almohada una saya entera de cierta telilla rica y una mantellina de otra vistosa tela verde, y de una cajita un collar y otras joyas, con que en un instante se adorn6 de manera que una rica y gran se1ora parec6a. Todo aquello, y m6s, dijo que haba sacado de su casa para lo que se ofreciese, y que hasta entonces no se le haba ofrecido ocasi6n de habello menester. A todos content6 en extremo su mucha gracia, donaire y hermosura, y confirmaron a don Fernando por de poco conocimiento, pues tanta belleza desechaba.

Pero el que m6s se admir6 fue Sancho Panza, por parecerle -como era as6 verdad-que en todos los d6as de su vida haba visto tan hermosa criatura; y as6, pregunt6 al cura con grande ah6nco le dijese qui6n era aquella tan fermosa se1ora, y qu6 era lo que buscaba por aquellos andurriales.

-Esta hermosa se1ora -respondi6 el cura-, Sancho hermano, es, como quien no dice nada, es la heredera por l6nea recta de var6n del gran reino de Micomic6n, la cual viene en busca de vuestro amo a pedirle un don, el cual es que le desfaga un tuerto o agravio que un mal gigante le tiene fecho; y, a la fama que de buen caballero vuestro amo tiene por todo lo descubierto, de Guinea ha venido a buscarle esta princesa.

-Dichosa buscada y dichoso hallazgo -dijo a esta sazón Sancho Panza-, y más si mi amo es tan venturoso que desfaga ese agravio y enderece ese tuerto, matando a ese hideputa dese gigante que vuestra merced dice; que sí matará si él le encuentra, si ya no fuese fantasma, que contra las fantasmas no tiene mi señor poder alguno. Pero una cosa quiero suplicar a vuestra merced, entre otras, señor licenciado, y es que, porque a mi amo no le tome gana de ser arzobispo, que es lo que yo temo, que vuestra merced le aconseje que se case luego con esta princesa, y así quedará imposibilitado de recibir órdenes arzobispales y vendrá con facilidad a su imperio y yo al fin de mis deseos; que yo he mirado bien en ello y hallo por mi cuenta que no me está bien que mi amo sea arzobispo, porque yo soy inútil para la Iglesia, pues soy casado, y andarme ahora a traer dispensaciones para poder tener renta por la Iglesia, teniendo, como tengo, mujer y hijos, sería nunca acabar. Así que, señor, todo el toque está en que mi amo se case luego con esta señora, que hasta ahora no sé su gracia, y así, no la llamo por su nombre.

-Llámase -respondió el cura-la princesa Micomicona, porque, llamándose su reino Micomicón, claro está que ella se ha de llamar así.

-No hay duda en eso -respondió Sancho-, que yo he visto a muchos tomar el apellido y alcurnia del lugar donde nacieron, llamándose Pedro de Alcalá, Juan de Úbeda y Diego de Valladolid; y esto mismo se debe de usar allá en Guinea: tomar las reinas los nombres de sus reinos.

-Así debe de ser -dijo el cura-; y en lo del casarse vuestro amo, yo haré en ello todos mis poderíos.

Con lo que quedó tan contento Sancho cuanto el cura admirado de su simplicidad, y de ver cuán encajados tenía en la fantasía los mismos disparates que su amo, pues sin alguna duda se daba a entender que había de venir a ser emperador.

Ya, en esto, se había puesto Dorotea sobre la mula del cura y el barbero se había acomodado al rostro la barba de la cola de buey, y dijeron a Sancho que los guiase adonde don Quijote estaba; al cual advirtieron que no dijese que conocía al licenciado ni al barbero, porque en no conocerlos consistía todo el toque de venir a ser emperador su amo; puesto que ni el cura ni Cardenio quisieron ir con ellos, porque no se le acordase a don Quijote la pendencia que con Cardenio había tenido, y el cura porque no era menester por entonces su presencia. Y así, los dejaron ir delante, y ellos los fueron siguiendo a pie, poco a poco. No dejó de avisar el cura lo que había de hacer Dorotea; a lo que ella dijo que descuidasen, que todo se haría, sin faltar punto, como lo pedían y pintaban los libros de caballerías.

Tres cuartos de legua habrían andado, cuando descubrieron a don Quijote entre unas intrincadas peñas, ya vestido, aunque no armado; y, así como Dorotea le vio y fue informada de Sancho que aquél era don Quijote, dio del azote a su palafrén, siguiéndole el bien barbado barbero. Y, en llegando junto a él, el escudero se arrojó de la mula y fue a tomar en los brazos a Dorotea, la cual, apeándose con grande desenvoltura, se fue a hincar de rodillas ante las de don Quijote; y, aunque él pugnaba por levantarla, ella, sin levantarse, le fabló en esta guisa:

-De aquí no me levantaré, ¡oh valeroso y esforzado caballero!, fasta que la vuestra bondad y cortesía me otorgue un don, el cual redundará en honra y prez de vuestra persona, y en pro de la más desconsolada y agraviada doncella que el sol ha visto. Y si es que el valor de vuestro fuerte brazo corresponde a la voz de vuestra inmortal fama, obligado estáis a favorecer a la sin ventura que de tan lueñas tierras viene, al olor de vuestro famoso nombre, buscándoos para remedio de sus desdichas.

-No os responderé palabra, hermosa señora -respondió don Quijote-, ni oiré más cosa de vuestra hacienda, fasta que os levantéis de tierra.

-No me levantaré, señor -respondió la afligida doncella-, si primero, por la vuestra cortesía, no me es otorgado el don que pido.

-Yo vos le otorgo y concedo -respondió don Quijote-, como no se haya de cumplir en daño o mengua de mi rey, de mi patria y de aquella que de mi corazón y libertad tiene la llave.

-No será en daño ni en mengua de los que decís, mi buen señor -replicó la dolorosa doncella.

Y, estando en esto, se llegó Sancho Panza al oído de su señor y muy pasito le dijo:

-Bien puede vuestra merced, señor, concederle el don que pide, que no es cosa de nada: sólo es matar a un gigantazo, y esta que lo pide es la alta princesa Micomicona, reina del gran reino Micomicón de Etiopía.

-Sea quien fuere -respondió don Quijote-, que yo haré lo que soy obligado y lo que me dicta mi conciencia, conforme a lo que profesado tengo.

Y, volviéndose a la doncella, dijo:

-La vuestra gran hermosura se levante, que yo le otorgo el don que pedirme quisiere.

-Pues el que pido es -dijo la doncella- que la vuestra magnánima persona se venga luego conmigo donde yo le llevare, y me prometa que no se ha de entremeter en otra aventura ni demanda alguna hasta darme venganza de un traidor que, contra todo derecho divino y humano, me tiene usurpado mi reino.

-Digo que así lo otorgo -respondió don Quijote-, y así podéis, señora, desde hoy más, desechar la malenconía que os fatiga y hacer que cobre nuevos bríos y fuerzas vuestra desmayada esperanza; que, con el ayuda de Dios y la de mi brazo, vos os veréis presto restituida en vuestro reino y sentada en la silla de vuestro antiguo y grande estado, a pesar y a despecho de los follones que contradecirlo quisieren. Y manos a labor, que en la tardanza dicen que suele estar el peligro.

La menesterosa doncella pugnó, con mucha porfía, por besarle las manos, mas don Quijote, que en todo era comedido y cortés caballero, jamás lo consintió; antes, la hizo levantar y la abrazó con mucha cortesía y comedimiento, y mandó a Sancho que requiriese las cinchas a Rocinante y le armase luego al punto. Sancho descolgó las armas, que, como trofeo, de un árbol estaban pendientes, y, requiriendo las cinchas, en un punto armó a su señor; el cual, viéndose armado, dijo:

-Vamos de aquí, en el nombre de Dios, a favorecer esta gran señora.

Estábase el barbero aún de rodillas, teniendo gran cuenta de disimular la risa y de que no se le cayese la barba, con cuya caída quizá quedaran todos sin conseguir su buena intención; y, viendo que ya el don estaba concedido y con la diligencia que don Quijote se alistaba para ir a cumplirle, se levantó y tomó de la otra mano a su señora, y entre los dos la subieron en la mula. Luego subió don Quijote sobre Rocinante, y el barbero se acomodó en su cabalgadura, quedándose Sancho a pie, donde de nuevo se le renovó la pérdida del rucio, con la falta que entonces le hacía; mas todo lo llevaba con gusto, por parecerle que ya su señor estaba puesto en camino, y muy a pique de ser emperador; porque sin duda alguna pensaba que se había de casar con aquella princesa, y ser, por lo menos, rey de Micomicón. Sólo le daba pesadumbre el pensar que aquel reino era en tierra de negros, y que la gente que por sus vasallos le diesen habían de ser todos negros; a lo cual hizo luego en su imaginación un buen remedio, y díjose a sí mismo:

-¿Qué se me da a mí que mis vasallos sean negros? ¿Habrás más que cargar con ellos y traerlos a España, donde los podré vender, y adonde me los pagarán de contado, de cuyo dinero podré comprar algún título o algún oficio con que vivir descansado todos los días de mi vida? ¡No, sino dormíos, y no tengáis ingenio ni habilidad para disponer de las cosas y para vender treinta o diez mil vasallos en dácame esas pajas! Par Dios que los he de volar, chico con grande, o como pudiere, y que, por negros que sean, los he de volver blancos o amarillos. ¡Llegaos, que me mamo el dedo!

Con esto, andaba tan solícito y tan contento que se le olvidaba la pesadumbre de caminar a pie.

Todo esto miraban de entre unas breñas Cardenio y el cura, y no sabían qué hacerse para juntarse con ellos; pero el cura, que era gran tracista, imaginó luego lo que harían para conseguir lo que deseaban; y fue que con unas tijeras que traía en un estuche quitó con mucha presteza la barba a Cardenio, y vistióle un capotillo pardo que él traía y diole un herreruelo negro, y él se quedó en calzas y en jubón; y quedó tan otro de lo que antes parecía Cardenio, que él mismo no se conociera, aunque a un espejo se mirara. Hecho esto, puesto ya que los otros habían pasado adelante en tanto que ellos se disfrazaron, con facilidad salieron al camino real antes que ellos, porque las malezas y malos pasos de aquellos lugares no concedían que anduviesen tanto los de a caballo como los de a pie. En efeto, ellos se pusieron en el llano, a la salida de la sierra, y, así como salió della don Quijote y sus camaradas, el cura se le puso a mirar muy de espacio, dando señales de que le iba reconociendo; y, al cabo de haberle una buena pieza estado mirando, se fue a él abiertos los brazos y diciendo a voces:

-Para bien sea hallado el espejo de la caballería, el mi buen compatriote don Quijote de la Mancha, la flor y la nata de la gentileza, el amparo y remedio de los menesterosos, la quintaesencia de los caballeros andantes.

Y, diciendo esto, tenía abrazado por la rodilla de la pierna izquierda a don Quijote; el cual, espantado de lo que veía y oía decir y hacer aquel hombre, se le puso a mirar con atención, y, al fin, le conoció y quedó como espantado de verle, y hizo grande fuerza por apearse; mas el cura no lo consintió, por lo cual don Quijote decía:

-Déjeme vuestra merced, señor licenciado, que no es razón que yo esté a caballo, y una tan reverenda persona como vuestra merced esté a pie.

-Eso no consentiré yo en ningún modo -dijo el cura-: estése la vuestra grandeza a caballo, pues estando a caballo acaba las mayores fazañas y aventuras que en nuestra edad se han visto; que a mí, aunque indigno sacerdote, bastaráme subir en las ancas de una destas mulas destes señores que con vuestra merced caminan, si no lo han por enojo. Y aun haré cuenta que voy caballero sobre el caballo Pegaso, o sobre la cebra o alfana en que cabalgaba aquel famoso moro Muzaraque, que aún hasta ahora yace encantado en la gran cuesta Zulema, que dista poco de la gran Compluto.

-Aún no caía yo en tanto, mi señor licenciado -respondió don Quijote-; y yo sé que mi señora la princesa será servida, por mi amor, de mandar a su escudero dé a vuestra merced la silla de su mula, que él podrá acomodarse en las ancas, si es que ella las sufre.

-Sí sufre, a lo que yo creo -respondió la princesa-; y también sé que no será menester mandárselo al señor mi escudero, que él es tan cortés y tan cortesano que no consentirá que una persona eclesiástica vaya a pie, pudiendo ir a caballo.

-Así es -respondió el barbero.

Y, apeándose en un punto, convidó al cura con la silla, y él la tomó sin hacerse mucho de rogar. Y fue el mal que al subir a las ancas el barbero, la mula, que, en efeto, era de alquiler, que para decir que era mala esto basta, alzó un poco los cuartos traseros y dio dos coces en el aire, que, a darlas en el pecho de maese Nicolás, o en la cabeza, él diera al diablo la venida por don Quijote. Con todo eso, le sobresaltaron de manera que cayó en el suelo, con tan poco cuidado de las barbas, que se le cayeron en el suelo; y, como se vio sin ellas, no tuvo otro remedio sino acudir a cubrirse el rostro con ambas manos y a quejarse que le habían derribado las muelas. Don Quijote, como vio todo aquel mazo de barbas, sin quijadas y sin sangre, lejos del rostro del escudero caído, dijo:

-¡Vive Dios, que es gran milagro éste! ¡Las barbas le ha derribado y arrancado del rostro, como si las quitaran aposta!

El cura, que vio el peligro que corría su invención de ser descubierta, acudió luego a las barbas y fuese con ellas adonde yacía maese Nicolás, dando aún voces todavía, y de un golpe, llegándole la cabeza a su pecho, se las puso, murmurando sobre él unas palabras, que dijo que era cierto ensalmo apropiado para pegar barbas, como lo verían; y, cuando se las tuvo puestas, se apartó, y quedó el escudero tan bien barbado y tan sano como de antes, de que se admiró don Quijote sobremanera, y rogó al cura que cuando tuviese lugar le enseñase aquel ensalmo; que él entendía que su virtud a más que pegar barbas se debía de estender, pues estaba claro que de donde las barbas se quitasen había de quedar la carne llagada y maltrecha, y que, pues todo lo sanaba, a más que barbas aprovechaba.

-Así es -dijo el cura, y prometió de enseñársele en la primera ocasión.

Concertáronse que por entonces subiese el cura, y a trechos se fuesen los tres mudando, hasta que llegasen a la venta, que estaría hasta dos leguas de allí. Puestos los tres a caballo, es a saber, don Quijote, la princesa y el cura, y los tres a pie, Cardenio, el barbero y Sancho Panza, don Quijote dijo a la doncella:

-Vuestra grandeza, señora mía, guíe por donde más gusto le diere.

Y, antes que ella respondiese, dijo el licenciado:

-¿Hacia qué reino quiere guiar la vuestra señoría? ¿Es, por ventura, hacia el de Micomicón?; que sí debe de ser, o yo sé poco de reinos.

Ella, que estaba bien en todo, entendió que había de responder que sí; y así, dijo:

-Sí, señor, hacia ese reino es mi camino.

-Si así es -dijo el cura-, por la mitad de mi pueblo hemos de pasar, y de allí tomará vuestra merced la derrota de Cartagena, donde se podrá embarcar con la buena ventura; y si hay viento próspero, mar tranquilo y sin borrasca, en poco

menos de nueve años se podrá estar a vista de la gran laguna Meona, digo, Meótides, que está poco más de cien jornadas más acá del reino de vuestra grandeza.

-Vuestra merced está engañado, señor mío -dijo ella-, porque no ha dos años que yo partí dél, y en verdad que nunca tuve buen tiempo, y, con todo eso, he llegado a ver lo que tanto deseaba, que es al señor don Quijote de la Mancha, cuyas nuevas llegaron a mis oídos así como puse los pies en España, y ellas me movieron a buscarle, para encomendarme en su cortesía y fiar mi justicia del valor de su invencible brazo.

-No más: cesen mis alabanzas -dijo a esta sazón don Quijote-, porque soy enemigo de todo género de adulación; y, aunque ésta no lo sea, todavía ofenden mis castas orejas semejantes pláticas. Lo que yo sé decir, señora mía, que ora tenga valor o no, el que tuviere o no tuviere se ha de emplear en vuestro servicio hasta perder la vida; y así, dejando esto para su tiempo, ruego al señor licenciado me diga qué es la causa que le ha traído por estas partes, tan solo, y tan sin criados, y tan a la ligera, que me pone espanto.

-A eso yo responderé con brevedad -respondió el cura-, porque sabrá vuestra merced, señor don Quijote, que yo y maese Nicolás, nuestro amigo y nuestro barbero, íbamos a Sevilla a cobrar cierto dinero que un pariente mío que ha muchos años que pasó a Indias me había enviado, y no tan pocos que no pasan de sesenta mil pesos ensayados, que es otro que tal; y, pasando ayer por estos lugares, nos salieron al encuentro cuatro salteadores y nos quitaron hasta las barbas; y de modo nos las quitaron, que le convino al barbero ponérselas postizas; y aun a este mancebo que aquí va -señalando a Cardenio-le pusieron como de nuevo. Y es lo bueno que es pública fama por todos estos contornos que los que nos saltearon son de unos galeotes que dicen que libertó, casi en este mismo sitio, un hombre tan valiente que, a pesar del comisario y de las guardas, los soltó a todos; y, sin duda alguna, él debía de estar fuera de juicio, o debe de ser tan grande bellaco como ellos, o algún hombre sin alma y sin conciencia, pues quiso soltar al lobo entre las ovejas, a la raposa entre las gallinas, a la mosca entre la miel; quiso defraudar la justicia, ir contra su rey y señor natural, pues fue contra sus justos mandamientos. Quiso, digo, quitar a las galeras sus pies, poner en alboroto a la Santa Hermandad, que había muchos años que reposaba; quiso, finalmente, hacer un hecho por donde se pierda su alma y no se gane su cuerpo.

Habíales contado Sancho al cura y al barbero la aventura de los galeotes, que acabó su amo con tanta gloria suya, y por esto cargaba la mano el cura refiriéndola, por ver lo que hacía o decía don Quijote; al cual se le mudaba la color a cada palabra, y no osaba decir que él había sido el libertador de aquella buena gente.

-Éstos, pues -dijo el cura-, fueron los que nos robaron; que Dios, por su misericordia, se lo perdone al que no los dejó llevar al debido suplicio.

Capítulo XXX

Que trata del gracioso artificio y orden que se tuvo en sacar a nuestro enamorado caballero de la asperísima penitencia en que se había puesto

NO HUBO bien acabado el cura, cuando Sancho dijo:

-Pues, mía fe, señor licenciado, el que hizo esa fazaña fue mi amo, y no porque yo no le dije antes y le avisé que mirase lo que hacía, y que era pecado darles libertad, porque todos iban allí por grandísimos bellacos.

-¡Majadero! -dijo a esta sazón don Quijote-, a los caballeros andantes no les toca ni atañe averiguar si los afligidos, encadenados y opresos que encuentran por los caminos van de aquella manera, o están en aquella angustia, por sus culpas o por sus gracias; sólo le toca ayudarles como a menesterosos, poniendo los ojos en sus penas y no en sus bellaquerías. Yo topé un rosario y sarta de gente mohína y desdichada, y hice con ellos lo que mi religión me pide, y lo demás allá se avenga; y a quien mal le ha parecido, salvo la santa dignidad del señor licenciado y su honrada persona, digo que sabe poco de achaque de caballería, y que miente como un hideputa y mal nacido; y esto le haré conocer con mi espada, donde más largamente se contiene.

Y esto dijo afirmándose en los estribos y calándose el morrión; porque la bacía de barbero, que a su cuenta era el yelmo de Mambrino, llevaba colgado del arzón delantero, hasta adobarla del mal tratamiento que la hicieron los galeotes.

Dorotea, que era discreta y de gran donaire, como quien ya sabía el menguado humor de don Quijote y que todos hacían burla dél, sino Sancho Panza, no quiso ser para menos, y, viéndole tan enojado, le dijo:

-Señor caballero, miémbresele a la vuestra merced el don que me tiene prometido, y que, conforme a él, no puede entremeterse en otra aventura, por urgente que sea; sosiegue vuestra merced el pecho, que si el señor licenciado supiera que por ese invicto brazo habían sido librados los galeotes, él se diera tres puntos en la boca, y aun se mordiera tres veces la lengua, antes que haber dicho palabra que en despecho de vuestra merced redundara.

-Eso juro yo bien -dijo el cura-, y aun me hubiera quitado un bigote.

-Yo callaré, señora mía -dijo don Quijote-, y reprimiré la justa cólera que ya en mi pecho se había levantado, y iré quieto y pacífico hasta tanto que os cumpla el don prometido; pero, en pago deste buen deseo, os suplico me digáis, si no se os hace de mal, cuál es la vuestra cuita y cuántas, quiénes y cuáles son las personas de quien os tengo de dar debida, satisfecha y entera venganza.

-Eso haré yo de gana -respondió Dorotea-, si es que no os enfadan oír lástimas y desgracias.

-No enfadaré, señora mía -respondió don Quijote.

A lo que respondió Dorotea:

-Pues así es, esténme vuestras mercedes atentos.

No hubo ella dicho esto, cuando Cardenio y el barbero se le pusieron al lado, deseosos de ver cómo fingía su historia la discreta Dorotea; y lo mismo hizo Sancho, que tan engañado iba con ella como su amo. Y ella, después de haberse puesto bien en la silla y prevenídose con toser y hacer otros ademanes, con mucho donaire, comenzó a decir desta manera:

-«Primeramente, quiero que vuestras mercedes sepan, señores míos, que a mí me llaman...»

Y detúvose aquí un poco, porque se le olvidó el nombre que el cura le había puesto; pero él acudió al remedio, porque entendió en lo que reparaba, y dijo:

-No es maravilla, señora mía, que la vuestra grandeza se turbe y empache contando sus desventuras, que ellas suelen ser tales, que muchas veces quitan la memoria a los que maltratan, de tal manera que aun de sus mismos nombres no se les acuerda, como han hecho con vuestra gran señoría, que se ha olvidado que se llama la princesa Micomicona, legítima heredera del gran reino Micomicón; y con este apuntamiento puede la vuestra grandeza reducir ahora fácilmente a su lastimada memoria todo aquello que contar quisiere.

-Así es la verdad -respondió la doncella-, y desde aquí adelante creo que no será menester apuntarme nada, que yo saldré a buen puerto con mi verdadera historia. «La cual es que el rey mi padre, que se llamaba Tinacrio el Sabidor, fue muy docto en esto que llaman el arte mágica, y alcanzó por su ciencia que mi madre, que se llamaba la reina Jaramilla, había de morir primero que él, y que de allí a poco tiempo él también había de pasar desta vida y yo había de quedar huérfana de padre y madre. Pero decía él que no le fatigaba tanto esto cuanto le ponía en confusión saber, por cosa muy cierta, que un descomunal gigante, señor de una grande ínsula, que casi alinda con nuestro reino, llamado Pandafilando de la Fosca Vista (porque es cosa averiguada que, aunque tiene los ojos en su lugar y derechos, siempre mira al revés, como si fuese bizco, y esto lo hace él de maligno y por poner miedo y espanto a los que mira); digo que supo que este gigante, en sabiendo mi orfandad, había de pasar con gran poderío sobre mi reino y me lo había de quitar todo, sin dejarme una pequeña aldea donde me recogiese; pero que podía escusar toda esta ruina y desgracia si yo me quisiese casar con él; mas, a lo que él entendía, jamás pensaba que me vendría a mí en voluntad de hacer tan desigual casamiento; y dijo en esto la pura verdad, porque

jamás me ha pasado por el pensamiento casarme con aquel gigante, pero ni con otro alguno, por grande y desaforado que fuese. Dijo también mi padre que, después que él fuese muerto y viese yo que Pandafilando comenzaba a pasar sobre mi reino, que no aguardase a ponerme en defensa, porque sería destruirme, sino que libremente le dejase desembarazado el reino, si quería escusar la muerte y total destrucción de mis buenos y leales vasallos, porque no había de ser posible defenderme de la endiablada fuerza del gigante; sino que luego, con algunos de los míos, me pusiese en camino de las Españas, donde hallaría el remedio de mis males hallando a un caballero andante, cuya fama en este tiempo se extendería por todo este reino, el cual se había de llamar, si mal no me acuerdo, don Azote o don Gigote.»

-Don Quijote diría, señora -dijo a esta sazón Sancho Panza-, o, por otro nombre, el Caballero de la Triste Figura.

-Así es la verdad -dijo Dorotea-. «Dijo más: que había de ser alto de cuerpo, seco de rostro, y que en el lado derecho, debajo del hombro izquierdo, o por allí junto, había de tener un lunar pardo con ciertos cabellos a manera de cerdas.»

En oyendo esto don Quijote, dijo a su escudero:

-Ten aquí, Sancho, hijo, ayúdame a desnudar, que quiero ver si soy el caballero que aquel sabio rey dejó profetizado.

-Pues, ¿para qué quiere vuestra merced desnudarse? -dijo Dorotea.

-Para ver si tengo ese lunar que vuestro padre dijo -respondió don Quijote.

-No hay para qué desnudarse -dijo Sancho-, que yo sé que tiene vuestra merced un lunar desas señas en la mitad del espinazo, que es señal de ser hombre fuerte.

-Eso basta -dijo Dorotea-, porque con los amigos no se ha de mirar en pocas cosas, y que esté en el hombro o que esté en el espinazo, importa poco; basta que haya lunar, y esté donde estuviere, pues todo es una misma carne; y, sin duda, acertó mi buen padre en todo, y yo he acertado en encomendarme al señor don Quijote, que él es por quien mi padre dijo, pues las señales del rostro vienen con las de la buena fama que este caballero tiene, no sólo en España, pero en toda la Mancha, pues apenas me hube desembarcado en Osuna, cuando oí decir tantas hazañas tuyas, que luego me dio el alma que era el mismo que venía a buscar.

-Pues, ¿cómo se desembarcó vuestra merced en Osuna, señora mía -preguntó don Quijote-, si no es puerto de mar?

Mas, antes que Dorotea respondiese, tomó el cura la mano y dijo:

-Debe de querer decir la señora princesa que, después que desembarcó en Málaga, la primera parte donde oyó nuevas de vuestra merced fue en Osuna.

-Eso quise decir -dijo Dorotea.

-Y esto lleva camino -dijo el cura-, y prosiga vuestra majestad adelante.

-No hay que proseguir -respondió Dorotea-, sino que, finalmente, mi suerte ha sido tan buena en hallar al señor don Quijote, que ya me cuento y tengo por reina y señora de todo mi reino, pues él, por su cortesía y magnificencia, me ha prometido el don de irse conmigo dondequiera que yo le llevare, que no será a otra parte que a ponerle delante de Pandafilando de la Fosca Vista, para que le mate y me restituya lo que tan contra razón me tiene usurpado: que todo esto ha de suceder a pedir de boca, pues así lo dejó profetizado Tinacrio el Sabidor, mi buen padre; el cual también dejó dicho y escrito en letras caldeas, o griegas, que yo no las sé leer, que si este caballero de la profecía, después de haber degollado al gigante, quisiese casarse conmigo, que yo me otorgase luego sin réplica alguna por su legítima esposa, y le diese la posesión de mi reino, junto con la de mi persona.

-¿Qué te parece, Sancho amigo? -dijo a este punto don Quijote-. ¿No oyes lo que pasa? ¿No te lo dije yo? Mira si tenemos ya reino que mandar y reina con quien casar.

-¡Eso juro yo -dijo Sancho-para el puto que no se casare en abriendo el gaznatico al señor Pandahilado! Pues, ¡monta que es mala la reina! ¡Así se me vuelvan las pulgas de la cama!

Y, diciendo esto, dio dos zapatetas en el aire, con muestras de grandísimo contento, y luego fue a tomar las riendas de la mula de Dorotea, y, haciéndola detener, se hincó de rodillas ante ella, suplicándole le diese las manos para besárselas, en señal que la recibía por su reina y señora. ¿Quién no había de reír de los circustantes, viendo la locura del amo y la simplicidad del criado? En efecto, Dorotea se las dio, y le prometió de hacerle gran señor en su reino, cuando el cielo le hiciese tanto bien que se lo dejase cobrar y gozar. Agradecióselo Sancho con tales palabras que renovó la risa en todos.

-Ésta, señores -prosiguió Dorotea-, es mi historia: sólo resta por deciros que de cuanta gente de acompañamiento saqué de mi reino no me ha quedado sino sólo este buen barbado escudero, porque todos se anegaron en una gran borrasca que tuvimos a vista del puerto, y él y yo salimos en dos tablas a tierra, como por milagro; y así, es todo milagro y misterio el discurso de mi vida, como lo habréis notado. Y si en alguna cosa he andado demasiada, o no tan acertada como debiera, echad la culpa a lo que el señor licenciado dijo al principio de mi cuento: que los trabajos continuos y extraordinarios quitan la memoria al que los padece.

-Ésa no me quitarán a mí, ¡oh alta y valerosa señora! -dijo don Quijote-, cuantos yo pasare en serviros, por grandes y no vistos que sean; y así, de nuevo confirmo el don que os he prometido, y juro de ir con vos al cabo del mundo, hasta verme con el fiero enemigo vuestro, a quien pienso, con el ayuda de Dios y de mi brazo, tajar la cabeza soberbia con los filos desta... no quiero decir buena espada, merced a Ginés de Pasamonte, que me llevó la mía.

Esto dijo entre dientes, y prosiguió diciendo:

-Y después de habérsela tajado y puéstoos en pacífica posesión de vuestro estado, quedará a vuestra voluntad hacer de vuestra persona lo que más en talante os viniere; porque, mientras que yo tuviere ocupada la memoria y cautiva la voluntad, perdido el entendimiento, a aquella..., y no digo más, no es posible que yo arrostre, ni por pienso, el casarme, aunque fuese con el ave fénix.

Parecióle tan mal a Sancho lo que últimamente su amo dijo acerca de no querer casarse, que, con grande enojo, alzando la voz, dijo:

-Voto a mí, y juro a mí, que no tiene vuestra merced, señor don Quijote, cabal juicio. Pues, ¿cómo es posible que pone vuestra merced en duda el casarse con tan alta princesa como aquésta? ¿Piensa que le ha de ofrecer la fortuna, tras cada cantillo, semejante ventura como la que ahora se le ofrece? ¿Es, por dicha, más hermosa mi señora Dulcinea? No, por cierto, ni aun con la mitad, y aun estoy por decir que no llega a su zapato de la que está delante. Así, noramala alcanzaré yo el condado que espero, si vuestra merced se anda a pedir cotufas en el golfo. Cásese, cásele luego, encomiéndole yo a Satanás, y tome ese reino que se le viene a las manos de vobis, vobis, y, en siendo rey, hágame marqués o adelantado, y luego, siquiera se lo lleve el diablo todo.

Don Quijote, que tales blasfemias oyó decir contra su señora Dulcinea, no lo pudo sufrir, y, alzando el lanzón, sin hablalle palabra a Sancho y sin decirle esta boca es mía, le dio tales dos palos que dio con él en tierra; y si no fuera porque Dorotea le dio voces que no le diera más, sin duda le quitara allí la vida.

-¿Pensáis -le dijo a cabo de rato-, villano ruin, que ha de haber lugar siempre para ponerme la mano en la horcajadura, y que todo ha de ser errar vos y perdonaros yo? Pues no lo penséis, bellaco descomulgado, que sin duda lo estás, pues has puesto lengua en la sin par Dulcinea. ¿Y no sabéis vos, gañán, faquín, belitre, que si no fuese por el valor que ella infunde en mi brazo, que no le tendría yo para matar una pulga? Decid, socarrón de lengua viperina, ¿y quién pensáis que ha ganado este reino y cortado la cabeza a este gigante, y héchoos a vos marqués, que todo esto doy ya por hecho y por cosa pasada en cosa juzgada, si no es el valor de Dulcinea, tomando a mi brazo por instrumento de sus hazañas? Ella pelea en mí, y vence en mí, y yo vivo y respiro en ella, y tengo vida y ser. ¡Oh hideputa bellaco, y cómo sois desagradecido: que os veis levantado del polvo de la tierra a ser señor de título, y correspondéis a tan buena obra con decir mal de quien os la hizo!

No estaba tan maltrecho Sancho que no oyese todo cuanto su amo le decía, y, levantándose con un poco de presteza, se fue a poner detrás del palafrén de

Dorotea, y desde allí dijo a su amo:

-Dígame, señor: si vuestra merced tiene determinado de no casarse con esta gran princesa, claro está que no será el reino suyo; y, no siéndolo, ¿qué mercedes me puede hacer? Esto es de lo que yo me quejo; cásese vuestra merced una por una con esta reina, ahora que la tenemos aquí como llovida del cielo, y después puede volverse con mi señora Dulcinea; que reyes debe de haber habido en el mundo que hayan sido amancebados. En lo de la hermosura no me entremeto; que, en verdad, si va a decirla, que entrambas me parecen bien, puesto que yo nunca he visto a la señora Dulcinea.

-¿Cómo que no la has visto, traidor blasfemo? -dijo don Quijote-. Pues, ¿no acabas de traerme ahora un recado de su parte?

-Digo que no la he visto tan despacio -dijo Sancho-que pueda haber notado particularmente su hermosura y sus buenas partes punto por punto; pero así, a bulto, me parece bien.

-Ahora te disculpo -dijo don Quijote-, y perdóname el enojo que te he dado, que los primeros movimientos no son en manos de los hombres.

-Ya yo lo veo -respondió Sancho-; y así, en mí la gana de hablar siempre es primero movimiento, y no puedo dejar de decir, por una vez siquiera, lo que me viene a la lengua.

-Con todo eso -dijo don Quijote-, mira, Sancho, lo que hablas, porque tantas veces va el cantarillo a la fuenteâ, y no te digo más.

-Ahora bien -respondió Sancho-, Dios está en el cielo, que ve las trampas, y será juez de quién hace más mal: yo en no hablar bien, o vuestra merced en obrallo.

-No haya más -dijo Dorotea-: corred, Sancho, y besad la mano a vuestro señor, y pedilde perdón, y de aquí adelante andad más atentado en vuestras alabanzas y vituperios, y no digáis mal de aquea señora Tobosa, a quien yo no conozco si no es para servilla, y tened confianza en Dios, que no os ha de faltar un estado donde viváis como un príncipe.

Fue Sancho cabizbajo y pidió la mano a su señor, y él se la dio con reposado continente; y, después que se la hubo besado, le echó la bendición, y dijo a Sancho que se adelantasen un poco, que tenía que preguntalle y que departir con él cosas de mucha importancia. Hízolo así Sancho y apartáronse los dos algo adelante, y díjole don Quijote:

-Después que veniste, no he tenido lugar ni espacio para preguntarte muchas cosas de particularidad acerca de la embajada que llevaste y de la respuesta que trujiste; y ahora, pues la fortuna nos ha concedido tiempo y lugar, no me niegues tú la ventura que puedes darme con tan buenas nuevas.

-Pregunte vuestra merced lo que quisiere -respondió Sancho-, que a todo daré tan buena salida como tuve la entrada. Pero suplico a vuestra merced, señor mío, que no sea de aquí adelante tan vengativo.

-¿Por qué lo dices, Sancho? -dijo don Quijote.

-Dígoles -respondió- porque estos palos de agora más fueron por la pendencia que entre los dos trabó el diablo la otra noche, que por lo que dije contra mi señora Dulcinea, a quien amo y reverencio como a una reliquia, aunque en ella no lo haya, sólo por ser cosa de vuestra merced.

-No tornes a esas pláticas, Sancho, por tu vida -dijo don Quijote-, que me dan pesadumbre; ya te perdoné entonces, y bien sabes tú que suele decirse: a pecado nuevo, penitencia nueva. 2

En tanto que los dos iban en estas pláticas, dijo el cura a Dorotea que había andado muy discreta, así en el cuento como en la brevedad dél, y en la similitud que tuvo con los de los libros de caballerías. Ella dijo que muchos ratos se había entretenido en leellos, pero que no sabía ella dónde eran las provincias ni puertos de mar, y que así, había dicho a tiento que se había desembarcado en Osuna.

-Yo lo entendí así -dijo el cura-, y por eso acudí luego a decir lo que dije, con que se acomodó todo. Pero, ¿no es cosa estraña ver con cuánta facilidad cree este desventurado hidalgo todas estas invenciones y mentiras, sólo porque llevan el estilo y modo de las necedades de sus libros?

-Sí es -dijo Cardenio-, y tan rara y nunca vista, que yo no sé si queriendo inventarla y fabricarla mentirosamente, hubiera tan agudo ingenio que pudiera dar en ella.

-Pues otra cosa hay en ello -dijo el cura-: que fuera de las simplicidades que este buen hidalgo dice tocantes a su locura, si le tratan de otras cosas, discurre con bonísimas razones y muestra tener un entendimiento claro y apacible en todo. De manera que, como no le toquen en sus caballerías, no habrá nadie que le juzgue sino por de muy buen entendimiento.

En tanto que ellos iban en esta conversación, prosiguió don Quijote con la suya y dijo a Sancho:

-Echemos, Panza amigo, pelillos a la mar en esto de nuestras pendencias, y dime ahora, sin tener cuenta con enojo ni rencor alguno: ¿Dónde, cómo y cuándo hallaste a Dulcinea? ¿Qué hacía? ¿Qué le dijiste? ¿Qué te respondió? ¿Qué rostro hizo cuando leía mi carta? ¿Quién te la trasladó? Y todo aquello que vieres que en este caso es digno de saberse, de preguntarse y satisfacerse, sin que añadidas o mientas por darme gusto, ni menos te acortes por no quitármele.

-Señor -respondió Sancho-, si va a decir la verdad, la carta no me la trasladó nadie, porque yo no llevé carta alguna.

-Así es como tú dices -dijo don Quijote-, porque el librito de memoria donde yo la escribí le hallé en mi poder a cabo de dos días de tu partida, lo cual me

causó grandísima pena, por no saber lo que habías tú de hacer cuando te vieses sin carta, y creí siempre que te volvieras desde el lugar donde la echaras menos.

-Así fuera -respondió Sancho-, si no la hubiera yo tomado en la memoria cuando vuestra merced me la leyó, de manera que se la dije a un sacristán, que me la trasladó del entendimiento, tan punto por punto, que dijo que en todos los días de su vida, aunque había leído muchas cartas de descomunión, no había visto ni leído tan linda carta como aquélla.

-Y ¿tiénesla todavía en la memoria, Sancho? -dijo don Quijote.

-No, señor -respondió Sancho-, porque después que la di, como vi que no había de ser de más provecho, di en olvidalla. Y si algo se me acuerda, es aquello del sobajada, digo, del soberana señora, y lo último: Vuestro hasta la muerte, el Caballero de la Triste Figura. Y, en medio destas dos cosas, le puse más de trecientas almas, y vidas, y ojos míos.

Capítulo XXXI

De los sabrosos razonamientos que pasaron entre don Quijote y Sancho Panza, su escudero, con otros sucesos

-TODO eso no me descontenta; prosigue adelante -dijo don Quijote-. Llegaste, ¿y qué hacía aquella reina de la hermosura? A buen seguro que la hallaste ensartando perlas, o bordando alguna empresa con oro de cañutillo para este su cautivo caballero.

-No la hallé -respondió Sancho-sino ahechando dos hanegas de trigo en un corral de su casa.

-Pues haz cuenta -dijo don Quijote-que los granos de aquel trigo eran granos de perlas, tocados de sus manos. Y si miraste, amigo, el trigo ¿era candeal, o trechel?

-No era sino rubión -respondió Sancho.

-Pues yo te aseguro -dijo don Quijote-que, ahechado por sus manos, hizo pan candeal, sin duda alguna. Pero pasa adelante: cuando le diste mi carta, ¿besóla? ¿Púsosela sobre la cabeza? ¿Hizo alguna ceremonia digna de tal carta, o qué hizo?

-Cuando yo se la iba a dar -respondió Sancho-, ella estaba en la fuga del meneo de una buena parte de trigo que tenía en la criba, y díjome: «Poned, amigo, esa carta sobre aquel costal, que no la puedo leer hasta que acabe de acribar todo lo que aquí está».

-¡Discreta señora! -dijo don Quijote-. Eso debió de ser por leerla despacio y recrearse con ella. Adelante, Sancho: y, en tanto que estaba en su menester, ¿qué coloquios pasó contigo? ¿Qué te preguntó de mí? Y tú, ¿qué le respondiste? Acaba, cuéntamelo todo; no se te quede en el tintero una mínima.

-Ella no me preguntó nada -dijo Sancho-, mas yo le dije de la manera que vuestra merced, por su servicio, quedaba haciendo penitencia, desnudo de la cintura arriba, metido entre estas sierras como si fuera salvaje, durmiendo en el suelo, sin comer pan a manteles ni sin peinarse la barba, llorando y maldiciendo su fortuna.

-En decir que maldecía mi fortuna dijiste mal -dijo don Quijote-, porque antes la bendigo y bendeciré todos los días de mi vida, por haberme hecho digno de merecer amar tan alta señora como Dulcinea del Toboso.

-Tan alta es -respondió Sancho-, que a buena fe que me lleva a mí más de un coto.

-Pues, ¿cómo, Sancho? -dijo don Quijote-. ¿Haste medido tú con ella?

-Medíme en esta manera -respondió Sancho-: que, llegándole a ayudar a poner un costal de trigo sobre un jumento, llegamos tan juntos que eché de ver que me llevaba más de un gran palmo.

-Pues ¡es verdad -replicó don Quijote-que no acompaña esa grandeza y la adorna con mil millones y gracias del alma! Pero no me negarás, Sancho, una cosa: cuando llegaste junto a ella, ¿no sentiste un olor sabeo, una fragancia aromática, y un no sé qué de bueno, que yo no acierto a darte nombre? Digo, ¿un tufo o tufo como si estuvieras en la tienda de algún curioso guantero?

-Lo que sé decir -dijo Sancho-es que sentí un olorcillo algo hombruno; y debía de ser que ella, con el mucho ejercicio, estaba sudada y algo correosa.

-No sería eso -respondió don Quijote-, sino que tú debías de estar romadizado, o te debiste de oler a ti mismo; porque yo sé bien a lo que huele aquella rosa entre espinas, aquel lirio del campo, aquel ámbar desleído.

-Todo puede ser -respondió Sancho-, que muchas veces sale de mí aquel olor que entonces me pareció que salía de su merced de la señora Dulcinea; pero no hay de qué maravillarse, que un diablo parece a otro.

-Y bien -prosiguió don Quijote-, he aquí que acabó de limpiar su trigo y de enviallo al molino. ¿Qué hizo cuando leyó la carta?

-La carta -dijo Sancho-no la leyó, porque dijo que no sabía leer ni escribir; antes, la rasgó y la hizo menudas piezas, diciendo que no la quería dar a leer a nadie, porque no se supiesen en el lugar sus secretos, y que bastaba lo que yo le había dicho de palabra acerca del amor que vuestra merced le tenía y de la penitencia extraordinaria que por su causa quedaba haciendo. Y, finalmente, me dijo que dijese a vuestra merced que le besaba las manos, y que allí quedaba con más deseo de verle que de escribirle; y que, así, le suplicaba y mandaba que, vista la presente, saliese de aquellos matorrales y se dejase de hacer disparates, y se pusiese luego luego en camino del Toboso, si otra cosa de más importancia no le sucediese, porque tenía gran deseo de ver a vuestra merced. Rióse mucho cuando le dije como se llamaba vuestra merced el Caballero de la Triste Figura. Preguntéle si había ido allá el vizcaíno de marras; díjome que sí, y que era un hombre muy de bien. También le pregunté por los galeotes, mas díjome que no había visto hasta entonces alguno.

-Todo va bien hasta agora -dijo don Quijote-. Pero dime: ¿qué joya fue la que te dio, al despedirte, por las nuevas que de mí le llevaste? Porque es usada y antigua costumbre entre los caballeros y damas andantes dar a los escuderos, doncellas o enanos que les llevan nuevas, de sus damas a ellos, a ellas de sus andantes, alguna rica joya en albricias, en agradecimiento de su recado.

-Bien puede eso ser así, y yo la tengo por buena usanza; pero eso debió de ser en los tiempos pasados, que ahora sólo se debe de acostumbrar a dar un pedazo de pan y queso, que esto fue lo que me dio mi señora Dulcinea, por las bardas de un corral, cuando della me despedí; y aun, por más señas, era el queso ovejuno.

-Es liberal en extremo -dijo don Quijote-, y si no te dio joya de oro, sin duda debió de ser porque no la tendría allí a la mano para dártela; pero buenas son mangas después de Pascua: yo la veré, y se satisfará todo. ¿Sabes de qué estoy maravillado, Sancho? De que me parece que fuiste y veniste por los aires, pues poco más de tres días has tardado en ir y venir desde aquí al Toboso, habiendo de aquí allá más de treinta leguas; por lo cual me doy a entender que aquel sabio nigromante que tiene cuenta con mis cosas y es mi amigo (porque por fuerza le hay, y le ha de haber, so pena que yo no sería buen caballero andante); digo que este tal te debió de ayudar a caminar, sin que tú lo sintieses; que hay sabio éstos que coge a un caballero andante durmiendo en su cama, y, sin saber cómo o en qué manera, amanece otro día más de mil leguas de donde anocheció. Y si no fuese por esto, no se podrían socorrer en sus peligros los caballeros andantes unos a otros, como se socorren a cada paso. Que acaece estar uno peleando en las sierras de Armenia con algún endriago, o con algún fiero vestiglo, o con otro caballero, donde lleva lo peor de la batalla y está ya a punto de muerte, y cuando no os me cato, asoma por acullá, encima de una nube, o sobre un carro de fuego, otro caballero amigo suyo, que poco antes se hallaba en Ingalaterra, que le favorece y libra de la muerte, y a la noche se halla en su posada, cenando muy a su sabor; y suele haber de la una a la otra parte dos o tres mil leguas. Y todo esto se hace por industria y sabiduría destos sabios encantadores que tienen cuidado destos valerosos caballeros. Así que, amigo Sancho, no se me hace dificultoso creer que en tan breve tiempo hayas ido y venido desde este lugar al del Toboso, pues, como tengo dicho, algún sabio amigo te debió de llevar en volandillas, sin que tú lo sintieses.

-Así sería -dijo Sancho-; porque a buena fe que andaba Rocinante como si fuera asno de gitano con azogue en los oídos.

-Y ¡cómo si llevaba azogue! -dijo don Quijote-, y aun una legión de demonios, que es gente que camina y hace caminar, sin cansarse, todo aquello que se les antoja. Pero, dejando esto aparte, ¿qué te parece a ti que debo yo de hacer ahora cerca de lo que mi señora me manda que la vaya a ver?; que, aunque yo veo que estoy obligado a cumplir su mandamiento, véome también imposibilitado del don que he prometido a la princesa que con nosotros viene, y fuérame la ley de caballería a cumplir mi palabra antes que mi gusto. Por una parte, me acosa y fatiga el deseo de ver a mi señora; por otra, me incita y llama la prometida fe y la gloria que he de alcanzar en esta empresa. Pero lo que pienso hacer será caminar apriesa y llegar presto donde está este gigante, y, en llegando, le cortaré la cabeza, y pondré a la princesa pacíficamente en su estado, y al punto daré la vuelta a ver a la luz que mis sentidos alumbra, a la cual daré tales disculpas que ella venga a tener por buena mi tardanza, pues verá que todo redunda en aumento de su gloria y fama, pues cuanta yo he alcanzado, alcanzo y alcanzaré por las armas en esta vida, toda me viene del favor que ella me da y de ser yo suyo.

-¡Ay -dijo Sancho-, y cómo está vuestra merced lastimado de esos cascos! Pues dígame, señor: ¿piensa vuestra merced caminar este camino en balde, y dejar pasar y perder un tan rico y tan principal casamiento como éste, donde le dan en dote un reino, que a buena verdad que he oído decir que tiene más de veinte mil leguas de contorno, y que es abundantísimo de todas las cosas que son necesarias para el sustento de la vida humana, y que es mayor que Portugal y que Castilla juntos? Calle, por amor de Dios, y tenga vergüenza de lo que ha dicho, y tome mi consejo, y perdóneme, y cásese luego en el primer lugar que haya cura; y si no, ahí está nuestro licenciado, que lo hará de perlas. Y advierta que ya tengo edad para dar consejos, y que este que le doy le viene de molde, y que más vale pájaro en mano que buitre volando, porque quien bien tiene y mal escoge, por bien que se enoja no se venga.

-Mira, Sancho -respondió don Quijote-: si el consejo que me das de que me case es porque sea luego rey, en matando al gigante, y tenga cómodo para hacerte mercedes y darte lo prometido, hágote saber que sin casarme podré cumplir tu deseo muy fácilmente, porque yo sacaré de adahala, antes de entrar en la batalla, que, saliendo vencedor della, ya que no me case, me han de dar una parte del reino, para que la pueda dar a quien yo quisiere; y, en dándomela, ¿a quién quieres tú que la dé sino a ti?

-Eso está claro -respondió Sancho-, pero mire vuestra merced que la escoja hacia la marina, porque, si no me contentare la vivienda, pueda embarcar mis negros vasallos y hacer dellos lo que ya he dicho. Y vuestra merced no se cure de ir por agora a ver a mi señora Dulcinea, sino váyase a matar al gigante, y concluyamos este negocio; que por Dios que se me asienta que ha de ser de mucha honra y de mucho provecho.

-Dígame, Sancho -dijo don Quijote-, que estás en lo cierto, y que habré de tomar tu consejo en cuanto el ir antes con la princesa que a ver a Dulcinea. Y avísote que no digas nada a nadie, ni a los que con nosotros vienen, de lo que aquí hemos departido y tratado; que, pues Dulcinea es tan recatada que no quiere que se sepan sus pensamientos, no será bien que yo, ni otro por mí, los descubra.

-Pues si eso es así -dijo Sancho-, ¿cómo hace vuestra merced que todos los que vence por su brazo se vayan a presentar ante mi señora Dulcinea, siendo esto firma de su nombre que la quiere bien y que es su enamorado? Y, siendo forzoso que los que fueren se han de ir a hincar de finojos ante su presencia, y decir que van de parte de vuestra merced a dalle la obediencia, ¿cómo se pueden encubrir los pensamientos de entrambos?

-¡Oh, qué necio y qué simple que eres! -dijo don Quijote-. ¿Tú no ves, Sancho, que eso todo redundaba en su mayor ensalzamiento? Porque has de saber que en este nuestro estilo de caballería es gran honra tener una dama muchos caballeros andantes que la sirvan, sin que se estiendan más sus pensamientos que a servilla, por sólo ser ella quien es, sin esperar otro premio de sus muchos y buenos deseos, sino que ella se contente de acetarlos por sus caballeros.

-Con esa manera de amor -dijo Sancho-he oído yo predicar que se ha de amar a Nuestro Señor, por sí solo, sin que nos mueva esperanza de gloria o temor de pena, aunque yo le querría amar y servir por lo que pudiese.

-¡Válate el diablo por villano -dijo don Quijote-, y qué de discreciones dices a las veces! No parece sino que has estudiado.

-Pues a fe mía que no sé leer -respondió Sancho.

En esto, les dio voces maese Nicolás que esperasen un poco, que querían detenerse a beber en una fontecilla que allí estaba. Detúvose don Quijote, con no poco gusto de Sancho, que ya estaba cansado de mentir tanto y temía no le cogiese su amo a palabras; porque, puesto que él sabía que Dulcinea era una labradora del Toboso, no la había visto en toda su vida.

Habíase en este tiempo vestido Cardenio los vestidos que Dorotea traía cuando la hallaron, que, aunque no eran muy buenos, hacían mucha ventaja a los que dejaba. Apeáronse junto a la fuente, y con lo que el cura se acomodó en la venta satisficieron, aunque poco, la mucha hambre que todos traían.

Estando en esto, acertó a pasar por allí un muchacho que iba de camino, el cual, poniéndose a mirar con mucha atención a los que en la fuente estaban, de allí a poco arremetió a don Quijote, y, abrazándole por las piernas, comenzó a llorar muy de propósito, diciendo:

-¡Ay, señor mío! ¿No me conoce vuestra merced? Pues míreme bien, que yo soy aquel mozo Andrés que quitó vuestra merced de la encina donde estaba atado.

Reconocióle don Quijote, y, asiéndole por la mano, se volvió a los que allí estaban y dijo:

-Porque vean vuestras mercedes cuán de importancia es haber caballeros andantes en el mundo, que desfagan los tuertos y agravios que en él se hacen por los insolentes y malos hombres que en él viven, sepan vuestras mercedes que los días pasados, pasando yo por un bosque, oí unos gritos y unas voces muy lastimosas, como de persona afligida y menesterosa; acudí luego, llevado de mi obligación, hacia la parte donde me pareció que las lamentables voces sonaban, y hallé atado a una encina a este muchacho que ahora está delante (de lo que me huelgo en el alma, porque será testigo que no me dejará mentir en nada); digo que estaba atado a la encina, desnudo del medio cuerpo arriba, y estábale abriendo a azotes con las riendas de una yegua un villano, que después supe que era amo suyo; y, así como yo le vi, le pregunté la causa de tan atroz vapulamiento; respondió el zafio que le azotaba porque era su criado, y que ciertos descuidos que tenía nacían más de ladrón que de simple; a lo cual este niño dijo: «Señor, no me azota sino porque le pido mi salario». El amo replicó no sé qué arengas y disculpas, las cuales, aunque de mí fueron oídas, no fueron admitidas. En resolución, yo le hice desatar, y tomé juramento al villano de que le llevaría consigo y le pagaría un real sobre otro, y aun sahumados. ¿No es verdad todo esto, hijo Andrés? ¿No notaste con cuánto imperio se lo mandé, y con cuánta humildad prometió de hacer todo cuanto yo le impuse, y notifiqué y quise? Responde; no te turbes ni dudes en nada: di lo que pasó a estos señores, porque se vea y considere ser del provecho que digo haber caballeros andantes por los caminos.

-Todo lo que vuestra merced ha dicho es mucha verdad -respondió el muchacho-, pero el fin del negocio sucedió muy al revés de lo que vuestra merced se imagina.

-¿Cómo al revés? -replicó don Quijote-; luego, ¿no te pagó el villano?

-No sólo no me pagó -respondió el muchacho-, pero, así como vuestra merced traspuso del bosque y quedamos solos, me volvió a atar a la misma encina, y me dio de nuevo tantos azotes que quedé hecho un San Bartolomé desollado; y, a cada azote que me daba, me decía un donaire y chufeta acerca de hacer burla de vuestra merced, que, a no sentir yo tanto dolor, me riera de lo que decía. En efeto: él me paró tal, que hasta ahora he estado curándome en un hospital del mal que el mal villano entonces me hizo. De todo lo cual tiene vuestra merced la culpa, porque si se fuera su camino adelante y no viniera donde no le llamaban, ni se entremetiera en negocios ajenos, mi amo se contentara con darme una o dos docenas de azotes, y luego me soltara y pagara cuanto me debía. Mas, como vuestra merced le deshonoró tan sin propósito y le dijo tantas villanías, encendiósele la cólera, y, como no la pudo vengar en vuestra merced, cuando se vio solo descargó sobre mí el nublado, de modo que me parece que no seré más hombre en toda mi vida.

-El daño estuvo -dijo don Quijote-en irme yo de allí; que no me había de ir hasta dejarte pagado, porque bien debía yo de saber, por luengas experiencias, que no hay villano que guarde palabra que tiene, si él vee que no le está bien guardalla. Pero ya te acuerdas, Andrés, que yo juré que si no te pagaba, que había de ir a buscarle, y que le había de hallar, aunque se escondiese en el vientre de la ballena.

-Así es la verdad -dijo Andrés-, pero no aprovechó nada.

-Ahora verás si aprovecha -dijo don Quijote.

Y, diciendo esto, se levantó muy apriesa y mandó a Sancho que enfrenase a Rocinante, que estaba paciando en tanto que ellos comían.

Preguntóle Dorotea qué era lo que hacer quería. Él le respondió que quería ir a buscar al villano y castigalle de tan mal término, y hacer pagado a Andrés hasta el último maravedí, a despecho y pesar de cuantos villanos hubiese en el mundo. A lo que ella respondió que advirtiese que no podía, conforme al don prometido, entremeterse en ninguna empresa hasta acabar la suya; y que, pues esto sabía él mejor que otro alguno, que sosegase el pecho hasta la vuelta de su reino.

-Así es verdad -respondió don Quijote-, y es forzoso que Andrés tenga paciencia hasta la vuelta, como vos, señora, decís; que yo le torno a jurar y a prometer de nuevo de no parar hasta hacerle vengado y pagado.

-No me creo desos juramentos -dijo Andrés-; más quisiera tener agora con qué llegar a Sevilla que todas las venganzas del mundo: déme, si tiene ahí, algo que coma y lleve, y quédese con Dios su merced y todos los caballeros andantes; que tan bien andantes sean ellos para consigo como lo han sido para conmigo.

Sacó de su repuesto Sancho un pedazo de pan y otro de queso, y, dándoselo al mozo, le dijo:

-Tomá, hermano Andrés, que a todos nos alcanza parte de vuestra desgracia.

-Pues, ¿qué parte os alcanza a vos? -preguntó Andrés.

-Esta parte de queso y pan que os doy -respondió Sancho-, que Dios sabe si me ha de hacer falta o no; porque os hago saber, amigo, que los escuderos de los caballeros andantes estamos sujetos a mucha hambre y a mala ventura, y aun a otras cosas que se sienten mejor que se dicen.

Andrés asió de su pan y queso, y, viendo que nadie le daba otra cosa, abajó su cabeza y tomó el camino en las manos, como suele decirse. Bien es verdad que, al partirse, dijo a don Quijote:

-Por amor de Dios, señor caballero andante, que si otra vez me encontrare, aunque vea que me hacen pedazos, no me socorra ni ayude, sino déjeme con mi desgracia; que no será tanta, que no sea mayor la que me vendrá de su ayuda de vuestra merced, a quien Dios maldiga, y a todos cuantos caballeros andantes han nacido en el mundo.

Íbase a levantar don Quijote para castigalle, mas él se puso a correr de modo que ninguno se atrevió a seguille. Quedó corridísimo don Quijote del cuento de Andrés, y fue menester que los demás tuviesen mucha cuenta con no reírse, por no acaballe de correr del todo.

Capítulo XXXII

Que trata de lo que sucedió en la venta a toda la cuadrilla de don Quijote

ACABÓSE la buena comida, ensillaron luego, y, sin que les sucediese cosa digna de contar, llegaron otro día a la venta, espanto y asombro de Sancho Panza; y, aunque él quisiera no entrar en ella, no lo pudo huir. La ventera, ventero, su hija y Maritornes, que vieron venir a don Quijote y a Sancho, les salieron a recibir con muestras de mucha alegría, y él las recibió con grave continente y aplauso, y díjoles que le aderezasen otro mejor lecho que la vez pasada; a lo cual le respondió la huéspeda que como la pagase mejor que la otra vez, que ella se la daría de príncipes. Don Quijote dijo que sí haría, y así, le aderezaron uno razonable en el mismo caramanchón de marras, y él se acostó luego, porque venía muy quebrantado y falto de juicio.

No se hubo bien encerrado, cuando la huéspeda arremetió al barbero, y, asiéndole de la barba, dijo:

-Para mi santiguada, que no se ha aún de aprovechar más de mi rabo para su barba, y que me ha de volver mi cola; que anda lo de mi marido por esos suelos, que es vergüenza; digo, el peine, que solía yo colgar de mi buena cola.

No se la quería dar el barbero, aunque ella más tiraba, hasta que el licenciado le dijo que se la diese, que ya no era menester más usar de aquella industria, sino que se descubriese y mostrase en su misma forma, y dijese a don Quijote que cuando le despojaron los ladrones galeotes se habían venido a aquella venta huyendo; y que si preguntase por el escudero de la princesa, le dirían que ella le había enviado adelante a dar aviso a los de su reino como ella iba y llevaba consigo el libertador de todos. Con esto, dio de buena gana la cola a la ventera el barbero, y asimismo le volvieron todos los adherentes que había prestado para la libertad de don Quijote. Espantáronse todos los de la venta de la hermosura de Dorotea, y aun del buen talle del zagal Cardenio. Hizo el cura que les aderezasen de comer de lo que en la venta hubiese, y el huésped, con esperanza de mejor paga, con diligencia les aderezó una razonable comida; y a todo esto dormía don Quijote, y fueron de parecer de no despertalle, porque más provecho le haría por entonces el dormir que el comer.

Trataron sobre comida, estando delante el ventero, su mujer, su hija, Maritornes, todos los pasajeros, de la estraña locura de don Quijote y del modo que le habían hallado. La huéspeda les contó lo que con él y con el arriero les había acontecido, y, mirando si acaso estaba allí Sancho, como no le viese, contó todo lo de su manteamiento, de que no poco gusto recibieron. Y, como el cura dijese que los libros de caballerías que don Quijote había leído le habían vuelto el juicio, dijo el ventero:

-No sé yo cómo puede ser eso; que en verdad que, a lo que yo entiendo, no hay mejor letrado en el mundo, y que tengo ahí dos o tres dellos, con otros papeles, que verdaderamente me han dado la vida, no sólo a mí, sino a otros muchos. Porque, cuando es tiempo de la siega, se recogen aquí, las fiestas, muchos segadores, y siempre hay algunos que saben leer, el cual coge uno destos libros en las manos, y rodeámonos dél más de treinta, y estámosle escuchando con tanto gusto que nos quita mil canas; a lo menos, de mí sé decir que cuando oyo decir aquellos furibundos y terribles golpes que los caballeros pegan, que me toma gana de hacer otro tanto, y que querría estar oyéndolos noches y días.

-Y yo ni más ni menos -dijo la ventera-, porque nunca tengo buen rato en mi casa sino aquel que vos estáis escuchando leer: que estáis tan embobado, que no os acordáis de reñir por entonces.

-Así es la verdad -dijo Maritornes-, y a buena fe que yo también gusto mucho de oír aquellas cosas, que son muy lindas; y más, cuando cuentan que se está la otra señora debajo de unos naranjos abrazada con su caballero, y que les está una dueña haciéndoles la guarda, muerta de envidia y con mucho sobresalto. Digo que todo esto es cosa de mieles.

-Y a vos ¿qué os parece, señora doncella? -dijo el cura, hablando con la hija del ventero.

-No sé, señor, en mi ánima -respondió ella-; también yo lo escucho, y en verdad que, aunque no lo entiendo, que recibo gusto en oírlo; pero no gusto yo de los golpes de que mi padre gusta, sino de las lamentaciones que los caballeros hacen cuando están ausentes de sus señoras: que en verdad que algunas veces me hacen llorar de compasión que les tengo.

-Luego, ¿bien las remediárades vos, señora doncella -dijo Dorotea-, si por vos lloraran?

-No sé lo que me hiciera -respondió la moza-; sólo sé que hay algunas señoras de aquéllas tan crueles, que las llaman sus caballeros tigres y leones y otras mil inmundicias. Y, ¡Jesús!, yo no sé qué gente es aquélla tan desalmada y tan sin conciencia, que por no mirar a un hombre honrado, le dejan que se muera, o que se vuelva loco. Yo no sé para qué es tanto melindre: si lo hacen de honradas, cásense con ellos, que ellos no desean otra cosa.

-Calla, niña -dijo la ventera-, que parece que sabes mucho destas cosas, y no está bien a las doncellas saber ni hablar tanto.

-Como me lo pregunta este señor -respondió ella-, no pude dejar de respondelle.

-Ahora bien -dijo el cura-, traedme, señor huésped, aqueles libros, que los quiero ver.

-Que me place -respondió él.

Y, entrando en su aposento, sacó dél una maletilla vieja, cerrada con una cadenilla, y, abriéndola, halló en ella tres libros grandes y unos papeles de muy buena letra, escritos de mano. El primer libro que abrió vio que era Don Cirongilio de Tracia; y el otro, de Felixmarte de Hircania; y el otro, la Historia del Gran Capitán Gonzalo Hernández de Córdoba, con la vida de Diego García de Paredes. Así como el cura leyó los dos títulos primeros, volvió el rostro al barbero y dijo:

-Falta nos hacen aquí ahora el ama de mi amigo y su sobrina.

-No hacen -respondió el barbero-, que también sé yo llevarlos al corral o a la chimenea; que en verdad que hay muy buen fuego en ella.

-Luego, ¿quiere vuestra merced quemar más libros? -dijo el ventero.

-No más -dijo el cura-que estos dos: el de Don Cirongilio y el de Felixmarte.

-Pues, ¿por ventura -dijo el ventero-mis libros son herejes o flemáticos, que los quiere quemar?

-Cismáticos queréis decir, amigo -dijo el barbero-, que no flemáticos.

-Así es -replicó el ventero-; mas si alguno quiere quemar, sea ese del Gran Capitán y dese Diego García, que antes dejaré quemar un hijo que dejar quemar ninguno desotros.

-Hermano mío -dijo el cura-, estos dos libros son mentirosos y están llenos de disparates y devaneos; y este del Gran Capitán es historia verdadera, y tiene los hechos de Gonzalo Hernández de Córdoba, el cual, por sus muchas y grandes hazañas, mereció ser llamado de todo el mundo Gran Capitán, renombre famoso y claro, y dél sólo merecido. Y este Diego García de Paredes fue un principal caballero, natural de la ciudad de Trujillo, en Estremadura, valentísimo soldado, y de tantas fuerzas naturales que detenía con un dedo una rueda de molino en la mitad de su furia; y, puesto con un montante en la entrada de una puente, detuvo a todo un innumerable ejército, que no pasase por ella; y hizo otras tales cosas que, como si él las cuenta y las escribe él asimismo, con la modestia de caballero y de coronista propio, las escribiera otro, libre y desapasionado, pusieran en su olvido las de los Hétores, Aquiles y Roldanes.

-¡Tomaos con mi padre! -dijo el dicho ventero-. ¡Mirad de qué se espanta: de detener una rueda de molino! Por Dios, ahora había vuestra merced de leer lo que hizo Felixmarte de Hircania, que de un revés solo partió cinco gigantes por la cintura, como si fueran hechos de habas, como los frailecicos que hacen los niños. Y otra vez arremetió con un grandísimo y poderosísimo ejército, donde llevó más de un millón y seiscientos mil soldados, todos armados desde el pie hasta la cabeza, y los desbarató a todos, como si fueran manadas de ovejas. Pues, ¿qué me dirán del bueno de don Cirongilio de Tracia, que fue tan valiente y animoso como se verá en el libro, donde cuenta que, navegando por un río, le salió de la mitad del agua una serpiente de fuego, y él, así como la vio, se arrojó sobre ella, y se puso a horcajadas encima de sus escamosas espaldas, y la apretó con ambas manos la garganta, con tanta fuerza que, viendo la serpiente que la iba ahogando, no tuvo otro remedio sino dejarse ir a lo hondo del río, llevándose tras sí al caballero, que nunca la quiso soltar? Y, cuando llegaron allá bajo, se halló en unos palacios y en unos jardines tan lindos que era maravilla; y luego la sierpe se volvió en un viejo anciano, que le dijo tantas de cosas que no hay más que oír. Calle, señor, que si oyese esto, se volvería loco de placer. ¡Dos higas para el Gran Capitán y para ese Diego García que dice!

Oyendo esto Dorotea, dijo callando a Cardenio:

-Poco le falta a nuestro huésped para hacer la segunda parte de don Quijote.

-Así me parece a mí -respondió Cardenio-, porque, según da indicio, él tiene por cierto que todo lo que estos libros cuentan pasó ni más ni menos que lo escriben, y no le harán creer otra cosa frailes descalzos.

-Mirad, hermano -tornó a decir el cura-, que no hubo en el mundo Felixmarte de Hircania, ni don Cirongilio de Tracia, ni otros caballeros semejantes que los libros de caballerías cuentan, porque todo es compostura y ficción de ingenios ociosos, que los compusieron para el efeto que vos decís de entretener el tiempo, como lo entretienen leyéndolos vuestros segadores; porque realmente os juro que nunca tales caballeros fueron en el mundo, ni tales hazañas ni disparates acontecieron en él.

-¡A otro perro con ese hueso! -respondió el ventero-. ¡Como si yo no supiese cuántas son cinco y adónde me aprieta el zapato! No piense vuestra merced darme papilla, porque por Dios que no soy nada blanco. ¡Bueno es que quiera darme vuestra merced a entender que todo aquello que estos buenos libros dicen sea disparates y mentiras, estando impreso con licencia de los señores del Consejo Real, como si ellos fueran gente que habían de dejar imprimir tanta mentira junta, y tantas batallas y tantos encantamientos que quitan el juicio!

-Ya os he dicho, amigo -replicó el cura-, que esto se hace para entretener nuestros ociosos pensamientos; y, así como se consiente en las repúblicas bien concertadas que haya juegos de ajedrez, de pelota y de trucos, para entretener a algunos que ni tienen, ni deben, ni pueden trabajar, así se consiente imprimir y que haya tales libros, creyendo, como es verdad, que no ha de haber alguno tan ignorante, que tenga por historia verdadera ninguna destos libros. Y si me fuera lícito agora, y el auditorio lo requiriera, yo dijera cosas acerca de lo que han de tener los libros de caballerías para ser buenos, que quizá fueran de provecho y aun de gusto para algunos; pero yo espero que vendrá tiempo en que lo pueda comunicar con quien pueda remediallo, y en este entretanto creed, señor ventero, lo que os he dicho, y tomad vuestros libros, y allá os avenid con sus verdades o mentiras, y buen provecho os hagan, y quiera Dios que no cojeéis del pie que cojea vuestro huésped don Quijote.

-Eso no -respondió el ventero-, que no seré yo tan loco que me haga caballero andante: que bien veo que ahora no se usa lo que se usaba en aquel tiempo, cuando se dice que andaban por el mundo estos famosos caballeros.

A la mitad desta plática se halló Sancho presente, y quedó muy confuso y pensativo de lo que había oído decir que ahora no se usaban caballeros andantes, y que todos los libros de caballerías eran necedades y mentiras, y propuso en su corazón de esperar en lo que paraba aquel viaje de su amo, y que si no salía con la felicidad que él pensaba, determinaba de dejalle y volverse con su mujer y sus hijos a su acostumbrado trabajo.

Llevábase la maleta y los libros el ventero, mas el cura le dijo:

-Esperad, que quiero ver qué papeles son esos que de tan buena letra están escritos.

Sacólos el huésped, y, dándoselos a leer, vio hasta obra de ocho pliegos escritos de mano, y al principio tenían un título grande que decía: Novela del curioso impertinente. Leyó el cura para sí tres o cuatro renglones y dijo:

-Cierto que no me parece mal el título desta novela, y que me viene voluntad de leella toda.

A lo que respondió el ventero:

-Pues bien puede leella su reverencia, porque le hago saber que algunos huéspedes que aquí la han leído les ha contentado mucho, y me la han pedido con muchas veras; mas yo no se la he querido dar, pensando volvérsela a quien aquí dejó esta maleta olvidada con estos libros y esos papeles; que bien puede ser que vuelva su dueño por aquí algún tiempo, y, aunque sé que me han de hacer falta los libros, a fe que se los he de volver: que, aunque ventero, todavía soy cristiano.

-Vos tenéis mucha razón, amigo -dijo el cura-, mas, con todo eso, si la novela me contenta, me la habéis de dejar trasladar.

-De muy buena gana -respondió el ventero.

Mientras los dos esto decían, había tomado Cardenio la novela y comenzado a leer en ella; y, pareciéndole lo mismo que al cura, le rogó que la leyese de modo que todos la oyesen.

-Sí leyera -dijo el cura-, si no fuera mejor gastar este tiempo en dormir que en leer.

-Harto reposo será para mí -dijo Dorotea-entretener el tiempo oyendo algún cuento, pues aún no tengo el espíritu tan sosegado que me conceda dormir cuando fuera razón.

-Pues, desamano -dijo el cura-, quiero leerla, por curiosidad siquiera; quizá tendrá alguna de gusto.

Acudió maese Nicolás a rogarle lo mismo, y Sancho también; lo cual visto del cura, y entendiendo que a todos daría gusto y él le recibiría, dijo:

-Pues así es, esténme todos atentos, que la novela comienza desta manera:

Capítulo XXXIII

Donde se cuenta la novela del Curioso impertinente

«EN FLORENCIA, ciudad rica y famosa de Italia, en la provincia que llaman Toscana, vivían Anselmo y Lotario, dos caballeros ricos y principales, y tan amigos que, por excelencia y antonomasia, de todos los que los conocían los dos amigos eran llamados. Eran solteros, mozos de una misma edad y de unas mismas costumbres; todo lo cual era bastante causa a que los dos con recíproca amistad se correspondiesen. Bien es verdad que el Anselmo era algo más inclinado a los pasatiempos amorosos que el Lotario, al cual llevaban tras sí los de la caza; pero, cuando se ofrecía, dejaba Anselmo de acudir a sus gustos por seguir los de Lotario, y Lotario dejaba los suyos por acudir a los de Anselmo; y, desta manera, andaban tan a una sus voluntades, que no había concertado reloj que así lo anduviese.

»Andaba Anselmo perdido de amores de una doncella principal y hermosa de la misma ciudad, hija de tan buenos padres y tan buena ella por sí, que se determinó, con el parecer de su amigo Lotario, sin el cual ninguna cosa hacía, de pedilla por esposa a sus padres, y así lo puso en ejecución; y el que llevó la embajada fue Lotario, y el que concluyó el negocio tan a gusto de su amigo, que en breve tiempo se vio puesto en la posesión que deseaba, y Camila tan contenta de haber alcanzado a Anselmo por esposo, que no cesaba de dar gracias al cielo, y a Lotario, por cuyo medio tanto bien le había venido.

»Los primeros días, como todos los de boda suelen ser alegres, continuó Lotario, como solía, la casa de su amigo Anselmo, procurando honralle, festejalle y regocijalle con todo aquello que a él le fue posible; pero, acabadas las bodas y sosegada ya la frecuencia de las visitas y parabienes, comenzó Lotario a descuidarse con cuidado de las idas en casa de Anselmo, por parecerle a él -como es razón que parezca a todos los que fueren discretos- que no se han de visitar ni continuar las casas de los amigos casados de la misma manera que cuando eran solteros; porque, aunque la buena y verdadera amistad no puede ni debe de ser sospechosa en nada, con todo esto, es tan delicada la honra del casado, que parece que se puede ofender aun de los mismos hermanos, cuanto más de los amigos.

»Notó Anselmo la remisión de Lotario, y formó dél quejas grandes, diciéndole que si él supiera que el casarse había de ser parte para no comunicalle como solía, que jamás lo hubiera hecho, y que si, por la buena correspondencia que los dos tenían mientras él fue soltero, habían alcanzado tan dulce nombre como el de ser llamados los dos amigos, que no permitiese, por querer hacer del circunspecto, sin otra ocasión alguna, que tan famoso y tan agradable nombre se perdiese; y que así, le suplicaba, si era lícito que tal término de hablar se usase entre ellos, que volviese a ser señor de su casa, y a entrar y salir en ella como de antes, asegurándole que su esposa Camila no tenía otro gusto ni otra voluntad que la que él quería que tuviese, y que, por haber sabido ella con cuántas veras los dos se amaban, estaba confusa de ver en él tanta esquivaza.

»A todas estas y otras muchas razones que Anselmo dijo a Lotario para persuadirle volviese como solía a su casa, respondió Lotario con tanta prudencia, discreción y aviso, que Anselmo quedó satisfecho de la buena intención de su amigo, y quedaron de concierto que dos días en la semana y las fiestas fuese Lotario a comer con él; y, aunque esto quedó así concertado entre los dos, propuso Lotario de no hacer más de aquello que viese que más convenía a la honra de su amigo, cuyo crédito estimaba en más que el suyo propio. Decía él, y decía bien, que el casado a quien el cielo había concedido mujer hermosa, tanto cuidado había de tener qué amigos llevaba a su casa como en mirar con qué amigas su mujer conversaba, porque lo que no se hace ni concierto en las plazas, ni en los templos, ni en las fiestas públicas, ni estaciones -cosas que no todas veces las han de negar los maridos a sus mujeres-, se concierto y facilita en casa de la amiga o la parienta de quien más satisfacción se tiene.

»También decía Lotario que tenían necesidad los casados de tener cada uno algún amigo que le advirtiese de los descuidos que en su proceder hiciese, porque suele acontecer que con el mucho amor que el marido a la mujer tiene, o no le advierte o no le dice, por no enojalla, que haga o deje de hacer algunas cosas, que el hacellas o no, le sería de honra o de vituperio; de lo cual, siendo del amigo advertido, fácilmente pondría remedio en todo. Pero, ¿dónde se hallará amigo tan discreto y tan leal y verdadero como aquí Lotario le pide? No lo sé yo, por cierto; sólo Lotario era éste, que con toda solicitud y advertimiento miraba por la honra de su amigo y procuraba dezmar, frisar y acortar los días del concierto del ir a su casa, porque no pareciese mal al vulgo ocioso y a los ojos vagabundos y maliciosos la entrada de un mozo rico, gentilhomme y bien nacido, y de las buenas partes que él pensaba que tenía, en la casa de una mujer tan hermosa como Camila; que, puesto que su bondad y valor podía poner freno a toda maldiciente lengua, todavía no quería poner en duda su crédito ni el de su amigo, y por esto los más de los días del concierto los ocupaba y entretenía en otras cosas, que él daba a entender ser inexcusables. Así que, en quejas del uno y disculpas del otro se pasaban muchos ratos y partes del día.

»Sucedió, pues, que uno que los dos se andaban paseando por un prado fuera de la ciudad, Anselmo dijo a Lotario las semejantes razones: »-Pensabas, amigo Lotario, que a las mercedes que Dios me ha hecho en hacerme hijo de tales padres como fueron los míos y al darme, no con mano escasa, los bienes, así los que llaman de naturaleza como los de fortuna, no puedo yo corresponder con agradecimiento que llegue al bien recibido, y sobre al que me hizo en darme a ti por amigo y a Camila por mujer propia: dos prendas que las estimo, si no en el grado que debo, en el que puedo. Pues con todas estas partes, que suelen ser el todo con que los hombres suelen y pueden vivir contentos, vivo yo el más despechado y el más desabrido hombre de todo el universo mundo; porque no sé qué días a esta parte me fatiga y aprieta un deseo tan extraño, y tan fuera del uso común de otros, que yo me maravillo de mí mismo, y me culpo y me riño a solas, y procuro callarlo y encubrirlo de mis propios pensamientos; y así me ha sido posible salir con este secreto como si de industria procurara decillo a todo el mundo. Y, pues que, en efeto, él ha de salir a plaza, quiero que sea en la del archivo de tu secreto, confiado que, con él y con la diligencia que pondrás, como mi amigo verdadero, en remediarme, yo me veré presto libre de la angustia que me causa, y llegará mi alegría por tu solicitud al grado que ha llegado mi descontento por mi locura.

»Suspenso tenían a Lotario las razones de Anselmo, y no sabía en qué había de parar tan larga prevención o preámbulo; y, aunque iba revolviendo en su imaginación qué deseo podría ser aquel que a su amigo tanto fatigaba, dio siempre muy lejos del blanco de la verdad; y, por salir presto de la agonía que le causaba aquella suspensión, le dijo que hacía notorio agravio a su mucha amistad en andar buscando rodeos para decirle sus más encubiertos pensamientos, pues tenía cierto que se podía prometer dél, o ya consejos para entretenellos, o ya remedio para cumplillos.

»-Así es la verdad -respondió Anselmo-, y con esa confianza te hago saber, amigo Lotario, que el deseo que me fatiga es pensar si Camila, mi esposa, es tan buena y tan perfeta como yo pienso; y no puedo enterarme en esta verdad, si no es probándola de manera que la prueba manifieste los quilates de su bondad, como el fuego muestra los del oro. Porque yo tengo para mí, ¡oh amigo!, que no es una mujer más buena de cuanto es o no es solicitada, y que aquella sola es fuerte que no se dobla a las promesas, a las dádivas, a las lágrimas y a las continuas importunidades de los solícitos amantes. Porque, ¿qué hay que agradecer -decía él-que una mujer sea buena, si nadie le dice que sea mala? ¿Qué mucho que esté recogida y temerosa la que no le dan ocasión para que se suelte, y la que sabe que tiene marido que, en cogiéndola en la primera desenvoltura, la ha de quitar la vida? Ansí que, la que es buena por temor, o por falta de lugar, yo no la quiero tener en aquella estima en que tendré a la solicitada y perseguida que salió con la corona del vencimiento. De modo que, por estas razones y por otras muchas que te pudiera decir para acreditar y fortalecer la opinión que tengo, deseo que Camila, mi esposa, pase por estas dificultades y se acrisole y quilate en el fuego de verse requerida y solicitada, y de quien tenga valor para poner en ella sus deseos; y si ella sale, como creo que saldrá, con la palma desta batalla, tendré yo por sin igual mi ventura; podré yo decir que está colmo el vacío de mis deseos; diré que me cupo en suerte la mujer fuerte, de quien el Sabio dice que ¿quién la hallará? Y, cuando esto suceda al revés de lo que pienso, con el gusto de ver que acerté en mi opinión, llevaré sin pena la que de razón podrá causarme mi tan costosa experiencia. Y, prosupuesto que ninguna cosa de cuantas me dijeres en contra de mi deseo ha de ser de algún provecho para dejar de ponerle por la obra, quiero, ¡oh amigo Lotario!, que te dispongas a ser el instrumento que labre aquesta obra de mi gusto; que yo te daré lugar para que lo hagas, sin faltarte todo aquello que yo viere ser necesario para solicitar a una mujer honesta, honrada, recogida y desinteresada. Y muéveme, entre otras cosas, a fiar de ti esta tan ardua empresa, el ver que si de ti es vencida Camila, no ha de llegar el vencimiento a todo trance y rigor, sino a sólo a tener por hecho lo que se ha de hacer, por buen respeto; y así, no quedaré yo ofendido más de con el deseo, y mi injuria quedará escondida en la virtud de tu silencio, que bien sé que en lo que me tocare ha de ser eterno como el de la muerte. Así que, si quieres que yo tenga vida que pueda decir que lo es, desde luego has de entrar en esta amorosa batalla, no tibia ni perezosamente, sino con el ahínco y diligencia que mi deseo pide, y con la confianza que nuestra amistad me asegura.

»Éstas fueron las razones que Anselmo dijo a Lotario, a todas las cuales estuvo tan atento, que si no fueron las que quedan escritas que le dijo, no desplegó sus labios hasta que hubo acabado; y, viendo que no decía más, después que le estuvo mirando un buen espacio, como si mirara otra cosa que jamás hubiera visto, que le causara admiración y espanto, le dijo: »-No me puedo persuadir, ¡oh amigo Anselmo!, a que no sean burlas las cosas que me has dicho; que, a pensar que de veras las decías, no consintiera que tan adelante pasaras, porque con no escucharte previniera tu larga arenga. Sin duda imagino, o que no me conoces, o que yo no te conozco. Pero no; que bien sé que eres Anselmo, y tú sabes que yo soy Lotario; el daño está en que yo pienso que no eres el Anselmo que solías, y tú debes de haber pensado que tampoco yo soy el Lotario que debía ser, porque las cosas que me has dicho, ni son de aquel Anselmo mi amigo, ni las que me pides se han de pedir a aquel Lotario que tú conoces; porque los buenos amigos han de probar a sus amigos y valerse dellos, como dijo un poeta, usque ad aras; que quiso decir que no se habían de valer de su amistad en cosas que fuesen contra Dios. Pues, si esto sintió un gentil de la amistad, ¿cuánto mejor es que lo sienta el cristiano, que sabe que por ninguna humana ha de perder la amistad divina? Y cuando el amigo tirase tanto la barra que pusiese aparte los respetos del cielo por acudir a los de su amigo, no ha de ser por cosas ligeras y de poco momento, sino por aquellas en que vaya la honra y la vida de su amigo. Pues dime tú ahora, Anselmo: ¿cuál destas dos cosas tienes en peligro para que yo me aventure a complacerte y a hacer una cosa tan detestable como me pides? Ninguna, por cierto; antes, me pides, según yo entiendo, que procure y solicite quitarte la honra y la vida, y quitármela a mí juntamente. Porque si yo he de procurar quitarte la honra, claro está que te quito la vida, pues el hombre sin honra peor es que un muerto; y, siendo yo el instrumento, como tú quieres que lo sea, de tanto mal tuyo, ¿no vengo a quedar deshonorado, y, por el mismo consiguiente, sin vida? Escucha, amigo Anselmo, y ten paciencia de no responderme hasta que acabe de decirte lo que se me ofreciere acerca de lo que te ha pedido tu deseo; que tiempo quedará para que tú me repliques y yo te escuche.

»-Que me place -dijo Anselmo-: di lo que quisieres.

»Y Lotario prosiguió diciendo:

»-Paréceme, ¡oh Anselmo!, que tienes tú ahora el ingenio como el que siempre tienen los moros, a los cuales no se les puede dar a entender el error de su secta con las acotaciones de la Santa Escritura, ni con razones que consistan en especulación del entendimiento, ni que vayan fundadas en artículos de fe, sino que les han de traer ejemplos palpables, fáciles, intelegibles, demostrativos, indubitables, con demostraciones matemáticas que no se pueden negar, como cuando dicen: “Si de dos partes iguales quitamos partes iguales, las que quedan también son iguales”; y, cuando esto no entiendan de palabra, como, en efeto, no lo entienden, háseles de mostrar con las manos y ponérselo delante de los ojos, y, aun con todo esto, no basta nadie con ellos a persuadirles las verdades de mi sacra religión. Y este mismo término y modo me convendrá usar contigo, porque el deseo que en ti ha nacido va tan descaminado y tan fuera de todo aquello que tenga sombra de razonable, que me parece que ha de ser tiempo gastado el que ocupare en darte a entender tu simplicidad, que por ahora no le quiero dar otro nombre, y aun estoy por dejarte en tu desatino, en pena de tu mal deseo; mas no me deja usar deste rigor la amistad que te tengo, la cual no consiente que te deje puesto en tan manifiesto peligro de perderte. Y, porque claro lo veas, dime, Anselmo: ¿tú no me has dicho que tengo de solicitar a una retirada, persuadir a una honesta, ofrecer a una desinteresada, servir a una prudente? Sí que me lo has dicho. Pues si tú sabes que tienes mujer retirada, honesta, desinteresada y prudente, ¿qué buscas? Y si piensas que de todos mis asaltos ha de salir vencedora, como saldrá sin duda, ¿qué mejores títulos piensas darle después que los que ahora tiene, o qué será más después de lo que es ahora? O es que tú no la tienes por la que dices, o tú no sabes lo que pides. Si no la tienes por lo que dices, ¿para qué quieres probarla, sino, como a mala, hacer della lo que más te viniere en gusto? Mas si es tan buena como crees, impertinente cosa será hacer experiencia de la misma verdad, pues, después de hecha, se ha de quedar con la estimación que primero tenía. Así que, es razón concluyente que el intentar las cosas de las cuales antes nos puede suceder daño que provecho es de juicios sin discurso y temerarios, y más cuando quieren intentar aquellas a que no son forzados ni compelidos, y que de muy lejos traen descubierto que el intentarlas es manifiesta locura. Las cosas dificultosas se intentan por Dios, o por el mundo, o por entrambos a dos: las que se acometen por Dios son las que acometieron los santos, acometiendo a vivir vida de ángeles en cuerpos humanos; las que se acometen por respeto del mundo son las de aquellos que pasan tanta infinidad de agua, tanta diversidad de climas, tanta estrañeza de gentes, por adquirir estos que llaman bienes de fortuna. Y las que se intentan por Dios y por el mundo juntamente son aquellas de los valerosos soldados, que apenas veen en el contrario muro abierto tanto espacio cuanto es el que pudo hacer una redonda bala de artillería, cuando, puesto aparte todo temor, sin hacer discurso ni advertir al manifiesto peligro que les amenaza, llevados en vuelo de las alas del deseo de volver por su fe, por su nación y por su rey, se arrojan intrépidamente por la mitad de mil contrapuestas muertes que los esperan. Estas cosas son las que suelen intentarse, y es honra, gloria y provecho intentarlas, aunque tan llenas de inconvenientes y peligros. Pero la que tú dices que quieres intentar y poner por obra, ni te ha de alcanzar gloria de Dios, bienes de la fortuna, ni fama con los hombres; porque, puesto que salgas con ella como deseas, no has de quedar ni más ufano, ni más rico, ni más honrado que estás ahora; y si no sales, te has de ver en la mayor miseria que imaginarse pueda, porque no te ha de aprovechar pensar entonces que no sabe nadie la desgracia que te ha sucedido, porque bastará para afligirte y deshacerte que la sepas tú mismo. Y, para confirmación desta verdad, te quiero decir una estancia que hizo el famoso poeta Luis Tansilo, en el fin de su primera parte de Las lágrimas de San Pedro, que dice así:

Crece el dolor y crece la vergüenza
en Pedro, cuando el día se ha mostrado;
y, aunque allí no ve a nadie, se avergüenza
de sí mismo, por ver que había pecado:
que a un magnánimo pecho a haber vergüenza
no sólo ha de moverle el ser mirado;

que de sí se avergüenza cuando yerra,
si bien otro no ve que cielo y tierra.

»Así que, no escusarás con el secreto tu dolor; antes, tendrás que llorar continuo, si no lágrimas de los ojos, lágrimas de sangre del corazón, como las lloraba aquel simple doctor que nuestro poeta nos cuenta que hizo la prueba del vaso, que, con mejor discurso, se escusó de hacerla el prudente Reinaldos; que, puesto que aquello sea ficción poética, tiene en sí encerrados secretos morales dignos de ser advertidos y entendidos e imitados. Cuanto más que, con lo que ahora pienso decirte, acabarás de venir en conocimiento del grande error que quieres cometer. Dime, Anselmo, si el cielo, o la suerte buena, te hubiera hecho señor y legítimo posesor de un finísimo diamante, de cuya bondad y quilates estuviesen satisfechos cuantos lapidarios le vieses, y que todos a una voz y de común parecer dijese que llegaba en quilates, bondad y fineza a cuanto se podía estender la naturaleza de tal piedra, y tú mismo lo creyeses así, sin saber otra cosa en contrario, ¿sería justo que te viniese en deseo de tomar aquel diamante, y ponerle entre un ayunque y un martillo, y allí, a pura fuerza de golpes y brazos, probar si es tan duro y tan fino como dicen? Y más, si lo pusieses por obra; que, puesto caso que la piedra hiciese resistencia a tan necia prueba, no por eso se le añadiría más valor ni más fama; y si se rompiese, cosa que podría ser, ¿no se perdería todo? Sí, por cierto, dejando a su dueño en estimación de que todos le tengan por simple. Pues haz cuenta, Anselmo amigo, que Camila es finísimo diamante, así en tu estimación como en la ajena, y que no es razón ponerla en contingencia de que se quiebre, pues, aunque se quede con su entereza, no puede subir a más valor del que ahora tiene; y si faltase y no resistiese, considera desde ahora cuál quedarías sin ella, y con cuánta razón te podrías quejar de ti mismo, por haber sido causa de su perdición y la tuya. Mira que no hay joya en el mundo que tanto valga como la mujer casta y honrada, y que todo el honor de las mujeres consiste en la opinión buena que dellas se tiene; y, pues la de tu esposa es tal que llega al extremo de bondad que sabes, ¿para qué quieres poner esta verdad en duda? Mira, amigo, que la mujer es animal imperfecto, y que no se le han de poner embarazos donde tropiece y caiga, sino quitárselos y despejalle el camino de cualquier inconveniente, para que sin pesadumbre corra ligera a alcanzar la perfección que le falta, que consiste en el ser virtuosa. Cuentan los naturales que el arminio es un animalejo que tiene una piel blanquísima, y que cuando quieren cazarle, los cazadores usan deste artificio: que, sabiendo las partes por donde suele pasar y acudir, las atajan con lodo, y después, ojeándole, le encaminan hacia aquel lugar, y así como el arminio llega al lodo, se está quedo y se deja prender y cautivar, a trueco de no pasar por el cieno y perder y ensuciar su blancura, que la estima en más que la libertad y la vida. La honesta y casta mujer es arminio, y es más que nieve blanca y limpia la virtud de la honestidad; y el que quisiere que no la pierda, antes la guarde y conserve, ha de usar de otro estilo diferente que con el arminio se tiene, porque no le han de poner delante el cieno de los regalos y servicios de los importunos amantes, porque quizá, y aun sin quizá, no tiene tanta virtud y fuerza natural que pueda por sí misma atropellar y pasar por aquellos embarazos, y es necesario quitárselos y ponerle delante la limpieza de la virtud y la belleza que encierra en sí la buena fama. Es asimesmo la buena mujer como espejo de cristal luciente y claro; pero está sujeto a empañarse y escurecerse con cualquiera aliento que le toque. Hase de usar con la honesta mujer el estilo que con las reliquias: adorarlas y no tocarlas. Hase de guardar y estimar la mujer buena como se guarda y estima un hermoso jardín que está lleno de flores y rosas, cuyo dueño no consiente que nadie le pasee ni manosee; basta que desde lejos, y por entre las verjas de hierro, gocen de su fragancia y hermosura. Finalmente, quiero decirte unos versos que se me han venido a la memoria, que los oí en una comedia moderna, que me parece que hacen al propósito de lo que vamos tratando. Aconsejaba un prudente viejo a otro, padre de una doncella, que la recogiese, guardase y encerrase, y entre otras razones, le dijo éstas: Es de vidrio la mujer;

pero no se ha de probar
si se puede o no quebrar,
porque todo podría ser.

Y es más fácil el quebrarse,

y no es cordura ponerse

a peligro de romperse
lo que no puede soldarse.

Y en esta opinión estén
todos, y en razón la fundo:
que si hay Dánaes en el mundo,
hay pluvias de oro también.

»Cuanto hasta aquí te he dicho, ¡oh Anselmo!, ha sido por lo que a ti te toca; y ahora es bien que se oiga algo de lo que a mí me conviene; y si fuere largo, perdóname, que todo lo requiere el laberinto donde te has entrado y de donde quieres que yo te saque. Tú me tienes por amigo y quieres quitarme la honra, cosa que es contra toda amistad; y aun no sólo pretendes esto, sino que procuras que yo te la quite a ti. Que me la quieres quitar a mí está claro, pues, cuando Camila vea que yo la solicito, como me pides, cierto está que me ha de tener por hombre sin honra y mal mirado, pues intento y hago una cosa tan fuera de aquello que el ser quien soy y tu amistad me obliga. De que quieres que te la quite a ti no hay duda, porque, viendo Camila que yo la solicito, ha de pensar que yo he visto en ella alguna liviandad que me dio atrevimiento a descubrirle mi mal deseo; y, teniéndose por deshonorada, te toca a ti, como a cosa suya, su misma deshonor. Y de aquí nace lo que comúnmente se platica: que el marido de la mujer adúltera, puesto que él no lo sepa ni haya dado ocasión para que su mujer no sea la que debe, ni haya sido en su mano, ni en su descuido y poco recato estorbar su desgracia, con todo, le llaman y le nombran con nombre de vituperio y bajo; y en cierta manera le miran, los que la maldad de su mujer saben, con ojos de menosprecio, en cambio de mirarle con los de lástima, viendo que no por su culpa, sino por el gusto de su mala compañera, está en aquella desventura. Pero quíérote decir la causa por que con justa razón es deshonorado el marido de la mujer mala, aunque él no sepa que lo es, ni tenga culpa, ni haya sido parte, ni dado ocasión, para que ella lo sea. Y no te canses de oírme, que todo ha de redundar en tu provecho. Cuando Dios crió a nuestro primero padre en el Paraíso terrenal, dice la Divina Escritura que infundió Dios sueño en Adán, y que, estando durmiendo, le sacó una costilla del lado siniestro, de la cual formó a nuestra madre Eva; y, así como Adán despertó y la miró, dijo: “Ésta es carne de mi carne y hueso de mis huesos”. Y Dios dijo: “Por ésta dejará el hombre a su padre y madre, y serán dos en una carne misma”. Y entonces fue instituido el divino sacramento del matrimonio, con tales lazos, que sola la muerte puede desatarlos. Y tiene tanta fuerza y virtud este milagroso sacramento, que hace que dos diferentes personas sean una misma carne; y aún hace más en los buenos casados, que, aunque tienen dos almas, no tienen más de una voluntad. Y de aquí viene que, como la carne de la esposa sea una misma con la del esposo, las manchas que en ella caen, o los defectos que se procura, redundan en la carne del marido, aunque él no haya dado, como queda dicho, ocasión para aquel daño. Porque, así como el dolor del pie o de cualquier miembro del cuerpo humano le siente todo el cuerpo, por ser todo de una carne misma, y la cabeza siente el daño del tobillo, sin que ella se le haya causado, así el marido es participante de la deshonra de la mujer, por ser una misma cosa con ella. Y como las honras y deshonoras del mundo sean todas y nazcan de carne y sangre, y las de la mujer mala sean deste género, es forzoso que al marido le quepa parte dellas, y sea tenido por deshonorado sin que él lo sepa. Mira, pues, ¡oh Anselmo!, al peligro que te pones en querer turbar el sosiego en que tu buena esposa vive. Mira por cuán vana e impertinente curiosidad quieres revolver los humores que ahora están sosegados en el pecho de tu casta esposa. Advierte que lo que aventuras a ganar es poco, y que lo que perderás será tanto que lo dejaré en su punto, porque me faltan palabras para encarecerlo. Pero si todo cuanto he dicho no basta a moverte de tu mal propósito, bien puedes buscar otro instrumento de tu deshonra y desventura, que yo no pienso serlo, aunque por ello pierda tu amistad, que es la mayor pérdida que imaginar puedo.

»Calló, en diciendo esto, el virtuoso y prudente Lotario, y Anselmo quedó tan confuso y pensativo que por un buen espacio no le pudo responder palabra; pero, en fin, le dijo: »-Con la atención que has visto he escuchado, Lotario amigo, cuanto has querido decirme, y en tus razones, ejemplos y comparaciones he visto la mucha discreción que tienes y el extremo de la verdadera amistad que alcanzas; y ansimesmo veo y confieso que si no sigo tu parecer y me voy tras el mío, voy huyendo del bien y corriendo tras el mal. Prosupuesto esto, has de considerar que yo padezco ahora la enfermedad que suelen tener algunas mujeres, que se les antoja comer tierra, yeso, carbón y otras cosas peores, aun asquerosas para mirarse, cuanto más para comerse; así que, es menester usar de algún artificio para que yo sane, y esto se podía hacer con facilidad, sólo con que comiences, aunque tibia y fingidamente, a solicitar a Camila, la cual no ha de ser tan tierna que a los primeros encuentros dé con su honestidad por tierra; y con solo este principio quedaré contento y tú habrás cumplido con lo que debes a nuestra amistad, no solamente dándome la vida, sino persuadiéndome de no verme sin honra. Y estás obligado a hacer esto por una razón sola; y es que, estando yo, como estoy, determinado de poner en plática esta prueba, no has tú de consentir que yo dé cuenta de mi desatino a otra persona, con que pondría en aventura el honor que tú procuras que no pierda; y, cuando el tuyo no esté en el punto que debe en la intención de Camila en tanto que la solicitares, importa poco o nada, pues con brevedad, viendo en ella la entereza que esperamos, le podrás decir la pura verdad de nuestro artificio, con que volverá tu crédito al ser primero. Y, pues tan poco aventuras y tanto contento me puedes dar aventurándote, no lo dejes de hacer, aunque más inconvenientes se te pongan delante, pues, como ya he dicho, con sólo que comiences daré por concluida la causa.

»Viendo Lotario la resoluta voluntad de Anselmo, y no sabiendo qué más ejemplos traerle ni qué más razones mostrarle para que no la siguiese, y viendo que le amenazaba que daría a otro cuenta de su mal deseo, por evitar mayor mal, determinó de contentarle y hacer lo que le pedía, con propósito e intención de guiar aquel negocio de modo que, sin alterar los pensamientos de Camila, quedase Anselmo satisfecho; y así, le respondió que no comunicase su pensamiento con otro alguno, que él tomaba a su cargo aquella empresa, la cual comenzaría cuando a él le diese más gusto. Abrazóle Anselmo tierna y amorosamente, y agradecióle su ofrecimiento, como si alguna grande merced le hubiera hecho; y quedaron de acuerdo entre los dos que desde otro día siguiente se comenzase la obra; que él le daría lugar y tiempo como a sus solas pudiese hablar a Camila, y asimesmo le daría dineros y joyas que darla y que ofrecerla. Aconsejóle que le diese músicas, que escribiese versos en su alabanza, y que, cuando él no quisiese tomar trabajo de hacerlos, él mismo los haría. A todo se ofreció Lotario, bien con diferente intención que Anselmo pensaba.

»Y con este acuerdo se volvieron a casa de Anselmo, donde hallaron a Camila con ansia y cuidado, esperando a su esposo, porque aquel día tardaba en venir más de lo acostumbrado.

»Fuese Lotario a su casa, y Anselmo quedó en la suya, tan contento como Lotario fue pensativo, no sabiendo qué traza dar para salir bien de aquel impertinente negocio. Pero aquella noche pensó el modo que tendría para engañar a Anselmo, sin ofender a Camila; y otro día vino a comer con su amigo, y fue bien recibido de Camila, la cual le recibía y regalaba con mucha voluntad, por entender la buena que su esposo le tenía.

»Acabaron de comer, levantaron los manteles y Anselmo dijo a Lotario que se quedase allí con Camila, en tanto que él iba a un negocio forzoso, que dentro de hora y media volvería. Rogóle Camila que no se fuese y Lotario se ofreció a hacerle compañía, más nada aprovechó con Anselmo; antes, importunó a Lotario que se quedase y le aguardase, porque tenía que tratar con él una cosa de mucha importancia. Dijo también a Camila que no dejase solo a Lotario en tanto que él volviese. En efeto, él supo tan bien fingir la necesidad, o necedad, de su ausencia, que nadie pudiera entender que era fingida. Fuese Anselmo, y quedaron solos a la mesa Camila y Lotario, porque la demás gente de casa toda se había ido a comer. Viose Lotario puesto en la estacada que su amigo deseaba y con el enemigo delante, que pudiera vencer con sola su hermosura a un escuadrón de caballeros armados: mirad si era razón que le temiera Lotario.

»Pero lo que hizo fue poner el codo sobre el brazo de la silla y la mano abierta en la mejilla, y, pidiendo perdón a Camila del mal comedimiento, dijo que quería reposar un poco en tanto que Anselmo volvía. Camila le respondió que mejor reposaría en el estrado que en la silla, y así, le rogó se entrase a dormir en él. No quiso Lotario, y allí se quedó dormido hasta que volvió Anselmo, el cual, como halló a Camila en su aposento y a Lotario durmiendo, creyó que, como se había tardado tanto, ya habrían tenido los dos lugar para hablar, y aun para dormir, y no vio la hora en que Lotario despertase, para volverse con él fuera y preguntarle de su ventura.

»Todo le sucedió como él quiso: Lotario despertó, y luego salieron los dos de casa, y así, le preguntó lo que deseaba, y le respondió Lotario que no le había parecido ser bien que la primera vez se descubriese del todo; y así, no había hecho otra cosa que alabar a Camila de hermosa, diciéndole que en toda la ciudad no se trataba de otra cosa que de su hermosura y discreción, y que éste le había parecido buen principio para entrar ganando la voluntad, y disponiéndola a que otra vez le escuchase con gusto, usando en esto del artificio que el demonio usa cuando quiere engañar a alguno que está puesto en atalaya de mirar por sí: que se transforma en ángel de luz, siéndolo él de tinieblas, y, poniéndole delante apariencias buenas, al cabo descubre quién es y sale con su intención, si a los principios no es descubierto su engaño. Todo esto le contentó mucho a Anselmo, y dijo que cada día daría el mismo lugar, aunque no saliese de casa, porque en ella se ocuparía en cosas que Camila no pudiese venir en conocimiento de su artificio.

»Sucedió, pues, que se pasaron muchos días que, sin decir Lotario palabra a Camila, respondía a Anselmo que la hablaba y jamás podía sacar della una pequeña muestra de venir en ninguna cosa que mala fuese, ni aun dar una señal de sombra de esperanza; antes, decía que le amenazaba que si de aquel mal pensamiento no se quitaba, que lo había de decir a su esposo.

»-Bien está -dijo Anselmo-. Hasta aquí ha resistido Camila a las palabras; es menester ver cómo resiste a las obras: yo os daré mañana dos mil escudos de oro para que se los ofrezcáis, y aun se los deis, y otros tantos para que compréis joyas con que cebarla; que las mujeres suelen ser aficionadas, y más si son hermosas, por más castas que sean, a esto de traerse bien y andar galanas; y si ella resiste a esta tentación, yo quedaré satisfecho y no os daré más pesadumbre.

»Lotario respondió que ya que había comenzado, que él llevaría hasta el fin aquella empresa, puesto que entendía salir della cansado y vencido. Otro día recibió los cuatro mil escudos, y con ellos cuatro mil confusiones, porque no sabía qué decirse para mentir de nuevo; pero, en efeto, determinó de decirle que Camila estaba tan entera a las dádivas y promesas como a las palabras, y que no había para qué cansarse más, porque todo el tiempo se gastaba en balde.

»Pero la suerte, que las cosas guiaba de otra manera, ordenó que, habiendo dejado Anselmo solos a Lotario y a Camila, como otras veces solía, él se encerró en un aposento y por los agujeros de la cerradura estuvo mirando y escuchando lo que los dos trataban, y vio que en más de media hora Lotario no habló palabra a Camila, ni se la hablara si allí estuviera un siglo, y cayó en la cuenta de que cuanto su amigo le había dicho de las respuestas de Camila todo era ficción y mentira. Y, para ver si esto era así, salió del aposento, y, llamando a Lotario aparte, le preguntó qué nuevas había y de qué temple estaba Camila. Lotario le respondió que no pensaba más darle puntada en aquel negocio, porque respondía tan áspera y desabridamente, que no tendría ánimo para volver a decirle cosa alguna.

»-¡Ah! -dijo Anselmo-, Lotario, Lotario, y cuán mal correspondest a lo que me debes y a lo mucho que de ti confío! Ahora te he estado mirando por el lugar que concede la entrada desta llave, y he visto que no has dicho palabra a Camila, por donde me doy a entender que aun las primeras le tienes por decir; y si esto es así, como sin duda lo es, ¿para qué me engañas, o por qué quieres quitarme con tu industria los medios que yo podría hallar para conseguir mi deseo?

»No dijo más Anselmo, pero bastó lo que había dicho para dejar corrido y confuso a Lotario; el cual, casi como tomando por punto de honra el haber sido hallado en mentira, juró a Anselmo que desde aquel momento tomaba tan a su cargo el contentalle y no mentille, cual lo vería si con curiosidad lo espiaba; cuanto más, que no sería menester usar de ninguna diligencia, porque la que él pensaba poner en satisfacelle le quitaría de toda sospecha. Creyóle Anselmo, y para dalle comodidad más segura y menos sobresaltada, determinó de hacer ausencia de su casa por ocho días, yéndose a la de un amigo suyo, que estaba en una aldea, no lejos de la ciudad, con el cual amigo concertó que le enviase a llamar con muchas veras, para tener ocasión con Camila de su partida.

»¡Desdichado y mal advertido de ti, Anselmo! ¿Qué es lo que haces? ¿Qué es lo que trazas? ¿Qué es lo que ordenas? Mira que haces contra ti mismo, trazando tu deshonor y ordenando tu perdición. Buena es tu esposa Camila, quieta y sosegadamente la posees, nadie sobresalta tu gusto, sus pensamientos no salen de las paredes de su casa, tú eres su cielo en la tierra, el blanco de sus deseos, el cumplimiento de sus gustos y la medida por donde mide su voluntad, ajustándola en todo con la tuya y con la del cielo. Pues si la mina de su honor, hermosura, honestidad y recogimiento te da sin ningún trabajo toda la riqueza que tiene y tú puedes desear, ¿para qué quieres ahondar la tierra y buscar nuevas vetas de nuevo y nunca visto tesoro, poniéndote a peligro que toda venga abajo, pues, en fin, se sustenta sobre los débiles arrimos de su flaca naturaleza? Mira que el que busca lo imposible es justo que lo posible se le niegue, como lo dijo mejor un poeta, diciendo:

Busco en la muerte la vida,
salud en la enfermedad,
en la prisión libertad,

en lo cerrado salida
y en el traidor lealtad.
Pero mi suerte, de quien
jamás espero algún bien,

con el cielo ha estatuido que, pues lo imposible pido,
lo posible aun no me den.

»Fuese otro día Anselmo a la aldea, dejando dicho a Camila que el tiempo que él estuviese ausente vendría Lotario a mirar por su casa y a comer con ella; que tuviese cuidado de tratalle como a su misma persona. Afligióse Camila, como mujer discreta y honrada, de la orden que su marido le dejaba, y díjole que advirtiese que no estaba bien que nadie, él ausente, ocupase la silla de su mesa, y que si lo hacía por no tener confianza que ella sabría gobernar su casa, que probase por aquella vez, y vería por experiencia como para mayores cuidados era bastante. Anselmo le replicó que aquél era su gusto, y que no tenía más que hacer que bajar la cabeza y obedecelle. Camila dijo que así lo haría, aunque contra su voluntad.

»Partióse Anselmo, y otro día vino a su casa Lotario, donde fue rescebido de Camila con amoroso y honesto acogimiento; la cual jamás se puso en parte donde Lotario la viese a solas, porque siempre andaba rodeada de sus criados y criadas, especialmente de una doncella suya, llamada Leonela, a quien ella mucho quería, por haberse criado desde niñas las dos juntas en casa de los padres de Camila, y cuando se casó con Anselmo la trujo consigo.

»En los tres días primeros nunca Lotario le dijo nada, aunque pudiera, cuando se levantaban los manteles y la gente se iba a comer con mucha priesa, porque así se lo tenía mandado Camila. Y aun tenía orden Leonela que comiese primero que Camila, y que de su lado jamás se quitase; mas ella, que en otras cosas de su gusto tenía puesto el pensamiento y había menester aquellas horas y aquel lugar para ocuparle en sus contentos, no cumplía todas veces el mandamiento de su señora; antes, los dejaba solos, como si aquello le hubieran mandado. Mas la honesta presencia de Camila, la gravedad de su rostro, la compostura de su persona era tanta, que ponía freno a la lengua de Lotario.

»Pero el provecho que las muchas virtudes de Camila hicieron, poniendo silencio en la lengua de Lotario, redundó más en daño de los dos, porque si la lengua callaba, el pensamiento discurría y tenía lugar de contemplar, parte por parte, todos los extremos de bondad y de hermosura que Camila tenía, bastantes a enamorar una estatua de mármol, no que un corazón de carne.

»Mirábala Lotario en el lugar y espacio que había de hablarla, y consideraba cuán digna era de ser amada; y esta consideración comenzó poco a poco a dar asaltos a los respetos que a Anselmo tenía, y mil veces quiso ausentarse de la

ciudad y irse donde jamás Anselmo le viese a él, ni él viese a Camila; mas ya le hacía impedimento y detenía el gusto que hallaba en mirarla. Hacíase fuerza y peleaba consigo mismo por desechar y no sentir el contento que le llevaba a mirar a Camila. Culpábase a solas de su desatino, llamábase mal amigo y aun mal cristiano; hacía discursos y comparaciones entre él y Anselmo, y todos paraban en decir que más había sido la locura y confianza de Anselmo que su poca fidelidad, y que si así tuviera disculpa para con Dios como para con los hombres de lo que pensaba hacer, que no temiera pena por su culpa.

»En efecto, la hermosura y la bondad de Camila, juntamente con la ocasión que el ignorante marido le había puesto en las manos, dieron con la lealtad de Lotario en tierra. Y, sin mirar a otra cosa que aquella a que su gusto le inclinaba, al cabo de tres días de la ausencia de Anselmo, en los cuales estuvo en continua batalla por resistir a sus deseos, comenzó a requebrar a Camila, con tanta turbación y con tan amorosas razones que Camila quedó suspensa, y no hizo otra cosa que levantarse de donde estaba y entrarse a su aposento, sin respondelle palabra alguna. Mas no por esta sequedad se desmayó en Lotario la esperanza, que siempre nace juntamente con el amor; antes, tuvo en más a Camila. La cual, habiendo visto en Lotario lo que jamás pensara, no sabía qué hacerse. Y, pareciéndole no ser cosa segura ni bien hecha darle ocasión ni lugar a que otra vez la hablase, determinó de enviar aquella misma noche, como lo hizo, a un criado suyo con un billete a Anselmo, donde le escribió estas razones:

Capítulo XXXIV

Donde se prosigue la novela del Curioso impertinente

»ASÍ como suele decirse que parece mal el ejército sin su general y el castillo sin su castellano, digo yo que parece muy peor la mujer casada y moza sin su marido, cuando justísimas ocasiones no lo impiden. Yo me hallo tan mal sin vos, y tan imposibilitada de no poder sufrir esta ausencia, que si presto no venís, me habré de ir a entretener en casa de mis padres, aunque deje sin guarda la vuestra; porque la que me dejastes, si es que quedó con tal título, creo que mira más por su gusto que por lo que a vos os toca; y, pues sois discreto, no tengo más que deciros, ni aun es bien que más os diga.

»Esta carta recibió Anselmo, y entendió por ella que Lotario había ya comenzado la empresa, y que Camila debía de haber respondido como él deseaba; y, alegre sobremanera de tales nuevas, respondió a Camila, de palabra, que no hiciese mudamiento de su casa en modo ninguno, porque él volvería con mucha brevedad. Admirada quedó Camila de la respuesta de Anselmo, que la puso en más confusión que primero, porque ni se atrevía a estar en su casa, ni menos irse a la de sus padres; porque en la quedada corría peligro su honestidad, y en la ida iba contra el mandamiento de su esposo.

»En fin, se resolvió en lo que le estuvo peor, que fue en el quedarse, con determinación de no huir la presencia de Lotario, por no dar que decir a sus criados; y ya le pesaba de haber escrito lo que escribió a su esposo, temerosa de que no pensase que Lotario había visto en ella alguna desenvoltura que le hubiese movido a no guardalle el decoro que debía. Pero, fiada en su bondad, se fió en Dios y en su buen pensamiento, con que pensaba resistir callando a todo aquello que Lotario decirle quisiese, sin dar más cuenta a su marido, por no ponerle en alguna pendencia y trabajo. Y aun andaba buscando manera como disculpar a Lotario con Anselmo, cuando le preguntase la ocasión que le había movido a escribirle aquel papel. Con estos pensamientos, más honrados que acertados ni provechosos, estuvo otro día escuchando a Lotario, el cual cargó la mano de manera que comenzó a titubear la firmeza de Camila, y su honestidad tuvo hartos que hacer en acudir a los ojos, para que no diesen muestra de alguna amorosa compasión que las lágrimas y las razones de Lotario en su pecho habían despertado. Todo esto notaba Lotario, y todo le encendía.

»Finalmente, a él le pareció que era menester, en el espacio y lugar que daba

la ausencia de Anselmo, apretar el cerco a aquella fortaleza. Y así, acometió a su presunción con las alabanzas de su hermosura, porque no hay cosa que más presto rinda y allane las encastilladas torres de la vanidad de las hermosas que la misma vanidad, puesta en las lenguas de la adulación. En efecto, él, con toda diligencia, minó la roca de su entereza, con tales pertrechos que, aunque Camila fuera toda de bronce, viniera al suelo. Lloró, rogó, ofreció, aduló, porfió, y fingió Lotario con tantos sentimientos, con muestras de tantas veras, que dio al través con el recato de Camila y vino a triunfar de lo que menos se pensaba y más deseaba.

»Rindióse Camila, Camila se rindió; pero ¿qué mucho, si la amistad de Lotario no quedó en pie? Ejemplo claro que nos muestra que sólo se vence la pasión amorosa con huilla, y que nadie se ha de poner a brazos con tan poderoso enemigo, porque es menester fuerzas divinas para vencer las suyas humanas. Sólo supo Leonela la flaqueza de su señora, porque no se la pudieron encubrir los dos malos amigos y nuevos amantes. No quiso Lotario decir a Camila la pretensión de Anselmo, ni que él le había dado lugar para llegar a aquel punto, porque no tuviese en menos su amor y pensase que así, acaso y sin pensar, y no de propósito, la había solicitado.

»Volvió de allí a pocos días Anselmo a su casa, y no echó de ver lo que faltaba en ella, que era lo que en menos tenía y más estimaba. Fuese luego a ver a Lotario, y hallóle en su casa; abrazáronse los dos, y el uno preguntó por las nuevas de su vida o de su muerte.

»-Las nuevas que te podré dar, ¡oh amigo Anselmo! -dijo Lotario-, son de que tienes una mujer que dignamente puede ser ejemplo y corona de todas las mujeres buenas. Las palabras que le he dicho se las ha llevado el aire, los ofrecimientos se han tenido en poco, las dádivas no se han admitido, de algunas lágrimas fingidas más se ha hecho burla notable. En resolución, así como Camila es cifra de toda belleza, es archivo donde asiste la honestidad y vive el comedimiento y el recato, y todas las virtudes que pueden hacer loable y bien afortunada a una honrada mujer. Vuelve a tomar tus dineros, amigo, que aquí los tengo, sin haber tenido necesidad de tocar a ellos; que la entereza de Camila no se rinde a cosas tan bajas como son dádivas ni promesas. Conténtate, Anselmo, y no quieras hacer más pruebas de las hechas; y, pues a pie enjuto has pasado el mar de las dificultades y sospechas que de las mujeres suelen y pueden tenerse, no quieras entrar de nuevo en el profundo piélago de nuevos inconvenientes, ni quieras hacer experiencia con otro piloto de la bondad y fortaleza del navío que el cielo te dio en suerte para que en él pasases la mar deste mundo, sino haz cuenta que estás ya en seguro puerto, y aférrate con las áncoras de la buena consideración, y déjate estar hasta que te vengan a pedir la deuda que no hay hidalguía humana que de pagarla se escuse.

»Contentísimo quedó Anselmo de las razones de Lotario, y así se las creyó como si fueran dichas por algún oráculo. Pero, con todo eso, le rogó que no dejase la empresa, aunque no fuese más de por curiosidad y entretenimiento, aunque no se aprovechase de allí adelante de tan ahincadas diligencias como hasta entonces; y que sólo quería que le escribiese algunos versos en su alabanza, debajo del nombre de Clori, porque él le daría a entender a Camila que andaba enamorado de una dama, a quien le había puesto aquel nombre por poder celebrarla con el decoro que a su honestidad se le debía; y que, cuando Lotario no quisiera tomar trabajo de escribir los versos, que él los haría.

»-No será menester eso -dijo Lotario-, pues no me son tan enemigas las musas que algunos ratos del año no me visiten. Dile tú a Camila lo que has dicho del fingimiento de mis amores, que los versos yo los haré; si no tan buenos como el sujeto merece, serán, por lo menos, los mejores que yo pudiere.

»Quedaron deste acuerdo el impertinente y el traidor amigo; y, vuelto Anselmo a su casa, preguntó a Camila lo que ella ya se maravillaba que no se lo hubiese preguntado: que fue que le dijese la ocasión por que le había escrito el papel que le envió. Camila le respondió que le había parecido que Lotario la miraba un poco más desenvueltamente que cuando él estaba en casa; pero que ya estaba desengañada y creía que había sido imaginación suya, porque ya Lotario huía de vella y de estar con ella a solas. Díjole Anselmo que bien podía estar segura de aquella sospecha, porque él sabía que Lotario andaba enamorado de una doncella principal de la ciudad, a quien él celebraba debajo del nombre de Clori, y que, aunque no lo estuviera, no había que temer de la verdad de Lotario y de la mucha amistad de entrambos. Y, a no estar avisada Camila de Lotario de que eran fingidos aquellos amores de Clori, y que él se lo había dicho a Anselmo por poder ocuparse algunos ratos en las mismas alabanzas de Camila, ella, sin duda, cayera en la desesperada red de los celos; mas, por estar ya advertida, pasó aquel sobresalto sin pesadumbre.

»Otro día, estando los tres sobre mesa, rogó Anselmo a Lotario dijese alguna cosa de las que había compuesto a su amada Clori; que, pues Camila no la conocía, seguramente podía decir lo que quisiese.

»-Aunque la conociera -respondió Lotario-, no encubriera yo nada, porque cuando algún amante loa a su dama de hermosa y la nota de cruel, ningún oprobrio hace a su buen crédito. Pero, sea lo que fuere, lo que sé decir, que ayer hice un soneto a la ingratitud desta Clori, que dice así:

SONETO

En el silencio de la noche, cuando
ocupa el dulce sueño a los mortales,
la pobre cuenta de mis ricos males
estoy al cielo y a mi Clori dando.

Y, al tiempo cuando el sol se va mostrando 5
por las rosadas puertas orientales,
con suspiros y acentos desiguales,
voy la antigua querella renovando.

Y cuando el sol, de su estrellado asiento,
derechos rayos a la tierra envía, 10
el llanto crece y doblo los gemidos.

Vuelve la noche, y vuelvo al triste cuento,
y siempre hallo, en mi mortal porfía, al cielo, sordo; a Clori, sin oídos.

»Bien le pareció el soneto a Camila, pero mejor a Anselmo, pues le alabó, y dijo que era demasiadamente cruel la dama que a tan claras verdades no correspondía. A lo que dijo Camila:

»-Luego, ¿todo aquello que los poetas enamorados dicen es verdad?

»-En cuanto poetas, no la dicen -respondió Lotario-; mas, en cuanto enamorados, siempre quedan tan cortos como verdaderos.

»-No hay duda deso -replicó Anselmo, todo por apoyar y acreditar los pensamientos de Lotario con Camila, tan descuidada del artificio de Anselmo como ya enamorada de Lotario.

»Y así, con el gusto que de sus cosas tenía, y más, teniendo por entendido que sus deseos y escritos a ella se encaminaban, y que ella era la verdadera Clori, le rogó que si otro soneto o otros versos sabía, los dijese:

»-Sí sé -respondió Lotario-, pero no creo que es tan bueno como el primero, o, por mejor decir, menos malo. Y podréislo bien juzgar, pues es éste:

SONETO

Yo sé que muero; y si no soy creído,
es más cierto el morir, como es más cierto
verme a tus pies, ¡oh bella ingrata!, muerto,
antes que de adorarte arrepentido.

Podré yo verme en la región de olvido, 5
de vida y gloria y de favor desierto,
y allí verse podrá en mi pecho abierto
cómo tu hermoso rostro está esculpido.

Que esta reliquia guardo para el duro trance que me amenaza mi porfía, 10
que en tu mismo rigor se fortalece.

¡Ay de aquel que navega, el cielo oscuro,
por mar no usado y peligrosa vía,
adonde norte o puerto no se ofrece!

»También alabó este segundo soneto Anselmo, como había hecho el primero, y desta manera iba añadiendo eslabón a eslabón a la cadena con que se enlazaba y trababa su deshonor, pues cuando más Lotario le deshonoraba, entonces le decía que estaba más honrado; y, con esto, todos los escalones que Camila bajaba hacia el centro de su menosprecio, los subía, en la opinión de su marido, hacia la cumbre de la virtud y de su buena fama.

»Sucedió en esto que, hallándose una vez, entre otras, sola Camila con su doncella, le dijo:

»-Corrida estoy, amiga Leonela, de ver en cuán poco he sabido estimarme, pues siquiera no hice que con el tiempo comprara Lotario la entera posesión que le di tan presto de mi voluntad. Temo que ha de estimar mi presteza o ligereza, sin que eche de ver la fuerza que él me hizo para no poder resistirle.

»-No te dé pena eso, señora mía -respondió Leonela-, que no está la monta, ni es causa para menguar la estimación, darse lo que se da presto, si, en efecto, lo que se da es bueno, y ello por sí digno de estimarse. Y aun suele decirse que el que luego da, da dos veces.

»-También se suele decir -dijo Camila- que lo que cuesta poco se estima en menos.

»-No corre por ti esa razón -respondió Leonela-, porque el amor, según he oído decir, unas veces vuela y otras anda, con éste corre y con aquél va despacio,

a unos entibia y a otros abrasa, a unos hiere y a otros mata, en un mismo punto comienza la carrera de sus deseos y en aquel mismo punto la acaba y concluye, por la mañana suele poner el cerco a una fortaleza y a la noche la tiene rendida, porque no hay fuerza que le resista. Y, siendo así, ¿de qué te espantas, o de qué temes, si lo mismo debe de haber acontecido a Lotario, habiendo tomado el amor por instrumento de rendirnos la ausencia de mi señor? Y era forzoso que en ella se concluyese lo que el amor tenía determinado, sin dar tiempo al tiempo para que Anselmo le tuviese de volver, y con su presencia quedase imperfecta la obra. Porque el amor no tiene otro mejor ministro para ejecutar lo que desea que es la ocasión: de la ocasión se sirve en todos sus hechos, principalmente en los principios. Todo esto sé yo muy bien, más de experiencia que de oídas, y algún día te lo diré, señora, que yo también soy de carne y de sangre moza. Cuanto más, señora Camila, que no te entregaste ni diste tan luego, que primero no hubieses visto en los ojos, en los suspiros, en las razones y en las promesas y dádivas de Lotario toda su alma, viendo en ella y en sus virtudes cuán digno era Lotario de ser amado. Pues si esto es así, no te asalten la imaginación esos escrupulosos y melindrosos pensamientos, sino asegúrate que Lotario te estima como tú le estimas a él, y vive con contento y satisfacción de que, ya que caíste en el lazo amoroso, es el que te aprieta de valor y de estima. Y que no sólo tiene las cuatro eses que dicen que han de tener los buenos enamorados, sino todo un ABC entero: si no, escúchame y verás como te le digo de coro. Él es, según yo veo y a mí me parece, agradecido, bueno, caballero, dadivoso, enamorado, firme, gallardo, honrado, ilustre, leal, mozo, noble, onesto, principal, quantioso, rico, y las eses que dicen; y luego, tácito, verdadero. La X no le cuadra, porque es letra áspera; la Y ya está dicha; la Z, zelador de tu honra.

»Rióse Camila del ABC de su doncella, y túvola por más plática en las cosas de amor que ella decía; y así lo confesó ella, descubriendo a Camila como trataba amores con un mancebo bien nacido, de la misma ciudad; de lo cual se turbó Camila, temiendo que era aquél camino por donde su honra podía correr riesgo. Apuróla si pasaban sus pláticas a más que serlo. Ella, con poca vergüenza y mucha desenvoltura, le respondió que sí pasaban; porque es cosa ya cierta que los descuidos de las señoras quitan la vergüenza a las criadas, las cuales, cuando ven a las amas echar traspiés, no se les da nada a ellas de cojear, ni de que lo sepan.

»No pudo hacer otra cosa Camila sino rogar a Leonela no dijese nada de su hecho al que decía ser su amante, y que tratase sus cosas con secreto, porque no viniesen a noticia de Anselmo ni de Lotario. Leonela respondió que así lo haría, mas cumpliólo de manera que hizo cierto el temor de Camila de que por ella había de perder su crédito. Porque la deshonesta y atrevida Leonela, después que vio que el proceder de su ama no era el que solía, atrevióse a entrar y poner dentro de casa a su amante, confiada que, aunque su señora le viese, no había de osar descubrirle; que este daño acarrear, entre otros, los pecados de las señoras: que se hacen esclavas de sus mismas criadas y se obligan a encubrirles sus deshonestidades y vilezas, como aconteció con Camila; que, aunque vio una y muchas veces que su Leonela estaba con su galán en un aposento de su casa, no sólo no la osaba reñir, mas dábale lugar a que lo encerrase, y quitábale todos los estorbos, para que no fuese visto de su marido.

»Pero no los pudo quitar que Lotario no le viese una vez salir, al romper del alba; el cual, sin conocer quién era, pensó primero que debía de ser alguna fantasma; mas, cuando le vio caminar, embozarse y encubrirse con cuidado y recato, cayó de su simple pensamiento y dio en otro, que fuera la perdición de todos si Camila no lo remediara. Pensó Lotario que aquel hombre que había visto salir tan a deshora de casa de Anselmo no había entrado en ella por Leonela, ni aun se acordó si Leonela era en el mundo; sólo creyó que Camila, de la misma manera que había sido fácil y ligera con él, lo era para otro; que estas añadiduras trae consigo la maldad de la mujer mala: que pierde el crédito de su honra con el mismo a quien se entregó rogada y persuadida, y cree que con mayor facilidad se entrega a otros, y da infalible crédito a cualquiera sospecha que desto le venga. Y no parece sino que le faltó a Lotario en este punto todo su buen entendimiento, y se le fueron de la memoria todos sus advertidos discursos, pues, sin hacer alguno que bueno fuese, ni aun razonable, sin más ni más, antes que Anselmo se levantara, impaciente y ciego de la celosa rabia que las entrañas le roía, muriendo por vengarse de Camila, que en ninguna cosa le había ofendido, se fue a Anselmo y le dijo:

»-Sábet, Anselmo, que ha muchos días que he andado peleando conmigo mismo, haciéndome fuerza a no decirte lo que ya no es posible ni justo que más te encubra. Sábet que la fortaleza de Camila está ya rendida y sujeta a todo aquello que yo quisiere hacer della; y si he tardado en descubrirete esta verdad, ha sido por ver si era algún liviano antojo suyo, o si lo hacía por probarme y ver si eran con propósito firme tratados los amores que, con tu licencia, con ella he comenzado. Creí, ansimismo, que ella, si fuera la que debía y la que entrambos pensábamos, ya te hubiera dado cuenta de mi solicitud, pero, habiendo visto que se tarda, conozco que son verdaderas las promesas que me ha dado de que, cuando otra vez hagas ausencia de tu casa, me hablará en la recámara, donde está el repuesto de tus alhajas -y era la verdad, que allí le solía hablar Camila-; y no quiero que precipitosamente corras a hacer alguna venganza, pues no está aún cometido el pecado sino con pensamiento, y podría ser que, desde éste hasta el tiempo de ponerle por obra, se mudase el de Camila y naciese en su lugar el arrepentimiento. Y así, ya que, en todo o en parte, has seguido siempre mis consejos, sigue y guarda uno que ahora te diré, para que sin engaño y con medroso advertimento te satisfagas de aquello que más vieres que te convenga. Finge que te ausentas por dos o tres días, como otras veces sueles, y haz de manera que te quedes escondido en tu recámara, pues los tapices que allí hay y otras cosas con que te puedas encubrir te ofrecen mucha comodidad, y entonces verás por tus mismos ojos, y yo por los míos, lo que Camila quiere; y si fuere la maldad que se puede temer antes que esperar, con silencio, sagacidad y discreción podrás ser el verdugo de tu agravio.

»Absorto, suspenso y admirado quedó Anselmo con las razones de Lotario, porque le cogieron en tiempo donde menos las esperaba oír, porque ya tenía a Camila por vencedora de los fingidos asaltos de Lotario y comenzaba a gozar la gloria del vencimiento. Callando estuvo por un buen espacio, mirando al suelo sin mover pestaña, y al cabo dijo:

»-Tú lo has hecho, Lotario, como yo esperaba de tu amistad; en todo he de seguir tu consejo: haz lo que quisieres y guarda aquel secreto que ves que conviene en caso tan no pensado.

